In your complaint, you must identify yourself as the plaintiff (the party who is bringing the suit). You also have to identify the defendant(s) (the party or parties you are suing)[278] and state the grounds for your complaint (the defendant's actions that violated your constitutional or other rights). You must specifically state which of your constitutional or federal statutory rights were violated. You also must inform the court what laws give it the power or "jurisdiction" to hear your suit. If you are suing in federal court, you must state in your complaint that 28 U.S.C. §§ 1331[279] and 1343(a)(3)[280] give the federal district courts jurisdiction over 42 U.S.C. § 1983 cases. You also have to inform the court of the type of relief you are seeking—damages, injunctive relief, or declaratory relief. See Part C(1) of this Chapter for information on the types of relief available.

The Federal Rules of Civil Procedure require you to make a "short and plain statement" of your claim in the complaint.[281] In your complaint, you should include a reasonably specific description of the incident or practice that is the basis for your claim. Give the court specific details such as names, dates, locations, and injuries suffered. Details help convince the court that you "state a claim for relief" and that your claim should not be dismissed. In particular, your complaint should indicate how each person you name as a defendant was involved in the violation you are complaining about. Being clear about the facts will allow the court to apply the law more accurately to your claim. The federal courts are under a duty to read prisoner pro se complaints generously, giving you every benefit of the doubt in stating a claim for which relief can be granted.[282] Still, it is in your best interest to write your complaint and state its legal basis as clearly as you can.

You are not legally required to prove the facts behind your complaint at the time that you file it. But remember, it is very important to explain what happened or is happening to you as clearly as possible. You can use affidavits to do this. If you do, your complaint must refer to the affidavits and you must include copies of them with your complaint for each defendant to get along with your complaint. Appendix A-3 of this Chapter contains a sample affidavit.

---

278. You should name the defendants using their full, proper names. If you do not know a defendant's full name, write down whatever identifying information you do know, such as his nickname, badge number, official position or duties, etc. Only defendants who have been adequately identified can be served with the summons and complaint. For more information on what you should do if you do not know a defendant's name, see Part C(2)(a) of this Chapter.

279. 28 U.S.C. § 1331 (2006) ("The district courts shall have original jurisdiction of all civil actions arising under the Constitution, laws, or treaties of the United States.").

280. 28 U.S.C. § 1343(a)(3) (2006) ("The district courts shall have original jurisdiction of any civil action authorized by law to be commenced by any person: To redress the deprivation, under color of any State law, statute, ordinance, regulation, custom or usage, of any right, privilege or immunity secured by the Constitution of the United States.").

281. Fed. R. Civ. P. 8(a) ("A pleading which sets forth a claim for relief … shall contain (1) a short and plain statement of the grounds for the court's jurisdiction … (2) a short and plain statement of the claim showing that the pleader is entitled to relief, and (3) a demand for the relief sought, which may include relief in the alternative or different types of relief").

282. See Haines v. Kerner, 404 U.S. 519, 520–21, 92 S. Ct. 594, 595–96, 30 L. Ed. 2d 652, 654 (1972) (stating that prisoner should be allowed opportunity to offer proof unless it appears beyond doubt that prisoner can prove no facts to support his claim); Pabon v. Wright, 459 F.3d 241, 248 (2d Cir. 2006) ("We construe complaints filed by pro se litigants liberally and interpret them to raise the strongest arguments that they suggest.") (internal quotations and citations omitted); Hall v. Bellmon, 935 F.2d 1106, 1110 (10th Cir. 1991) ("A pro se litigant's pleadings are to be construed liberally and held to a less stringent standard than formal pleadings drafted by lawyers. We believe that this rule means that if the court can reasonably read the pleadings to state a valid claim on which the plaintiff could prevail, it should do so.").

(b) Including Supplemental State Claims in Your Complaint

You may want to add some supplemental state law claims to your federal claim. A state law claim is "supplemental" to a federal constitutional or statutory violation if it involves the same facts.[283] A federal court will consider a supplemental state claim if it is attached to a non-frivolous federal claim.[284] For example, you could file a single complaint claiming that prison officials failed to prevent another prisoner from assaulting you in violation of your Eighth Amendment rights and that the officials were negligent under state tort law.[285]

Note that in New York you cannot add a supplemental claim when suing a state corrections officer in his individual capacity in federal or state court for acts he committed within the scope of his employment.[286] But if your claim is based on conduct that was not within the scope of the officer's employment, you can add a supplemental state law claim.[287] You can also add a supplemental state claim when suing county or city corrections personnel. If you want to add supplemental state claims to your lawsuit, you should research the law in your own state to find out whether your state also limits your ability to add state claims to Section 1983 suits against particular kinds of defendants.

Bringing a supplemental state claim in federal court can save you time and effort, but there are three potential disadvantages. First, the federal courts cannot grant an injunction against a state official when the claim against that official is based on a supplemental state law claim.[288] If you want to get an injunction against a state official based on a state law claim, you must bring that state law claim in state court. Second, you cannot use Section 1983 to sue a state official in his official capacity for damages in federal court.[289] Similarly, you cannot use state law to sue a state official in his official capacity for damages in federal court. However, most federal courts permit damage claims against state officials sued in their individual capacities based on state law.[290]

---

283. 28 U.S.C. § 1367 (2006) (describing the requirements for a federal court to exercise supplemental jurisdiction over a state law claim).

284. 28 U.S.C. § 1367 (2006).

285. For more information on state tort claims, see Chapter 17 of the JLM, "The State's Duty to Protect You and Your Property: Tort Actions."

286. This is because New York state law does not permit such suits—it requires claims of that type to be brought in the State Court of Claims. N.Y. Correct. Law § 24 (McKinney 2003) (prohibiting civil suits brought by individuals in state court against employees of the Department of Correctional Services in their personal capacities for damages arising out of any act performed within the scope of the employment); Baker v. Coughlin 77 F.3d 12, 14–16 (2d Cir. 1996) (holding that N.Y. Correct. Law § 24 also prohibits such actions from being brought in federal court); Riviello v. Waldron, 47 N.Y.2d 297, 303, 391 N.E.2d 1278, 1281, 418 N.Y.S.2d 300, 303 (1979) (When determining an employee's scope of employment, New York courts have considered such factors as: "the connection between the time, place and occasion for the act; the history of the relationship between employer and employee as spelled out in actual practice; whether the act is one commonly done by such an employee; the extent of departure from normal methods of performance; and whether the specific act was one that the employer could reasonably have anticipated.").

287. See Ierardi v. Sisco, 119 F.3d 183, 188 (2d Cir. 1997) (holding that sexual harassment of a co-worker by a state corrections officer is not within the scope of the officer's employment and therefore allowing plaintiff's supplemental state law claim); Degrafinreid v. Ricks, 452 F. Supp. 2d 328, 334 (S.D.N.Y. 2006) (finding plaintiff's negligence claim against corrections officers barred because, while the officers were negligent in not replacing plaintiff's hearing aids, such negligence occurred in the course of "doing the employer's work … While it is true that both New York and federal courts have, on occasion, found that the on-the-job conduct of DOCS employees was outside the scope of employment, such holdings generally have been limited to cases in which the conduct 'was prompted purely by personal reasons unrelated to the employer's interest.'") (internal citation omitted).

288. See Pennhurst State Sch. & Hosp. v. Halderman, 465 U.S. 89, 106, 104 S. Ct. 900, 911, 79 L. Ed. 2d 67, 82 (1984) (holding that the 11th Amendment prevents a federal court from ordering state officials to abide by state law), overruled in part by Will v. Michigan Dept. of State Police, 491 U.S. 58, 71 n.10, 109 S. Ct. 2304, 2312 n.10, 105 L. Ed. 2d 45, 58 n.10 (1989) (affirming that state officials can be sued in their official capacity for injunctive relief), as recognized in Nelson v. Miller, 170 F.3d 641, 645 n.5 (6th Cir. 1999) (recognizing that Will v. Michigan Dept. of State Police "reaffirmed that state officers who are violating a federal law may always be sued for purely injunctive relief-'capacity' and 'party in interest' are irrelevant.") see also Part C(3)(a) of this Chapter.

289. See Part C(3)(a) of this Chapter.

290. See Williams v. Kentucky, 24 F.3d 1526, 1543 (6th Cir. 1994) (permitting plaintiff to go forward with supplemental state law damages claim against state officials sued in their individual capacity); Wilson v. Univ. of Tex. Health Ctr., 973 F.2d 1263, 1271 (5th Cir. 1992) (holding that federal courts may hear state law claims for damages against officials sued in their individual capacity).

Third, if your state claim depends on state law that is unclear, the federal court may refuse to decide both your state and federal claims until the state court clarifies the state law, which takes time.[291] Even if you then win your state claim in state court, the federal court may still refuse to decide your federal claim because your state victory has made federal relief "unnecessary." The bottom line is that you should be very careful when adding anything but the most routine state claim to your Section 1983 action.

7. How to File Your Complaint

Each court has its own detailed procedures for filing a complaint. You should try to obtain a copy of the local Rules of the Court for the court where you are filing your lawsuit. These can be obtained from your prison's law library or by writing to the clerk of the court and (sometimes) paying a small fee.

You can also ask the clerk of the district court for model Section 1983 forms and in forma pauperis papers. Be sure to ask the clerk how many copies of each document you need to file and if you need to submit a summons for each defendant you are naming in the complaint. A summons is the document that orders the defendant to respond to or "answer" your complaint with his own legal papers. Appendix A-1 of this Chapter has a sample summons form.

You should file your complaint by mailing the complaint, your in forma pauperis papers (described below), the summonses, and as many copies as the court requires in a sealed envelope to the clerk of the court for the federal district in which the wrongful act took place. The clerk will request a United States Marshal to deliver a copy of the complaint and a summons to each defendant. The court clerk will return one copy of each paper to you marked "received by the clerk," so that you will have a record of all papers that you have officially filed with the court. Although the amount of time it will take for you to receive this copy varies from court to court, it should range from one to two weeks. Make sure to keep all the documents you receive from the court.

An in forma pauperis declaration is a sworn statement in which you tell the court that you cannot afford the filing fee and other legal expenses. If the court approves your in forma pauperis declaration, you do not have to pay certain court expenses, including a fee and travel expenses (a mileage charge) for each summons delivered by the U.S. Marshal.

In forma pauperis status does not relieve you from having to pay the filing fees associated with filing a complaint. These fees will no longer be waived in the same manner in which they were in the past.[292] See Chapter 14 of the JLM, "The Prison Litigation Reform Act." to determine how you are required to pay filing fees. If you cannot obtain a form for an in forma pauperis declaration from the clerk of the district court, use the form in Appendix A-5 of this Chapter as a model (fill in your answers to the questions) and file it with an in forma pauperis motion, an example of which is also contained in Appendix A-5.

If you wish the court to appoint an attorney for you, you should also make this request when filing to proceed in forma pauperis. See Appendix A-6 of this Chapter for a sample form to request an attorney.

To summarize, the following are the general steps required to file a complaint:

(1) Determine the federal district court in which you must file. (See Appendix I of the JLM if you are in New York.)
(2) Write to the clerk of that district court (the pro se clerk if there is one). Ask:
    (a) For a model Section 1983 complaint form;
    (b) For in forma pauperis papers;
    (c) For the local rules of practice for that district;
    (d) Whether you need a summons for each named defendant; and

---

291. 28 U.S.C. § 1367(c)(1) (2006) ("The district courts may decline to exercise supplemental jurisdiction ... if the [state] claim raises a novel or complex issue of State law"); see also R.R. Comm'n of Tex. v. Pullman Co., 312 U.S. 496, 501–02, 61 S. Ct. 643, 645–46, 85 L. Ed. 2d 971, 974 (1941) (holding that federal court should refuse to hear unsettled state law issue until the issue is resolved by the state courts and that, on the facts of the case, the federal constitutional claim could not be heard by the federal court because the question of whether a constitutional violation occurred depended on the outcome of the state law issue). In practice, federal courts will often ask the state's highest court to resolve unsettled state law issues instead of refusing to hear the state law question at all. See Arizonans for Official English v. Arizona, 520 U.S. 43, 79–80, 117 S. Ct. 1055, 1075, 137 L. Ed. 2d 170, 201 (1997) (encouraging federal courts to certify unsettled questions of state law to state courts). When a federal court asks a state's highest court to decide a state law issue, it is called "certification." Most states have a provision allowing certification. Hart and Wechsler's The Federal Courts and The Federal System, 1072 n.6 (Richard H. Fallon, Jr., et al. eds., 6th ed. 2009).

292. 28 U.S.C. § 1915(b) (2006) (outlining procedures for prisoner payment of filing fees).

(e) How many copies of each document (complaint, in forma pauperis declaration, and summons) you must file.

(3) Complete and mail to the clerk of the court:

(a) Complaint and copies of the complaint, including any affidavits (use the sample complaints in Appendix A of this Chapter as a guide for drafting your complaint if the clerk does not send you model forms);

(b) In forma pauperis papers and copies (use the forms for an in forma pauperis motion and an in forma pauperis declaration found in Appendix A-5 of this Chapter if you cannot obtain model forms from the clerk of the district court); and

(c) Summonses (if necessary) and copies (see Appendix A-1 of this Chapter).

By mailing these documents to the clerk, you have filed your Section 1983 lawsuit.

8. What to Expect After Your Legal Papers Have Been Filed in Court

Once you file your complaint, your lawsuit has officially begun. However, it is your responsibility to make sure that your lawsuit continues to move forward. It is not enough to simply file your complaint and then wait for something to happen. Nothing will happen unless you stay involved.

After you file your complaint and serve the defendant(s), the defendant(s) must respond by filing an "answer."[293] Defendants are supposed to file answers within twenty-one days of receiving the complaint,[294] but some defendants ask for extra time. The defendant's answer usually denies the truth of your factual statements or allegations. The defendant may also file a motion to dismiss your complaint under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 12(b)(6).[295] In the motion to dismiss, a defendant may argue that even if your allegations are true, they do not make out a legal claim upon which relief can be granted. Basically, the defendant argues that your complaints are not violations of statutory or constitutional rights that can be enforced using Section 1983. The court should give you the opportunity to amend (make changes to) your complaint if you left something important out of your original complaint. If the district does not let you amend your complaint, you may have grounds for an appeal.[296] If the defendant does not respond to your complaint at all, you can move for a "default judgment." If the court grants you a default judgment, you win your case because the defendants did not answer. Although the court will probably not grant your motion for a default judgment, it may force the defendant to respond.

Another way a defendant might seek to end your lawsuit is by filing for summary judgment under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 56.[297] In a summary judgment motion, the defendant argues that there is no real factual dispute and, on the undisputed facts, they would win. For example, the defendant may claim that he or she is immune from suit for your claim.[298] If the defendant makes a summary judgment motion, you must raise a "genuine issue of material fact."[299] To raise a genuine issue of material fact, you must provide factual support that would be admissible in evidence for each element of your claim against each defendant. For example, if you are suing supervisory officials, you must provide some evidence that the

---

293. For more information, see Chapter 6 of the JLM, "An Introduction to Legal Documents."

294. Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(a)(1)(A)(i) ("A defendant must serve an answer: (i) within 21 days after being served with the summons and complaint.").

295. Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6) ("Every defense, in law or fact, to a claim for relief in any pleading ... shall be asserted in the responsive pleading thereto if one is required, except that the following defenses may at the option of the pleader be made by motion … (6) failure to state a claim upon which relief can be granted.").

296. See Platsky v. CIA, 953 F.2d 26, 29 (2d Cir. 1991) (holding that the pro se plaintiff whose claim was dismissed should be given an opportunity to amend his pleadings and refile his complaint). But see Woodard v. Hardenfelder, 845 F. Supp. 960, 969 (E.D.N.Y. 1994) (holding that "leave to file an amended complaint is only appropriate when, based on the plaintiff's first complaint, it is conceivable that an amended complaint could state a cause of action for a violation of the plaintiff's civil rights"). Taken together, these cases mean that you should be given a chance to amend your original complaint with additional facts that support your legal claim, unless the court determines that based upon what you wrote in your original complaint, there is no possible way that you can prove additional facts to strengthen your legal claim.

297. Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(b) ("A party against whom relief is sought may move, with or without supporting affidavits, for summary judgment on all or part of the claim.").

298. See Part C(3) of this Chapter for information on other possible defenses.

299. Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(c) ("The [summary] judgment sought should be rendered if the pleadings, the discovery and disclosure materials on file, and any affidavits show that there is no genuine issue as to any material fact and that the movant is entitled to judgment as a matter of law.").

particular official is responsible for what happened. Factual support can be your own affidavit or declaration, the affidavit or declaration of other people who witnessed the event, or relevant documents.[300] If you need discovery in order to defend against a summary judgment motion, you can ask to delay the motion, but you will have to explain to the court what discovery you want and why you think it would help. Since statements in response to a summary judgment motion must be sworn to, you cannot just rely on the complaint unless the complaint is verified, and if the verified complaint does not address all relevant issues, you will still need to supplement it with a declaration.[301]

The defendants in your lawsuit may try to stop your case by making it "moot." A lawsuit is moot when it presents claims that no longer exist. Courts will not hear lawsuits that become moot. For example, if you ask for an injunction against certain bad prison conditions and the prison then improves the conditions, your lawsuit would be moot. Mootness is usually decided when the defendant files a summary judgment motion. To avoid having your claim dismissed because of mootness, you can request money damages for injuries you have already received—a damages claim is never moot—or ask the court to decide if the changes made by prison officials really solve the problem and are not just temporary.[302]

If your suit is not dismissed, the next stage of the proceedings may be the "discovery" or investigation stage. Discovery is the process by which each party requests information from the other about the case. See Chapter 8 of the JLM, "Obtaining Information to Prepare Your Case: The Process of Discovery," for more information on discovery in a federal civil case. It is your responsibility, not the court's, to keep your case moving. Once you have filed your complaint, you should begin discovery. Defendants often ignore discovery requests from pro se plaintiffs such as prisoners. If so, you should write a letter to the defendant(s), requesting a response "in a timely manner," and stating that if you do not hear from them you will write to the judge. Most courts now have what are called "meet and confer" requirements. Under these requirements, you must try to settle any discovery disputes with the defendant before you ask the court for help. If you do not hear from the defendants after you write to them, or if you are otherwise unable to resolve a discovery dispute with them, after a week or two you should write to the judge. Judges want cases to move quickly. If your discovery demands are proper, the judge should order defendants to fulfill these demands or assist you in narrowing them so they may be met. See Appendix A of Chapter 8 of the JLM, "Obtaining Information to Prepare Your Case: The Process of Discovery," for examples of letters that you may send to defendants and judges.

If you receive discovery requests from the defendants, you should make sure to respond in a timely and honest manner because you are obligated to follow the rules of the court when you file a lawsuit. In addition, if you ignore discovery requests or delay your response to them, you might damage your case and compromise your credibility before the judge.

If you are threatened or punished by prison officials for bringing your suit, you should tell the court as soon as possible or, if you have been assigned an attorney, your attorney. You should also tell the court if your appointed attorney has not communicated with you.

If, at any time, the court dismisses your suit, make sure that you understand the reasons for the dismissal. Your lawsuit may be dismissed with or without prejudice. If the court dismissed your suit "without prejudice," you can file your suit again.[303] If your suit is dismissed "with prejudice" you cannot re-

---

300. If you give the court documents, you must provide a proper "foundation" (explanation) for the documents so the court knows what the document is, when you received it, who gave it to you, etc. You must explain in an affidavit or declaration what the documents are (for example, that the document is the notice the lieutenant gave you that you were found guilty of a particular disciplinary offense, or that it is the grievance you filed and the decision you received, etc.).

301. See Chapter 6 of the JLM, "Introduction to Legal Documents," for explanations of documents such as affidavits and declarations.

302. See City of Richmond v. J.A. Croson Co., 488 U.S. 469, 478 n.1, 109 S. Ct. 706, 713 n.1, 102 L. Ed. 2d 854, 872 n.1 (1989) (stating that the expiration of an affirmative action program did not make a challenge to the program moot because the plaintiff had asserted a claim for monetary damages); Weinstein v. Bradford, 423 U.S. 147, 148–49, 96 S. Ct. 347, 348–49, 46 L. Ed. 2d 350, 352–53 (1975) (holding that the release of the plaintiff prisoner on parole mooted his challenge to earlier parole board proceedings, but also noting that where an issue is so short-lived that it will not continue throughout the time it takes to litigate, the issue will not be declared moot if there is a "reasonable expectation that the same complaining party would be subjected to the same action again.").

303. For example, if you filed in the wrong district court, you may be allowed to re-file in the right court. Your suit could also be dismissed without prejudice because of a technical problem in your pleadings. If the statute of limitations has not ended, you may have the chance to fix your pleadings and re-file your complaint.

file your complaint. Instead you must appeal the court's decision to dismiss your complaint—before the deadline to appeal.

D. Alternate Ways to Bring Lawsuits

1. Filing Your Lawsuit as a Class Action

Section 1983 claims can also be brought as "class action" suits. A class action is a lawsuit brought on behalf of a group of people who experience the same harm or have the same complaint—in other words, all persons who are "similarly situated."[304]

Class actions are very complicated and can take years. Practically speaking, you need an attorney to bring a class action. Losing a class action affects the rights of all class members, so having a good lawyer is very important. Courts will probably not "certify" a case as a class action if you do not have a lawyer. If you believe that other prisoners like you are experiencing similar mistreatment, you should talk with a lawyer about whether bringing a class action would be appropriate.

A class action will only be recognized by the court if it meets all of the following conditions:

(1) The class of similarly situated persons must be too large for each person to bring his own lawsuit or even join individual lawsuits;
(2) The prison officials must have acted or refused to act on grounds that apply to the entire class;
(3) The personal claims of the main plaintiff(s), the "class representative," must be typical of the other plaintiffs; and
(4) The class representative must adequately protect the rights of the other members of the class.[305]

Class actions are appropriate only if the wrong you suffered was also suffered by the other plaintiffs in the suit. All of you together will be considered a "class." The class members do not need to know each other, but you must have a way to reasonably identify most of them, so they can be given notice of the suit and an opportunity to consider whether to participate in it.[306] Again, in order to have your class "certified" (recognized by the court), you will probably need to retain a lawyer or ask the court to appoint one because class actions are so complicated.

If you decide to proceed on your own and feel that the case fits the requirements of a class action suit, you should name yourself and "all others similarly situated" as the plaintiffs. In the complaint, you should state all the facts concerning the wrongs done to you and also state whatever information you have about similar treatment of other prisoners. The court will then decide, on the basis of the facts you provide, whether or not a class action would be proper. If the court allows the class action, it may appoint an attorney to represent the class. If the court does not recognize the class action, you will be allowed to amend your complaint and sue by yourself.

2. Using State Law and/or State Courts

There are certain advantages to suing in federal court, such as liberal discovery rules and potentially higher damage awards. But you may want to file in state court if you only have state law claims or if there are advantages to bringing your Section 1983 claim in a particular state court.

---

304. Fed. R. Civ. P. 23. There are two main advantages offered by a class action. First, the suit will not become "moot" if one plaintiff is transferred or released. See U.S. Parole Comm'n v. Geraghty, 445 U.S. 388, 402, 100 S. Ct. 1202, 1211, 63 L. Ed. 2d 479, 494 (1980) (holding that even without class certification, the resolution of the named plaintiff's substantive claim does not necessarily moot all other issues in the case); Sosna v. Iowa, 419 U.S. 393, 401, 95 S. Ct. 553, 558, 42 L. Ed. 2d 532, 541 (1975) (holding that when a claim is no longer relevant for a named plaintiff in a class action suit, the claim is still alive and not moot for the class of persons the named plaintiff has been certified to represent); Sze v. I.N.S., 153 F.3d 1005, 1010 (9th Cir. 1998) (noting two exceptions to Sosna's mootness doctrine: where, in a proposed class action, plaintiffs' claims are "inherently transitory" and "there is a constantly changing putative class," leaving the court no time to certify the class; and where "but for the 'relation back' of a later class certification, putative class members' claims would be barred by the statute of limitations."). The second advantage of bringing a class action is that, if you win, each member of the class can enforce the judgment or injunction on behalf of the other class members, which avoids separate enforcement actions.

305. Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(a)–(b).

306. Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(c)(2).

(a) Turning Your Federal Civil Rights Claim into a State Law Claim

By bringing a state claim (instead of a federal civil rights claim) in state court, you can avoid the Prison Litigation Reform Act ("PLRA"), since the PLRA applies only to claims arising under federal law. You can do this by converting your federal civil rights claim into a state tort claim or other state law claim.[307] For example, a claim for "deliberate indifference to serious medical needs" in violation of the Eighth Amendment could be brought in state court instead as a tort action for medical malpractice. Similarly, if a disciplinary hearing denied you due process, you could file in state court for violation of the state regulations governing prison disciplinary proceedings.

In addition to avoiding the PLRA, you may have a better chance of winning if you file in state court because of the lower standard that you, as the plaintiff, will have to meet to prove your case. For example, a state court may find that you have a valid state medical malpractice tort claim even if you cannot show the prison officials were "deliberately indifferent" as required in a Section 1983 claim.[308] However, many state statutes contain PLRA-like restrictions as well.[309] You need to research the law in your own state before deciding to file a claim in state court.

Another advantage of bringing your claim in state court is that you may be able to enforce rights that are not granted under federal law. State constitutions may protect rights that are not recognized by the U.S. Constitution. This is because the Constitution protects a minimum level of individual rights and allows the states to provide greater rights for state citizens through their own "constitutions, statutes, and rule-making authority."[310]

(b) Bringing Your Section 1983 Action in State Court

Even if you have a federal law claim, you may want to consider bringing your Section 1983 action in state court. The advantages and disadvantages of federal court compared with state court vary depending upon the state. Some state courts might have more sympathetic judges, more favorable procedural rules, or fewer cases to hear than federal courts. There may, however, be restrictions on damages or the amount recoverable for attorney fees. State courts also have different immunity rules than federal courts, which might be helpful or harmful to your lawsuit depending on what state you are in and who you want to sue.

---

307. For more information on state tort claims, see Chapter 16 of the JLM, "The State's Duty to Protect You and Your Property: Tort Actions."

308. See Estelle v. Gamble, 429 U.S. 97, 104–05, 97 S. Ct. 285, 291, 50 L. Ed. 2d 251, 261 (1976) (describing the "deliberate indifference" standard that must be met to prove a § 1983 claim against a prison official for denial of medical care).

309. See, e.g., Cal. Civ. Proc. Code §§ 391–91.7 (West 2004) (governing vexatious (troublesome) litigants in general, and preventing those litigants that a court has found to be troublesome from filing future lawsuits without the permission of a judge); Fla. Stat. Ann. § 57.085(6)–(7) (West 2006) (allowing a court to dismiss a prisoner's claim if it is frivolous, malicious, or harassing, and requiring that a prisoner who has litigated as an indigent twice within the previous three years receive permission from a judge before going ahead with another suit); Ga. Code Ann. §§ 42-12-1–9 (1997 & Supp. 2009) (governing payment of certain court fees and costs by a prisoner, and requiring that any prisoner who has filed three or more actions that were later dismissed as frivolous or malicious be barred from filing any future actions unless the prisoner is under imminent danger of serious physical injury); Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code Ann. §§ 14.001–.014 (Vernon 2002 & Supp. 2009) (requiring that prisoners exhaust their administrative remedies before filing a claim in state court and that the state court claim be filed within 31 days of when the prisoner receives a written decision from the administrative grievance system, allowing courts to dismiss claims that are frivolous or malicious, and governing costs and fees that the court may require a prisoner to pay).

310. See Hernandez v. Robles, 7 N.Y.3d 338, 362, 855 N.E.2d 1, 9, 821 N.Y.S.2d 770 778 (2006) ("We have at times found our Due Process Clause to be more protective of rights than its federal counterpart, usually in cases involving the rights of criminal defendants, or prisoners … [W]e have used the same analytical framework as the Supreme Court … though our analysis may lead to different results.") (internal citations omitted); New York v. LaValle, 3 N.Y.3d 88, 129, 817 N.E.2d 341, 366, 783 N.Y.S.2d 485, 510 (2004) ("It bears reiterating here that on innumerable occasions this Court has given the State Constitution an independent construction, affording the rights and liberties of the citizens of this State even more protection than may be secured under the United States Constitution.") (internal quotations omitted); Cooper v. Morin, 49 N.Y.2d 69, 79, 399 N.E.2d 1188, 1193, 424 N.Y.S.2d 168, 174 (1979) ("We have not hesitated when we concluded that the Federal Constitution as interpreted by the Supreme Court fell short of adequate protection for our citizens to rely upon the principle that that document defines the minimum level of individual rights and leaves the States free to provide greater rights for its citizens through its Constitution, statutes or rule-making authority.") (internal citations omitted).

You should research the law and practice of your state to see if it has any of these advantages or disadvantages.

Bringing your Section 1983 action in state court will also avoid some, but not all of the restrictions of the PLRA. For example, the barriers in the PLRA for prisoners filing in forma pauperis will not apply in state court (although, as mentioned above, many states have their own PLRA-like laws that may restrict in forma pauperis filing). However, the requirement that you exhaust all of your administrative remedies prior to bringing your Section 1983 claim will apply even in state court.

E. Special Concerns for Prisoners in Federal Prisons

1. Bivens Actions

There is no statute similar to Section 1983 that explicitly provides individuals with a means to sue federal officials who violate federal rights while acting under color of federal law. However, the Supreme Court held that, even without a specific statute, federal officials may be sued for damages and injunctive relief for violations of your constitutional rights.[311] These lawsuits are usually referred to as Bivens actions.

Federal courts have jurisdiction to hear Bivens actions under 28 U.S.C. § 1331(a). A Bivens action is the federal equivalent of a Section 1983 action. Therefore, most of the discussion of Section 1983 in Part B also applies to a federal Bivens action under Section 1331. Before proceeding, you should review all of Part B. Appendix A of this Chapter provides two sample Section 1983 complaints, which can also be used for a Bivens action. This Part explains the differences between Section 1983 suits and Bivens actions.

2. Exhaustion of Remedies

In a Bivens suit against federal officials, you must exhaust (use up) any and all available administrative remedies, such as internal grievance procedures, before going to court, regardless of whether you are suing for injunctive relief, declaratory relief, or monetary damages.[312] See Chapter 14 of the JLM, "The Prison Litigation Reform Act," for more information.

3. Whom You Can Sue

In bringing a Bivens action, you are generally limited to suing the federal official who violated your rights. You can sue the official only in his individual capacity, not in his official capacity.[313] This is because "official capacity" suits are considered to be the same as suits against the government and the federal government has "sovereign immunity" (a type of absolute immunity) from being sued.[314] Neither can you bring a Bivens action against a federal agency[315] or a private corporation which contracts with the federal 311. See Bivens v. Six Unknown Named Agents of Fed. Bur. of Narcotics, 403 U.S. 388, 389, 91 S. Ct. 1999, 2001, 29 L. Ed. 2d 619, 622 (1971) (holding that suit for 4th Amendment violation is permitted against a federal agent); see also Carlson v. Green, 446 U.S. 14, 18–19, 100 S. Ct. 1468, 1471, 64 L. Ed. 2d 15, 23–24 (1980) (finding that the widow of deceased federal prisoner had a Bivens remedy directly under the Constitution). But see FDIC v. Meyer, 510 U.S. 471, 484–86, 114 S. Ct. 996, 1004–06, 127 L. Ed. 2d 308, 315 (1994) (refusing to extend Bivens doctrine to suits against federal agencies).

---

312. See Booth v. Churner, 532 U.S. 731, 741, 121 S. Ct. 1819, 1825, 149 L. Ed. 2d 958, 966–67 (2001) (holding that the Prison Litigation Reform Act required that all administrative remedies be exhausted before filing suit, regardless of the form of relief sought).

313. See Tapia-Tapia v. Potter, 322 F.3d 742, 746 (1st Cir. 2003) (holding that Postmaster General cannot be sued in his official capacity under Bivens); Affiliated Prof'l Home Health Care Agency v. Shalala, 164 F.3d 282, 286 (5th Cir. 1999) (noting that Bivens "provides a cause of action only against government officers in their individual capacities"); Buford v. Runyon, 160 F.3d 1199, 1203 (8th Cir. 1998) (holding that a Bivens claim cannot be brought against a federal official in his official capacity); Randall v. United States, 95 F.3d 339, 345 (4th Cir. 1996) (noting that Bivens actions must be against federal officials individually); Robinson v. Overseas Military Sales Corp., 21 F.3d 502, 510 (2d. Cir. 1994) (stating that a Bivens action "must be brought against the federal officers involved in their individual capacities.").

314. See Robinson v. Overseas Military Sales Corp., 21 F.3d 502, 510 (2d. Cir. 1994) ("Under the doctrine of sovereign immunity, an action for damages will not lie against the United States absent consent. Because an action against federal officers in their official capacities is essentially a suit against the United States, such suits are also barred under the doctrine of sovereign immunity, unless such immunity is waived."). See the discussion of state sovereign immunity under the 11th Amendment immunity in Part C(3)(a) of this Chapter. The discussion generally applies to the federal government as well.

315. See FDIC v. Meyer, 510 U.S. 471, 486, 114 S. Ct. 996, 1006, 127 L. Ed. 2d 308, 323 (1994) (finding a damages remedy against federal agencies inappropriate and inconsistent with Bivens because of the "potentially enormous financial burden for the Federal Government.").

government to operate prison facilities.[316] In Corrections Services Corporation v. Malesko, the Supreme Court held that it would be unfair to allow Bivens suits against private corporations and not federal agencies. Violations by these private corporations, the Court said, are best handled through tort remedies available to prisoners.[317] It is not yet clear whether employees of private corporations contracting with the federal prisons may be sued under Bivens. While some courts have found that Malesko only excluded private entities and not private individuals from Bivens actions,[318] others have found that neither private entities nor their employees can be sued.[319]

4. What You Can Complain About

In a Bivens action under Section 1331, like a Section 1983 action, you may complain about conditions and/or treatments that violate your federal constitutional rights. Parts B(2) and (3) of this Chapter, which explain possible Section 1983 actions, apply equally to Bivens actions. Who you can sue (name as a defendant) in Bivens actions is also similar to Section 1983 lawsuits, although remember that federal agencies cannot be sued.[320]

Federal courts may refuse to hear Bivens complaints based on the Fifth Amendment's Due Process Clause[321] if they fall within the category of less serious harms such as deprivation or removal of personal items.[322] For harms that are simple tort violations, you will need to sue using the Federal Tort Claims Act ("FTCA")[323] instead of a Bivens action. The FTCA is a statute that authorizes damages suits against the federal government for actions by federal employees who, within the scope of their employment, negligently or wrongfully inflict harm on persons or their property. You begin a FTCA claim by submitting Form 95, "Claim for Damage, Injury, or Death," and requesting money damages from the federal agency whose employee allegedly committed the harmful action(s).[324] Many FTCA cases are resolved at the agency level through negotiation and an eventual settlement. However, if your claim is denied, you may file suit in federal court. But remember, the judge will dismiss your case if you go to federal court without exhausting this administrative remedy.[325]

---

316. Corr. Servs. Corp. v. Malesko, 534 U.S. 61, 63, 122 S. Ct. 515, 517, 151 L. Ed. 2d 456, 461 (2001) (refusing to extend Bivens to allow recovery against a private company operating a halfway house under contract with the Federal Bureau of Prisons).

317. See Corr. Servs. Corp. v. Malesko, 534 U.S. 61, 71–73, 122 S. Ct. 515, 521–22, 151 L. Ed. 2d 456, 466–67 (2001) ("Nor are we confronted with a situation in which claimants … lack effective remedies … For example, federal prisoners in private facilities enjoy a parallel tort remedy that is unavailable to prisoners housed in government facilities.").

318. See Sarro v. Cornell Corr., Inc., 248 F. Supp. 2d 52, 58–60 (D.R.I. 2003) (finding private prison guards to be federal actors under Bivens because they are considered state actors within the meaning of § 1983 and act under the color of federal law). But see LaCedra v. Donald W. Wyatt Det. Facility, 334 F. Supp. 2d 114, 141 (D.R.I. 2004) (holding that no Bivens action can be brought against employees of a public corporation because they are not federal agents).

319. See Holly v. Scott, 434 F.3d 287, 296 (4th Cir. 2006) (dismissing Bivens lawsuit brought by prisoner in a privately run federal correctional facility because he could seek relief under state law); Peoples v. CCA Det. Ctrs., 422 F.3d 1090, 1105 (10th Cir. 2005) (finding Bivens actions are not available against private prison employees because there are other remedies, such as negligence actions), aff'd by an equally divided court, 449 F.3d 1097 (10th Cir. 2006) (per curiam).

320. See FDIC v. Meyer, 510 U.S. 471, 484–86, 114 S. Ct. 996, 1004–06, 127 L. Ed. 2d 308, 322–24 (1994) (holding that federal agencies, such as the FDIC, are immune from Bivens actions).

321. The 5th and 14th Amendments to the Constitution each contain a Due Process Clause. The 5th Amendment's clause applies to the federal government, while the 14th Amendment's applies to the states. The Due Process protections described in Part B(2)(e) of this Chapter will apply to federal prisoners through the 5th Amendment rather than the 14th Amendment.

322. See, e.g., Hudson v. Palmer, 468 U.S. 517, 526, 533, 104 S. Ct. 3194, 3200, 3204, 82 L. Ed. 2d 393, 402–03, 407–08 (1984) (holding that the 4th Amendment's prohibition of unreasonable searches and seizures did not apply to searches of prison cells or seizures of prisoner property and such seizures did not violate the 14th Amendment's Due Process Clause if a post-deprivation remedy was available); Daniels v. Williams 474 U.S. 327, 328, 106 S. Ct. 662, 663, 88 L. Ed. 2d 662, 666 (1986) (holding that "the Due Process Clause is simply not implicated by a negligent act of an official causing unintended loss of or injury to life, liberty, or property.").

323. Federal Tort Claims Act, 28 U.S.C. § 1346(b) (2006).

324. You may obtain this form by writing to the clerk of the federal district court in which you plan to file your action. Form 95 is also available at http://www.justice.gov/civil/forms.htm (last visited October 10, 2010).

325. See Deutsch v. Fed. Bureau of Prisons, 737 F. Supp. 261, 266 (S.D.N.Y. 1990) (holding that failure to file an administrative claim will bar a plaintiff from suing under the Federal Torts Claims Act).

5. What You Should File

If you are suing for injunctive relief in a Bivens action under Section 1331, you must serve a copy of the summons and complaint on: (1) the named defendants, (2) the U.S. Attorney for the district in which you bring your suit, and (3) the Attorney General of the United States in Washington, D.C.[326] If you are suing under Section 1331 for only money damages, you need to serve the summons and complaint on: (1) the U.S. Attorney for the district in which you bring your suit, (2) the Attorney General of the United States in Washington D.C., and (3) the officer or employee being sued.[327] All service must be by registered or certified mail.[328]

6. Where to File

If you are seeking injunctive or declaratory relief, you may file your lawsuit in the federal district where any defendant resides, where the events complained of occurred or are occurring, or where you presently reside.[329] If, however, you are suing for money damages only, you must file suit in the federal district in which all the defendants reside or the district in which your claim arose (where the events you are complaining about occurred).[330]

F. Conclusion

If your constitutional rights have been violated, you may be able to obtain relief by suing state and local officials under 42 U.S.C. Section 1983 or by suing federal officials under 28 U.S.C. Section 1331. Through these suits, prisoners may receive monetary relief, injunctive relief, and/or declaratory judgment. In a Section 1983 claim against state and local officials, you can sue officials in their official capacities as representatives of the state. However, when suing federal officials under Section 1331, you may only sue the federal officials in their individual capacities. Refer to Part E of this chapter to review the special requirements for filing Section 1331 claims. Appendix A of this chapter provides helpful examples of forms for making your claim, such as a summons form, a sample temporary restraining order, and a sample full complaint. Remember to read Chapter 13 of the JLM on the Prison Litigation Reform Act before starting your 1983 claim.

---

326. Fed. R. Civ. P. 4(i).

327. Fed. R. Civ. P. 4(i)(2)(B).

328. Fed. R. Civ. P. 4(i)(1).

329. 28 U.S.C. §1391(e) (2006) ("A civil action in which a defendant is an officer or employee of the United States ... may, except as otherwise provided by law, be brought in any judicial district in which (1) a defendant in the action resides, (2) a substantial part of the events or omissions giving rise to the claim occurred, or a substantial part of property that is the subject of the action is situated, or (3) the plaintiff resides if no real property is involved in the action.").

330. See Stafford v. Briggs, 444 U.S. 527, 544, 100 S. Ct. 774, 785, 63 L. Ed. 2d 1, 15 (1980) (finding that under 28 U.S.C. § 1391(b), "suits against private persons for money damages must be brought in the judicial district where all defendants reside, or in which the claim arose").

APPENDIX A

This Appendix contains the following materials:

A-1. Sample Summons Form
A-2. Sample Section 1983 Complaint Form[331]
A-3. Form for an Affidavit
A-4. Order to Show Cause and Temporary Restraining Order ("TRO")
A-5. In Forma Pauperis ("IFP") Papers
  a. Notice of Sample Motion to Proceed In Forma Pauperis
  b. Declaration in Support of Request to Proceed In Forma Pauperis
A-6. Application for Appointment of Counsel
A-7. Prisoner Authorization
A-8. Sample Language for Statement of Facts
A-9. Sample Full Complaint

Parts B and C of this Chapter contain instructions on when and how to use each of the following forms. DO NOT USE THESE FORMS UNTIL YOU HAVE READ PARTS B AND C OF THIS CHAPTER.

You may obtain free model forms for Section 1983 complaints and supporting papers by writing to the clerk of the district court in which you plan to file your action. These model forms are designed to make your work less confusing, and will help the district court process your case. If for some reason you cannot obtain model forms, draft your own papers based on the samples in this section. The endnotes following the sample documents (on the last two pages of this chapter) tell you how to fill in the necessary information. DO NOT TEAR THESE FORMS OUT OF THE JLM.

If you are in New York and need to know the name or address of the court to which you should send these papers, consult Appendix I at the end of the JLM for the federal courts in New York and Appendix II for the state courts in New York.

For sample forms for state court In Forma Pauperis Motions and Declarations in Support of Request to Proceed In Forma Pauperis, see Appendix A of Chapter 9 of the JLM, "Appealing Your Conviction or Sentence."

331. Federal prisoners can also use this form for a Bivens action. Just cross out the reference to "42 U.S.C. § 1983" and replace it with "28 U.S.C. § 1331(a) (Bivens action)."

A-1. SAMPLE SUMMONS FORM[332]

This is based on the official form. You can get as many free copies as you need from the clerk of the U.S. district court for your district.

In the United States District Court
For the_____[1]

[Name(s) of the Prisoner(s) Who Are Bringing the Suit], Plaintiffs,
v.	Summons
[Names and Titles of All the People and Governments Whom You Are Suing], individually and in their official capacities,[3] Defendants.	Civil Action No.____[2]

To the Above-Mentioned Defendants:

You are hereby summoned and required to serve upon plaintiffs, whose address is _____,[4] an answer to the complaint which is herewith served upon you, within _____ days after service of this summons upon you, exclusive of the day of service. If you fail to do so, judgment by default will be taken against you for the relief demanded in the complaint. Any answer that you serve on the parties to this action must be filed with the Clerk of this Court within a reasonable period of time after service.

_____
Clerk of the Court

Date: _____

332. See Admin. Office of the U.S. Courts, Form No. AO 440, Summons in a Civil Action (2001), available at http://www.uscourts.gov/forms/AO440.pdf (last visited Feb. 5, 2011); see also Nat'l Ctr. for State Courts, Pro Se: Self Represented Litigants, available at http://www.ncsc.org/topics/access-and-fairness/self-representation/resource-guide.aspx (last visited Feb. 5, 2011) (listing helpful resources and state court websites with limited state court forms); WashLaw: Legal Research on the Web, Legal Forms, available at http://www.washlaw.edu/legalforms/#fedcts (last visited Feb. 5, 2011) (a legal form resource page with links to federal court forms, state court forms, and form databases).

A-2. SAMPLE SECTION 1983 COMPLAINT FORM[333]

In the United States District Court
For the_____[5]

[Name(s) of the Prisoner(s)
Plaintiffs,
	Complaint
v.
[Names and Titles of All the People and Governments Whom You Are Suing], individually and in their official capacities[7],	Civil Action No.____[6]
	Jury Trial Demanded Defendants.

I. Complaint

Plaintiffs, [your name and the name of any other plaintiffs], pro se, for their complaint state as follows:

II. Parties, Jurisdiction and Venue

1. Plaintiff [your name] was confined[8] in the [type of facility: municipal (city) jail, federal penitentiary, state correctional institution], located at [address of the facility] in the city of ____ in the state of _____ from [dates of confinement at that facility] to _____ of 20___. Plaintiff is currently confined at [your current address].
2. Plaintiff [your name] is, and was at all times mentioned herein, an adult citizen of the United States and a resident of the state of _____.
3. [If other prisoners are complaining, you should repeat paragraphs 1, 2 and 3 for their names and addresses].
4. Defendant [name of first defendant][9] was at all relevant times herein mayor of the city of ____ .[10]
5. Defendant [name of second defendant] was at all relevant times herein the commissioner of adult services for the city of ___ , with responsibility for operating and maintaining detention, penal, and corrective institutions within the City of _____, including the city jail.[11]
6. Defendant [name of third defendant] is and was at all relevant times herein the warden or "superintendent" of the municipal prison for the City of _____. As Superintendent of the prison, Defendant manages its day-to-day operations and executes its policies.
7. Defendant [name of fourth defendant] is and was at all relevant times herein an employee of the prison.
8. Defendant _____is employed as [job of defendant, such as prison guard, mayor, warden or doctor] at [name of prison or other place that this defendant works]. Defendant _____is employed as [job of defendant, such as prison guard, mayor, warden or doctor] at [name of prison or other place that this defendant works].
9. Defendant City of ___ is and was at all relevant times herein a municipal corporation of the State of ___.
10. This action arises under and is brought pursuant to 42 U.S.C. Section 1983 to remedy the deprivation, under color of state law, of rights guaranteed by the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments[12] to the United States Constitution. This Court has jurisdiction over this action pursuant to 28 U.S.C. Sections 1331 and 1343.
11. Plaintiff's claims for injunctive relief are authorized by Rule 65 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure.
12. This cause of action arose in the _____ District of _____.[13] Therefore, venue is proper under 28 U.S.C. Section 1391(b).

---

333. This sample complaint uses the complaint forms found in John W. Witt et al., § 1983 Litigation: Forms 1-5–1-8.2 (1994 & Jonathan M. Purver, ed., Aspen Publishers 3d ed. Supp. 2006) as a guide and source of sample language. See also U.S. District Court, EDNY, Civil Rights Complaint-Prisoner (2006), available at http://www.nyed.uscourts.gov/General_Information/Court_Forms/CivilRightsCmpPrisoner.pdf (last visited Feb.5, 2011).

III. Previous Lawsuits by Plaintiff

13. Plaintiff has filed no other lawsuits dealing with the same facts involved in this action or otherwise relating to his/her imprisonment.[14]

Use these paragraphs if you have filed a lawsuit before:

14. Plaintiff has filed other lawsuits dealing with the same facts involved in this action or otherwise relating to his/her imprisonment.
15. [Describe the lawsuit in the space below. (If there is more than one lawsuit, describe the additional lawsuits on another piece of paper, using the same outline.)] The parties to the previous lawsuit were Plaintiffs [names of all of the plaintiffs in that lawsuit] and Defendants [names of all of the defendants in that lawsuit] in the [if federal court, name the district; if state court, name the county] Court, Docket Number __, under [name of judge to whom case was assigned]. The case was [disposition (outcome) of the cases: dismissed? appealed? still pending?]. The lawsuit was filed on _____, 20 __ and I learned of the outcome on _____, 20___.

IV. Exhaustion of Administrative Remedies[15]

16. [Read Chapter 13 of the JLM, "The Prison Litigation Reform Act," to determine whether you need to include any description here of how you exhausted your administrative remedies and in what detail. It may depend on your jurisdiction.]

V. Statement of Claim

17. At all relevant times herein, defendants were "persons" for purposes of 42 U.S.C. Section 1983 and acted under color of law to deprive plaintiffs of their constitutional rights, as set forth more fully below.

VI. Statement of Facts

18. [State here fully but as briefly as possible the facts of your case. Describe how each defendant is involved. The facts should be in clear, chronological order, like you are telling a story. Try to start out each paragraph with the date of the events you are describing. Include also the names of other persons involved, dates and places. Do not give any legal arguments or cite any cases or statutes.[16] If you intend to allege a number of related claims, number and give each claim a separate paragraph. Use as much space as you need. Attach extra sheet(s) if necessary. See the examples of language given for each kind of violation given in Appendix A-8. You should also look at the full sample complaint in Appendix A-9.]

VII. Prayer for Relief

State briefly exactly what you want the court to do for you. Make no legal arguments. Cite no cases or statutes. Some sample things you might want are:

19. Plaintiffs request an order declaring that the defendants have acted in violation of the United States Constitution.
20. Plaintiffs request an injunction[17] compelling defendants to provide or stop _____ .
21. Plaintiff requests $ ___as compensatory damages.

Signed this _day of _____, 20__.

_____
[Name of Plaintiff]

I declare under penalty of perjury that the foregoing is true and correct.

_____
PLAINTIFF'S NAME

_____
DATE

A-3. FORM FOR AN AFFIDAVIT[334]

This form is for plaintiffs, other prisoners, or anyone else who wants to make a sworn statement on behalf of plaintiffs.

In the United States District Court
For the_____[18]

[Name of First Prisoner in Complaint[19], et al., Plaintiffs,	:	AFFIDAVIT
v.	:
[Name of First Defendant in Complaint[21], et al. Defendants.	:	Civil Action No.____-[20]

AFFIDAVIT OF [NAME OF PERSON MAKING STATEMENT]

I, [Full name of prisoner or other person making the statement], being duly sworn according to the law depose and say [that I am the Plaintiff in the above entitled proceeding].

[Write statement here. Use numbered paragraphs.]

All of the information I have submitted [in support of my request, Plaintiff's case, etc.] is true and correct.

_____
Sign Here Before Notary Public

Sworn to before me this ____ day of ____ , 20__ .

_____[22]
NOTARY PUBLIC

334. See, e.g., U.S. District Court, EDNY, Affidavit in Support of Application for Appointment of Counsel, available at http://www.nyed.uscourts.gov/General_Information/Court_Forms/apptcnsl.pdf (last visited Feb. 5, 2011).

A-4. ORDER TO SHOW CAUSE AND TEMPORARY RESTRAINING ORDER ("TRO")[335]

Be sure to submit, along with this paper, an affidavit (Form A-3) stating how you will be hurt if you do not get temporary relief and how you tried to notify the defendants of your request for temporary relief.

In the United States District Court
For the_____[23]

[Name of First Prisoner in Complaint, et al., Plaintiffs,
v.	Order to Show Cause for Preliminary Injunction and Temporary Restraining Order
[Name of First Defendant in Complaint, et al. Defendants.	Civil Action No.____

Upon the complaint, supporting affidavits of plaintiffs sworn to the ____ day of _____, 20___, and the memorandum of law submitted herewith, it is:

ORDERED that the above named defendants [names of defendants against whom you need immediate court action] show cause in room ____ of the United States Courthouse, [address] on the __day of ____ , 20__ , at _ o'clock,[24] or as soon thereafter as counsel may be heard, why preliminary injunction should not issue pursuant to Rule 65(a) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure enjoining the defendants, their successors in office, agents and employees and all other persons acting in concert and participation with them, from [a precise statement of the actions you want the preliminary injunction to cover].

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that effective immediately, and pending the hearing and determination of this order to show cause, the defendants [names of defendants against whom you want temporary relief] and each of their officers, agents, employees, and all persons acting in concert or participation with them, are restrained from [statement of actions you want the preliminary injunction to cover].

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that personal service of a copy of this order and annexed affidavit upon the defendant(s) or his counsel on or before [date], shall be deemed good and sufficient service thereof.

[leave this space blank for judge's signature]

_____
Dated: [leave blank]
United States District Judge

335. See, e.g., U.S. District Court, SDNY, Order to Show Cause for Preliminary Injunction and Temporary Restraining Order (1999), available at http://www.nysd.uscourts.gov/forms.php (last visited Feb. 5, 2011); John W. Witt, et al., Section 1983 Litigation: Forms 4-1, 4-2, 252–54 (1994).

A-5. IN FORMA PAUPERIS ("IFP") PAPERS[336]

You should ask for this form from the district court clerk where you will be filing your complaint. They will also send you the paperwork (A-7, "Prisoner Authorization," below) for you to fill out regarding your prison account that is required by the Prison Litigation Reform Act. Each plaintiff prisoner must fill out IFP and Prisoner Authorization forms.

a. Notice of Motion to Proceed In Forma Pauperis[25]

In the United States District Court
For the_____

[Name(s) of the Prisoner(s) Who Are Bringing the Suit], Plaintiffs,	:
v.	:	Request to Proceed In Forma Pauperis
[Names and Titles of All the People and Other Entities Whom You Are Suing] Defendant.	:	Civil Action No.____ [26]

PLEASE TAKE NOTICE, that upon the declaration [or affidavit or affirmation] of [your name], sworn to on the _____ day of _____, 20__, a motion will be made at a term of this court, for an order permitting plaintiff to pursue this action as a poor person, upon the ground that said plaintiff has insufficient income and property to enable [him/her] to pay the costs, fees, and expenses to pursue said action, and for such other and further relief as this Court may deem just and proper.

Signed this ___ day of _____, 20__.

_____
(Signature of Plaintiff)

To: _____
Clerk
United States District Court
For the _____[27]

336. See, e.g., U.S. District Court, EDNY, In Forma Pauperis Form-Prisoner (2002), available at http://www.nyed.uscourts.gov/pub/docs/courtforms/ifppris.pdf (last visited Feb. 5, 2011); John W. Witt, et al., Section 1983 Litigation: Forms 7-1, 310 (1994).

b. Declaration in Support of Request to Proceed In Forma Pauperis[28]

DECLARATION IN SUPPORT OF REQUEST TO PROCEED IN FORMA PAUPERIS[337]

In the United States District Court
For the _____ 29

[YOUR NAME IN CAPITAL LETTERS]	:
	:
	:
(Petitioner/Plaintiff)	:
	:
	:
	:
[RESPONDENT'S NAME IN ALL CAPS]	:
	:
(Respondent(s)/Defendant(s))	:
	:

I, [Your Name], am the petitioner/plaintiff in the above entitled case. In support of my motion to proceed without being required to prepay fees or costs or give security therefore, I state that because of my poverty I am unable to pay the costs of the said proceeding or to give security therefore, that I believe I am entitled to redress.

I declare that the responses which I have made below are true.

1. If you are presently employed, state the amount of your salary wage per month, and give the name and address of your last employer. YOU MUST ANSWER THIS QUESTION EVEN IF YOU ARE INCARCERATED.

2. If you are NOT PRESENTLY EMPLOYED, state the date of last employment and amount of the salary per month that you received AND how long the employment lasted. YOU MUST ANSWER THIS QUESTION EVEN IF YOU ARE INCARCERATED. IF YOU HAVE NEVER BEEN EMPLOYED, SAY SO.

3. Have you ever received, within the past twelve months, any money from any of the following sources?

(a) Business, profession, or form of self-employment?	YES	NO
(b) Rent payments, interest, or dividends?	YES	NO
(c) Pensions, annuities, or life insurance payments?	YES	NO
(d) Gifts or inheritances?	YES	NO
(e) Any form of public assistance?	YES	NO
(f) Any other sources?	YES	NO

If the answer to any of the questions (a) through (f) is yes, describe each source of money and state the amount received from each during the past months.

4. Do you own any cash or do you have money in a checking or savings account? Include any funds in prison accounts.
__If the answer is yes, state the total value owned.

---

337. See, e.g., U.S. District Court, SDNY, Request to Proceed In Forma Pauperis, available at http://www.nysd.uscourts.gov/forms.php (last visited Feb. 5, 2011).

5. Do you own any real estate, stock, bonds, notes, automobiles, or other valuable property (including ordinary household furnishings and clothing)?
___If the answer is yes, state the total value owned.

6. List the person(s) who are dependent upon you for support, state your relationship to those person(s), and indicate how much you contribute toward their support at the present time.

7. If you live in a rented apartment or other rented building, state how much you pay each month for rent. Do not include rent contributed by other people.

8. State any special financial circumstances which the court should consider in this application.

I understand that a false statement or answer to any questions in this declaration will subject me to the penalties of perjury.

I declare under penalty of perjury that the foregoing is true and correct.

Signed this ____ day of ___ , 20___.

_____
(signature)

_____
Social Security No.

_____
Date of birth

A-6. APPLICATION FOR APPOINTMENT OF COUNSEL[338]

In the United States District Court
For the _____ [30]

[YOUR NAME IN CAPITAL LETTERS]
(Petitioner/Plaintiff)	APPLICATION FOR APPOINTMENT OF COUNSEL
	No. _____[31]
[RESPONDENT'S NAME IN ALL CAPS]
(Respondent(s)/Defendant(s))

(a) Your Name and Mailing Address _____[32]

(b) Explain why you feel you need a lawyer in this case. (For example, you don't know the law well, you don't have access to the law library, you have a disability, your case is very complicated, etc. Use additional paper or include an affidavit supporting your application if necessary.)[33]

(c) Explain what steps you have taken to find an attorney and with what results. (Use additional paper if necessary.)

(d) If you need a lawyer who speaks in a language other than English, state what language you speak: _____

I declare under penalties of perjury that my answers to the foregoing questions are true to the best of my knowledge.

I understand that if I am assigned a lawyer and my lawyer learns, either from myself or elsewhere, that I can afford a lawyer, the lawyer may give this information to the court.

I understand that if my answers on my application to Proceed in Forma Pauperis [or Affidavit in Support of Application for Appointment of Counsel] are false, my case can be dismissed.

I understand that making this application does not excuse me from litigating my case, and that it is still my responsibility to have the defendants served with a summons and complaint, if I have not already done so.

Dated: _____

_____
[Your Signature]

338. See, e.g., U.S. District Court, EDNY, Application for Appointment of Counsel, available at http://www.nyed.uscourts.gov/General_Information/Court_Forms/apptcnsl.pdf (last visited Feb. 5, 2011); John W. Witt, et al., Section 1983 Litigation: Forms 7-3, 7-4 312–13 (1994).

A-7. PRISONER AUTHORIZATION[339]

This is the form that should be sent to you after you submit your complaint to the district court. If you do not receive it within two weeks of submitting your complaint, you should copy the information found here and send it to the court so that your complaint is not dismissed because you did not comply with the Prison Litigation Reform Act.

****

Mailed to the Plaintiff by the Court on this date:

RE: _____ v. _____

NOTICE IS HEREBY GIVEN THAT THIS ACTION WILL BE DISMISSED UNLESS PLAINTIFF COMPLETES AND RETURNS THIS AUTHORIZATION FORM TO THIS COURT WITHIN FORTY-FIVE DAYS FROM THE DATE OF THIS NOTICE.

On April 26, 1996, the Prison Litigation Reform Act ("PLRA" or "Act") was signed into law. This Act amends the in forma pauperis statute (28 U.S.C. Section 1915) and requires you to pay the full filing fee when bringing a civil action if you are currently incarcerated or detained in any facility. If you do not have sufficient funds in your prison account at the time your action is filed, the Court must assess and collect payments until the entire filing fee of $ ___[34] has been paid, no matter what the outcome of the action.

****

SIGN AND DATE A COPY OF THE FOLLOWING AUTHORIZATION:

I, _____ , request and authorize the agency holding me in custody to send to the Clerk of the United States District Court for the _____[35] a certified copy of my prison account statement for the past six months. I further request and authorize the agency holding me in custody to calculate the amounts specified by 28 U.S.C. Section 1915(b), to deduct those amounts from my prison trust fund account (or institutional equivalent), and to disburse those amounts to the United States District Court for the _____.[36] This authorization shall apply to any agency into whose custody I may be transferred.

I UNDERSTAND THAT BY SIGNING AND RETURNING THIS NOTICE TO THE COURT, THE ENTIRE COURT FILING FEE OF $ ___[37] WILL BE PAID IN INSTALLMENTS BY AUTOMATIC DEDUCTIONS FROM MY PRISON TRUST FUND ACCOUNT EVEN IF MY CASE IS DISMISSED.

_____
Signature of Plaintiff

_____
Date Signed
State I.D. #
Local Prison I.D. #
Federal Bureau of Prisons I.D. #

339. See, e.g., U.S. District Court, EDNY, In Forma Pauperis Form-Prisoner (2002), available at http://www.nyed.uscourts.gov/pub/docs/courtforms/ifppris.pdf (last visited Feb. 5, 2011).

A-8. SAMPLE LANGUAGE FOR STATEMENT OF FACTS

The following paragraphs are examples of how to explain different types of complaints that you may want to bring.[340] DO NOT COPY ANY OF THESE as your facts will be different than this example.

INADEQUATE AND UNSANITARY HOUSING[341]

1. Numerous insects, rats, mice, and other vermin were in the prison throughout the period of plaintiffs' confinement from November, 2002 until the time of this complaint.
2. An exterminator did visit the prison in March of 2005, but only the common areas and guard areas were sprayed. Individual cells were never sprayed. When the common areas were sprayed, roaches and other vermin simply moved into the individual cells. Once the fumes dissipated, the vermin returned unharmed to again infest the entire prison.
3. The exterminator wore a mask and gloves, but prisoners remained in their cells and were not given masks or protective clothing.
4. There was no ventilation to prevent prisoners from inhaling the fumes. Plaintiff and fellow prisoner [Plaintiff #2], as well as several others, suffered severe headaches and nausea after the extermination.
5. Inadequate lighting in the cells made reading for more than a few minutes at a time extremely difficult and nearly impossible. Requests for lamps or stronger light bulbs were denied on [insert dates and name of person who denied the lightbulb].

INADEQUATE VISITATION AND TELEPHONE ACCESS[342]

1. Plaintiff attempted to telephone his attorney beginning in March, 2005, because he wished to tell him about new evidence in his case. On or about March 3, 2005, plaintiff asked [Defendant #1] to allow plaintiff to make a telephone call to his attorney. Defendant refused.
2. Plaintiff continued to request telephone access throughout the month of March. On April 1, 2005, he was given access to the telephone, but only after 7:30 p.m. Because his attorney works only during business hours, plaintiff was unable to contact him that day.
3. The refusal of the prison staff to allow plaintiff access to telephone contradicted stated prison policy regarding telephone use for prisoners in the general population posted in the cafeteria. Plaintiff was a part of the general population for the entire time that he could not access a telephone.
4. The official prison policy regarding telephone use is also insufficient for purposes of contact with prisoners' attorneys. While confined in the prison, each prisoner was allowed to make only one 5-minute call during the week and one 10-minute call on the weekend. The weekday phone calls were restricted to the daytime one week and the evening the next. Each prisoner was allowed only one long-distance telephone call per month, even if that was the only way to contact that prisoner's attorney.
5. On January 17, 2006, plaintiff [Plaintiff #2] met with his attorney in the common area. Despite numerous requests by plaintiff [Plaintiff #2] and plaintiff's attorney for privacy, defendants [Defendant #2 and #4] refused to keep other prisoners away from plaintiff and his attorney. In addition, defendants [Defendant #2 and #4] were also observed to be listening to plaintiff and attorney conversing.
6. The short amount of time allotted for the calls and the complete lack of privacy markedly decreased the quality of discussions between prisoners and their attorneys. The only phone was located in the common area. It was not only difficult to have a conversation over the noise of the guards and other prisoners, but also nearly impossible to have a private conversation. On numerous occasions prisoners complained that the guards were listening to their phone conversations.
7. The prison's attorney visitation policy was unduly restrictive during the period of plaintiffs' confinement. Prisoners were forced to converse either in the common area where other prisoners and guards could overhear conversations or in a meeting room observed by guards through two-way mirrors. Since attorneys often felt uncomfortable conversing openly in the common area, surrounded by other prisoners, meetings often occurred under the watchful eye of the prison guards.

340. These fact patterns are based in large part upon examples taken from the sample complaints in John W. Witt, et al., Section 1983 Litigation: Forms (1994).

341. See John W. Witt, et al., Section 1983 Litigation: Forms, Form 1-5, 31 (1994).

342. See John W. Witt, et al., Section 1983 Litigation: Forms, Form 1-5, 32 (1994).

INADEQUATE MEDICAL CARE[343]

SPECIFIC INSTANCE

1. On August 23, 2004, plaintiff injured his ankle and foot while playing basketball with other prisoners. At approximately 2:00 p.m., he asked [Defendant #1] to be allowed to attend sick call at the infirmary. [Defendant #1] denied plaintiff's request, stating that sick call was at 8:30 a.m. and that plaintiff would have to wait until the following morning. Plaintiff then returned to his cell, his injury untreated.
2. In the early afternoon of August 23, 2004, plaintiff, still in his cell, saw [Defendant #2] making his rounds on plaintiff's floor. Plaintiff told [Defendant #2] about his foot injury and asked to see the prison nurse. [Defendant #2] replied that in order to see the nurse, his pain would have to be an emergency. Otherwise, plaintiff would have to wait until the next day for sick call. Plaintiff immediately told him it was an emergency. However, [Defendant #2] said that he did not think it was an emergency because plaintiff was not bleeding and told plaintiff to wait for sick call. [Defendant #2] then left to continue his rounds.
3. Later on in the afternoon of August 23, 2004, plaintiff was in severe pain from his foot and noticed that it had swelled and become discolored. He called [Defendant #4], the shift supervisor at the time. He responded to plaintiff's call and asked him what was wrong. Plaintiff told him about his symptoms and asked to see the prison nurse. Instead, [Defendant #4] went to get some Advil for plaintiff.
4. On the evening of August 23, 2004, [Defendant #3] gave two Advil to plaintiff. Plaintiff took the Advil and told [Defendant #3] that his pain was so bad that he could not stand or walk. [Defendant #3] responded that he could only follow [Defendant #4]'s orders, and told plaintiff that sick call was at 8:30 a.m.
5. On the morning of August 24, 2004, prison staff members found plaintiff in his bed. He was unable to move his foot. Plaintiff was finally seen for the first time by the prison's staff nurse, at which time plaintiff was moved to _____County Hospital. At _____County Hospital, plaintiff's foot was examined and operated on. Plaintiff remained hospitalized for the next five days as a result of the prison's unprofessional and inappropriate treatment of his injury.
6. Plaintiff [Plaintiff #2] experienced earaches in both ears for the entire month of November, 2002, and was unable to obtain medical attention.
7. Plaintiff [Plaintiff #2] also suffered severe migraines from approximately December 2, 2005 through February 14, 2005 that were completely crippling. He was denied prompt medical care by the prison. When [Plaintiff #2] was finally taken to the hospital on February 14, 2005, he was diagnosed as suffering from cluster migraine headaches resulting from physical problems, namely, his ear infections.
8. Plaintiff [Plaintiff #3] suffered from severe neck pain as a result of a factory work accident prior to plaintiff's prison confinement. [Plaintiff #3] has been unable to get any medical attention for this physical ailment to date.
9. Plaintiff [Plaintiff #4] had pieces of broken knife lodged in his shoulder. While in the prison, the shards began causing him immense pain. Despite numerous complaints, [Plaintiff #4] has not received any medical attention to date.
10. Plaintiff [Plaintiff #5] suffered from an open, infected sore four inches in diameter on his leg. Plaintiff [Plaintiff #5] showed this sore to defendants [Defendants #1 and #2] on January 12, 2005. Prison authorities did not provide him with treatment or medication until February 1, 2005.
11. Plaintiff [Plaintiff #6] suffered severe migraine headaches resulting from stress and spiritual problems. He also had several stomach ulcers. He was unable to obtain adequate or timely medical care. Plaintiff reported these problems to defendant [Defendant #3] on December 1, December 15, and December 30, 2004. Defendant has not received any medical attention until the present time.

12. Plaintiff [Plaintiff #5] suffered a head wound in a shootout a few years prior to his sentence in prison. When the wound became painful during [Plaintiff #5]'s stay at the prison, he asked defendants

343. See John W. Witt, et al., Section 1983 Litigation: Forms, Form 1-8, 47–48; Form 1-5, 33–48 (1994); see also Chapter 22 of the JLM, "Your Right to Adequate Medical Care."

[Defendants #2 and #5] on January 25, 2005 for a medical exam. He did not receive any medical care until two months after his first request. As a consequence of the delay in treatment, [Plaintiff #5] underwent a complicated surgical procedure on April 15, 2005 and was hospitalized for two weeks.

IN GENERAL

13. In general, defendants showed deliberate indifference to the medical needs of prisoners, and particularly neglected those of the plaintiffs.
14. Medical care at the prison was inadequate and unprofessional. Medical records, vital in assessing a patient's potential for future sickness, were not used to assist diagnoses. Deficiencies were the norm, and plaintiffs were unable to obtain examinations or care upon request. Prisoners had to often submit grievances to receive medical care from a physician or hospital.
15. Sick call occurred only once a week, the screening process for determining whether a patient needed attention was inadequate, and in the interim, plaintiffs would have to beg guards or other staff for basic medical attention.

INADEQUATE LAW LIBRARY AND FACILITIES[344]

1. Plaintiff [Plaintiff #1] filed a case in the district court on May 15, 2003 regarding injuries he received from a prison guard during a prison riot. Plaintiff's case was dismissed because he failed to use the Inmate Grievance Program prior to filing his case, as required by the Prison Litigation Reform Act ("PLRA").
2. Plaintiff was unable to file his lawsuit again because the statute of limitations in New York had passed by the time he received notice that his case had been dismissed.
3. Plaintiff did not know about the PLRA because the legal materials available to him in prison contained no cases or information regarding the state of the law after 1995.
4. The prison library was woefully inadequate. The most recent case reporters in the library dated from 1994 and several volumes were missing, specifically all of the United States reporters from 1990 and 1992.
5. Plaintiffs, relying on these reporters, suffered actual injury because they could have prevailed under a different claim if they had access to current statutory and case law.
6. The prisoners on each block were supposed to have access to the law library at least three times a week. However, they were regularly called only once a week or less. Five prisoners at a time were sent to the library for a period of ninety minutes, not enough time to adequately conduct research and prepare legal documents. No books were allowed to be checked out of the library. As a result, it was extremely difficult for the prisoners to get more than a small amount of work done each time they went to the library.

INADEQUATE MAIL FACILITIES (CORRESPONDENCE)[345]

1. The mail processing system at the prison was extremely inadequate. Mail was frequently lost or misplaced.
2. Plaintiff [Plaintiff #2] prepared a petition for a writ of habeas corpus. Three weeks after giving it to prison authorities to be mailed, plaintiff discovered it at the bottom of a three foot stack of undelivered mail. In addition, the envelope was battered and dirty.
3. Plaintiff [Plaintiff #3] notified the mail clerk that he was expecting a letter and photographs from his wife and children. Three months later Plaintiff [Plaintiff #3] received a torn envelope with no photographs. The envelope was marked "Received" with the date of two months before stamped on it. Plaintiff [Plaintiff #3] suffered extreme emotional harm and depression due to this lack of expected correspondence with his family.
4. In addition, the prison did not have any secure place for incoming or outgoing mail to protect against the mail being stolen or lost.

---

344. See John W. Witt, et al., Section 1983 Litigation: Forms, Form 1-5, 34 (1994).
345. See John W. Witt, et al., Section 1983 Litigation: Forms, Form 1-5, 34 (1994).

INADEQUATE OPPORTUNITY TO PRACTICE RELIGION[346]

1. Plaintiffs were not permitted to meet or practice their religion. Even though numerous grievances were filed and the majority of the prisoners were usually Muslim, the prison did not allow any Muslim services.
2. Despite the fact that plaintiffs' religion strictly forbids them from eating pork and foods cooked with pork fat, the prison offered no vegetarian or alternative diet plan.

UNSAFE ENVIRONMENT[347]

1. From approximately April 2005 through December 2005 plaintiff was mercilessly beaten and savagely raped by defendant [Defendant #1] and other fellow prisoners whose names are unknown to plaintiffs.
2. As a result of these assaults, plaintiff [name] suffered [describe injuries such as: broken jaw, severe facial lacerations requiring stitches, anal bleeding, and severe anxiety]. Defendant [Defendant #2] knew about the injuries; despite plaintiff's request for hospitalization, defendant [Defendant #2] denied plaintiff access to medical care.
3. [Specify other acts or omissions that defendants knowingly and negligently committed, which tended to cause the injuries received by plaintiff, such as: A number of prison guards knowingly and negligently opened the cell doors of _____and allowed the intermingling of prisoners, many of them in prison for the commission of extremely violent crimes. These guards were well aware of the severe danger to plaintiff. The prison guards failed to properly supervise the prison and provide for plaintiff's safety. They also purposely and recklessly failed to provide plaintiff with medical assistance, thereby depriving plaintiff of his civil rights, guaranteed by the Constitution and Laws of the United States and of the State of _____.].
4. Defendants' [Defendants #2, #3, and #4] recklessness, failure to properly train and manage [prison guards or medical doctor] of the County of _____, State of _____, and failure to adequately supervise and protect plaintiffs from the acts complained of caused the deprivation of plaintiffs' rights.

346. See John W. Witt, et al., Section 1983 Litigation: Forms, Form 1-5, 34 (1994).

347. See John W. Witt, et al., Section 1983 Litigation: Forms 1-7.1, 36 (Jonathan M. Purver, ed., Aspen Publishers 3d ed. Supp. 2006).

A-9. SAMPLE FULL COMPLAINT

The following is a sample full complaint. DO NOT COPY ANY OF THESE as your facts will be different than this example. NOTE, you will want to DOUBLE SPACE the body of your complaint. This complaint is single spaced.

IN THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT FOR THE NORTHERN DISTRICT OF STATE

Scott Martin, Plaintiff, v. Captain Jack Williams, Sergeant John Doe, Acting Sergeant Joseph Franks, Correctional Officer Steve Doe, Dr. Stanley Thomas, Correctional Officer Ronald C. Smith, and Warden Justin A. Kent, individually and in their official capacities. Defendants.	COMPLAINT Jury Trial Demanded No. 12345

PLAINTIFF'S SECOND AMENDED COMPLAINT

Plaintiff Scott Martin, by his attorneys, for his second amended complaint against defendants Captain Jack Williams, Sergeant John Doe, Acting Sergeant Joseph Franks, Correctional Officer Steve Doe, Dr. Stanley Thomas, Correctional Officer Ronald C. Smith, and Warden Justin A. Kent, alleges as follows:

JURISDICTION AND VENUE

1. This Court has jurisdiction over this action under 28 U.S.C. Sections 1331 and 1343(3) and (4). The matters in controversy arise under 42 U.S.C. Section 1983.

2. Venue properly lies in this District pursuant to 28 U.S.C. Section 1391(b)(2), because the events giving rise to this cause of action occurred at Plaineville Correctional Center ("Plaineville") in City, State, which is located within the Northern District of State.

PARTIES

3. Plaintiff Scott Martin is and was, at all times relevant hereto, a prisoner in the custody of the State Department of Corrections ("SDOC"). At the time of the events relevant hereto, Martin was incarcerated at Plaineville. Martin is currently incarcerated at the Smithville Correctional Center ("Smithville").

4. Defendant Jack Williams is an SDOC officer with the rank of captain, who at all times relevant hereto was assigned to Plaineville.

5. Defendant Dr. Stanley Thomas was, at all times relevant hereto, a physician employed or retained by SDOC to provide medical services at Plaineville.

6. Defendant Sergeant John Doe is an SDOC officer with the rank of Sergeant, who at all times relevant hereto was assigned to Plaineville.

7. Defendant Acting Sergeant Joseph Franks was, at all times relevant hereto, a correctional officer at Plaineville, who at the time of the events described below was serving as an acting sergeant.

8. Defendant Officer Steve Doe was, at all times relevant hereto, a correctional officer at Plaineville.

9. Defendant Ronald C. Smith was, at all times relevant hereto, a correctional officer at Plaineville.

10. Defendant Justin A. Kent was, at all times relevant hereto, Warden of Plaineville. As Warden of the prison, Defendant manages its day-to-day operations and executes its policies.

PREVIOUS LAWSUITS BY PLAINTIFF

11. Plaintiff has filed no other lawsuits dealing with the same facts involved in this action or otherwise relating to his/her imprisonment.

EXHAUSTION OF ADMINISTRATIVE REMEDIES

[Read Chapter 13 of the JLM, "The Prison Litigation Reform Act."]

FACTS

12. On or about January 1, 2003, plaintiff was assigned to and resided in cell 1, Unit 1, at Plaineville with his cellmate, Mr. Joshua Nixon ("Nixon").

12. On several occasions prior to January 1, 2003, plaintiff informed defendant Williams that he feared for his personal health and safety due to serious conflicts he was having with Nixon, and plaintiff requested that one of them be transferred as soon as possible.

13. Prior to January 1, 2003, plaintiff wrote a letter to defendant Williams that again informed Williams of his fear for his personal health and safety due to the situation between plaintiff and Nixon and asked that plaintiff be transferred from the cell.

14. On January 1, 2003, Nixon also made a request to defendant Williams for a cell transfer due to conflicts between himself and plaintiff. Defendant Williams denied the request.

15. On January 1, 2003, plaintiff personally asked defendant Williams if he could be transferred from his cell because he feared for his personal health and safety due to conflicts between himself and Nixon. Defendant Williams refused plaintiff's request.

16. On January 1, 2003, Nixon asked Correctional Officer Washington whether he could be transferred from his cell to an adjoining cell occupied only by Charles Jones, because he and plaintiff were having serious problems living together. Officer Washington agreed to make such a transfer. However, without explanation, defendant Sergeant John Doe refused to permit Officer Washington to supervise the move.

17. Charles Jones also discussed with both Officer Washington and defendant Williams Nixon's request for a move into Jones's cell, and he notified Washington and Williams that he was not opposed to Nixon moving into his cell.

18. On January 1, 2003, the same day that plaintiff and Nixon repeatedly asked various correctional officers at Plaineville for a cell transfer, the two engaged in a verbal argument about the volume level of Nixon's radio. A few hours later, plaintiff was sleeping when he heard his cellmate making noise. Plaintiff awoke to see Nixon putting on his boots. After Nixon had put on his boots, he attacked plaintiff without provocation. Nixon struck plaintiff numerous times, causing injuries to his eyes, nose, mouth, and chest.

Nixon also used various objects to strike plaintiff, including the radio and a property box. During the attack, Nixon stomped on plaintiff's bare feet with his heavy boots, causing injury to plaintiff's feet.

19. As Nixon beat him, plaintiff yelled for a "med tech" and summoned prison officials for assistance via a buzzer in his cell. When Acting Sergeant Franks and Correctional Officer Steve Doe arrived, they refused to open the cell door while plaintiff was being attacked. The two officers acknowledged to plaintiff that they saw that he was being attacked but failed to intervene until later.

20. Immediately following this assault, plaintiff was taken to the emergency room at Plaineville Hospital. Plaintiff suffered from cuts and lacerations on his body and his face, as well as multiple bruises and swelling on his face and body. Plaintiff was informed by medical personnel that a deep, 1.25 inch cut in his mouth required stitches. In addition, plaintiff was given an X-ray to determine whether or not his nose was broken, but the amount of blood in plaintiff's nose rendered the X-ray inconclusive.

21. Despite the severity of his injuries and the excruciating pain plaintiff suffered as a result of these injuries, only two Tylenol were administered to plaintiff after the attack. Plaintiff endured severe pain throughout the night from his extensive injuries. The next day, despite the serious pain, Dr. Thomas prescribed only Motrin for pain relief. Although plaintiff's pain was not alleviated, no stronger pain killer was administered.

22. Notwithstanding the opinion of other medical personnel that plaintiff required stitches, defendant Dr. Thomas refused to administer any stitches for the deep cut in plaintiff's mouth. He instead told a colleague that plaintiff was "a crybaby" and discharged him from any further care. Despite plaintiff's repeated requests, defendant Dr. Thomas refused to arrange for any follow-up care for his injuries.

23. At plaintiff's request, he was given a pass permitting him to return to the Hospital the following day for follow-up medical care, but he was never called to return to the Hospital. Plaintiff wrote to defendants Warden Kent and Dr. Thomas to tell them that he had not been taken back to the Hospital for follow-up treatment for his injuries and to request such treatment, but he never was sent back to the Hospital for follow-up care. The only further action any member of the prison staff took with respect to plaintiff's injuries was to advise plaintiff in the future to avoid going to sleep before resolving disagreements with a cellmate.

24. Following his visit to the emergency room, plaintiff continued to suffer from migraine headaches, dizziness, and general physical pain as a result of his injuries. He continued to bleed from the unstitched cut in his mouth for days afterwards, making it difficult or impossible to eat.

25. Soon after, plaintiff filed a grievance and a civil suit against the above-named defendants for their deliberate indifference to harm caused to him throughout the above-mentioned period.

26. After filing the civil suit, plaintiff was the target of harassment and retaliation from both defendant Williams and defendant Smith.

27. On January 14, 2004, plaintiff exited his cell and approached defendant Smith to ask him when lunch was being served. Defendant Smith stuck out his arm and threw plaintiff backwards, nearly causing him to fall. Plaintiff then approached defendant Williams, who witnessed the event, to ask him if he would let this act go without reprimand. Defendant Smith then threatened plaintiff by telling him that "next time, I will bust your head." To this, defendant Williams responded to plaintiff, "you know what you've got to do, take care of your business." On subsequent occasions, defendant Smith verbally harassed plaintiff for filing grievances and lawsuits.

28. Defendant Williams also harassed plaintiff in retaliation for grievances plaintiff had filed against Williams. For example, on February 1, 2004, during an alcohol "shake down," plaintiff and only two other prisoners were forced to submit to a strip search, even though plaintiff had never had an alcohol violation, nor had he ever failed any drug test administered by the prison.

29. Similarly, on March 12, 2004, defendant Williams loudly berated plaintiff from the gallery for accusing him of being a racist in one of the grievances plaintiff had filed against him. Defendant Williams then approached plaintiff's cell, opened the cell door, and told plaintiff that he does not harass prisoners and only tries to help and protect them. In doing so, Williams used the precise language that plaintiff had used in his grievance against Williams, thus emphasizing that he was acting in retaliation for the grievance.

COUNT ONE: BREACH OF DUTY TO PROTECT

31. Defendant Williams exercised deliberate indifference to plaintiff's health and safety by failing to protect him from a prison attack even though he had been informed of a threat to plaintiff's health and safety. Defendant Williams received repeated requests, oral and in writing, from both plaintiff and his cellmate, Nixon, for a cell transfer due to conflict between the two and refused to act upon them. Defendant Williams' deliberate indifference to plaintiff's health and safety was further demonstrated when he spoke to plaintiff the day after plaintiff had been attacked and laughed at plaintiff's injuries.

32. Defendant Sergeant John Doe exercised deliberate indifference to plaintiff's health and safety by refusing, for no reason, to authorize a cell transfer of either plaintiff or Nixon to an available cell, when he knew that there were serious conflicts between plaintiff and Nixon and that plaintiff's health and safety were at risk.

33. Defendants Acting Sergeant Franks and Correctional Officer Steve Doe exercised deliberate indifference to plaintiff's health and safety by failing immediately to protect plaintiff from an attack by his cellmate as soon as they knew it was occurring. Instead, these defendants merely acknowledged to plaintiff that they saw the attack and, despite seeing that plaintiff had suffered and was suffering serious injuries, the defendants failed to stop the attack immediately.

34. As a result of the deliberate indifference exercised by the aforementioned defendants, plaintiff suffered serious harm at the hands of his cellmate. Plaintiff sustained multiple physical injuries, including deep cuts in his mouth and upon his face, bruises upon his face and body, as well as migraine headaches and dizziness. Plaintiff also suffered extreme emotional distress from the incident.

COUNT TWO: FAILURE TO ADMINISTER ADEQUATE MEDICAL REMEDY

36. Defendant Dr. Thomas exercised deliberate indifference to plaintiff's health by failing to provide adequate medical care to him following the attack by Nixon. Defendant Dr. Thomas intentionally did not administer stitches to a deep cut in plaintiff's mouth and refused to fulfill any of plaintiff's requests for follow-up care. Instead, defendant Dr. Thomas mocked plaintiff in front of other medical personnel.

37. As a result of Dr. Thomas's deliberate indifference to plaintiff's condition, plaintiff suffered further pain and mental anguish. He continued to suffer from migraine headaches and general pain throughout his body, and Dr. Thomas refused to provide adequate pain medication for plaintiff. In addition, plaintiff was unable to eat properly for days after receiving care from defendant Dr. Thomas, because the unstitched cut in his mouth did not properly heal.

COUNT THREE: RETALIATORY TREATMENT FOR FILING SECTION 1983 CLAIM AND FOR FILING GRIEVANCES

39. Almost immediately after plaintiff filed grievances against him, defendant Williams repeatedly harassed and caused harm to plaintiff in retaliation for the grievances. Defendant Williams forced plaintiff to submit to a strip search, even though he had no reason to do so. Defendant Williams came on the gallery and loudly berated plaintiff for allegations he made in one of the grievances filed against Williams.

40. After plaintiff filed a civil rights action against defendant Williams, plaintiff suffered retaliation by defendants Williams and Smith. When plaintiff approached defendant Smith to speak with him, defendant Smith stuck his arm out straight and struck plaintiff, throwing him backward and nearly knocking him down. Defendant Williams looked on and failed to correct or chastise defendant Smith as a result of this battery, merely warning plaintiff that "you know what you've got to do, take care of your business."

41. A few months later, after plaintiff had filed a grievance against defendants Smith and Williams for the above incident, Officer Smith verbally harassed plaintiff in retaliation for plaintiff's filing of the grievance. Defendant Smith told plaintiff that he "was the type who liked to file grievances and that it didn't matter if [Martin] filed a [lawsuit] because [Martin] wasn't going to be getting any money and that nothing [was] going to be done."

42. These acts represent a pattern of events demonstrating intentional retaliation against plaintiff by defendants Williams and Smith for filing grievances and a civil rights action and have caused plaintiff further mental anguish as a result.

WHEREFORE, Scott Martin prays for judgment in his favor and damages in his favor against all defendants in an amount sufficient to compensate him for the pain and mental anguish suffered by him due to the deliberate indifference and intentional misconduct of defendants, but in no event less than $300,000, together with his attorneys' fees and costs, and such additional relief as the Court may deem just and proper.

Respectfully submitted,

_____

Scott Martin, Plaintiff

Fill in the forms shown in Appendix A as follows:

---

1. Name of the federal district where the prison is located in which the alleged offense occurred, for example, "Southern District of New York" or "District of Colorado."

2. Leave this blank. This entry will be filled in by the clerk of the court where you file the form.

3. See Section C(2) of this Chapter for information on whom to name as proper defendants.

4. Your complete prison address.

5. Name of the federal district where the prison is located in which the alleged offense occurred, for example, "Southern District of New York" or "District of Colorado."

6. Leave this blank. This will be filled in by the clerk of the court where you file the form.

7. See Section C(2) of this Chapter for information on whom to name as proper defendants.

8. Add "as a pretrial detainee" if that applied to you at the time about which you are complaining.

9. If you do not know the names of the defendants, you should refer to them as either John or Jane Doe. See Section C(2) for more information.

10. In this and the following paragraphs, use the descriptions and titles of defendants that are correct for your case.

11. Include the type of prison about which you are complaining, such as federal penitentiary or state correctional institute.

12. Use the name of whatever part of the Constitution or federal statute that protects your rights.

13. Fill in the name of the District and State where you are filing, for example, "Southern District of New York" or "District of Colorado."

14. Use this paragraph if you have never filed a lawsuit before.

15. Whether you will need to include this section and what you will need to include in it varies greatly depending on where you are filing your lawsuit. For an explanation of how to indicate to the court that you exhausted your administrative remedies, see Chapter 13 of the JLM, "The Prison Litigation Reform Act." Pay particular attention to whether the courts in your jurisdiction require you to plead and prove in your complaint that you exhausted the administrative grievance procedures available to you. Depending on where you are, you may be able to omit this section entirely. However, in some circuits, such as the 6th Circuit, you will need to include quite a bit of information in this section.

16. You should try to write the facts in such a way that they satisfy the appropriate legal standard. See Appendix A-8 of this Chapter for a full complaint.

17. An order from the court making the defendants do or stop doing something.

18. Name of the federal district where the prison is located in which the alleged offense occurred, for example, "Southern District of New York" or "District of Colorado."

19. Your name.

20. Leave this blank.

21. The name of the first defendant against whom you are bringing suit.

22. Leave blank. You should have this affidavit notarized. The notary public will fill in the date here.

23. Name of the federal district where the prison is located in which the alleged offense occurred, for example, "Southern District of New York" or "District of Colorado."

24. Leave these blank. The court clerk will fill these in.

25. This format is only a sample. You should request what is usually called a T-1080 Form of Motion from the court and use it to make your motion to file in forma pauperis.

26. Leave this blank. This entry will be filled in by the clerk of the court where you file the form.

27. Name of the federal district where the prison is located in which the alleged offense occurred, for example, "Southern District of New York" or "District of Colorado."

28. The Prison Litigation Reform Act ("PLRA") requires you to submit a certified copy of your prison account statement showing your balance for the last six months along with this declaration. For more information on complying with the PLRA, see Chapter 13 of the JLM, "The Prison Litigation Reform Act."

29. Name of the federal district in which your prison is located and the alleged violation occurred, for example, "Southern District of New York" or "District of Colorado."

30. Name of the federal district in which your prison is located and the alleged violation occurred, for example, "Southern District of New York" or "District of Colorado."

31. Leave this blank. The clerk of the court will write in a number.

32. Your name.

33. The most obvious reason prisoners need legal representation is that § 1983 claims involve complex legal issues that are difficult to understand and litigate effectively for non-lawyers.

34. Filing fees may differ depending upon the federal district court in which you file your claim.

35. Fill in the district in which the court is located, such as "Southern District of New York" or "District of Colorado."

36. Once again, fill in the federal district in which the court is located.

37. Fill in the fee charged by the district court in which your case is filed.

A JAILHOUSE LAWYER'S MANUAL

Chapter 17: The State's Duty to Protect You and Your Property: Tort Actions

Columbia Human Rights Law Review

Ninth Edition 2011

Legal Disclaimer

A Jailhouse Lawyer's Manual is written and updated by members of the Columbia Human Rights Law Review. The law prohibits us from providing any legal advice to prisoners. This information is not intended as legal advice or representation nor should you consider or rely upon it as such. Neither the JLM nor any information contained herein is intended to or shall constitute a contract between the JLM and any reader, and the JLM does not guarantee the accuracy of the information contained herein. Additionally, your use of the JLM should not be construed as creating an attorney-client relationship with the JLM staff or anyone at Columbia Law School. Finally, while we have attempted to provide information that is up-to-date and useful, because the law changes frequently, we cannot guarantee that all information is current.

CHAPTER 17

THE STATE'S DUTY TO PROTECT YOU AND YOUR PROPERTY: TORT ACTIONS*

A. Introduction

This Chapter explains your rights to protect your body and your property while you are in prison, and the steps you can take if you believe someone has violated those rights. Part B of this Chapter will introduce you to the general law of personal injury, called tort law. It covers injuries caused by excessive force, the failure of prison officials to protect you from other prisoners, improper or inappropriate medical care, and poorly maintained facilities. Part B also covers damage to your personal property. Part C of this Chapter will help you determine whom you can sue, where to sue, and what kind of relief you can get. It also explains how to complete your institution's internal grievance procedures (or exhaust your administrative remedies) before filing a case in court. Part D explains how to proceed with your case step-by-step, from filing the right papers to obtaining evidence and appealing a decision. Part D is very important because if you wait too long to file a claim or file it in the wrong place, you could lose the claim for good. Keep in mind that prisoners face additional hurdles in bringing lawsuits about injuries suffered in prison.

At the end of this Chapter there is an Appendix with examples of forms you may need to fill out and submit at various stages of the court process. DO NOT RIP THESE FORMS OUT OF THE JLM.

JLM, Chapter 24, "Your Right To Be Free From Assault," gives more information about excessive force by correction officers and failure to protect prisoners from assault. If you believe you have been assaulted in prison, Chapter 24 will explain your rights and what action you can take.

Please note that this Chapter details the procedures under New York State law. Prisoners outside New York State should use this Chapter to learn about the basic concepts of tort law, and then do careful research about their own state's laws. Chapter 2 of the JLM, "Introduction to Legal Research," will help you perform this task.

B. Know Your Rights: Tort Actions

The law recognizes that, in general, people have a duty not to injure one another, and not to damage or destroy one another's property. When someone breaks that duty, it is called a tort.[1] A tort can be either intentional or negligent. An intentional tort is when one person hurts another person (or their property) on purpose. A negligent tort, on the other hand, is often the result of failing to take proper precautions to protect other people and their property. The person who commits a tort, whether intentionally or through negligence, is called a tortfeasor.[2]

Once you conclude that you have suffered a tort, you must decide whether it was an intentional or negligent tort. This distinction determines what you will have to prove in order to win your case.

1. Intentional Torts

For most intentional torts, you must prove: 1) that the tortfeasor hurt you or damaged your property, and 2) that he intended to do so. These two elements are sometimes called the "results prong" and the "intent prong." Some examples of intentional torts include assault, false arrest, false imprisonment, intentional infliction of emotional distress, libel, and slander. Intentional torts against property include trespass[3] (wrongful entry onto another's property) and conversion (taking something that does not belong to you and acting like it is yours).[4]

---

* This Chapter was revised by Jonathan Gant, based on previous versions by Alison Fischer, Sandy Santana, Mathew Strada, Elizabeth Galani, Vanessa Armstrong, Deirdre Bialo-Padin, and members of the 1977 Columbia Human Rights Law Review. Special thanks to Lanny E. Walter, Esq. of Walter, Thayer & Mishler, P.C. for his valuable comments.

1. Black's Law Dictionary 1626 (9th ed. 2009).
2. Black's Law Dictionary 1627 (9th ed. 2009).
3. Black's Law Dictionary 1642 (9th ed. 2009).
4. Black's Law Dictionary 381 (9th ed. 2009).

2. Negligent Torts

The biggest difference between intentional torts and negligent torts is the mental state of the person causing the injury. Unlike an intentional tortfeasor, a negligent tortfeasor does not intend to cause damage or injury. Instead, a negligent tortfeasor creates an unreasonably unsafe situation by doing something an ordinary person would not do, or by failing to take some precaution he should have taken. When this unreasonable behavior causes injury or destruction of property, we call it a negligent tort.

To prove a negligent tort, you must first show that the tortfeasor had a responsibility to keep you from being injured, called a "duty of care." Second, you must show that the tortfeasor violated (or breached) this duty of care by acting negligently, or failing to do what a reasonable person would have done under the circumstances.[5] Third, you must show that your injury was foreseeable, meaning that a reasonable person would have known that the tortfeasor's behavior could cause the type of injury that you suffered.

(a) Duty and Breach

Even if you can show that someone was negligent towards you and caused you injury, you must also show that they had a legal duty to treat you with care. Whether or not someone owes you a duty of care depends on the particular situation and your relationship to that person. For example, a supervisor in a job owes you a duty of care to maintain a safe workplace, and you can therefore sue him if he fails to do so. A coworker, however, does not owe you that duty, and you could not sue him, even if he gave you a piece of defective equipment and you got injured using it. To decide whether or not the person responsible for your injuries owed you a duty of care, you can look to what other courts have said about similar situations. The cases mentioned in the footnotes of this Chapter are a good place to start your research.

There may also be laws in your state that define what duties people owe one another in certain situations and what counts as a breach of those duties. If a law or statute says that a certain type of behavior constitutes negligence, then that behavior is called per se negligence.[6] All you need to show in such cases is that the tortfeasor engaged in the behavior described in the statute.

As a prisoner, the state and its employees will owe you a duty of care in most situations. But, to make sure that the state or a specific state employee owed you a duty of care in your case, you will have to look for cases or laws that apply to your specific situation.

(b) Reasonableness and Foreseeability

In court, ordinary words like reasonable and foreseeable have special legal meanings. You should look to cases with facts like yours to determine how courts would define those terms in your case. As with a duty of care, certain written laws and statutes may define standards of reasonableness and foreseeability.

To determine whether your injury was foreseeable and whether the alleged tortfeasor acted reasonably, courts will examine the situation before you were injured. This is called an ex ante perspective. You must show your injury was predictable apart from the fact that you ended up injured; in other words, you cannot use the fact that you were injured to show that an injury was foreseeable.

(c) Checklist for General Tort Claims

Before filing a tort claim, make sure you can establish the following elements in your case:

(1) In the case of an intentional tort:
  (a) The person causing the injury meant to cause it; and
  (b) The person causing the injury had no established right to do what he or she did.[7]
(2) In the case of a negligent tort:
  (a) The person causing the injury could have prevented the harm; and
  (b) The person's action or inaction caused your harm directly and foreseeably; and

---

5. Negligence is defined as the "[t]he failure to exercise the standard of care that a reasonably prudent person would have exercised in a similar situation." Black's Law Dictionary 1133 (9th ed. 2009). See also Black's Law Dictionary 1627 (9th ed. 2009) (defining negligent tort).

6. Black's Law Dictionary 1135 (9th ed. 2009).

7. See, e.g., N.Y. Correct. Law § 137(5) (McKinney 2003) ("No inmate … shall be subjected to degrading treatment, and no officer or other employee … shall inflict any blows … upon any inmate, unless in self-defense, or to suppress a revolt or insurrection."). Thus, if a guard hits you and was not acting in self-defense, the guard would be acting outside the scope of his authority.

(c) If the person causing the injury is a state or prison employee, he or she, in his or her official capacity, owed you a greater duty of care than you received.[8]

(3) In both intentional and negligent torts, you must prove actual injury.
   (a) It is not enough to show a prison official intended to harm you if you were not actually injured.
   (b) You must show signs of injury to your body, or proof of loss or damage to your property. Medical records will be helpful in proving this element. It is possible to show that emotional distress you have suffered is an actual injury, but this is very difficult. The act necessary to produce such emotional distress must be "extreme and outrageous."[9]

3. Constitutional Torts

The violation of your constitutional rights constitutes another type of tort. The state officers and employees you encounter have the same duty not to harm you and your property that other citizens have. However, because they are state actors, they also have a duty not to violate your federal or state constitutional rights. You should also read JLM, Chapter 13, "Federal Habeas Corpus," and Chapter 16, "Using 42 U.S.C. § 1983 and 28 U.S.C. § 1331 to Obtain Relief from Violations of Federal Law" if you believe your constitutional rights have been violated.

(a) Violation of State Constitutional Rights

When the state government violates your rights under the state constitution, you may be able to sue the state for damages.[10] Part C of this Chapter explains more about choosing the right court in which to file your claim, but if you wish to sue the State of New York, you must file your case in the New York Court of Claims.[11] To prove a constitutional tort against the state, you must show that the state harmed you and that the state's actions violated specific rights listed in the state constitution. For example, you can sue the state government if the state discriminated against you because of your race or religion.[12]

The New York Court of Appeals[13] established the right to bring claims for violations of the state constitution in the 1996 case Brown v. State.[14] However, Brown only addressed tort claims based on the equal protection clause and the search and seizure clause of the New York Constitution.[15] The court did not decide whether individuals can sue for damages based on violations of other parts of the state constitution.[16]

---

8. See, e.g., Kagan v. State, 221 A.D.2d 7, 11–12, 646 N.Y.S.2d 336, 339 (2d Dept. 1996) (finding State liable for failure of prison employees to bring complaining prisoner to see nurse in a timely fashion, and of the nurse to refer prisoner to a physician, when both actions were required by prison regulations).

9. See, e.g., Shenandoah v. Hill, 9 Misc. 3d 548, 553, 799 N.Y.S.2d 892, 896–97 (Sup. Ct. Madison County 2005) (defining extreme and outrageous behavior as conduct "so outrageous of character, and so extreme in degree, as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency, and to be regarded as atrocious, and utterly intolerable in a civilized community") (citing Howell v. New York Post Co., 81 N.Y2d 115, 612 N.E. 699 (1993)).

10. Not all states permit civil suits based on violations of the state constitution, but New York does. See Brown v. State, 89 N.Y.2d 172, 674 N.E.2d 1129, 652 N.Y.S.2d 223 (1996).

11. See Brown v. State, 89 N.Y.2d 172, 183, 674 N.E.2d 1129, 1136, 652 N.Y.S.2d 223, 230 (1996) ("[D]amage claims against the state based upon violations of the State Constitution come within the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims.").

12. N.Y. Const. art. I, § 11: "No person shall be denied the equal protection of the laws of this state or any subdivision thereof. No person shall, because of race, color, creed, or religion, be subjected to any discrimination in his civil rights by any other person or by any firm, corporation, or institution, or by the state or any agency or subdivision of the state."

13. The New York Court of Appeals is the highest court in the State of New York. The intermediate court is the New York Appellate Division, and the trial level court is called the New York Supreme Court.

14. See Brown v. State, 89 N.Y.2d 172, 674 N.E.2d 1129, 652 N.Y.S.2d 223 (1996).

15. See Brown v. State, 89 N.Y.2d 172, 188, 674 N.E.2d 1129, 1139, 652 N.Y.S.2d 223, 233 (1996) ("[W]e conclude that a cause of action to recover damages may be asserted against the State for violation of the Equal Protection and Search and Seizure Clauses of the State Constitution."); see also N.Y. Const. art. I, § 11 (equal protection clause); N.Y. Const. art. 1, § 12 (search and seizure clause); Bin Wahad v. FBI, 994 F. Supp. 237, 239 (S.D.N.Y. 1998) (stating that Brown recognized a "narrow remedy" against the State of New York for violations of the equal protection and search and seizure guarantees of the New York State Constitution).

16. See Augat v. State, 244 A.D.2d 835, 837, 666 N.Y.S.2d 249, 251–52 (3d Dept. 1997) (stating that the availability of damages under New York's due process and freedom of association protections was "not specifically resolved in Brown").

So far, only one New York court has allowed damages based on another part of the state constitution (the "cruel and unusual punishment" provision).[17]

After Brown, New York courts have refused to award damages for state constitutional violations if other remedies are available.[18] This means that if you can bring a regular tort claim or a federal civil rights claim under 42 U.S.C. § 1983,[19] New York courts may not allow you to bring a state constitutional tort claim. However, you can still sue the state in the Court of Claims for violations of ordinary tort law. Since it is usually easier to prove a simple tort law claim than a constitutional claim, your chance of success is also better under tort law.

(b) Federal Constitutional Violations

If you want to recover damages for a violation of your rights under the U.S. Constitution, you must file a claim in either a federal district court or in the New York Supreme Court—not in the Court of Claims. See JLM Chapter 16, "Using 42 U.S.C. § 1983 and 28 U.S.C. § 1331 to Obtain Relief from Violations of Federal Law," for more information about using Section 1983 to bring a claim for violations of federal constitutional rights. Remember that the New York State Constitution has similar provisions to the U.S. Constitution, so you may be able to use the same facts to sue in the Court of Claims by alleging violations of the state constitution.

4. Examples of Common Tort Actions

This Section describes five torts that can happen in prison and the elements you must prove to win damages for these torts. Excessive force and failure to protect from other prisoners are two types of actions that are not included in this Chapter, because they are covered in JLM, Chapter 24, "Your Right to be Free From Assault." You should read that Chapter if you have been assaulted by a corrections officer or if you feel that the prison failed to protect you from assault by another prisoner. While the footnotes for this Section include citations to relevant cases, you should use these cases only as a starting point for your research. If you use the cases cited here, you should read the full text of those cases.

This Chapter only includes cases from New York and some federal cases. While New York cases are not binding on the courts of any other state, the tort law of most states is very similar to New York's. For that reason, the case summaries in this Chapter should serve as a useful starting point for determining the types of claims that other states' courts will hear. However, you should make sure to research the law in your state so that you know which cases to cite in your lawsuit.

The following are just a few examples of claims that you can bring; there are many other torts that happen in prison that can form the basis of a lawsuit. Look for cases with similar facts to your situation where the prisoner won, and use those cases to support your claim.

(a) Injuries Relating to Work and Work-Release Programs

Injuries sustained during the course of work within the prison or while on work release are considered work injuries. Tort actions under this category include the state's failure to provide reasonably safe equipment, as well as the state's failure to warn prisoners of specific dangers they might face when using the equipment.[20]

---

17. See De La Rosa v. State, 173 Misc. 2d 1007, 1010–11, 662 N.Y.S.2d 921, 924 (N.Y. Ct. Cl. 1997) (holding that a state's violation of the cruel and unusual punishment provision in Article I, § 5 of the New York Constitution can give rise to a civil rights cause of action under 42 U.S.C. § 1982, provided that injunctive and declaratory relief are inadequate and money damages would further the constitutional purpose).

18. See Bin Wahad v. FBI, 994 F. Supp. 237, 240 (S.D.N.Y 1998) (refusing to imply a cause of action for violation of the State Due Process Clause because plaintiffs had alternative remedies under 42 U.S.C. § 1983); see also Augat v. New York, 244 A.D.2d 835, 837–38, 666 N.Y.S.2d 249, 251–52 (3d Dept. 1997) (holding that plaintiff's constitutional tort claims were related to existing common-law torts for which there were adequate remedies); Remley v. State, 174 Misc. 2d 523, 527–28, 665 N.Y.S.2d 1005, 1009 (N.Y. Ct. Cl. 1997) (refusing to imply private right of action for violations of State Due Process Clause under Brown analysis because plaintiff had alternative remedies under State tort law).

19. See Chapter 16 of the JLM, "Using 42 U.S.C. § 1983 and 28 U.S.C. § 1331 to Obtain Relief from Violations of Federal Law," for more information on how to obtain relief for violations of federal law under 42 U.S.C. § 1983.

20. See Kandrach v. State, 188 A.D.2d 910, 913, 591 N.Y.S.2d 868, 871 (3d Dept. 1992) (finding that when a prisoner participates in a prison work program, the State has a duty to provide reasonably safe equipment and warn prisoners of any potential dangers).

For example, one court awarded damages to a prisoner who lost his fingers working in an on-site prison sawmill because his woodchipping machine was missing a safety guard.[21] The missing safety guard violated the state's duty to maintain safe machinery. Similarly, another court awarded damages to a prisoner who was injured in the course of repair work when the scaffolding beneath him collapsed.[22]

Just as the state has a duty to maintain a safe workplace, you too have a responsibility to take proper care of yourself while working in the prison or work-release program. If the court finds that your carelessness played a role in your injury, it can reduce your damages by the amount for which it believes you were responsible, or even prevent you from recovering altogether. This is called comparative negligence or contributory negligence.[23]

For example, in the woodchipping case above, the court only awarded half of the total damages to the prisoner, because the prisoner should not have climbed onto the chipping machine in the first place.[24] In another case, the court reduced damages because the prisoner did not follow safety instructions.[25] However, if you were ordered to do the dangerous act that caused your injury, courts may not reduce your damages under contributory negligence theory.[26] This is because courts know that prisoners can be punished for disobeying instructions.[27]

Furthermore, if the court believes that you behaved recklessly in a work-related setting, it can refuse to award you damages at all. Recklessness in this context means ignoring a known or obvious risk.[28] Whether the court considers that you were reckless depends partially on how knowledgeable you were about the field or area in which you were working. For instance, one court denied a prisoner damages for injuries suffered after touching live wiring because his previous electrical training made him aware that touching wires was dangerous.[29] By contrast, a prisoner who had received only minimal training was not held responsible for his own injuries.[30]

Note that you may be unable to recover from the state for work-release injuries that do not occur on prison grounds, especially if the state was not the owner or contractor at the work site.[31] Also, if recommending a prisoner for a work-release job is a discretionary action within the scope of a correctional employee's duties, the state is not responsible. Finally, the state has no duty to inspect possible work sites for work-release programs.[32]

You may be able to determine whether the state is liable for your injury by researching New York State labor laws, which courts have found applicable to prison work.[33]

---

21. Kandrach v. State, 188 A.D.2d 910, 912, 915, 591 N.Y.S.2d 868, 870, 872 (3d Dept. 1992) (recommending that damages be split between the prisoner and the State because, although the State failed to provide a safe environment, the plaintiff ignored safety warnings).

22. Shulenberg v. State, 35 Misc. 2d 751, 751–52, 231 N.Y.S.2d 816, 817 (N.Y. Ct. Cl. 1962).

23. Black's Law Dictionary 1134 (9th ed. 2009). States that use a contributory negligence rule will not grant damages if the plaintiff was negligent in a way that contributed to his injury. Comparative negligence systems are less harsh and allow the plaintiff to recover partial damages even if he shared in responsibility for the accident. New York and thirteen other states employ comparative negligence systems. N.Y. C.P.L.R. 1411, 1413 (McKinney 2010).

24. Kandrach v. State, 188 A.D.2d 910, 914–15, 591 N.Y.S.2d 868, 872 (3d Dept. 1992).

25. Hicks v. State, 124 A.D.2d 949, 949–50, 509 N.Y.S.2d 152, 152–53 (3d Dept. 1986) (upholding a damages award as reasonable but reducing it because the prisoner had not followed instructions).

26. See Lowe v. State, 194 A.D.2d 898, 899, 599 N.Y.S.2d 639, 641 (3d Dept. 1993) (finding that the prisoner faced an unfair choice between disobeying orders and risking injury).

27. See Lowe v. State, 194 A.D.2d 898, 899, 599 N.Y.S.2d 639, 641 (3d Dept. 1993) (finding that the prisoner faced an unfair choice between disobeying orders and risking injury).

28. Black's Law Dictionary 1385 (9th ed. 2009); see People v. Angelo, 246 N.Y. 451, 455, 159 N.E. 394, 396 (1927) (explaining that culpable negligence is something more than the slight negligence necessary to support a civil action for damages, and involves disregard of consequences and indifference to the rights of others).

29. Martinez v. State, 225 A.D.2d 877, 879, 639 N.Y.S.2d 145, 147 (3d Dept. 1996).

30. See Kandrach v. State, 188 A.D.2d 910, 910–11, 591 N.Y.2d 868, 869 (3d Dept. 1992) (upholding partial damages for a prisoner who had received only five minutes' training on how to operate a woodchipper).

31. See Gress v. State, 157 A.D.2d 479, 479, 549 N.Y.S.2d 666, 667 (1st Dept. 1990).

32. See Gress v. State, 157 A.D.2d 479, 479, 549 N.Y.S.2d 666, 667 (1st Dept. 1990).

33. See Callahan v. State, 19 A.D.2d 437, 438, 243 N.Y.S.2d 881, 882–83 (3d Dept. 1963), (holding that the Labor Law establishes a standard of care against which the state should be judged), aff'd, 14 N.Y.2d 665, 198 N.E.2d 903, 249 N.Y.S.2d 871 (1964).

(b) Medical Care Provided to Prisoners[34]

Claims relating to inadequate or inappropriate medical care are negligence claims. The state has a duty to provide prisoners with reasonable and adequate medical care in a timely manner.[35] If you believe the state has violated this duty towards you in a way that caused you real harm, you may have a successful medical tort claim.

In order to pursue a tort claim for medical negligence, you will have to prove that the treatment the state gave you (or failed to give you) was not standard—that it was not within "accepted medical practice."[36]

Second, you will have to prove that the state's action or inaction directly caused your injury and that the injury would not have happened anyway. This is called proximate cause.[37] For example, even if you had to wait a long time for treatment, you would not be able to recover damages unless the waiting caused your injury or made it significantly worse.[38] In order to prove the cause of your injury, you will almost always need testimony from medical experts.[39] As in other negligence tort claims, you must also show that the injury you suffered was a foreseeable result of the improper treatment you received.[40]

If you believe you have been injured due to improper or inadequate medical care, you can also seek damages under the theory of ministerial neglect, which means that when the state makes rules governing its duty to provide medical care and then fails to follow those rules, it is liable for the resulting harm.[41] For example, if the prison has a formal process by which prisoners can see medical staff and fails to follow that process for you, the prison may have automatically breached its duty towards you.[42]

The court may decide to eliminate or reduce damages if your actions contributed to your medical injury. For example, if you know that you have tuberculosis but do not inform prison officials of this fact, you might not receive damages if your condition goes untreated.[43]

A court may also refuse to hold the state liable if your injuries were due to the negligence of a private physician not directly employed by the state.[44] In this case, you may have to take legal action against the medical official or private hospital that treated you instead. However, the state could potentially be held

---

34. For more information about inadequate medical care claims in federal court, see Chapter 23 of the JLM, "Your Right to Adequate Medical Care."

35. See, e.g., Kagan v. State, 221 A.D.2d 7, 11, 646 N.Y.S.2d 336, 339 (2d Dept. 1996) (citing Estelle v. Gamble, 429 U.S. 97, 103, 97 S. Ct. 285, 290, 50 L. Ed. 2d. 251, 259 (1976), which provides that prisoners have the right to adequate and timely medical care).

36. See, e.g., Larkin v. State, 84 A.D.2d 438, 445–46, 446 N.Y.S.2d 818, 823 (4th Dept. 1982) (holding the state liable where a doctor failed to diagnose and treat a prisoner's headaches, resulting in the prisoner's death by aneurysm).

37. Black's Law Dictionary 250 (9th ed. 2009).

38. See, e.g., Brown v. State, 192 A.D.2d 936, 938–39, 596 N.Y.S.2d 882, 884–85 (3d Dept. 1993) (refusing to award damages for delay in treatment to prisoner who had to have his larynx (voice box) removed because it was determined that by the time he complained the larynx would have had to be removed anyway), appeal denied, 82 N.Y.2d 654, 622 N.E.2d 304, 602 N.Y.S.2d 803 (1993).

39. See Zi Guang v. State, 263 A.D.2d 745, 747, 695 N.Y.S.2d 142, 145 (3d Dept. 1999) (finding that prisoner failed to establish medical malpractice by prison officials in part because the prisoner's medical expert at trial "often … appeared unfamiliar with [prisoner's] medical records"); Duffen v. State, 245 A.D.2d 653, 654, 665 N.Y.S.2d 978, 980 (3d Dept. 1997) (dismissing prisoner's claim against the State because medical expert's testimony was too speculative to prove causation).

40. See Kagan v. State, 221 A.D.2d 7, 16–17, 646 N.Y.S.2d 336, 342 (2d Dept. 1996) (finding that prisoner's loss of hearing was foreseeable result of not treating the pain or bleeding in her ear); Williams v. State, 164 Misc. 2d 783, 785, 626 N.Y.S.2d 659, 661 (N.Y. Ct. Cl. 1995) (stating that court would not award damages for delay in receiving dental care unless prisoner could show the delay was "a deviation from good and accepted dental practice.").

41. See Kagan v. State, 221 A.D.2d 7, 10–11, 646 N.Y.S.2d 336, 338–39 (2d Dept. 1996) (finding that there is "no governmental immunity for the negligent performance of … ministerial duties" and that "whenever delays in diagnosis and/or treatment are a proximate cause or aggravating cause of a claimed injury, the State may be liable"); see also Ogle v. State, 191 A.D.2d 878, 881 594 N.Y.S.2d 824, 826 (3d Dept. 1993) (stating the State's failure to administer a tuberculosis treatment consistent with its policies made it liable for damages when surgery was ultimately necessary).

42. See Kagan v. State, 221 A.D.2d 7, 11–12, 17, 646 N.Y.S.2d 336, 339, 343 (2d Dept. 1996) (finding negligence where, contrary to policy, prison officials failed to allow prisoner to make appointment for next available screening, to make her medical records available to the screening nurse, and to properly enter her complaints into the record).

43. See Ogle v. State, 191 A.D.2d 878, 881, 594 N.Y.S.2d 824, 826 (3d Dept. 1993) (stating that it is "well established that culpable conduct, including the failure to reveal part of one's medical history, may diminish a victim's recovery in a medical malpractice case.").

44. See Williams v. State, 164 Misc. 2d 783, 785, 626 N.Y.S.2d 659, 661 (N.Y. Ct. Cl. 1995) (holding that the state was not liable for the negligence of a private dentist not working for the state).

liable for the actions of a private physician if you reasonably believed the physician worked for the state and had no reason to believe otherwise.[45]

(c) Destruction or Loss of Prisoner Property

State employees have an obligation not to take, damage, or destroy your property without just cause—whether intentionally or through negligence. If they do, you may be able to sue the state in the Court of Claims.[46] Remember that before you can file a claim for damages in any court, you must first exhaust all of your prison's administrative remedies.[47] A full description of when you can access the courts and what courts you should use is contained in Part C below.

If your items were stolen from you, you may be able to hold the state responsible for failing to provide adequate security in the area from which your property was taken.[48] However, you also have a responsibility for securing your own belongings. If you fail to lock a footlocker or leave your valuables in an open space, the court may reduce your damages to the degree they feel you were responsible, or may prevent you from recovering damages at all.[49] If you believe that prison officials have intentionally taken or destroyed your property without authorization, refer to Part B(1) above (intentional torts). If you believe that your property was destroyed due to negligently maintained prison facilities, see Part B(4)(d) below.

(d) Negligently Maintained Prison Facilities

As with injuries in the workplace, the state is not responsible for preventing all injuries that could occur on its property.[50] The state is only responsible for maintaining facilities in a "reasonably safe condition."[51] To determine what reasonably safe means, a court might consider how likely it was that an injury would occur, how serious that injury was likely to be, and how much it would have cost the state to prevent the injury.[52]

For example, a court refused to award damages to a prisoner who was injured in an icy exercise yard because prison staff had taken reasonable precautions to prevent such injuries by checking the area daily and salting it when slippery.[53] To recover in that case, the prisoner would have had to show that the particular area of the track was abnormally dangerous, and that officials knew or should have known about the danger.[54]

---

45. See Soltis v. State, 172 A.D.2d 919, 920, 568 N.Y.S.2d 470, 471–72 (3d Dept. 1991) (refusing to dismiss case against state where prisoner could reasonably have believed that the private physician was a state employee).

46. See Tigner v. New York, 559 F. Supp. 25, 27 (W.D.N.Y. 1983), aff'd, 742 F.2d 1432 (2d Cir. 1983) (holding that the Court of Claims provides a remedy for lost and damaged property claims that is sufficient to satisfy constitutional guarantees of due process).

47. N.Y. Ct. Cl. Act § 10(9) (McKinney 2007) (also providing that such a claim must be filed within 120 days after the date in which the prison's administrative remedies have been exhausted).

48. See Foy v. State, 182 A.D.2d 670, 671, 582 N.Y.S.2d 262, 263 (2d Dept. 1992) (holding that the State is not immune from liability in a prisoner's claim for loss of personal property when the prisoner alleged that the State negligently failed to properly secure the area of his cell).

49. Cf. Pollard v. State, 173 A.D.2d 906, 907–08, 569 N.Y.S.2d 770, 771 (3d Dept. 1991) (addressing the State's contributory negligence defense, but deferring to findings of trial court that prisoner had locked his locker and was thus not contributorily negligent).

50. See, e.g., Killeen v. State, 66 N.Y.2d 850, 851–52, 489 N.E.2d 245, 246, 498 N.Y.S.2d 358, 359 (1985) (holding that while the State "owes patients in its institutions a duty of reasonable care to protect them from injury, whatever the source," that does not "render the State an insurer or require it to keep each patient under constant surveillance," and finding the state not liable for injury that resulted when a patient in a state mental facility accidentally spilled hot water on himself (internal citation omitted)).

51. Basso v. Miller, 40 N.Y.2d 233, 241, 352 N.E.2d 868, 872, 386 N.Y.S.2d 564, 568 (1976) ("A landowner must act as a reasonable man in maintaining his property in a reasonably safe condition in view of all the circumstances.") (quoting Smith v. Arbaugh's Rest., Inc., 469 F.2d 97, 100 (D.C. Cir. 1972)).

52. Basso v. Miller, 40 N.Y.2d 233, 241, 352 N.E.2d 868, 872, 386 N.Y.S.2d 564, 568 (1976) (quoting Smith v. Arbaugh's Rest., Inc., 469 F.2d 97, 100 (D.C. Cir. 1972)).

53. Condon v. State, 193 A.D.2d 874, 875, 597 N.Y.S.2d 531, 532 (3d Dept. 1993).

54. Condon v. State, 193 A.D.2d 874, 875, 597 N.Y.S.2d 531, 532 (3d Dept. 1993).

(e) False Arrest and False Imprisonment

False imprisonment primarily applies to prisoners who are wrongfully confined in special housing units or on keeplock.[55] For additional information on confinement to special housing units, refer to JLM, Chapter 18, "Your Rights at Prison Disciplinary Proceedings."

A plaintiff making a false arrest claim must prove four elements: (1) the defendant intended to confine the plaintiff; (2) the plaintiff was aware of the confinement; (3) the plaintiff did not consent to the confinement; and (4) the confinement was not otherwise privileged.[56] The elements for proving false imprisonment are essentially the same as the elements for proving false arrest.[57]

The Court of Appeals has found that when prison employees discipline prisoners under the authority of and in compliance with statutes and regulations, both the employees and the state have absolute immunity from suit.[58] This means that even if you are placed on keeplock or in administrative segregation for charges that are eventually dismissed, you may not be able to recover damages.[59]

Note also that a judge is not a state officer within the meaning of the Court of Claims Act, and thus you cannot sue in the Court of Claims for an erroneous decision by a judge.[60]

(f) Excessive Force and Failure to Protect

Perhaps the most common tort lawsuits by prisoners are those alleging that corrections officers used excessive force against them or failed to protect them from other prisoners. Actions to recover for excessive force and failure to protect are covered in detail in JLM, Chapter 24, "Your Right to be Free From Assault."

C. Protecting Your Rights

This section provides an overview of the ways that you can go about seeking relief for your tort claim. It covers both administrative remedies available through the prison and remedies available through the courts.

1. Facility Grievance Procedures

(a) Exhaustion

If you are filing a claim for damages based on loss or damage to personal property, you cannot file in the Court of Claims until you have exhausted the prison's own administrative remedies for personal property claims.[61] This means that you must use all Department of Correctional Services (DOCS) internal procedures for compensating prisoners for loss or damage to property before suing in the Court of Claims. If DOCS grants your claims as requested, then you will not be able to pursue a suit in the Court of Claims.[62] After you have used all those procedures, you have 120 days to file and serve your claim in the Court of Claims.[63] Part D describes how to file a claim in the Court of Claims.

---

55. See, e.g., Gittens v. State, 132 Misc. 2d 399, 406–07, 504 N.Y.S.2d 969, 974 (N.Y. Ct. Cl. 1986) (finding that prisoner held in keeplock nine days beyond the penalty imposed by a disciplinary hearing could sue the state for false imprisonment).

56. See Broughton v. State, 37 N.Y.2d 451, 456, 335 N.E.2d 310, 314, 373 N.Y.S.2d 87, 93 (1975). Note that in some jurisdictions, the plaintiff does not need to show that he was aware of the confinement. See Scofield v. Critical Air Med., Inc., 52 Cal. Rptr. 2d 915, 923–24, 45 Cal. App. 4th 990, 1003–07 (Cal. Ct. App. 1996).

57. See Broughton v. State, 37 N.Y.2d 451, 455–56, 335 N.E.2d 310, 313–14, 373 N.Y.S.2d 87, 92–93 (1975).

58. See Arteaga v. State, 72 N.Y.2d 212, 217–21, 527 N.E.2d 1194, 1197–99, 532 N.Y.S.2d 57, 60–62 (1988) (finding that acts by employees in compliance with regulations constitute discretionary conduct for which the State has absolute immunity); see also Gittens v. State, 132 Misc. 2d 399, 403, 504 N.Y.S.2d 969, 972 (N.Y. Ct. Cl. 1986) (finding prison employee's disciplinary confinement of prisoner to be in compliance with applicable regulations and thus not false imprisonment).

59. See Arteaga v. State, 72 N.Y.2d 212, 220–21, 527 N.E.2d 1194, 1198–99, 532 N.Y.S.2d 57, 61–62 (1988) (finding the state and prison officers not liable for confinement of prisoners even though charges against prisoners were later dismissed); see also Gittens v. State, 132 Misc. 2d 399, 403 n.5, 504 N.Y.S.2d 969, 972 n.5 (N.Y. Ct. Cl. 1986) ("[R]egardless of a disposition ultimately favorable to the inmate, [confinement during the period when the charges are pending] does not constitute an actionable deprivation.").

60. See Murph v. State, 98 Misc. 2d 324, 326, 413 N.Y.S.2d 854, 856 (N.Y. Ct. Cl. 1979).

61. N.Y. Ct. Cl. Act § 10(9) (McKinney Supp. 2007).

62. In order to preserve your claim, it may be necessary to begin the filing process even though your DOCS procedures are not yet completed.

63. N.Y. Ct. Cl. Act § 10(9) (McKinney Supp. 2007).

(b) Administrative Remedies

DOCS may pay you if (1) another prisoner has damaged or destroyed your personal property or (2) an employee of DOCS has damaged or destroyed your personal property. According to Directive #2733, claims are limited to $350 if another prisoner caused the loss of property and $5000 if a DOCS employee is responsible for the loss or damage. You should ask prison officials for a copy of Directive #2733, which includes sample forms for applying for reimbursement.[64]

2. Pursuing a Remedy in Court

(a) Choosing a Court

Where you file suit depends on the circumstances of your case, whom you want to sue, and what kind of relief you are seeking. Generally, the Court of Claims hears suits against the state, including people acting as representatives of the state, and the New York State Supreme Court hears suits against people acting as individuals. If you want to sue individuals for violating your federal constitutional rights, you would sue in federal court.

(i) Filing in the Court of Claims

If you wish to sue the State of New York (if, for example, you are a prisoner in a state prison and you believe the state's employees have harmed you), you must sue in the New York Court of Claims.[65] In fact, the State of New York is the only defendant you can name in a suit before the Court of Claims. If a state guard or other employee has harmed you in the course of his employment, you may sue the state for damages in the Court of Claims.[66] As long as the employee was acting in his official capacity, you may not sue him personally.[67] If, however, an employee does something to you that is clearly outside the scope of his

---

64. N.Y. State Fin. Law § 8(12), (12-a) (McKinney 2007) (establishing that (1) heads of state departments are authorized to pay out of a cash advance account up to $250 at their own discretion through facility grievance procedures; (2) payments over $250 must be submitted to the State comptroller; (3) payments over $1000 must be approved by the State Attorney General; and (4) payments from internal grievance procedures cannot exceed $5000).

65. N.Y. Ct. Cl. Act § 9(2) (McKinney Supp. 2007) (giving the Court of Claims jurisdiction to hear cases against the State for damages).

66. N.Y. Correct. Law § 24(2) (McKinney 2010) ("Any claim for damages arising out of any act done or the failure to perform any act within the scope of the employment and in the discharge of the duties of any officer or employee of the [D]epartment [of Correctional Services] shall be brought and maintained in the court of claims as a claim against the state."). Note that if you seek a remedy other than money damages, such as injunctive relief, you do not have to sue in the Court of Claims. Furthermore, the above requirement does not apply to § 1983 actions, which may be filed in any court of general jurisdiction. Haywood v. Drown, 129 S. Ct. 2109, 2113, 173 L.Ed.2d 920 (2009).

67. N.Y. Correct. Law § 24 (McKinney 2010). The test for whether an employee can be held personally liable, or whether the State must instead be sued for the employee's tortious acts, is "whether the act was done while the [employee] was doing [the State]'s work, no matter how irregularly, or with what disregard of instructions." See, e.g., Riviello v. Waldron, 47 N.Y.2d 297, 302, 391 N.E.2d 1278, 1281, 418 N.Y.S.2d 300, 302 (1979) (considering employee to be within the scope of his employment so long as he is discharging his duties, "no matter how irregularly, or with what disregard of instructions") (quoting Jones v. Weigand, 134 A.D. 644, 645, 119 N.Y.S. 441, 443 (2d Dept. 1909)). This test is complicated, however. An employee is not personally liable for an act simply because he was not ordered to do that act. Rather, you may be able to find liability against New York State instead of the individual employee if the tort can be explained as a necessary step to the employee's ordered task or responsibility. In deciding whether an employee's conduct falls within the definition of "employment," the New York Court of Appeals has listed the following factors for consideration:

(1) The time, place and occasion of the act;
(2) The history of the relationship between employer and employee in actual practice;
(3) Whether the act is one commonly done by such an employee;
(4) The extent of departure from normal methods of performance; and
(5) Whether the employer could have "reasonably anticipated" the act.

Riviello v. Waldron, 47 N.Y.2d 297, 303, 391 N.E.2d 1278, 1281, 418 N.Y.S.2d 300, 303 (1979). The Court of Appeals of New York has applied these factors liberally to a range of situations. See, e.g., Riviello v. Waldron, 47 N.Y.2d 297, 302, 391 N.E.2d 1278, 1281, 418 N.Y.S.2d 300, 302 (1979) (considering employee to be within the scope of his employment so long as he is discharging his duties, "no matter how irregularly, or with what disregard of instructions."); Cepeda v. Coughlin, 128 A.D.2d 995, 996, 513 N.Y.S.2d 528, 530 (3d Dept. 1987) (finding that corrections officers' use of force when supervising movement of prisoners was within the scope of their employment), appeal denied, 70 N.Y.2d 602, 512 N.E.2d 550, 518 N.Y.S.2d 1024 (1987). While these cases do not establish a clear point at which a state employee becomes personally liable, it is clear that the level of violence or disregard must be very high to satisfy the test. Courts have employment (for example, a criminal act unrelated to any part of the employee's duty), you may then sue that individual in the New York Supreme Court (New York's general trial court) or in federal court under Section 1983.[68] Remember that in federal prisons, officials are employed by the federal government rather than the state; you cannot bring suit against a state for the actions of federal employees.[69]

Though there are some exceptions that will be discussed below, the Court of Claims can generally only award money damages. It cannot prohibit the prison from using punishment that violates your constitutional rights, or fix unconstitutional conditions in the prison. You must address these concerns in either a Section 1983 proceeding or an Article 78 claim.[70]

You also cannot bring suit in the Court of Claims to attack your sentence or any decision made by prison or parole officials regarding your status. Such complaints must be made under New York Civil Practice Article 78 (proceedings against body or officer) or Article 70 (state habeas corpus), or New York Criminal Procedure Law Article 440 (post-judgment motions).[71] You may, however, attack your conviction under the Court of Claims Act § 8-b, which allows a suit for damages if the prosecutor used improper means to secure your conviction.[72] But, to win this suit, you must prove by clear and convincing evidence that you have served all or any part of your sentence resulting from your felony or misdemeanor conviction(s),[73] that you have been pardoned of the crime,[74] or that the judgment of conviction against you has been reversed or vacated and the document that accuses you has been dismissed.[75] You must also prove that you did not commit the charged acts or that your acts did not constitute a felony or misdemeanor,[76] and that you did not cause your conviction by your own conduct.[77]

(ii) Filing in the New York State Supreme Court

You can sue an individual state employee (for example, a prison employee) in the New York Supreme Court (the trial court) only if that employee (1) owes you a duty as an individual, and (2) was not acting in an official capacity in the exercise of governmental functions. If the employee does not owe you a duty as an individual or was acting in his official capacity when he injured you, you will have to sue the state in the determined that custody and control of prisoners and the maintenance of safety and security in prisons are the main responsibilities of prison employees. Cepeda v. Coughlin, 128 A.D.2d 995, 997, 513 N.Y.S.2d 528, 530 (3d Dept. 1987). A New York Supreme Court has held that "it is entirely foreseeable that correction officers will be called upon to quell disturbances and subdue violence among inmates." Mathis v. State, 140 Misc. 2d 333, 340, 531 N.Y.S.2d 680, 684 (Sup. Ct. Albany County 1988). But see Sharrow v. State, 216 A.D.2d 844, 846, 628 N.Y.S.2d 878, 880 (3d Dept. 1995) (finding that no justification existed for correction officers to use force after they had already quelled a disturbance among the prisoners because, at this point, the use of force was counter to the goal of maintaining order and discipline in the facility). The Court of Appeals of New York has found that even some intentional torts can be considered within the scope of an employee's job if they were foreseeable. Riviello v. Waldron, 47 N.Y.2d 297, 304, 391 N.E.2d 1278, 1282, 418 N.Y.S.2d 300, 304 (1979). This means that even if a prison employee means to harm or injure you, if the employee can prove that situations in the past led the employee to think the act was necessary to keep control, the employee will not be found personally liable.

---

68. For a discussion of how to sue state officials in federal court, see JLM, Chapter 16, "Using 42 U.S.C. § 1983 and 28 U.S.C. § 1331 to Obtain Relief from Violations of Federal Law."

69. See Chapter 16 of the JLM, "Using 42 U.S.C. § 1983 and 28 U.S.C. § 1331 to Obtain Relief from Violations of Federal Law," for more information on how to sue federal prison officials if you are a federal prisoner.

70. See JLM Chapter 22, "How to Challenge Administrative Decisions Using Article 78 of the New York Civil Practice Law and Rules," for a discussion of Article 78 proceedings. For more information on injunctive relief in the Court of Claims, see Part C(2)(b)(iii) of this Chapter.

71. See JLM Chapter 20, "Using Article 440 of the New York Criminal Procedure Law to Attack Your Unfair Conviction or Illegal Sentence," and Chapter 21, "State Habeas Corpus: Florida, New York, and Texas," for more information. In brief, you may challenge your sentence using Article 440, decisions made by prison officials using Article 78, and decisions made by parole officials using Article 78 or state habeas corpus.

72. See N.Y. Ct. Cl. Act § 8-b(3)(b)(ii)(A) (McKinney 2007). § 8-b(3)(b)(ii)(A) states that a violation of N.Y. Crim. Proc. § 440.10(1)(b) (McKinney 2005) gives rise to a claim for damages. N.Y. Crim. Proc. § 440.10(1)(b) (McKinney 2005) provides that a court can vacate a conviction if "the judgment was procured by duress, misrepresentation or fraud on the part of the court or a prosecutor or a person acting for or in behalf of a court or a prosecutor."

73. N.Y. Ct. Cl. Act § 8-b(5)(a) (McKinney 2007).

74. N.Y. Ct. Cl. Act § 8-b(5)(b)(i) (McKinney 2007).

75. N.Y. Ct. Cl. Act § 8-b(5)(b)(ii) (McKinney 2007).

76. N.Y. Ct. Cl. Act § 8-b(5)(c) (McKinney 2007).

77. N.Y. Ct. Cl. Act § 8-b(5)(d) (McKinney 2007).

Court of Claims.[78] You cannot sue the State of New York for damages in the New York Supreme Court; as discussed above, those suits must be brought in the Court of Claims. However, if you are suing the state in order to receive something other than money damages, such as injunctive relief, you may sue in New York Supreme Court.

(iii) Filing in Federal Court

If you want to sue an individual state employee for violating your federal constitutional rights, federal court is an appropriate place to file suit. In federal court, you may receive damages and injunctive relief. For a full discussion of how to file a claim in federal court against a state employee for the violation of your federal rights, see Chapter 16 of the JLM, "Using 42 U.S.C. § 1983 and 28 U.S.C. § 1331 to Obtain Relief from Violations of Federal Law."

(b) Pursuing Your Case in the Court of Claims

(i) Types of Relief

If you prove that you were the victim of a tort, whether intentional or negligent, the court will order the tortfeasor to compensate you for the loss you suffered, most likely by paying a sum of money. Such a court-ordered payment is called damages.[79] A court may award you three kinds of damages: compensatory, punitive, and nominal.[80]

Compensatory damages, the most common form of damages, attempt to match the amount of your loss. For example, the court might order payments sufficient to replace personal items that were destroyed (such as a wristwatch), or to reimburse the plaintiff for money that was spent on medical bills after the injury. The court can also order payments to compensate you for your pain and suffering,[81] which can include a period after the injury during which you continue to suffer.

Punitive damages are court-ordered payments that exceed whatever amount would compensate you for the loss or injury suffered. These extra damages are generally awarded when the tort was aggravated by violence, oppression, malice, fraud, or wanton and wicked conduct on the part of the tortfeasor.[82] Punitive damages are intended to punish the tortfeasor, rather than compensate the injured party.[83] It is important to note that the Court of Claims will not award you punitive damages against the State.

Nominal damages are very small quantities of money awarded by courts in order to recognize that a right has been violated, even if there is no substantial loss or injury to be compensated for.[84] Nominal damages can also be granted when a real injury is found, but the evidence fails to show the amount of the injury.

Aside from these monetary awards, the Court of Claims may order institutions to take or cease specific actions. This is called an injunction.[85] The Court of Claims may only issue injunctions if they are authorized by statute or included as part of a judgment to pay damages.[86] Otherwise, you must bring your suit for an

---

78. See Morell v. Balasubramanian, 70 N.Y.2d 297, 300, 514 N.E.2d 1101, 1102, 520 N.Y.S.2d 530, 531 (1987) (deeming "actions against State officers acting in their official capacity in the exercise of governmental functions" to be essentially "claims against the State, and, therefore, arguable only in the Court of Claims").

79. Black's Law Dictionary 445 (9th ed. 2009).

80. See Chapter 16 of the JLM, "Using 42 U.S.C. § 1983 and 28 U.S.C. § 1331 to Obtain Relief from Violations of Federal Law," for more information on damages.

81. Black's Law Dictionary 446 (9th ed. 2009) (defining "discretionary damages" as damages "such as mental anguish or pain and suffering").

82. See Restatement (Second) of Torts § 908 (1979):

(1) Punitive damages are damages, other than compensatory or nominal damages, awarded against a person to punish him for his outrageous conduct and to deter him and others like him from similar conduct in the future.

(2) Punitive damages may be awarded for conduct that is outrageous, because of the defendant's evil motive or his reckless indifference to the rights of others. In assessing punitive damages, the trier of fact can properly consider the character of the defendant's act, the nature and extent of the harm to the plaintiff that the defendant caused or intended to cause and the wealth of the defendant.

83. Black's Law Dictionary 448 (9th ed. 2009).

84. Black's Law Dictionary 447 (9th ed. 2009).

85. For more discussion of injunctive relief, see JLM Chapter 16, "Using 42 U.S.C. § 1983 and 28 U.S.C. § 1331 to Obtain Relief from Violations of Federal Law."

86. See Doe v. State, 86 Misc. 2d 639, 641, 383 N.Y.S.2d 172, 174 (N.Y. Ct. Cl. 1976); see also N.Y. Ct. Cl. Act § 9, Notes of Decisions, n.59 (McKinney 1989 & Supp. 2006).

injunction in the New York Supreme Court or in federal court. You cannot bring a suit in the Court of Claims to complain generally about conditions in your prison because the Court of Claims cannot order the state to correct those prison conditions.[87]

(ii) Settlements in the Court of Claims

There is no limit to the amount of damages the Court of Claims may award.[88] It is also possible to settle your claim against the State out of court. When the State offers you a settlement, it is not necessarily agreeing that it did something wrong, but is offering to pay you a certain amount of money instead of going to trial. When you reach a settlement with the State, you give up your right to ask the court for additional damages. By contrast, if you go to trial and are awarded damages that you think are too low, you may then appeal to the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court of New York requesting additional damages.

(iii) Filing Time Limits

When you want to file a claim because a state employee's negligent or intentional act injured your body, you have ninety days from the time of the injury or loss[89] in which to either (1) file your claim, or (2) serve a Notice of Intention to File a Claim with the Attorney General.[90] You must serve at least the Notice of Intention within this period of time or you may not be permitted to file at all.[91] Whether you are filing a claim or serving a Notice of Intention, the document must be received within the ninety day deadline. Part D(1)(c) below explains how to make sure your document has been received within the filing deadline. These time limits exist even if you are still proceeding with the administrative remedies required by your institution. See Appendix A-1 of this Chapter for a sample "Notice of Intention" form.

The reason you must file a Notice of Intention is to alert the State of your claim so it has an opportunity to address your complaint or prepare for its defense. If you are asking for permission to file a late claim, you should tell the court why your late filing has not prevented the State from preparing its defense.

Serving a Notice of Intention is not the same as actually beginning a lawsuit; it only preserves your right to file a lawsuit against the State in the future. Once you serve a Notice of Intention to File a Claim with the Attorney General, you have two years to file a claim for a negligent or unintentional tort, and one year to file a claim for an intentional tort.[92] These time limits start counting at the moment your claim accrues.[93]

---

87. To get an injunction either (1) to prevent forms of punishment which violate your constitutional rights, or (2) to fix unconstitutional conditions in the prison, you must bring another kind of lawsuit. This lawsuit must either be in a § 1983 proceeding or Article 78 proceeding. See JLM Chapter 16, "Using 42 U.S.C. § 1983 and 28 U.S.C. § 1331 to Obtain Relief from Violations of Federal Law."

88. N.Y. Ct. Cl. Act § 20-a (McKinney Supp. 2010) (stating that settlements must be approved by the court); see also N.Y. Ct. Cl. Act § 20(6-a) (McKinney Supp. 2010) ("[I]n any case where a judgment … is to be paid to an inmate … the comptroller shall give written notice, if required pursuant to subdivision two of [§ 632-a] of the executive law, to the office of victim services ….").

89. For more information on the time of injury or loss and the discovery of injury or loss, see N.Y. Ct. Cl. Act § 10(7) (McKinney Supp. 2001) (stating that claim against the state that would be governed by N.Y. C.P.L.R. 214-c (McKinney 2003), which applies to non-visible effects of exposure to any substance upon or within the body or upon or within property, such as a toxic substance, shall be deemed to have accrued either on the date of discovery of the injury by the claimant or when the injury should have been discovered through reasonable diligence, whichever is earlier). Note that if you are assaulted by a corrections officer, for example, but the full extent of the injuries does not become apparent immediately, the 90 days begin when the assault happens, not when the injuries become apparent. The court has been very hesitant to extend a filing deadline to 90 days from the point at which an injury was realized, finding that it can be extended only when the injury is "reasonably ascertainable." Augat v. State 244 A.D.2d 835, 836, 666 N.Y.S.2d 249, 251 (3d Dept. 1997), appeal denied, 91 N.Y.2d 814, 698 N.E.2d 956, 676 N.Y.S.2d 127 (1998). Therefore, you should be very careful not to delay filing.

90. N.Y. Ct. Cl. Act § 10(3) (McKinney Supp. 2001). See Appendix A-1 of this Chapter for a sample Notice of Intention.

91. The claim itself should state the time and place where such claim arose, the nature of the claim, the damage or injuries claimed to have been sustained, and the total sum claimed. In your Notice of Intention to File a Claim, you should state the same matters, except that you do not have to state the items of damage or the total sum claimed. N.Y. Ct. Cl. Act § 11(b) (McKinney Supp. 2007). Therefore, you do not have to know the extent and severity of your injuries in order to file a Notice of Intention. Atterbury v. State, 26 Misc. 2d 422, 424, 210 N.Y.S.2d 460, 463 (N.Y. Ct. Cl. 1961) (explaining that claimant could have filed a notice of intention prior to being referred to a specialist because neither the severity of the injuries nor the sum claimed must be included in the notice and visiting a physician in the first instance shows she knew she had some injuries).

92. N.Y. Ct. Cl. Act § 10(3) (McKinney Supp. 2001).

If you are filing a claim for damage or loss of your personal property, the process is a little different. The time limit for filing is not ninety days after the injury, but 120 days after you have exhausted all administrative remedies. Within this 120 days you must file the claim itself—NOT a Notice of Intention.[94]

Courts strictly enforce the time limitations on filing a claim and serving the Notice of Intention to File a Claim.[95] The Court of Claims will not accept late filing of claims relating to loss of property.[96] However, there are some circumstances in which the Court may permit late claims.[97] Section 10(6) of the New York Court of Claims Act lists factors that may be considered by the Court in determining whether to permit a late filing. There is no requirement that each of the factors be satisfied in order for the court to exercise its discretion to permit the late filing of a claim.[98] The factors listed by the Court of Claims Act are:

(1) Whether the delay in filing was excusable;
(2) Whether the State had notice of the essential facts of the claim;
(3) Whether the State had an opportunity to investigate the circumstances of the claim;
(4) Whether the claim appears to be meritorious;[99]
(5) Whether the failure to file a timely claim or Notice of Intention resulted in substantial prejudice to the State;
(6) Whether the claimant has any other available remedy; and
(7) Any other relevant factors.[100]

With respect to the first factor, case law suggests that delay is excusable when it was caused by the claimant's treatment for physical or mental disabilities resulting from the injuries alleged in the lawsuit.[101]

---

93. N.Y. Ct. Cl. Act § 10(3-b) (McKinney Supp. 2001). A claim "accrues" when the amount of damage can be determined. Bronxville Palmer, Ltd. v. State, 36 A.D.2d 647, 647–48, 318 N.Y.S.2d 412, 413 (3d Dept. 1971) (holding that, "where a continuing injury or other circumstance prevents an evaluation of damages at the time of the occurrence of the wrong, the time for filing a claim does not begin to run until such an evaluation can be made."); see also Mahoney v. Temp. Comm'n of Investigation of N.Y., 165 A.D.2d 233, 240–41, 565 N.Y.S.2d 870, 874–75 (3d Dept. 1991) (holding that causes of action were not limited to conduct that occurred within 90-day period before filing because the violations were ongoing and interrelated and evaluation of damages could not be made within that period).

94. N.Y. Ct. Cl. Act § 10(9) (McKinney Supp. 2001); see also Wright v. State, 195 Misc. 2d 597, 598, 760 N.Y.S.2d 634, 635 (N.Y. Ct. Cl. 2003) ("[C]laims for property losses by inmates are no longer measured from the date of loss, but rather within a 120-day period commencing upon exhaustion of institutional remedies." (internal citation omitted)), appeal dismissed, 11 A.D.3d 1000, 782 N.Y.S.2d 209 (4th Dept. 2004).

95. See Conquest v. State, 58 Misc. 2d 121, 121, 294 N.Y.S.2d 892, 893 (N.Y. Ct. Cl. 1968) (holding that, where notice of intention to file claim was filed on the 92nd day after claim arose, the claim itself was not filed within statutory period and court did not have jurisdiction to hear the case). But see Killeen v. State, 12 Misc. 2d 89, 92, 174 N.Y.S.2d 1000, 1002 (N.Y. Ct. Cl. 1958) (excusing minor lateness per N.Y. Ct. Cl. Act § 10(5), where there was slight error in attorney's computation of time and State was not prejudiced).

96. See Roberts v. State, 11 A.D.3d 1000, 1001, 783 N.Y.S.2d 190, 191–92 (4th Dept. 2004) (holding that, because § 10(6) of the Court of Claims Act only allows a court discretion to permit the late claims mentioned in §§ 10(1)–(4), and loss of property claims are addressed in § 10(9), the court may never allow late claims for loss of property). But see Wright v. State, 195 Misc. 2d 597, 602, 760 N.Y.S.2d 634, 638 (N.Y. Ct. Cl. 2003) (holding that it was within the spirit of the Court of Claims Act to allow the court discretion over late loss of property claims). A subsequent Court of Claims case disagreed with Wright and read the 90-day time limit strictly. Murray v. State, 5 Misc.3d 398, 403–04, 781 N.Y.S.2d 724, 728–29 (N.Y. Ct. Cl. 2004) (strictly adhering to the 90-day filing period and dismissing § 10(9) claim that was filed late).

97. N.Y. Ct. Cl. Act § 10(6) (McKinney Supp. 2001); see also Gavigan v. State, 176 A.D.2d 1117, 1119, 575 N.Y.S.2d 217, 218 (3d Dept. 1991) (upholding Court of Claims' broad discretion under N.Y. Ct. Cl. Act § 10(6) to grant permission to file a late Notice of Claim where an employee of the State Office of General Services knew of an accident and, therefore, the State could not be said to have been prejudiced by the lateness). But see Jerrett v. State, 166 A.D.2d 907, 907, 560 N.Y.S.2d 568, 568 (4th Dept. 1990) (holding that Court of Claims abused its discretion in granting motion to serve a late claim where there was no valid excuse for claimant's delay in filing the claim, the state did not have timely notice of the essential facts constituting the claim nor the opportunity to investigate the circumstances underlying the claim, and the three other factors in N.Y. Ct. Cl. Act § 10(6) did not weigh heavily in claimant's favor).

98. See Butler v. State, 81 A.D.2d 834, 834, 438 N.Y.S.2d 834, 834 (2d Dept. 1981) (explaining that there is no requirement that claimant comply with all six requirements of § 10(6) for the Court of Claims to grant permission to file a late notice).

99. Black's Law Dictionary 1010 (8th ed. 2004) (defining "meritorious" as "meriting a legal victory; having legal worth").

100. N.Y. Ct. Cl. Act § 10(6) (McKinney 1989 & Supp. 2010).

101. See De Olden v. State, 91 A.D.2d 1057, 1057, 458 N.Y.S.2d 666, 666 (2d Dept. 1983) (acknowledging a reasonable excuse for delay in filing a claim where the claimant's extensive physical therapy and extreme psychological

Furthermore, Section 10(5) of the New York Court of Claims Act permits late filing where the claimant has a legal disability, such as insanity or infancy (age). In such a situation, the claim must be presented within two years after the disability has been removed (although, as explained below in this Section, you will not get to use all of this two-year extension because of the statute of limitations on injury claims).[102] Imprisonment is not in and of itself a legal disability. Incarceration and ignorance of the filing requirements of the New York Court of Claims Act do not excuse you for filing late. However, since prisoners have a right to hire counsel and the right to sue the State, if you are denied an opportunity to contact an attorney or are denied access to the prison's law library to learn your rights, you may have a reasonable excuse for filing late.[103]

In addition, if you served a Notice of Intention within the time limit but then failed to file the claim on time, you may apply to the court for permission to treat the Notice of Intention as a claim.[104] The court may grant your application to treat the Notice of Intention as a claim if:

(1) The application meets certain time limits in article two of the Civil Practice Law and Rules;
(2) The Notice of Intention was timely served and filed, and contains facts sufficient to constitute a claim; and
(3) Granting the application would not prejudice the state, meaning it would not damage the state's legal rights or ability to defend itself.[105]

The Court of Claims will not allow you to file a negligence tort claim more than three years after an injury,[106] or more than one year after the injury in the case of an intentional tort claim (for example, assault and battery).[107] Furthermore, even if the Court of Claims has the power to allow late claims in some cases, it cannot waive the New York statutes of limitations for the claims you are filing.[108] For example, the statute of trauma after amputation of his leg seriously affected his ability to function after being discharged from the hospital); Schweickert v. State, 64 A.D.2d 1026, 1026–27, 409 N.Y.S.2d 308, 309 (4th Dept. 1978) (holding that the amendment to the Court of Claims Act contained in § 10(6), which grounds and lengthens the time limits for allowing late claims, makes the failure to show a reasonable excuse for the delay no longer fatal to a claim for late filing); Cole v. State, 64 A.D.2d 1023, 1024, 409 N.Y.S.2d 306, 307–08 (4th Dept. 1978) (finding excuse to be reasonable when claimant was completely immobilized by his injuries and heavily medicated).

---

102. N.Y. Ct. Cl. Act § 10(5) (McKinney 1989 & Supp. 2010); N.Y. C.P.L.R. 208 (McKinney 2003 & Supp. 2010); see Vitello v. State, 66 Misc. 2d 582, 585, 321 N.Y.S.2d 787, 790 (N.Y. Ct. Cl. 1971) ("Infancy, along with incompetency, habitual drunkenness, and the like, are legal disabilities."), aff'd, 39 A.D.2d 792, 332 N.Y.S.2d 289 (3d Dept. 1972). For an application of insanity to the tolling of statutes of limitations, see McCarthy v. Volkswagen of America, Inc., 78 A.D.2d 849, 849, 432 N.Y.S.2d 722, 722–23 (2d Dept. 1980) (finding plaintiff's claim to be time-barred because plaintiff's college attendance and participation in athletic activities showed that he was not suffering from a temporary mental incapacity which prevented him from understanding or protecting his legal rights), aff'd, 55 N.Y.2d 543, 548–49, 435 N.E.2d 1072, 1075, 450 N.Y.S.2d 457, 460 (1982); Vitello v. State, 66 Misc. 2d 582, 586, 321 N.Y.S.2d 787, 791 (N.Y. Ct. Cl. 1971) (holding that plaintiff was under a legal disability at the time of his conviction even though his status changed from "hospitalization under commitment" to "voluntary hospitalization," and thus was entitled to file within two years after the legal disability ceased), aff'd, 39 A.D.2d 792, 332 N.Y.S.2d 289 (3d Dept. 1972).

103. See Plate v. State, 92 Misc. 2d 1033, 1038, 402 N.Y.S.2d 126, 129 (N.Y. Ct. Cl. 1978) (stating that denial of claimant's access to attorney and the law library for a substantial part of the 90-day period could constitute an excuse for not filing on time).

104. N.Y. Ct. Cl. Act § 10(8)(a) (McKinney 1989 & Supp. 2010). § 10(8)(a) provides a claimant who timely serves and files a notice of intention, but who fails to timely serve or file a claim, may apply for permission to treat notice of intention as a claim. See Wright v. State, 195 Misc. 2d 597, 602, 760 N.Y.S.2d 634, 638 (N.Y. Ct. Cl. 2003) (clarifying debate in previous cases over § 10(8)(a) and affirming that courts do have the discretion to treat a notice of intention as a claim). But see Murray v. State, 5 Misc. 3d 398, 401, 781 N.Y.S.2d 724, 726–27 (N.Y. Ct. Cl. 2004) (construing subdivision literally, as opposed to more broadly, thus implying there should be no discretion to treat notice of intention as a claim).

105. N.Y. Ct. Cl. Act § 10(8)(a) (McKinney 1989 & Supp. 2010). Prejudice is defined as "[d]amage or detriment to one's legal rights or claims." Black's Law Dictionary 1299 (9th ed. 2009).

106. N.Y. C.P.L.R. 214 (McKinney 2003 & Supp. 2010).

107. N.Y. Ct. Cl. Act § 10(3-b) (McKinney 1989 & Supp. 2007); N.Y. C.P.L.R. 215(3) (McKinney 2003 & Supp. 2010). In addition, property claims have shorter deadlines for filing—they must be filed within 120 days of the administrative decision on the claim (that is, after the Directive #2377 decision). N.Y. Ct. Cl. Act § 10(9) (McKinney 1989 & Supp. 2010).

108. Statutes of limitations are time limits for certain types of claims.

limitations for personal injury actions is three years after the incident.[109] The statute of limitations for malpractice claims is two and a half years.[110]

(iv) Filing Fees

All individuals must pay a fifty dollar filing fee whenever they bring a claim in the New York State Court of Claims.[111] If you cannot afford the fee, the court can reduce or waive it. Prisoners follow the same steps as everyone else to ask for reduced or excused filing fees.[112]

To get the reduced filing fee, you must submit an affidavit to the court explaining why you cannot afford the full filing fee.[113] You should include in your affidavit detailed information about your financial situation, including the amount of money in your prison account, any income you receive from a prison job or work release program, and any property you own.[114] Tell the court if you are unable to work because you are physically or mentally ill, or because you are living in protective custody due to personal danger. Additionally, you must indicate whether any other person has an interest in the monetary award you may win (for example, if a lawyer is representing you in exchange for a percentage of any damages awarded).[115] You should also list any outstanding financial obligations you have, especially court-ordered obligations such as child support or restitution. If your case has already begun, you will have to give notice to the State, as the party you are suing, that you have filed this motion.[116]

See Appendix A-5 for a sample affidavit requesting a reduced filing fee. If the court denies your request for the reduced filing fee, it will notify you. You will then have 120 days to pay the full fee (fifty dollars) or else your case will be dismissed.[117]

If you win your case, the court will refund you any filing fee that you paid.

(v) Where and How to File

If you are proceeding by Notice of Intention, you must serve the Attorney General with the Notice of Intention.[118] This is very important—if your case goes to trial, you must show that the Notice of Intention was served on the Attorney General. You do not need to file your Notice of Intention in the Court of Claims.

Your claim, by contrast, must be filed at the office of the Clerk of the Court of Claims in Albany.[119] You must also serve your claim on the defendant, the State of New York, by serving the Attorney General. After you serve the Attorney General, you must file proof of service with the Clerk of the Court of Claims within ten days. You can do this by filing an Affidavit of Service describing the service.[120] Filing is accomplished by delivering the necessary papers to:

Clerk of the Court of Claims
P.O. Box 7344
Capitol Station
Albany, New York 12224

When you file the original claim, you must also file two copies of each document with the Clerk's office. One copy of each must also be served on the Attorney General. The address is:

Office of the Attorney General
Department of Law
Capitol Building
Albany, New York 12224

---

109. N.Y. C.P.L.R. 214 (McKinney 2003 & Supp. 2010).
110. N.Y. C.P.L.R. 214-a (McKinney 2003 & Supp. 2010).
111. The fee requirements can be found in N.Y. Ct. Cl. Act § 11-a (McKinney 1989 & Supp. 2010).
112. N.Y. C.P.L.R. 1101(d) (McKinney 1997 & Supp. 2010).
113. N.Y. C.P.L.R. 1101(d) (McKinney 1997 & Supp. 2010).
114. N.Y. C.P.L.R. 1101(a) (McKinney 1997 & Supp. 2010).
115. N.Y. C.P.L.R. 1101(a) (McKinney 1997 & Supp. 2010).
116. N.Y. C.P.L.R. 1101(c) (McKinney 1997 & Supp. 2010).
117. N.Y. C.P.L.R. 1101(d) (McKinney 1997 & Supp. 2010).
118. N.Y. Ct. Cl. Act § 11(a)(i) (McKinney 1989 & Supp. 2010).
119. N.Y. Ct. Cl. Act § 11(a)(i) (McKinney 1989 & Supp. 2010).
120. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 22, § 206.5(a) (2010). "Service" means you have delivered copies of the legal complaint to the person or government entity you are suing. In the Court of Claims, service is accomplished by sending a copy of the claim to the State Attorney General.

Keep at least one copy of each document concerning your suit for your own records. Sample claim and notice forms appear at the end of this Chapter in Appendix A.

Your papers can be personally delivered to the clerk's office or the Attorney General.[121] They can also be sent by certified mail with a return receipt requested. This means that the postal service will mail you a receipt to prove that the documents were delivered. Do not lose this receipt, because it is the only way to prove that you completed service. If you do not receive a return receipt from both the Court of Claims and the Attorney General's Office within a reasonable period of time, you should send a follow-up letter to one or both of these offices asking if they have received your claim.[122]

Service on the State is not considered complete until papers have been received by both the clerk and the Attorney General's Office (the Notice of Intention need only be received by the Attorney General).[123] Remember, putting your papers in the mail is NOT the same as filing them. You must mail your documents early enough so that they are received within the time limits mentioned earlier. Allow enough time for delays in the mail. Do not forget: your claim may be dismissed if you fail to serve the State in the manner and time the law requires.[124]

(vi) What Documents to File

In Appendix A of this Chapter, you will find sample copies of papers that you may need to file, including sample claims and Notices of Intention.

Your claim must be clearly typed or printed on 8½-by-11 inch paper. You should specifically include:

(1) Your name and address;
(2) Where the incident happened;
(3) When the incident happened;
(4) The manner in which New York State (through its employees' actions) was negligently or intentionally responsible for your injury;
(5) A description of the incident (include the names of the individuals responsible, if you know);
(6) A detailed description of the injuries you received as a result of the incident;
(7) The date and place you served your Notice of Intention to File a Claim (if you served a Notice of Intention);
(8) A statement that you are filing this claim within the time limits in the Court of Claims Act; and
(9) An itemized listing of the damages you are claiming.[125]

If you are filing a claim initially, rather than filing a Notice of Intention to File a Claim, you do not need to include step (7) above, and step (8) should read that your claim is being filed within the ninety-day statutory limit. At the bottom of your claim form you must include and sign a verification, which states that all of the information included in your claim is true.[126] You must sign this verification in the presence of a notary public, who then must sign his name. The prison librarian may be a notary public or may be able to direct you to the person who provides that service within the prison.

If you are filing a motion for permission to file a late claim, your motion should describe the facts that will convince the Court of Claims that it should permit you to file late and, among other things, that the 121. N.Y. Ct. Cl. Act § 11(a)(i) (McKinney 1989 & Supp. 2010).

---

122. The Court of Claims sends a letter of acknowledgment once a claim has been received. The Attorney General's Office does not; therefore, if your claim was served in person, make sure that you get an affidavit that the claim was served. If the claim was sent Return Receipt Requested, keep the green card.

123. N.Y. Ct. Cl. Act § 11(a) (McKinney 1989 & Supp. 2010); see also Aetna Cas. & Sur. Co. v. State, 92 Misc. 2d 249, 252, 400 N.Y.S.2d 469, 471 (N.Y. Ct. Cl. 1977) (dismissing claim that was mailed 88 days after accident but not received by the Court of Claims clerk until the 93rd day).

124. See Mingues v. State, 146 Misc. 2d 412, 413, 550 N.Y.S.2d 802, 803 (N.Y. Ct. Cl. 1990) (dismissing claim when notice of intention and claim were sent by regular mail). But see Colon v. State, 146 Misc. 2d 1034, 1035–36, 553 N.Y.S.2d 979, 980 (N.Y. Ct. Cl. 1990) (holding that the issue of method of service under § 11 is one of personal jurisdiction that may be waived).

125. N.Y. Ct. Cl. Act § 11(b) (McKinney 1989 & Supp. 2010) ("The claim shall state the time when and place where such claim arose, the nature of same, [that a negligent or intentional action by a state employee has injured you or your property], and the items of damage or injuries claimed to have been sustained and … the total sum claimed.").

126. N.Y. Ct. Cl. Act § 11(b) (McKinney 1989 & Supp. 2010); N.Y. C.P.L.R. 3020, 3021 (McKinney 1991 & Supp. 2010). For a sample Verification, see Appendix A-2 of this Chapter.

State will not be substantially prejudiced by the delay, which means that the State will not have a harder time defending itself because you filed late.[127]

See Figure 1, below, to determine how many copies you need to file of each document.

	Clerk of Court	N.Y. Attorney General	Self	Total Number of Copies You Will Need
Notice of Intention to File Claim	0 copies	1 copy	1 copy	2 copies
Claim and Any Supporting Affidavits	1 original and 2 copies	1 copy	1 copy	1 original and 4 copies
Motion for Permission to File Late Claim	1 original and 2 copies	1 copy	1 copy	1 original and 4 copies
Affidavit in Support of Reduction of Fees	1 original and 2 copies	1 copy	1 copy	1 original and 4 copies

Figure 1: Copies needed when filing notices, claims, motions, or affidavits.

(vii) How to Obtain Help from a Lawyer

Since a tort claim filed against New York State is not a criminal action, you do not have the right to be assigned a lawyer. While the court may, at its discretion, require an attorney to represent poor people without providing for the attorney's compensation, it is not likely to do so.[128]

It is often difficult to find a lawyer who will take your case. If it seems likely that you will win a large amount of money from the State, you may be able to find a private attorney to represent you on a contingency fee basis, which means the attorney only charges you if you win the case. If you win, the attorney takes his fee (usually a percentage of the money you won), and any additional costs of representing you, from your award. You may be able to find the phone number of an attorney through the New York State Bar Association. If you cannot find a lawyer, you can bring your own claim in the Court of Claims and even appeal to the Appellate Division of the New York Supreme Court.

(viii) Examinations Before Trial: Obtaining Testimony from Witnesses

Like other civil cases, you are allowed to engage in some forms of pretrial discovery. Chapter 8 of the JLM, "Obtaining Information to Prepare Your Case: The Process of Discovery," discusses the processes of discovery for federal and New York State trials. Chapter 8 will help you decide if you need to take discovery in your case. Discovery may include any of the following methods to obtain evidence to support your claim before trial: interviewing witnesses, requesting documents, and demanding physical and mental examinations.[129] The state must follow the same discovery rules as individuals.[130]

You must pay any fees and expenses required in obtaining testimony.[131] Poor person status does not permit you to avoid paying these costs.

(ix) Reopening Trial Before Decision

If you discover new evidence favorable to you after you have closed your case in the Court of Claims but before the court has made a decision, you can submit a Notice of Motion to Reopen a Claim. Use a Notice of Motion to Reopen a Claim only if you have discovered important and relevant evidence that could make a difference in the court's decision.[132] Be aware that courts rarely grant these motions.

---

127. N.Y. Ct. Cl. Act § 10(6) (McKinney 1989 & Supp. 2010).

128. See Stephens v. State, 93 Misc. 2d 273, 274, 404 N.Y.S.2d 536, 537 (N.Y. Ct. Cl. 1978) (refusing to assign counsel in prisoner's civil case unless State provides for attorney compensation); see also Menin v. Menin, 79 Misc. 2d 285, 293, 359 N.Y.S.2d 721, 729 (Sup. Ct. Westchester County 1974) (refusing to assign counsel in a civil case to represent poor prisoner seeking damages from State for injuries allegedly received during confinement, in absence of any legislative provision of funds for compensation of such counsel), aff'd mem., 48 A.D.2d 904, 372 N.Y.S.2d 985 (2d Dept. 1975).

129. N.Y. C.P.L.R. 3102(a) (McKinney 2005 & Supp. 2010).

130. N.Y. C.P.L.R. 3102(f) (McKinney 2005 & Supp. 2010).

131. N.Y. Ct. Cl. Act § 18 (McKinney 1989 & Supp. 2010).

132. See Williams v. State, 90 A.D.2d 882, 884, 456 N.Y.S.2d 528, 530 (3d Dept. 1982) (holding that, where the

(x) Appeal from a Judgment

You can appeal the court's decision about the law, the facts, or both. You can also appeal if the amount awarded was too high or too low. When you make an appeal, the Appellate Division may affirm, reverse, or modify the judgment; dismiss the appeal; grant a new trial; or send the case back to a lower court for further proceedings.[133]

Once the Court of Claims makes a decision in your original case, that decision will be entered with the Clerk of the Court of Claims, and then the Attorney General will serve you with a notice that the judgment has been entered. You must file a Notice of Appeal within thirty days of the date on which the Attorney General mails you the notice that your judgment has been entered.[134] Because you may not be receiving mail promptly in prison, be sure to check the date on the envelope when you receive the notice.

You must serve both the Attorney General and the Clerk of the Court of Claims a written Notice of Appeal, briefly stating your reasons for appealing.[135] You will need a transcript of your trial in the Court of Claims. If you were permitted to proceed as a poor person, you may have a right to a free copy of this transcript.[136] If you have not filed for permission to proceed as a poor person, you may wish to apply for status as a poor person at this point. For information on the procedure for applying for status as a poor person, see Part C(2)(b)(iv) above.

(xi) Final Process

If you win at trial, you will be paid the amount of the judgment, unless either you or the State appeals. The Comptroller of the State of New York will mail you a check once you submit the following:

(1) A copy of the judgment certified by the Clerk of the Court of Claims;
(2) A certificate from the Attorney General stating that the State has not and will not take an appeal from the judgment; and
(3) A release signed by your attorney (if you have one) that he has waived any fee for services provided to you.[137]

Note that this is only a waiver of attorney's fees in the eyes of New York State, which makes it essentially a formality. In actuality, the State will make out the check to both you and your attorney and will probably mail it to your attorney's office. You and your attorney will most likely have already decided what percentage of any award the attorney will keep. Typically, attorneys will deduct the expenses of trying your case from the total award, then keep one-third of what remains. Thus, you will receive two-thirds of the damages awarded to you, minus expenses.

D. Checklist for Filing With the Court of Claims

1. Does your claim include violations of your constitutional rights?

(a) If Yes

If yes, you may bring suit in federal district court under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 or in State Supreme Court. See JLM, Chapter 16, "Using 42 U.S.C. § 1983 and 28 U.S.C. § 1331 to Obtain Relief from Violations of Federal Law." Recall that you may also file New York State constitutional claims with the Court of Claims. New York's state constitution protects many of the same rights as the Bill of Rights.

(b) If No

If no, then you may sue under the state statute that allows for claims such as yours; in New York, you may bring suit against the State in the Court of Claims.

Court of Claims was unable to accurately measure the damages resulting from a partial taking of claimant's property, which then affected the market value of the remaining premises, the court below properly reopened the trial to obtain further and more accurate evidence on the issue).

133. N.Y. Ct. Cl. Act § 24 (McKinney 1989 & Supp. 2010).
134. N.Y. Ct. Cl. Act § 25 (McKinney 1989 & Supp. 2010).
135. N.Y. Ct. Cl. Act § 25 (McKinney 1989 & Supp. 2010). See Appendix A-10 for a sample Notice of Appeal.
136. N.Y. C.P.L.R. 1102(b) (McKinney 1997 & Supp. 2010).
137. N.Y. Ct. Cl. Act § 20(6) (McKinney 1989 & Supp. 2010).

Note*: You must use the Department of Correctional Services' internal procedure to address issues with loss of or damage to property, which allows for prisoner compensation before bringing your claim to the Court of Claims. See Part C(1) of this Chapter.

Note*: If you wish to sue the federal government for a tort, and none of your constitutional rights have been violated, you must sue under the Federal Tort Claims Act.[138]

2. If you are bringing a suit in the New York Court of Claims:

(a) File a claim or Notice of Intention

Be sure to serve a claim or Notice of Intention to File a Claim with return receipt requested upon the Attorney General's Office within ninety days of the accident or injury. If you are serving a claim instead of a Notice of Intention, it must be filed within ninety days of the accident or injury at the clerk's office in Albany. You should always err on the side of serving the Notice of Intention, even if you are not certain if you will later proceed forward with the claim. That way, you may still have an opportunity to file a claim later should you decide to do so. Remember: the papers must be received within ninety days.

(b) File the original and two copies of each document

File the original and two copies of each document with the clerk's office when you file your claim. Be sure to:

(1) Include all necessary information in your claim;
(2) Serve one copy of each document on the Attorney General;
(3) Keep one copy of every document for your own records;
(4) File proof of service on the Attorney General (the representative of the defendant, the State) at the clerk's office in Albany within ten days of such service; and
(5) Include a notarized verification with your claim.

3. If you are appealing a judgment

Serve both the Attorney General and the Clerk of the Court of Claims with a written Notice of Appeal. The Notice should include the basic reason for your appeal, and must be filed within thirty days of receiving notice that a judgment was entered in your case.

E. Conclusion

You should consider several things before you think about bringing a tort claim. First, you should determine what kind of tort claim you want to bring and whether you can prove that you have suffered an actual injury. If you feel confident that you have a legitimate claim, check to see whether you must exhaust grievance procedures in prison before you think about the court in which you will file a claim and the kind of relief you will seek. Observe all deadlines for filing documents (especially the strict ninety-day time window in which you must file your claim or Notice of Intention with the Court of Claims), make sure you file the right documents in the right places, and pay the proper fees. Consult the checklists provided in this Chapter and the sample documents in the Appendix when filing your tort claims. Last but not least, always retain photocopies of all of the documents you file.

138. Federal Tort Claims Act provisions are found in 28 U.S.C. §§ 1291, 1346, 1402, 2401, 2402, 2411, 2412, 2671–80 (2006).

APPENDIX A

SAMPLE TORT CLAIM AND SUPPORTING PAPERS

This Appendix contains the following materials:

A-1. Sample Notice of Intention to File a Tort Claim
A-2. Sample Verification
A-3. Sample Assault and Battery Tort Claim
A-4. Sample Negligence Tort Claim
A-5. Sample Affidavit in Support of Application for a Reduction of Fees
A-6. Sample Affidavit in Support of Motion for Permission to File a Late Claim
A-7. Affidavit of Service
A-8. Sample Demand for Bill of Particulars
A-9. Sample Claimant's Bill of Particulars
A-10. Sample Notice of Appeal

Parts A, B, and C of this Chapter tell you how to use each of these papers. Do not use these forms until you have read this entire Chapter.

These papers are examples of the types of documents that you must file in the Court of Claims for various purposes. You should use the basic form of these papers where appropriate, but you must be careful to substitute the information that is applicable to your own case for the general information that is supplied by these samples. The endnotes following the sample documents tell you how to fill in the necessary information. These are only samples. DO NOT TEAR THESE FORMS OUT OF THE JLM. Many of the following forms can also be found in the New York Consolidated Laws Service Vol. 43 (1987). In addition, the form for applying for a reduction of filing fees can be obtained from the Chief Clerk's Office in Albany.

A-1. Sample Notice of Intention to File a Tort Claim

State of New York Court of Claims

_____[1]	:
	:	Notice of Intention
	:	to File Claim
- against -	:
The State of New York	:

TO THE ATTORNEY GENERAL OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK:
PLEASE TAKE NOTICE, that the undersigned _____,[2] intends to file a claim against the State of New York, pursuant to Sections 10 and 11 of the Court of Claims Act.
The post office address of the claimant herein is: _____.[3]
For the time being I am representing myself.

The time when and the place where such claim arose and the nature of my claim are as follows:
_____
_____
_____.[4]

_____[5]
Claimant, pro se

Dated: _____[6]

A-2. Sample Verification

STATE OF NEW YORK)
)ss:
COUNTY OF _____[7])
_____,[8] being duly sworn, says:

I am the claimant above named; I have read the foregoing claim[9] against the State of New York and know its contents; the same is true to my knowledge, except as to the matter therein stated to be alleged on information and belief, and as to those matters, I believe it to be true.

_____[10]
Claimant

Sworn to before me this _____ day of _____, 20____.

_____
Notary Public[11]

A-3. Sample Assault and Battery Tort Claim[12]

State of New York Court of Claims

_____X

_____[13] :

- against - : Claim No. _____[14]

The State of New York. :

_____X

Claimant, _____,[15] appearing pro se, complaining of defendant, the State of New York, alleges the following:

1. The post office address of the claimant herein is _____.[16]

2. This claim is for assault and battery of the State committed by its employee _____[17] for injuring the claimant while acting within the scope of his/her employment and in the discharge of his/her duties, on _____[18] at _____.[19]

3. [On September 10, 1999, at approximately 6:00pm, Correction Officer Smith at XYZ Correctional Facility told the claimant [name] to leave the day room where claimant was mopping the floor.

4. Claimant responded that he had been told to remain there by another officer, whose name he could not remember.

5. Correction Officer Smith then told claimant to leave immediately or he would receive an infraction.

6. Claimant, pursuant to Correction Officer Smith's order, began to leave when, without just cause or provocation, the defendant Correction Officer Smith willfully and maliciously grabbed the mop from claimant and hit him across the chest and head with the handle, causing the claimant to sustain serious injury.

7. The actions of Correction Officer Smith were intentional and unwarranted.[20]

8. As a result of this assault and battery, claimant was hospitalized for two weeks and received 26 stitches on his chest and head.

9. As a result of this incident, claimant suffered severe physical and mental pain and anguish.

10. Claimant's hearing has been permanently impaired as a result of a blow on the head by Correction Officer Smith.]

11. The particulars of claimant's damages are as follows:[21]

a) Medical expenses[22]

_____

_____.

b) Lost earnings[23]

[Claimant having been a musician prior to his incarceration, claimant having anticipated returning to that profession upon his release, claimant's hearing having been impaired as a result of this incident so as to render him unable to be gainfully employed as a musician, claimant seeks $_____ in damages for lost potential earnings.]

c) Pain and suffering[24]

_____

_____.

d) Mental anguish[25]

_____

_____.

e) Permanent disability

_____

_____.

12. Attached hereto as part of the claim is a sketch of the place of the above-described incident.[26]

13. Notice of intention to file this claim was served in the Office of the Clerk of the Court of Claims, on the ____ day of _____, 20____, and in the office of the Attorney General on the _____ day of _____ 20_____.[27]

14. This claim is filed within ____ years after the claim accrued, as required by law.[28]

15. This action is filed pursuant to Sections 10 and 11 of the Court of Claims Act.

WHEREFORE, claimant respectfully requests judgment against the defendant in the sum of _____ dollars ($_____).[29]

_____[30]
Claimant, pro se

Dated: _____[31]

A-4. Sample Negligence Tort Claim[32]

State of New York Court of Claims

_____[33]	:
- against -	:	Claim No. _____[34]
The State of New York.	:

Claimant, _____,[35] appearing pro se, complaining of defendant, the State of New York, alleges the following:

1. The post office address of the claimant herein is _____.[36]

2. This claim is for negligence of the State [for failure to adequately maintain the ceiling of the day room of][37] _____[38] on the ___ day of _____, 20___, so as to cause serious injury to the claimant, _____.[39]

3. It was the duty of the defendant State of New York [to maintain in a safe and proper condition the ceilings and walls in the correctional facilities of the State of New York, and more particularly the ceiling in the day room on Tier 3[40] at XYZ Correctional Facility.[41]

4. On and prior to the 5th day of May, 2000, the defendant disregarded its duty by negligently and carelessly permitting the ceiling at Tier 3 at XYZ Correctional Facility to be improperly and dangerously maintained in an unsafe condition in that the plaster had disintegrated so that large portions had become loosened and not properly held in place.

5. On the 5th day of May, 2000, at approximately 1:00pm, claimant [name] was sitting in the day room of Tier 3 at XYZ Correctional Facility reading a newspaper when a large portion of plaster fell from the ceiling striking claimant on the head, shoulder, arm, and leg and causing him to sustain serious injuries.

6. On the 5th day of May, 2000, and for three months prior, the defendant had actual knowledge and notice of the defective and dangerous condition of the ceiling of the day room as claimant had filed a grievance requesting the repair of the ceiling with the Superintendent of XYZ Correctional Facility on February 5, 2000.[42]

7. As a result of this incident, claimant received a broken arm, a broken leg, and injuries to the shoulder and head, including recurring headaches.

8. As a result of this incident, claimant suffered severe physical and mental pain and anguish.

9. As a result of this incident, claimant has suffered permanent disabilities including chronic headaches, lameness, and the loss of the full use of his arm.][43]

10. Attached hereto as part of the claim is a sketch of the place of the above-described incident.[44]

11. The particulars of claimant's damages are as follows:[45]

a) Medical expenses[46]

_____

_____.

b) Lost earnings[47]

[Claimant was a carpenter prior to his incarceration and anticipated returning to that profession upon his release. As a result of this incident, Claimant lost the full use of his arm and is now unable to be gainfully employed as a carpenter. Consequently, Claimant seeks $_____ in damages for lost potential earnings.]

c) Pain and suffering[48]

_____

_____.

d) Mental anguish[49]

_____

_____.

e) Permanent disability

_____

_____.

12. Notice of intention to file this claim was served in the Office of the Clerk of the Court of Claims, on the ____ day of _____, 20____, and in the office of the Attorney General on the _____ day of _____ 20_____.[50]

13. This claim is filed within ____ years after the claim accrued, as required by law.[51]

14. This action is filed pursuant to Sections 10 and 11 of the Court of Claims Act.

WHEREFORE, claimant respectfully requests judgment against the defendant in the sum of _____ dollars ($_____).[52]

_____[53]
Claimant, pro se

Dated: _____[54]

A-5. Sample Affidavit in Support of Application for a Reduction of Fees

State of New York Court of Claims

_____[55]	:	Application Pursuant to N.Y. C.P.L.R. 1101(f)
DIN No. _____,[56]	:
- against -	:	Claim No._____[57]
The State of New York,	:

STATE OF NEW YORK
COUNTY OF _____[58]

I, _____,[59] being duly sworn, hereby declare as follows:

1) I am the claimant in the above-entitled proceeding, I am a prisoner in a [federal, state, or local] correctional facility, _____,[60] and I submit this affidavit in support of my application for a reduction of the filing fee pursuant to CPLR 1101(f).

2) During the past six months:[61]

☐ I was not incarcerated at any other correctional facility.

☐ I was incarcerated at the following correctional facilities in addition to the one in which I am currently incarcerated: _____.

3) I currently receive income from the following sources, exclusive of correctional facility wages:

_____

4) I own the following valuable property (other than miscellaneous personal property): [62]

Property:	Value:
_____	_____
_____	_____

5) I have no savings, property, assets, or income other than as set forth herein.

6) I am unable to pay the filing fee necessary to prosecute this proceeding.

7) No other person able to pay the filing fee has a beneficial interest in the result of this proceeding.

8) The facts of my case are described in my claim and other papers filed with the court.

9) I have made no prior request for this relief in this case.

_____[63]

Sworn to before me this _____ day of _____, 20____.

_____
Notary Public[64]

AUTHORIZATION[65]

I, _____,[66] inmate number _____,[67] request and authorize the agency holding me in custody to send to the Clerk of the Court of Claims certified copies of my correctional facility trust fund account statements (or the institutional equivalent) for the past six months.

In the event that my application for poor person status in the above-captioned case is granted by the Court, I further request and authorize the agency holding me in custody to deduct the filing fee (or other outstanding obligation reported by the Court pursuant to N.Y. C.P.L.R. 1101(f)(2)) from my correctional facility trust fund account (or the institutional equivalent) and to disburse those amounts as instructed by the Court of Claims. This authorization is furnished in connection with the above entitled case and shall apply to any agency into whose custody I may be transferred.

I UNDERSTAND THAT THE FULL AMOUNT OF THE OUTSTANDING OBLIGATION REFERRED TO HEREIN WILL BE PAID BY AUTOMATIC DEDUCTION FROM MY CORRECTIONAL FACILITY TRUST FUND ACCOUNT EVEN IF MY CASE IS DISMISSED.

_____[68]

_____[69]

A-6. Sample Affidavit in Support of Motion for Permission to File a Late Claim[70]

State of New York Court of Claims[71]

_____[72]	:
	:	Motion For Permission To
	:	File A Late Claim
- against -	:
	:	Claim No. _____[73]
The State of New York	:

TO THE CLERK OF THE COURT OF CLAIMS:
TO THE ATTORNEY GENERAL OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK:

The undersigned claimant, _____,[74] hereby deposes and swears under penalty of perjury that the following is true.

Claimant requests the permission of the Court to file the attached claim against the State of New York, pursuant to the provisions of Section 10(6) of the Court of Claims Act for filing late claims. In support of my motion for permission to file this claim, I respectfully submit that:

1. The incident underlying this claim occurred on _____.[75] Under the provisions of Article Two of the Civil Practice Law and Rules, I would not be barred from asserting a like claim against a citizen of the State.

2. The delay in filing this claim is excusable because: [I am not a lawyer and I had no access to professional legal counsel or to the prison law library during the statutory period for filing because of the illness caused by the incident underlying this claim.[76]

3. The State had notice of the essential facts constituting the claim in that medical personnel in the prison dispensary were aware of my illness during my stay in the prison dispensary, and the State also had opportunity to investigate the cause of this illness, which is the subject of this claim, by simply questioning the guards and other persons who were present in the machine shop at the time of my injury.][77]

4. I have no other available remedy for the injury and suffering I sustained because of the State's negligence.

_____[78]
Claimant, pro se

Dated:_____, 20____[79]
_____
_____

A-7. Affidavit of Service[80]

State of New York Court of Claims

_____X

_____[81] :

- against - :

The State of New York :

_____X

Affidavit of Service

Claim No. _____[82]

STATE OF NEW YORK

COUNTY OF_____[83]

_____,[84] being duly sworn, deposes and says:

I am over the age of 18 and reside at _____.[85]

On _____,[86] I served the within _____[87] upon the Attorney General of the State of New York by certified mail No._____ , return receipt requested at the following address:

Department of Law
Capitol Building
Albany, NY 12224,

said address being the address designated by the Attorney General for that purpose, by depositing a true copy of the within in a postpaid properly addressed wrapper in an official depository under the exclusive care and custody of the United States Postal Service within the State of New York.

_____[88]
Claimant, pro se

Sworn to before me this _____ day of _____, 20____.

_____
Notary Public[89]

A-8. Sample Demand for Bill of Particulars[90]

State of New York Court of Claims

_____,[91]	:
	:	Demand for
	:	Bill of Particulars
- against -	:
	:	Claim No. _____[92]
The State of New York,	:

SIR:

PLEASE TAKE NOTICE that you are hereby required to serve upon the defendants within 30 days after service of a copy of this notice, a verified bill of particulars, setting forth in detail:

(a) The date and time of the occurrence.

(b) The exact location of the occurrence.

(c) A general statement of the acts or omissions constituting the negligence claimed.

(d) Whether actual or constructive notice is claimed.[93]

(e) If actual notice is claimed, the name of the person served with notice.

(f) Statement of the injuries and description of any that are claimed to be permanent.

(g) Length of time confined to bed and to house.

(h) Length of time incapacitated from employment, and the nature of such employment.

(i) Total amounts claimed as special damages for (1) physicians' services and medical supplies; (2) loss of earnings, with name and address of the employer; (3) hospital expenses, with names of hospitals; (4) nurses' services.

(j) Address and maiden name of claimant (if applicable).

(k) List of statutes, ordinances, rules, and regulations that were allegedly violated by defendant.

Hon. _____[94]
Attorney General of the State of New York
Department of Law
Albany, NY 12224
By:_____[95]
Assistant Attorney General

A-9. Sample Claimant's Bill of Particulars[96]

State of New York Court of Claims

———————————————————X

_____[97] :

:

- against - :

:

The State of New York, :

:

———————————————————X

Bill of Particulars

Claim No. _____[98]

Claimant, pursuant to the demand of the defendant, submits the following for his/her bill of particulars:

1. The occurrence took place on [May 5, 2000 at approximately 1:00 p.m.].
2. The occurrence took place in the [day room of Tier 3 at XYZ Correctional Facility].
3. The negligence of the defendants consisted of those acts alleged in paragraphs 4, 5, and 6 of the claim; specifically, [the failure to maintain in a safe and proper condition the ceilings and walls of the day room of Tier 3 at XYZ Correctional Facility].
4. Actual notice claimed.
5. Actual notice was given by the filing of a grievance with the Superintendent of [XYZ Correctional Facility requesting the repair of the ceiling on February 5, 2000].
6. As a result of this incident claimant received [a broken arm, a broken leg, injuries to the shoulder and head, including recurring headaches, and severe physical and mental pain and anguish]. Permanent disabilities include [chronic headaches, lameness, and the loss of full use of the arm].
7. Claimant was confined in the hospital for three weeks, in the prison infirmary for ten weeks and was bedridden for an additional five months.
8. Claimant lost employment wages [as law library clerk within the prison of $0.75 an hour for eight months]. Claimant's injuries also render him unable to be gainfully employed [as a construction worker] (his employment prior to incarceration) upon his release from prison, which will be no later than [May, 2004, the date of release based upon the serving of the maximum sentence].
9. Special damages for:
   (a) physicians' services and medical supplies—not applicable;[99]
   (b) loss of earnings—not applicable except as set forth in paragraph 8;
   (c) hospital expenses—not applicable;
   (d) nurses' services—not applicable.
10. Claimant's address currently is: _____[100]
11. Claimant claims that defendant violated _____.[101]

_____[102]
Claimant, pro se

_____
_____[103]

Hon. _____[104]
Attorney General of the State of New York
Department of Law
Albany, NY 12224

A-10. Sample Notice of Appeal[105]

State of New York Court of Claims

_____[106]	:
- against -	:	Notice of Appeal
	:	Claim No. _____[107]
The State of New York	:

SIRS:

PLEASE TAKE NOTICE, that the undersigned _____,[108] hereby appeals to the Appellate Division of the New York Supreme Court in and for the _____[109] Department, from a judgment entered in the above entitled action in favor of the above named defendant, the State of New York, against the above named claimant _____,[110] entered in the office of the Clerk of the County of _____[111] on the ____ day of _____, 20__,[112] and this appeal is taken from each and every part of said judgment as well as the whole thereof.

Dated: _____[113]

_____[114]
Claimant, pro se

To: _____[115]
Clerk of the County of _____[116]

Hon. _____[117]
Attorney General of the State of New York
Department of Law
Albany, New York 12224

Fill in the forms shown in Appendix A as follows:

1. Your name.
2. Your name.
3. Your complete address.
4. Give clear, detailed information about the basis for your complaint: who did what, where, when. Include the date of the incident and the facility in which it occurred.
5. Your signature.
6. The date on which you sign the notice and your address. Attach a Verification. See Appendix A-2 for a sample Verification.
7. The name of the county in which you signed the affidavit.
8. Your name.
9. Your tort claim. See Appendices A-3 and A-4 for sample tort claims.
10. Your signature. Sign this only in the presence of a notary public, as the next footnote explains.
11. This is where the notary public notarizes the Verification by signing it and fixing his or her official seal to it. If you have difficulty obtaining the services of a notary public, you should have another prisoner witness your signature and cross out "Notary Public." (But only do this if it is impossible for you to find a notary public.) If another prisoner is your witness, you should add the following paragraph at the bottom of the certification:

> I declare that I have not been able to have this [insert claim, or notice of intent to file a claim, etc.] notarized according to law because [explain here your efforts to get the claim, etc. notarized]. I therefore declare under penalty of perjury that all of the statements made in this [claim, or notice of intent, etc.] are true of my own knowledge, and I pray leave of the Court to allow this [claim, or notice of intent, etc.] to be filed without notarization.
>
> _____
> (Your signature)

12. This form is adapted from "Using the Court of Claims: A Guide for New York State Prisoners," a manual by the Prisoners' Rights Project of The Legal Aid Society. Assault and battery are intentional torts, in other words, torts that were committed purposefully and not by accident. In a claim for assault and battery, as in all claims for intentional torts, you must allege the following:
    (1) The facts of the assault and battery (the intentional tort). You should not simply say that assault and battery was committed by the defendant; rather, you should give the basic facts of what happened. However, remember that not only must you be able to prove all of the allegations set forth in your claim at trial, but that any inconsistencies between the allegations set forth in your claim and the proof you present at trial will make it more difficult for you to win at trial.
    (2) Intent. You must state that the defendant's actions were not accidental but rather were intentional.
    (3) Injury. You must indicate that you were injured as a result of the defendant's actions. You also must include a description of the injuries you received.
    (4) That the person who injured you was working for the State of New York and injured you while acting within the scope of his/her employment and in the discharge of his/her duties.
    (5) That you served the claim or the Notice of Intention to File a Claim upon the Attorney General within 90 days of the incident about which you are complaining.
    (6) That your claim is filed pursuant to §§ 10 and 11 of the Court of Claims Act.
13. Your name.
14. Leave this blank. This will be filled in by the clerk of the Court of Claims.
15. Your name.
16. Your prison address, including the name of your prison and the county where it is located.
17. Name of the state official who is responsible for your injury.
18. Insert the date (day, month, and year) when your injury or property damage occurred.
19. Insert the name of the correctional facility where your injury or property damage occurred.
20. Describe in detail how your injury happened, including names and dates. Each point should be in its own paragraph with its own number.
21. You should only include the following factors that apply to your case for determining damages.
22. If applicable, list the medical expenses you have had to pay for or that you can show a high probability of having to pay for in the future. You cannot obtain damages for any money your care cost while in prison because the State pays those bills. However, in seeking damages, you might consider such factors as the long-term effects of your injury after your release, including whether there is a high probability that you may require hospitalization, specialist care, or the purchase and maintenance of medical or therapeutic equipment such as, in this sample claim, the cost and maintenance of a hearing aid.

23. List below any current or future lost earnings.

24. You should be specific in detailing the location, length, and severity of the pain and suffering you have experienced.

25. Examples of factors that demonstrate mental anguish are nightmares, loss of sleep, heightened anxiety, and depression.

26. This paragraph is optional.

27. Include the day, the month, and the year when you filed the Notice of Intention with the Clerk for the Court of Claims and the Attorney General, respectively. Do not include this paragraph if you did not serve a Notice of Intention.

28. Paragraphs 13 and 14 will depend upon whether you served a Notice of Intention to File Claim. N.Y. Ct. Cl. Act § 10 (McKinney Supp. 2004). If you did not serve a Notice of Intention, do not include paragraph 13. Paragraph 14 should now read: "13. This claim is filed within ninety days after the claim accrued as required by law." If you are filing a late motion, add: "I am filing this motion pursuant to the late motion that the Court of Claims granted on [date]."

29. Insert total amount of money you are claiming as damages.

30. Your signature.

31. The date on which you sign the petition. Also write your mailing address in this space and attach at the end of your claim a Verification exactly like the one illustrated at Appendix A-2.

32. This form is adapted from "Using the Court of Claims: A Guide for New York State Prisoners," a manual by the Prisoners' Rights Project of The Legal Aid Society. An action for personal injury due to negligence, unlike assault and battery, does not require that you plead or prove intent. However, you must show that your injuries were foreseeable—that your injuries were a likely result of the defendant's action or failure to act. You must also show that the negligence of the defendant-State's employee's actions or failures to act when under a duty to do so were the major cause of the accident. Also, where appropriate, you should plead that the defendant had actual or constructive knowledge (knew or should have known) of the defective condition causing the accident.

33. Your name.

34. Insert claim number.

35. Your name.

36. Your prison address, including the name of your prison and the county where it is located.

37. Insert the type of the negligence tort you are claiming. For example, you may claim failure to protect, negligent destruction of property, or inadequate medical care. These claims may be stated as follows

> Sample Failure to Protect Claim:
>
> This claim is for negligence of the State for the failure of its employee [insert name of the state/prison official responsible for not protecting you] to protect claimant from the reasonably foreseeable assault by [insert the prisoner's name who attacked you] while acting within the scope of his/her employment and in the discharge of his/her duties, on [insert the date when the attack occurred], at [insert the name of the facility where the attack occurred], so as to cause serious injury to the claimant, [insert your name].
>
> Sample Destruction of Property Claim:
>
> This claim is for negligence of the State committed by its employee [insert the name of the state or prison official responsible for the damage to your property, if known] for the destruction of claimant's property while acting within the scope of his/her employment and in the discharge of his/her duties, on [insert the date when the destruction of your property occurred, if known], at [insert the name of the facility where the destruction of your property occurred].
>
> Sample Inadequate Medical Care Claim:
>
> This claim is for negligence of the State committed by its employee for failure of its employee [insert name of the state/prison official responsible for not protecting you] to > provide adequate medical care following accepted medical standards on [insert the date when you requested medical care that you did not receive or the date when you received inappropriate medical care] while acting within the scope of his/her employment and in the discharge of his/her duties, on [insert the date when the denial of medical care occurred], at [insert the name of the facility where the denial of medical care occurred], so as to cause serious injury to the claimant, [insert your name].

38. Insert the name of the facility where the injury occurred.

39. Insert your name.

40. Insert the state's duty of reasonable care that the State has violated. Examples of duty of care include: medical care following accepted professional standards, protection from reasonably foreseeable attacks by corrections officers or other prisoners, and other dangers that a reasonable official knew or should have known about. If the duty that an official owes you is defined by a statute or regulation, you may be able to make a claim of negligence per se.

41. Insert the name of the facility where your injury occurred.

42. In the preceding paragraphs you should describe in detail how your injury happened, including names and dates. Each point should be in its own paragraph with its own number.

43. In the preceding paragraphs you should describe your injury in detail. Each point should be in its own paragraph with its own number.

44. This paragraph is optional.

45. You should only include the following factors that apply to your case for determining damages.

46. If applicable, list below the medical expenses you have had to pay for or those you can show a high probability of having to pay for in the future. You cannot obtain damages for the money your care cost while you were incarcerated as the State has assumed this cost. However, in seeking damages, you might consider such factors as the long-term effects of your injury after your release, including whether there is a high probability that you may require hospitalization, specialist care, or the purchase and maintenance of therapeutic devices.

47. List below any current or future lost earnings.

48. You should be specific in detailing the location, length, and severity of the pain and suffering you have experienced.

49. Examples of factors that demonstrate mental anguish are nightmares, loss of sleep, heightened anxiety, and depression.

50. Include the day, the month, and the year when you filed the Notice of Intention with the Clerk for the Court of Claims and the Attorney General, respectively. Do not include this paragraph if you did not serve a Notice of Intention.

51. Paragraphs 12 and 13 will depend upon whether you served a Notice of Intention to File Claim. N.Y. Ct. Cl. Act § 10 (McKinney Supp. 2004). If you did not serve a Notice of Intention, do not include paragraph 12. Paragraph 13 should now read: "12. This claim is filed within ninety days after the claim accrued as required by law." If you are filing a late motion, add: "I am filing this motion pursuant to the late motion which the Court of Claims granted on (date)."

52. Insert total amount of money you are claiming as damages.

53. Your signature.

54. The date on which you sign the petition. Also write your mailing address in this space and attach a Verification at the end of your claim, illustrated at Appendix A-2.

55. Your name.

56. Your identification number.

57. Insert claim number.

58. The name of the county in which you signed the affidavit.

59. Your name.

60. Name and address of your correctional facility.

61. Check one of the boxes below.

62. If you do not own any property of value, write "NONE." Otherwise, list each item of property and how much it is worth in the spaces below.

63. Your signature.

64. This is where the notary public notarizes the verification by signing it and fixing his or her official seal to it. If you have difficulty obtaining the services of a notary public, you should have another prisoner witness your signature and delete "Notary Public." (Use this technique only as a last resort.) If another prisoner is your witness, you should add the following paragraph at the bottom of the certification:

> I declare that I have not been able to have this [insert claim, or notice of intent to file a claim, etc.] notarized according to law because [explain here your efforts to get the claim, etc. notarized]. I therefore declare under penalty of perjury that all of the statements made in this [claim, or notice of intent, etc.] are true of my own knowledge, and I pray leave of the Court to allow this [claim, or notice of intent, etc.] to be filed without notarization.
>
> _____
>
> (Your signature)

65. By signing this section, you give permission for your facility to send the Court copies of your trust fund account statement. You also authorize the facility to withdraw the filing fee from your account and to send it to the Court. The entire filing fee will be withdrawn automatically from your account even if your case is dismissed.

66. Your name.

67. Your inmate number.

68. Your signature.

69. Your name.

70. When submitting this form, you will also need to include a Notice of Motion form. See N.Y. Ct. Rules § 206.8, which includes a copy of the form.

71. When filing this motion you must attach the proposed claim itself so the court knows what the motion refers to. The court will not consider this copy of your claim as being filed, however. After you receive permission to file a late claim, you must send your claim to the court along with the order granting you permission to file a late claim.

72. Your name.

73. Insert claim number.

74. Your name.

75. The date on which the actions upon which you are basing your claim occurred.

76. These are only sample reasons; do not copy them unless they apply to you. The reasons you give here for your failure to file your claim in a timely manner must be persuasive. See Part C(1)(b) of the Chapter for a list of factors that the court considers in ruling on your application for permission to file a late claim.

77. These are examples of the types of justification that you must offer to the court to persuade it to grant your application; do not copy them unless they apply to you.

78. Your signature.

79. The date and your address.

80. You must complete this form and submit it to the court within 10 days after serving your Notice of Intention to File a Tort Claim or Claim on the Attorney General. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. Tit. 22, § 206.5 (2003). This form is adapted from "Using the Court of Claims: A Guide for New York State Prisoners," a manual by the Prisoners' Rights Project of The Legal Aid Society.

81. Your name.

82. Insert claim number.

83. Insert the name of the county in which you signed the affidavit.

84. Your name.

85. Insert the name and address of the correctional facility where you are incarcerated.

86. Insert the date on which you mailed the Notice of Intention or Claim to the Attorney General.

87. Insert either "Notice of Intention to file a Claim" if you filed a Notice of Intention, or "Claim" if you filed a Claim.

88. Your signature.

89. This is where the notary public notarizes the verification by signing it and fixing his or her official seal to it. If you have difficulty obtaining the services of a notary public, you should have another prisoner witness your signature and delete "Notary Public." (Use this technique only as a last resort.) If another prisoner is your witness, you should add the following paragraph at the bottom of the certification:

> I declare that I have not been able to have this [insert claim, or notice of intent to file a claim, etc.] notarized according to law because [explain here your efforts to get the claim, etc. notarized]. I therefore declare under penalty of perjury that all of the statements made in this [claim, or notice of intent, etc.] are true of my own knowledge, and I pray leave of the Court to allow this [claim, or notice of intent, etc.] to be filed without notarization.

_____
(Your signature)

90. If you do not answer or object to a demand for a Bill of Particulars within 30 days after receiving it, the Court may stop you (preclude you) from introducing evidence at trial of the facts asked for in the demand. See N.Y. C.P.L.R. 3042, 3126 (McKinney Supp. 2004). This form is adapted from "Using the Court of Claims: A Guide for New York State Prisoners," a manual by the Prisoners' Rights Project of The Legal Aid Society. This is a sample of a demand that the State may serve on you. Appendix A-9 is a sample response.

91. Your name.

92. Insert claim number.

93. This means whether you claim the defendant actually knew of the condition that caused your injury ("actual notice") or just that they should have known ("constructive notice").

94. The name of the New York State Attorney General.

95. The name of the New York State Assistant Attorney General.

96. This form is adapted from "Using the Court of Claims: A Guide for New York State Prisoners," a manual by the Prisoners' Rights Project of The Legal Aid Society. This is not a form you will prepare, but is a form that can be served on you by the State. This response to the Request for a Bill of Particulars (see Appendix A-9) is loosely based upon the facts set forth in the Sample Tort Claim in Appendix A-4, personal injury due to negligence. Please refer to this Claim to see how closely the Bill of Particulars follows it.

97. Your name.

98. Insert claim number.

99. This is because DOCS typically pays for medical expenses (unless you request, and pay for, a private doctor).

100. Your address.

101. Insert statutes, ordinances, rules, or regulations the state officials violated.

102. Your signature.

103. Your address.

104. The name of the New York State Attorney General.

105. If you would like to appeal the decision of the Court of Claims to the Appellate Division of the New York Supreme Court, you must file a Notice of Appeal within 30 days after the judgment. See N.Y. Ct. Cl. Act § 24 (McKinney 1989). This form is adapted from "Using the Court of Claims: A Guide for New York State Prisoners," a manual by the Prisoners' Rights Project of The Legal Aid Society.

106. Your name.

107. Insert the claim number.

108. Your name.

109. The Appellate Division is divided into four departments. Each department has a fixed geographic jurisdiction hearing cases from specific counties. You can determine which department your appeal should be taken to by checking the list of counties served by each Appellate Division, which can be found in Appendix II of the JLM.

110. Your name.

111. The county in which your case was heard.

112. Insert the date the judgment was filed in the Clerk's office.

113. The date on which you sign the notice.

114. Your signature.

115. Insert the name of the Clerk (if known) in whose office the judgment was filed.

116. The county in which your case was heard.

117. The name of the New York State Attorney General.

A JAILHOUSE LAWYER'S MANUAL

Chapter 18: Your Rights At Prison Disciplinary Proceedings

Columbia Human Rights Law Review

Ninth Edition 2011

Legal Disclaimer

A Jailhouse Lawyer's Manual is written and updated by members of the Columbia Human Rights Law Review. The law prohibits us from providing any legal advice to prisoners. This information is not intended as legal advice or representation nor should you consider or rely upon it as such. Neither the JLM nor any information contained herein is intended to or shall constitute a contract between the JLM and any reader, and the JLM does not guarantee the accuracy of the information contained herein. Additionally, your use of the JLM should not be construed as creating an attorney-client relationship with the JLM staff or anyone at Columbia Law School. Finally, while we have attempted to provide information that is up-to-date and useful, because the law changes frequently, we cannot guarantee that all information is current.

CHAPTER 18

YOUR RIGHTS AT PRISON DISCIPLINARY PROCEEDINGS*

A. Introduction

This Chapter is a guide for prisoners facing disciplinary action for violating prison rules. It outlines basic requirements for disciplinary proceedings under federal law, with special emphasis on New York State disciplinary proceedings. If you are incarcerated outside New York, you should research the rules and regulations covering disciplinary proceedings in your state before preparing your defense.[1]

This Chapter begins with a broad overview of your constitutional rights during prison disciplinary proceedings. Part B explains the concept of "due process of law," which applies to disciplinary proceedings. Part C details the concept of due process in the prison setting, with a detailed discussion of the U.S. Supreme Court case Sandin v. Conner. Part D describes prisoners' basic rights in disciplinary proceedings. Part E explains disciplinary proceedings in the State of New York and includes information on the procedures that prison officials must follow before they put you in disciplinary segregation. Finally, Part F explains the procedures that officials in New York State must follow before they put you in administrative segregation as well as the procedures that federal prisons must follow.

Prison officials have the authority to discipline prisoners who violate the law, or who violate prison rules and regulations. They also have the authority to place prisoners who pose a threat to prison safety and security in administrative segregation. Prison officials generally have wide discretion in disciplinary and administrative matters, and courts will usually defer to (agree with) the officials' conclusions and decisions about how to manage the prison. However, there are limits on this discretion. To protect you from arbitrary or unfair abuses of power by prison officials, federal and state laws require officials to follow procedural requirements (certain guidelines) when they discipline you or place you in administrative segregation. If officials do not comply with these procedural requirements and as a result you are subject to "atypical and significant hardship" (see below for more on what kinds of discipline meet this standard), you may be able to claim that your rights under the Due Process Clause of the U.S. Constitution have been violated.

This Chapter describes those rights that relate to the conditions of your confinement. To protect these rights, you must first go through your institution's administrative grievance procedure. Chapter 15 of the JLM contains further information on inmate grievance procedures. If you are unsuccessful or do not receive a favorable result through the prisoner grievance procedure, you can either bring an action under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 (in certain cases) or file a tort action in state court. If you are in New York, you can bring a tort action in the Court of Claims, or file an Article 78 petition in state court. More information on all of these types of cases can be found in JLM Chapter 5, "Choosing a Court and Lawsuit," JLM Chapter 14, "Prison Litigation Reform Act," JLM Chapter 16, "42 U.S.C. § 1983 and 28 U.S.C. § 1331 to Obtain Relief From Violations of Federal Law," JLM Chapter 17, "The State's Duty to Protect You and Your Property: Tort Actions," and JLM Chapter 22, "How to Challenge Administrative Decisions Using Article 78 of the New York Civil Practice Law and Rules." If you decide to pursue a claim in federal court, you must read Chapter 14 of the JLM on the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA). If you fail to follow the PLRA requirements you could lose your good-time credit and your right to bring future claims in federal court without paying the full filing fee.

B. Definition of "Due Process"

The Constitution's Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments prevent the government from taking your life, liberty, or property without due process. The Fifth Amendment limits the power of the federal government, including federal prison officials. The Fourteenth Amendment similarly limits the power of state prison officials. Both federal and state courts have authority to review the actions of prison officials to make sure they comply with due process requirements.[2] The Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment

---

* This Chapter was written by Miranda Berge based in part on previous versions by Rachel Wilgoren, Marjorie A. Adams, Jennifer L. Hurt, Ivan A. Sacks, and James A. Skarzynski. Special thanks to Kenneth Stephens of The Legal Aid Society, Prisoners' Rights Project for his assistance in the revision of this Chapter.

1. See Chapter 2 of the JLM, "Legal Research," for information on how to conduct legal research in prison.

2. Article III of the Constitution grants federal courts jurisdiction to hear cases "arising under this Constitution." State courts have "concurrent jurisdiction," which means that they are as equally able as federal courts to decide cases protects you from arbitrary and unfair treatment by the government. It refers to two kinds of interests: substantive rights and procedural rights. Substantive rights include the fundamental right to "life, liberty, and property," and the specific guarantees in the Bill of Rights, like the right to free speech and to freedom of religion. Substantive due process requires that the government treat people with "fundamental fairness" and not interfere with these rights unless it is absolutely necessary to achieve a more important public need.

If the government seeks to restrict your substantive rights, procedural due process guarantees that certain procedures be followed. These procedural rights include the right to know about a hearing before it occurs (advance notice) and the opportunity to be heard. The exact procedures that the government must follow are different from case to case. Courts determine what procedures are required in a given case by comparing the degree of your interests to those of the government.

C. Due Process in Prison

Due process means something different in the prison context than it does outside. The Constitution only guarantees you a right to due process in situations where the government attempts to deprive you of your "life, liberty, or property." So, a court must decide whether you have a "liberty interest" at stake before it identifies the required "due process" in your disciplinary hearing.[3] In other words, Fourteenth Amendment due process only applies when prison officials attempt to deprive you of a recognized interest.

It is important to note that the Supreme Court's decision in Sandin v. Conner[4] changed the law in this area dramatically. During the 1960s and '70s, the Supreme Court took major steps toward recognizing the constitutional rights of prisoners. Unfortunately, the Sandin decision reversed that trend by significantly limiting the circumstances in which prisoners may petition the courts to vindicate their constitutional rights. Sandin v. Conner is important because in it the Supreme Court sets the minimum standard all other federal and state courts must follow. States may choose to grant prisoners more rights than those required by the Supreme Court in Sandin v. Conner, but they cannot take away rights guaranteed by federal law.

In Sandin v. Conner, a prisoner in Hawaii faced a disciplinary proceeding for trying to physically interfere with a strip search being performed on him and for using "abusive or obscene language" toward prison employees.[5] The prison disciplinary committee refused the prisoner's request to present witnesses at the hearing, stating that all of the witnesses were unavailable.[6] The prisoner was sentenced to a thirty-day disciplinary segregation in the Special Holding Unit (SHU) and sought administrative review of the decision. Administrators eventually waived the charge, finding that it was unsupported.[7] In the meantime, however, the prisoner filed a Section 1983 claim, alleging that his civil rights had been violated.

According to the Supreme Court, although a change may have a substantial and adverse impact on the conditions of a prisoner's confinement, it does not necessarily violate a liberty interest protected by due process rights (rights dealing with procedural fairness).[8] As long as the new conditions are "within the normal limits or range of custody which the conviction has authorized the State to impose," the Due Process Clause does not apply.[9] However, even if the conditions of your confinement are not necessarily due process violations, you may still be able to use the Due Process Clause to challenge the procedures by which you were confined. The Supreme Court has held that if a state avoids certain types of confinement, it may create involving the U.S. Constitution.

---

3. This "liberty interest" refers to the liberty described in the 5th and 14th Amendments. Individuals cannot be deprived of liberty (which includes being imprisoned) without due process of law.

4. Sandin v. Conner, 515 U.S. 472, 484, 115 S. Ct. 2293, 2300, 132 L. Ed. 2d 418, 430 (1995) (holding that due process liberty interests created by prison regulations will generally be limited to freedom from restraints that impose an atypical and significant hardship on the prisoner in relation to the ordinary incidents of prison life).

5. Sandin v. Conner, 515 U.S. 472, 475, 115 S. Ct. 2293, 2296, 132 L. Ed. 2d 418, 424 (1995).

6. Sandin v. Conner, 515 U.S. 472, 475, 115 S. Ct. 2293, 2296, 132 L. Ed. 2d 418, 424 (1995).

7. Sandin v. Conner, 515 U.S. 472, 476, 115 S. Ct. 2293, 2296, 132 L. Ed. 2d 418, 425 (1995).

8. Meachum v. Fano, 427 U.S. 215, 225, 96 S. Ct. 2532, 2538, 49 L. Ed. 2d 451, 459 (1976) (holding that the transfer of a prisoner to a prison, the conditions of which are substantially less favorable to him, does not necessarily violate a liberty interest protected by the Due Process Clause of the 14th Amendment).

9. Meachum v. Fano, 427 U.S. 215, 225, 96 S. Ct. 2532, 2538, 49 L. Ed. 2d 451, 459 (1976); see also Montanye v. Haymes, 427 U.S. 236, 242–43, 96 S. Ct. 2543, 2547, 49 L. Ed. 2d 466, 471–72 (1976) (holding that no Due Process Clause liberty interest is infringed when a prisoner is transferred from one prison to another within the State, unless there is some right or expectation that can be derived from state law that a prisoner will not be transferred except for misbehavior or upon the occurrence of other "specified events").

a protected liberty interest. For that to be the case in your state, your state must have made a law or regulation that requires certain procedures to be followed before a particular condition is imposed on you.[10]

Even then, not every law or regulation that requires prison officials to follow procedures before depriving you of liberty creates a protected liberty interest. In Sandin, the Supreme Court held that such laws and regulations only implicate the Due Process Clause when the condition in question imposes "atypical [uncommon] and significant [major] hardship on the inmate in relation to the ordinary incidents of prison life."[11] To determine whether this is the case, a court will generally compare the conditions prisoners can ordinarily expect in the course of their incarceration with a fact-based analysis of the length and extent of the deprivation you are claiming. In Sandin, the Supreme Court decided that, "[b]ased on a comparison between inmates inside and outside disciplinary segregation, the state's actions in placing him there for thirty days did not work a major disruption in his environment."[12] The court concluded that the prisoner's thirty-day disciplinary segregation was not the "atypical, significant deprivation in which a State might conceivably create a liberty interest."[13] Because the prisoner did not have a liberty interest protected by due process, the court concluded that prison officials conducting the disciplinary proceeding were not required to follow the constitutional due process requirements or state regulations regarding disciplinary procedures.

In sum, if you wish to make a claim that your due process rights were violated by a deficiency in the procedures that led to your confinement in the SHU, you must show that:

(1) The confinement constituted an "atypical and significant hardship" compared with the deprivations experienced in the general population; and
(2) The state, through language in a statute, had created a protected liberty interest in avoiding that form of confinement.

Unfortunately, the Court's opinion in Sandin sets a very high standard for showing that the prison's procedures actually violated your right to due process, and typically you can allege this violation only after you have already been confined. However, even if you are unable to prove a due process violation using the Sandin standard, you may still be entitled to other protections from state actions that impose arbitrary and severe conditions of confinement on you. You may either:

(1) Draw upon internal prison grievance procedures[14] and state judicial review (review by state courts under state laws or state constitutional protections) where available; or
(2) Pursue a claim under the Eighth Amendment of the Constitution, which protects against cruel and unusual punishment.[15]

Since the Supreme Court decided Sandin, courts around the country have applied the Sandin test differently when determining what constitutes an "atypical and significant hardship" protected by state regulation. This Chapter examines when courts (especially in New York) have interpreted regulations as mandatory (therefore creating a liberty interest) and how they have applied Sandin to disciplinary and administrative segregation, transfers, good-time credits, and work release programs.

The rest of this Part will examine whether certain prison practices create "atypical and significant hardship." Remember that it does not matter whether the punishment is "atypical and significant" unless the state has a statute creating a protected liberty interest.

1. Disciplinary and Administrative Segregation

Prison officials in New York may confine a prisoner in a Segregated Housing/Holding Unit (SHU) for a predetermined period of time if the prisoner was found to have committed a rule violation. Pending the disciplinary hearing or during investigation, the prisoner may be placed in administrative segregation. Prison officials may also hold a prisoner in administrative segregation in a SHU if the prisoner poses a threat to the safety or security of the prison.[16] Disciplinary segregation must be based on a finding—after a 10. Sandin v. Conner, 515 U.S. 472, 483–84, 115 S. Ct. 2293, 2300, 132 L. Ed. 2d 418, 429–30 (1995) (citing Wolff v. McDonnell, 418 U.S. 539, 94 S. Ct. 2963, 41 L. Ed. 2d 935 (1974)).

11. Sandin v. Conner, 515 U.S. 472, 484, 115 S. Ct. 2293, 2300, 132 L. Ed. 2d 418, 430 (1995).

12. Sandin v. Conner, 515 U.S. 472, 486, 115 S. Ct. 2293, 2301, 132 L. Ed. 2d 418, 431 (1995).

13. Sandin v. Conner, 515 U.S. 472, 486, 115 S. Ct. 2293, 2301, 132 L. Ed. 2d 418, 431 (1995).

14. See Chapter 15 of the JLM, "Inmate Grievance Procedures," for more information.

15. See Chapter 16 of the JLM, "Using 42 U.S.C. § 1983 and 28 U.S.C. § 1331 to Obtain Relief From Violations of Federal Law," for more information.

16. See N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 301.4(b) (2007).

formal hearing—that the prisoner violated the New York State Department of Correctional Services (DOCS) Standards of Prisoner Behaviors. However, administrative segregation is based on a determination after an informal hearing that a prisoner's presence in the general prison population threatens prison safety and security. Disciplinary confinement takes place for a specific time period, unlike administrative segregation, which is not considered punishment and therefore may continue until the superintendent finds the threat is over.[17] For more on the procedural requirements for disciplinary and administrative segregation in New York prisons, see Parts E and F of this Chapter.

Courts in New York State and the Second Circuit analyze both disciplinary and administrative detention proceedings under the Sandin test explained above. Claims arising from both kinds of segregation must be evaluated by the court to determine whether:

(1) There are procedures explicitly required of prison officials; and,
(2) An "atypical and significant hardship" exists.[18]

This Section will help you figure out whether the procedures that took place before you were placed in disciplinary or administrative detention met requirement (1) and then how courts evaluate a prisoner's confinement in the SHU under requirement (2). This Section focuses specifically on the law that governs courts in the Second Circuit (that is, federal courts in New York, Vermont, and Connecticut). Analysis by courts in other jurisdictions may be different. Unfortunately, some courts outside of the Second Circuit have held that no liberty interests may arise in the context of administrative detention.[19] If you live outside the jurisdiction of the Second Circuit, you should research how courts in your jurisdiction have interpreted your prison's rules and whether administrative detention has been found to be a protected liberty interest.

(a) The State-Created Liberty Interest Requirement

Even if your segregation was "atypical and significant," courts will not recognize a due process violation unless you can show you had a constitutional or state-created liberty interest in avoiding the segregation. Some New York district courts rely on cases that came before Sandin, and hold that state and federal regulations which govern disciplinary confinement[20] and administrative segregation[21] automatically grant prisoners a liberty interest that protects them from certain prison conditions, and that the Due Process Clause of the U.S. Constitution protects these rights. The Second Circuit, however, does not accept this clear rule. The Second Circuit finds that a prisoner only has a federal due process claim if, upon careful analysis, specific state statutes and regulations create protected liberty interests and these protected interests are regularly upheld within the prison.[22] It is important to remember that courts outside of New York State do

---

17. See N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, §§ 301.2(a), 301.4 (2007).

18. See, e.g., Sealey v. Giltner, 197 F.3d 578, 584–85 (2d Cir. 1999) (interpreting Sandin to require consideration of: whether, first, a prisoner has a protected liberty interest in avoiding administrative confinement, and, second, the confinement imposed an atypical and significant hardship); Giano v. Kelly, No. 89-CV-727(C), 2000 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 9138, at *8 (W.D.N.Y. May 16, 2000) (unpublished) ("[C]onfinement implicated due process only if it was an atypical and significant hardship and if DOCS regulations conferred a liberty interest in remaining free from such confinement.").

19. See Crowder v. True, 74 F.3d 812, 815 (7th Cir. 1996) (holding administrative detention cannot give rise to a protected liberty interest); Moore v. Ham, No. 92-3305, 1993 U.S. App. LEXIS 826, at *5 (10th Cir. Jan. 13, 1993) (unpublished) ("If segregation is non-punitive in nature and is done for administrative or supervisory reasons, the inmate has no due process rights prior to administrative confinement unless prison regulations provide him with a liberty interest."); Awalt v. Whalen, 809 F. Supp. 414, 416 (E.D. Va. 1992) (holding regulations providing for staff procedures and time frames, but not mandating release upon a hearing and specific findings, do not create a liberty interest in release from administrative detention). But see Muhammad v. Carlson, 845 F.2d 175, 177 (8th Cir. 1988) (holding that a liberty interest may be created by prison regulations if those regulations impose substantive criteria limiting or guiding prison officials' discretion); Maclean v. Secor, 876 F. Supp. 695, 701–02 (E.D. Pa. 1995) (holding regulations limiting prison officials' discretion in administrative detention decisions created a liberty interest).

20. See, e.g., Nicholas v. Tucker, No. 95 Civ. 9705, 2000 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 749, at *19 (S.D.N.Y. Jan. 27, 2000) (unpublished) (finding New York State regulations grant prisoners a protected liberty interest in freedom from disciplinary confinement); Wright v. Miller, 973 F. Supp. 390, 395 (S.D.N.Y. 1997) (finding a state-created liberty interest in being free from disciplinary confinement); Gonzalez v. Coughlin, 969 F. Supp. 256, 257–58 (S.D.N.Y. 1997) (holding state regulations on disciplinary segregation create a liberty interest in freedom from disciplinary confinement).

21. See, e.g., Tellier v. Fields, 280 F.3d 69, 81 (2d Cir. 2000) (holding that 28 C.F.R. § 541.22 creates a liberty interest); Gonzalez v. Coughlin, 969 F. Supp. 256, 257–58 (S.D.N.Y. 1997) (concluding that New York State rules regarding administrative confinement create a liberty interest).

22. See Sealey v. Giltner, 197 F.3d 578, 583–84 (2d Cir. 1999) (finding that Sandin rejected the idea that "a state's establishment of a specific substantive predicate for restrictive confinement of a prisoner is sufficient to create a not always find that state statutes and regulations create a liberty interest that protects prisoners from disciplinary and administrative segregation.

(b) The "Atypical and Significant Hardship" Requirement

In determining whether your confinement in the SHU implicates a protected liberty interest, a court will conduct the same analysis for disciplinary segregation as it conducts for administrative segregation. The court assesses whether the specific factual conditions of your confinement in a segregated facility rise to the level of an "atypical and significant hardship … in relation to the ordinary incidents of prison life."[23] A court will look at the particular facts of your confinement in conducting its analysis.[24] There is no clear formula for determining whether a given SHU confinement is an "atypical and significant hardship," but courts will consider two main elements in their analysis:

(1) the length of your confinement; and
(2) the extent of your deprivation.[25]

The court will consider both factors "since especially harsh conditions endured for a brief interval and somewhat harsh conditions endured for a prolonged interval might both be atypical."[26]

(i) Duration of Your Confinement

If you are filing a claim within the jurisdiction of the Second Circuit, the length of your confinement is the actual time that you have been detained in the SHU, and this period of time is the period for which a prison official may be responsible for violating your due process rights. Therefore, when you file your claim, you will state the actual time that you spent in detention and not the potential duration of your confinement.[27] You should count the total number of days that you spent in the SHU before, during, and after the disciplinary or administrative hearing.[28] If you are transferred from one SHU directly to another SHU, in a different prison facility, count the total number of days that you were detained. Your transfer to another SHU does not restart the duration of confinement that the court will consider.[29]

There is not a strictly defined period of SHU confinement that qualifies as "atypical and significant," but the Second Circuit has indicated general rules to evaluate such claims. The Second Circuit recently suggested that SHU confinement of approximately 305 days or more probably implicates a protected liberty interest.[30] Periods of confinement that are shorter than 305 days but longer than 101 days may implicate a protected liberty interest, and whether it implicates a protected liberty interest heavily depends on the protected liberty interest"); Welch v. Bartlett, 196 F.3d 389, 392 (2d Cir. 1999) (holding that a prisoner who brings a due process claim that is premised upon a state-law liberty interest, has the burden to establish that the law does, in fact, create such a liberty interest). The Second Circuit's method of analysis, is based on the Supreme Court's opinion in Hewitt v. Helms, 459 U.S. 460, 103 S. Ct. 864, 74 L. Ed. 2d 675 (1983). The Supreme Court explicitly rejected the Hewitt analysis, however, as the primary means of determining the existence of a due process claim. Sandin v. Conner, 515 U.S. 472, 484, 115 S. Ct. 2293, 2300, 132 L. Ed. 2d 418, 430 (1995). Despite the Supreme Court's ruling in Sandin, the Second Circuit held that, in combination with Sandin's "atypical and significant hardship" test, the procedure established by the Second Circuit in Sealey and Welch is still an appropriate way to determine whether a legitimate due process claim is present.

---

23. Sandin v. Conner, 515 U.S. 472, 484, 115 S. Ct. 2293, 2300, 132 L. Ed. 2d 418, 430 (1995).

24. Miller v. Selsky, 111 F.3d 7, 9 (2d Cir. 1997) (holding that Sandin did not create a blanket rule, and that "courts must examine the circumstances of a confinement to determine whether that confinement affected a liberty interest").

25. Sealey v. Giltner, 197 F.3d 578, 582–83 (2d Cir. 1999).

26. Sealey v. Giltner, 197 F.3d 578, 586 (2d Cir. 1999).

27. See Scott v. Albury, 156 F.3d 283, 286–87 (2d Cir. 1998) (holding that the measure of liberty derivation under Sandlin is the actual confinement that the prisoner endured—in this case 60 days—rather than the potential, maximum penalty that the prisoner faced—indefinite detention).

28. See Sealey v. Giltner, 197 F.3d 578, 587–88 (2d Cir. 1999).

29. See Giano v. Selsky, 238 F.3d 223, 226 (2d Cir. 2001) (holding that a court must consider the cumulative period of time that a prisoner was held in administrative segregation at two facilities because his detention at the two facilities was continuous, based on the same administrative rationale, and under nearly identical conditions); see also Sims v. Artuz, 230 F.3d 14, 23–24 (2d Cir. 2000) (suggesting that "some or all" of a series of separate SHU sentences "should be aggregated for purposes of the Sandin inquiry" when they are imposed within a period of days or hours of each other and add up to a sustained period of confinement).

30. See Colon v. Howard, 215 F.3d 227, 231 (2d Cir. 2000) (holding that confinement in a SHU for 305 days under "normal conditions" is a departure from standard prison life, which warrants due process protection under Sandin).

extent of the deprivation that you suffered.[31] (This second factor is discussed more below.) Confinement for 101 days or shorter probably does not implicate a liberty interest under Sandin, unless you can prove that you endured unusually severe conditions in the SHU.[32] Finally, confinement under typical SHU conditions for thirty days or fewer probably will not give rise to a successful due process claim.

In addition to weighing the length of your confinement and the extent of your deprivation, courts also consider how frequently prisoners endure comparable periods of non-disciplinary SHU confinement to determine whether a particular period of segregation is "atypical." In other words, courts may compare your period of confinement with "periods of comparable deprivation typically endured by other prisoners in the ordinary course of prison administration" for non-disciplinary reasons.[33]

(ii) Extent of the Deprivation Compared to "Ordinary Incidents of Prison Life"

Courts will compare the extent of the hardship that you suffered in disciplinary or administrative segregation to the hardships that prisoners regularly endure as "ordinary incidents of prison life."[34] The Second Circuit has explained that, under Sandin, a prisoner does not have a due process claim if other prisoners typically experience approximately the same hardship as a result of ordinary prison administration.[35] Although there is some dispute about the meaning of "ordinary incidents of prison life,"[36] courts accept comparisons between the conditions that you experienced in the SHU to the conditions that the general population experiences at the prison in which you are housed.[37] Thus, to constitute an "atypical and

---

31. See Colon v. Howard, 215 F.3d 227, 231 (2d Cir. 2000); see also Beckford v. Portuondo, 151 F. Supp. 2d 204, 219 (N.D.N.Y. 2001) (holding plaintiff's confinement, which lasted less than a week, was not sufficiently atypical to implicate a protected liberty interest); Prince v. Edwards, No. 99 Civ. 8650 (DC), 2000 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 6608, at *16 (S.D.N.Y. May 17, 2000) (unpublished) (dismissing procedural due process claim because the prisoner did not allege that the conditions of his 66-day confinement constituted an atypical or significant hardship under Sandin); Jones v. Kelly, 937 F. Supp. 200, 202–03 (W.D.N.Y. 1996) (concluding that the prisoner's 191 days in segregated confinement did not impose an atypical and significant hardship, but that "[t]he length of SHU confinement is not necessarily dispositive of whether a liberty interest is implicated"); Tulloch v. Coughlin, No. 91-CV-0211E(M), 1995 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 19624, at *9 (W.D.N.Y. Dec. 28, 1995) (unpublished) (holding that the prisoner's 180-day disciplinary segregation in SHU did not represent a due process violation, because the conditions of the SHU segregation did not "present an atypical or significant hardship in relation to the normal incidents of prison life"); Carter v. Carriero, 905 F. Supp. 99, 104 (W.D.N.Y. 1995) (finding that the prisoner's 270 days in a SHU did not violate a protected liberty interest, because the nature of the deprivation did not impose "atypical and significant hardship on the inmate in relation to the ordinary incidents of prison life").

32. See Sealey v. Giltner, 197 F.3d 578, 589–90 (2d Cir. 1999) (holding that a prisoner's 101 day confinement under standard SHU conditions did not constitute an "atypical and significant" deprivation under Sandin). But see Colon v. Howard, 215 F.3d 227, 232 n.5 (2d Cir. 2000) (noting that confinement for periods of 101 days or less "could be shown on a record more fully developed than the one in Sealey to constitute an atypical and severe hardship under Sandin"); Welch v. Bartlett, 196 F.3d 389, 394 (2d Cir. 1999) (holding the prisoner's 90-day confinement in a SHU may be "atypical and significant" if the deprivation that the prison suffered "was more serious than typically endured by prisoners as an ordinary incident of prison life").

33. Scott v. Coughlin, 78 F. Supp. 2d 299, 307 (S.D.N.Y. 2000) (noting that "[a]long with duration, the Court must examine the frequency with which inmates are confined to SHU in the ordinary course of the prison administration"); see also Colon v. Howard, 215 F.3d 227, 231 (2d Cir. 2000) (holding that 305 days in SHU confinement is atypical under Sandin, because New York could not show that a 305-day confinement was comparable with that "typically endured by other prisoners in the ordinary course of prison administration"); Brooks v. DiFasi, 112 F.3d 46, 49 (2d Cir. 1997) (holding that, while New York prison regulations allow for lengthy administrative confinement, these regulations do not necessarily mean that lengthy disciplinary confinement is compatible with due process, and that after Sandin "a court must examine the specific circumstances of the punishment").

34. Sandin v. Conner, 515 U.S. 472, 484, 115 S. Ct. 2293, 2300, 132 L. Ed. 2d 418, 430 (1995).

35. Sandin v. Conner, 515 U.S. 472, 486, 115 S. Ct. 2293, 2301, 132 L. Ed. 2d 418, 430 (1995).

36. See Sealey v. Giltner, 197 F.3d 578, 588–89 (2d Cir. 1999) (noting unresolved questions about: (1) whether the "ordinary incidents of prison life" requirement asks courts to compare SHU conditions to the conditions within administrative confinement or to the conditions within the general population, and (2) whether the "ordinary incidents of prison life" requirement asks courts to compare SHU conditions to those conditions within the particular prison, to prison conditions across the state, or to prison conditions nationwide).

37. See, e.g., Sealey v. Giltner, 197 F.3d 578, 589 (2d Cir. 1999) (finding on appeal, that the prisoner's trial evidence was sufficient, when he only compared the conditions of his SHU confinement to the conditions among the general population within his particular prison); Welch v. Bartlett, 196 F.3d 389, 394 (2d Cir. 1999) (comparing the conditions of a prisoner's SHU segregation to the deprivation that other prisoners endure in the ordinary course of prison administration); Giano v. Kelly, No. 89-CV-727(C), 2000 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 9138, at *17 (W.D.N.Y. May 16, 2000) (unpublished) (comparing the conditions that the prisoner faced in administrative segregation to the typical conditions substantial deprivation," your hardships in the SHU must be "substantially more grave" than those hardships that you would ordinarily experience as a member of the general prison population.[38]

Like the duration of you confinement, courts have not determined a strict rule to determine when your deprivations in a SHU are "substantially grave" enough to be "atypical and significant." Rather, the court will consider various factors to determine whether the deprivation that you suffered violates the Due Process Clause. For example, in a case heard in the Southern District of New York, Giano v. Kelly, the court noted significant differences between conditions in the SHU and conditions in the general population, including:

(1) Significantly greater isolation;
(2) Absence of organized, meaningful activity, such as job assignments, vocational training, or classroom instruction; and
(3) Lack of social and recreational activity, such as drug and alcohol counseling, religious services, group meals, or group exercise.[39]

The Giano court found several additional distinctions between conditions in the SHU and conditions in the general population. SHU prisoners were confined to their cells for twenty-three hours per day, with one hour of daily exercise in a separate, slightly larger cell without any equipment. Additionally, SHU prisoners were only permitted two showers per week, one non-legal visit per week, and no telephone calls (except in the an emergency and with prison officials' permission). Finally, the Giano court considered the prisoner's testimony that his cell was ten feet by ten feet in size, often dirty, and usually dark, because the windows were covered to prevent eye contact with the other prisoners when they were outside.[40]

The fact that prisoners in the general population occasionally experience deprivations similar to what you experienced in SHU does not mean that you do not have a due process claim.[41] The Giano court reasoned that, while general population prisoners under "lock-down" are subject to conditions similar to those in SHU, the duration and extent of SHU "inactivity or cell confinement, long-term isolation and idleness are far less typical outside of SHU."[42] This type of analysis, which considers the conditions of segregation and the length of time of confinement, appears to be typical of what courts in the Second Circuit have been doing in recent years.[43]

It is important to remember that the length of time you are in administrative or disciplinary segregation is one of two factors the court will consider when comparing your detention to the ordinary incidents of that the prison's general population endured).

---

38. Sandin v. Conner, 515 U.S. 472, 486, 115 S. Ct. 2293, 2301, 132 L. Ed. 2d 418, 430 (1995); see also Welch v. Bartlett, 196 F.3d 389, 392 (2d Cir. 1999) (finding that, after Sandin, a prisoner who experiences a deprivation under mandatory state regulations does not have a federal due process claim if other prisoners in the prison's general population typically experience approximately the same deprivation in the ordinary administration of the prison); Frazier v. Coughlin, 81 F.3d 313, 317 (2d Cir. 1996) (holding that when a prisoner was confined in the SHU for 12 days while awaiting the disposition of disciplinary proceedings, his due process rights were not violated, despite the fact that the prisoner was denied certain privileges because the conditions of his confinement were not prohibited by law).

39. Giano v. Kelly, No. 89-CV-727(C), 2000 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 9138, at *18–20 (W.D.N.Y. May 16, 2000) (unpublished).

40. Giano v. Kelly, No. 89-CV-727(C), 2000 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 9138, at *18–21 (W.D.N.Y. May 16, 2000) (unpublished).

41. Giano v. Kelly, No. 89-CV-727(C), 2000 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 9138, at *21 (W.D.N.Y. May 16, 2000) (unpublished).

42. Giano v. Kelly, No. 89-CV-727(C), 2000 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 9138, at *21 (W.D.N.Y. May 16, 2000) (unpublished).

43. See, e.g., LaBounty v. Kinkhabwala, No. 99-0329, 2001 U.S. App. LEXIS 1696, at *6–7, 2 F. App'x. 197, 201 (2d Cir. Feb. 5, 2001) (unpublished) (instructing the district court to compare both the specific conditions of the prisoner's disciplinary segregation and the duration to the conditions of other categories of confinement); Vaughan v. Erno, No. 00-264, 2001 U.S. App. LEXIS 10585, at *3, 8 F.App'x 145, 146 (2d Cir. May 18, 2001) (unpublished) (finding no due process violation where the prisoner failed to allege any adverse conditions of the confinement other than its duration); Sealey v. Giltner, 197 F.3d 578, 587–89 (2d Cir. 1999) (finding that plaintiff's 101-day confinement in administrative segregation did not impair a protected liberty interest since the confinement was not of such duration and in such conditions as to meet the Sandin atypicality standard); Welch v. Bartlett, 196 F.3d 389, 394 (2d Cir. 1999) (holding that the relevant comparison concerning duration is between the period of deprivation endured by the plaintiff and periods of comparable deprivation typically endured by other prisoners in the ordinary course of prison administration); Nicholas v. Tucker, 95 Civ. 9705, 2000 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 749, at *13–14 (S.D.N.Y. Jan. 27, 2000) (unpublished) (holding that in determining whether a confinement constitutes an atypical and significant hardship, courts should consider the effect of the segregation on the length of the plaintiff's prison confinement, the extent to which conditions differ from other prison conditions, and the duration of the disciplinary confinement compared to the potential duration of discretionary confinement). All of these cases compared the individual experience of the prisoner in the SHU under the conditions imposed by applicable regulations to experiences of the general prison population.

prison life. Thus, if you wish to bring a claim that your due process rights were violated when you were confined in administrative or disciplinary segregation for a period of less than 305 days, it is recommended that you present any and all available evidence of the conditions of the SHU, any evidence of psychological effects of prolonged confinement in isolated conditions, and the specific amount of times you have been placed in SHU confinements of varying durations.[44] Your own testimony may be considered by the court, but it is recommended that you obtain and submit other, independent evidence about the conditions of your detention as well.

2. Transfers

The due process analysis is often triggered when a prisoner is transferred from one facility to another. Although the Supreme Court has concluded that you do not have a protected liberty interest in remaining at a specific prison,[45] you do have a claim if prison authorities transfer you in retaliation for exercising your constitutional rights.[46]

You also do not have a recognized liberty interest in remaining in a specific prison when you are transferred to a new prison that maintains a different level of security.[47] For example, a discretionary transfer from a minimum security prison to a medium security prison is not a disruption that exceeds the ordinary disruptions of prison life.[48] Likewise, courts may view transfers from the general population to maximum security as "within the normal limits or range of custody which the conviction" has authorized the state to impose, even when the conditions in maximum security are much more burdensome.[49] The frequency of transfers between prisons will not change this analysis.[50]

The courts' reasoning in the context of transfers also applies to deportation. It is settled that you do not have a protected liberty interest in avoiding deportation, despite the fact that you may be subjected to less humane conditions in the United States than you would have faced in your home country's prisons.[51]

---

44. See, e.g., Colon v. Howard, 215 F.3d 227, 232 (2d Cir. 1999) (recommending to the district courts that this information would be helpful in evaluating on appeal whether segregation is atypical and significant); see also Taylor v. Rodriguez, 238 F.3d 188, 195 (2d Cir. 2001) (reinforcing the finding in Colon that a "fully developed record" along with the length of confinement would be helpful in determining atypicality); Sealey v. Giltner, 197 F.3d 578, 589 (2d Cir. 1999) (noting evidence of "conditions of administrative confinement at other New York prisons, as well as the frequency and duration of confinements imposing significant hardships, might well be relevant to a prisoner's liberty claim").

45. See Meachum v. Fano, 427 U.S. 215, 224–25, 96 S. Ct. 2532, 2538–39, 49 L. Ed. 2d 451, 459–60 (1976) (holding that the "Due Process Clause [does not] in and of itself protect a duly convicted prisoner against transfer from one institution to another within the state prison system," such that a transfer within a state is within the normal range of custody), rehearing denied, Meachum v. Fano, 429 U.S. 873, 97 S. Ct. 191, 50 L. Ed. 2d 155 (1976); Olim v. Wakinekona, 461 U.S. 238, 247, 103 S. Ct. 1741, 1746, 75 L. Ed. 2d 813, 821 (1983) (transfer for confinement in another state is within the normal range of custody). But see Vitek v. Jones, 445 U.S. 480, 494, 100 S. Ct. 1254, 1264, 63 L. Ed. 2d 552, 555–56 (1980) (transfer to a mental hospital is not within the normal range of custody).

46. See Merriweather v. Coughlin, 879 F.2d 1037, 1046 (2d Cir. 1989) (holding that a jury could reasonably conclude that prisoners were transferred solely because they exercised their 1st Amendment rights, and thus had a valid claim, where the prisoners were transferred after critiquing the prison administration).

47. See Moorman v. Thalacker, 83 F.3d 970, 973 (8th Cir. 1996) (holding that discretionary transfer of prisoner from minimum to medium security prison, as a result of disciplinary action, was not a disruption exceeding ordinary incidents of prison life and, thus, did not implicate a due process liberty interest); Keenan v. Hall, 83 F.3d 1083, 1089 (9th Cir. 1996) (noting the standard for determining whether a prisoner had a protected liberty interest in prison transfer depends on whether conditions at the facility to which a prisoner was transferred imposed significant and atypical hardship).

48. See Moorman v. Thalacker, 83 F.3d 970, 973 (8th Cir. 1996) ("[S]uch assignments are discretionary, so long as they are not done for prohibited or invidious reasons.").

49. Meachum v. Fano, 427 U.S. 215, 225, 96 S. Ct. 2532, 2538–39, 49 L. Ed. 2d 451, 459 (1976) (concluding transfer to prison with more severe rules does not in itself signify a 14th Amendment liberty interest violation).

50. See Maguire v. Coughlin, 901 F. Supp. 101, 106 (N.D.N.Y. 1995) (asserting transfer of prisoner between four different correctional facilities in the span of three weeks did not implicate a protected liberty interest).

51. See Marshall v. Reno, 915 F. Supp. 426, 431–32 (D.D.C. 1996) (stating that it was beyond the authority of the courts to order where a defendant (in this case, a Canadian) is to be incarcerated, because this is the role of the Bureau of Prisons); see also Meachum v. Fano, 427 U.S. 215, 224, 96 S. Ct. 2532, 2538, 49 L. Ed. 2d 451, 459 (1976) ("The initial decision to assign the convict to a particular institution is not subject to audit under the Due Process Clause, although the degree of confinement in one prison may be quite different from that in another.").

3. Good-Time Credits

Good-time credits alone do not create a protected liberty interest.[52] In order to sustain a claim that you have a liberty interest, that interest must be created by the state.[53] For example, in Reynolds v. Wolff, a Nevada statute provided for the accumulation of good-time credits "unless the prisoner ha[d] committed serious misbehavior."[54] The court found that this statute, since it offered a "right of 'real substance'" by providing good-time credits, gave rise to a liberty interest falling under the due process analysis.[55] Finding prisoners guilty of "serious misbehavior" will result in the loss of the prisoner's good-time credits. Therefore, before Nevada prisons find prisoners guilty, the prisoners must be given a notice of the charges against them and an opportunity to be heard.[56]

The opportunity to earn good-time credits, however, does not create a protected liberty interest.[57] For example, in Luken v. Scott,[58] the prisoner was confined to administrative segregation and was, therefore, unable to receive additional good-time credits which would have accelerated his eligibility for parole. Still, the court found no liberty interest in his custody status because the "loss of opportunity to earn good-time credits ... is an [unsure] consequence of administrative decisions [that] do not create constitutionally protected liberty interests."[59] Similarly, in Bulger v. U.S. Bureau of Prisons, the loss of a prison job did not involve the prisoner's liberty interest even though the prisoner lost the ability to automatically accrue good-time credits as a result.[60]

The Supreme Court case of Edwards v. Balisok has major implications for prisoner claims involving loss of good-time credits.[61] According to that case, if a prisoner wants to bring a federal Section 1983 claim that questions the actual results of a hearing involving good-time credit issues (and not simply the procedures), he must first have that disciplinary hearing reversed in state court.[62] The application of the Edwards standard varies greatly. The Second Circuit, for instance, has interpreted Edwards as applying only to good-time credit cases.[63] The Seventh Circuit and some district courts, however, have read the case as broadly requiring an administrative or court reversal in all disciplinary or even administrative segregation cases before a prisoner can bring a damages action.[64] See JLM Chapter 35, "Getting Out Early: Conditional & Early Release," for more information about good-time credits.

---

52. See Wolff v. McDonnell, 418 U.S. 539, 557, 94 S. Ct. 2963, 2975, 41 L. Ed. 2d 935, 951 (1974) (holding actual restoration of good-time credits could not be handled in a civil rights suit—habeas corpus was the proper remedy—but declaratory judgment regarding good-time withdrawal procedures, as a predicate to a damage award, was not barred).

53. See Wolff v. McDonnell, 418 U.S. 539, 557, 94 S. Ct. 2963, 2975, 41 L. Ed. 2d 935, 951 (1974); see also Leacock v. DuBois, 937 F. Supp. 81, 83–84 (D. Mass. 1996) (holding a prisoner may not be divested of a state-created right to good-time credit without a minimum of due process, including written notice of claimed violations, qualified right to call witnesses and present evidence, and written statement of fact-finders as to evidence relied upon and reasons for action).

54. Reynolds v. Wolff, 916 F. Supp. 1018, 1023 (D. Nev. 1996).

55. Reynolds v. Wolff, 916 F. Supp. 1018, 1023 (D. Nev. 1996); see also Zamakshari v. Dvoskin, 899 F. Supp. 1097, 1106–07 (S.D.N.Y. 1995) (loss of good time constitutes protected liberty interest in New York under Sandin).

56. See Reynolds v. Wolff, 916 F. Supp. 1018, 1023 (D. Nev. 1996).

57. See Luken v. Scott, 71 F.3d 192, 193 (5th Cir. 1995).

58. Luken v. Scott, 71 F.3d 192, 193 (5th Cir. 1995).

59. Luken v. Scott, 71 F.3d 192, 193 (5th Cir. 1995) (alterations in original).

60. Bulger v. U.S. Bureau of Prisons, 65 F.3d 48, 50 (5th Cir. 1995); see also Rivera v. Coughlin, No. 92 CIV 3404, 1996 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 560, at *17 (S.D.N.Y. Jan. 22, 1996) (unpublished) (holding no protected liberty interest existed where loss of good-time credit under New York regulations was a recommendation and, therefore, only tentative).

61. Edwards v. Balisok, 520 U.S. 641, 117 S. Ct. 1584 (1997); see also Rivera v. Coughlin, No. 92 CIV 3404, 1996 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 560, at *9 (S.D.N.Y. Jan. 22, 1996) (unpublished) (finding no protected liberty interest existed where loss of good-time credit under New York regulations was a recommendation and, therefore, only tentative).

62. Edwards v. Balisok, 520 U.S. 641, 647–48, 117 S. Ct. 1584, 1588–89, 137 L. Ed. 2d 906, 914–915 (1997); Interview with Kenneth Stephens, Esq., The Legal Aid Society, Prisoners' Rights Project, in N.Y., N.Y. (Oct. 22, 1999).

63. See Jackson v. Johnson, 15 F. Supp. 2d 341, 360 (S.D.N.Y. 1998) (holding that where prisoner had not lost good-time credits and was not otherwise challenging the fact or duration of his confinement, he could use a § 1983 suit rather than habeas corpus to make a due process challenge to a disciplinary hearing); see also Brown v. Plaut, 131 F.3d 163, 166 (D.C. Cir. 1997) (finding that a former prisoner who brought a § 1983 action seeking damages for being placed in administrative segregation without due process was not required to raise the claim via writ of habeas corpus).

64. See Stone-Bey v. Barnes, 120 F.3d 718, 722 (7th Cir. 1997) (holding that prisoner's § 1983 claim that disciplinary segregation violated due process was barred because disciplinary judgment had not been overturned and claim would necessarily imply its invalidity).

4. Work Release Programs

The Supreme Court has been reluctant to find that a liberty interest may arise from the Due Process Clause, even without a state statute creating one, when the prisoner's "release from institutional life altogether" has been revoked.[65] But some lower courts have interpreted this restriction broadly enough to find an inherent liberty interest arising from the Due Process Clause "when a person has substantial, albeit conditional, freedom, such as when he is on probation or parole."[66] The standard used by courts to determine whether "substantial freedom" exists is whether the work release program in question is more similar to release from incarceration or whether it remains more similar to institutional life.[67] In fact, one court has proposed that parole and work release should be viewed on a scale, with a liberty interest existing when the program more closely resembles parole.[68]

The deciding factor for whether you have been "release[d] from institutional life altogether" is where you live on a full-time basis. In Edwards v. Lockhart, the court found that a work release program participant had a protected liberty interest because she no longer lived in an institution but lived in the community.[69] In Roucchio v. Coughlin, however, the court found no inherent liberty interest in continued placement in a work release program where the participant was on "5" and "2" status (spent five nights a week at home and two at the institution), held a full-time job, lived at home with his mother, and reported twice a week to the institution to sleep over and meet with his counselor.[70] In this case, the court found that "although the [prisoner] 'did enjoy some conditional liberty while participating in the work release program, he had not been released from institutional life altogether.'"[71]

Even if you do not have an inherent (absolute) liberty interest under the Due Process Clause, you may still have a state-created liberty interest in a work release program. Although it is settled that you do not have a state-created liberty interest in the initial determination of whether you may participate in a work release program,[72] in some states removal from a work release program does constitute an "atypical and significant hardship" under the Sandin analysis.[73] In New York, for example, it is settled that "the removal

---

65. See Hewitt v. Helms, 459 U.S. 460, 468, 103 S. Ct. 864, 870, 74 L. Ed. 2d 675, 686 (1983) (finding that neither parole nor good-time are interests that enjoy independent protection under the Due Process Clause). More recently, the Supreme Court has overruled this line of reasoning in Sandin, though the Court declined to actually overturn the Hewitt holding itself.

66. Callender v. Sioux City Residential Treatment Facility, 88 F.3d 666, 668 (8th Cir. 1996) (asserting that work release program did not give rise to liberty interest inherent in Due Process Clause itself and that there was no state-created liberty interest because revocation of prisoner's work release program was not atypical or significant deprivation in relation to ordinary prison life).

67. See Callender v. Sioux City Residential Treatment Facility, 88 F.3d 666, 668 (8th Cir. 1996) (finding the work release program in question "did not provide the sort of substantial freedom that gives rise to a liberty interest" because it "was more analogous to institutional life than it was to probation or parole").

68. See Harper v. Young, 64 F.3d 563, 566–67 (10th Cir. 1995) (citing Edwards v. Lockhart, 908 F.2d 299, 302–03 (8th Cir. 1990)) ("[A] prisoner release program which permits a convict to exist, albeit conditionally, in society on a full-time basis more closely resembles parole or probation than even the more permissive forms of institutional confinement.").

69. Edwards v. Lockhart, 908 F.2d 299, 302 (8th Cir. 1990); see also U.S. v. Stephenson, 928 F.2d 728, 732 (6th Cir. 1991) (finding inherent liberty interest in continued placement in supervised release program allowing convicts to live in society).

70. Roucchio v. Coughlin, 923 F. Supp. 360, 369 (E.D.N.Y. 1996).

71. Roucchio v. Coughlin, 923 F. Supp. 360, 369 (E.D.N.Y. 1996) (quoting Whitehorn v. Harrelson, 758 F.2d 1416, 1421 (11th Cir. 1985)).

72. See Roucchio v. Coughlin, 923 F. Supp. 360, 371 n.3 (E.D.N.Y. 1996) (stating that "a New York prisoner has no state-created liberty interest in the initial determination" about participation in a work release program in a case about revocation of work release privileges); see also Greenholtz v. Prisoners of Nebraska Penal and Correctional Complex, 442 U.S. 1, 9, 99 S. Ct. 2100, 2105, 60 L. Ed. 2d 668, 676 (1979) ("There is a crucial distinction between being deprived of a liberty one has ... and being denied a conditional liberty that one desires."); Lee v. Governor of the State of N.Y., 87 F.3d 55, 58 (2d Cir. 1996) (holding that since prisoners had not previously participated in work release program, new rules rendering him ineligible for such programs did not give rise to a liberty interest); Whitehorn v. Harrelson, 758 F.2d 1416, 1422 (11th Cir. 1985) (determination of initial placement in work release program, and removal of prisoner from such program, present different inquiries).

73. See Roucchio v. Coughlin, 923 F. Supp. 360, 374–75 (E.D.N.Y. 1996) (where prisoner removed from work release program after 15 months, the "revocation of [his] conditional freedom" gave rise to a liberty interest). But see Dominique v. Weld, 73 F.3d 1156, 1160 (1st Cir. 1996) (finding no liberty interest implicated when prisoner was removed from work release program in which he participated for almost four years; although "return from the quasi-freedom of

of a prisoner from a work release program in which he has been gainfully employed imposes an atypical, significant hardship upon the prisoner relative to the ordinary incidents of prison life."[74] The Second Circuit recently set out the process required before a participant may be removed from temporary work release:

(1) Written notice of the alleged violation of the program's rules or conditions;
(2) A statement of the actual reason for consideration of the prisoner's removal from work release;
(3) A report or summary of the evidence against him or her;
(4) An opportunity to be heard and to present evidence;
(5) Advance notice of a temporary release committee hearing;
(6) The right to confront and cross-examine adverse witnesses;
(7) A TRC (temporary release committee) composed of neutral decision makers; and
(8) A post-hearing written account of the actual reason for removal and a summary of the evidence supporting that reason.[75]
(9) Additionally, removal from a temporary work release program does not meet due process requirements "unless the findings of the [temporary release committee] are supported by some evidence in the record."[76]

5. Parole

You do not have an inherent liberty interest in obtaining parole.[77] The Constitution does, however, give rise to a protected liberty interest when your parole has been revoked.[78]

Although a liberty interest in obtaining parole does not arise from the Constitution, you have a protected liberty interest when a parole statute creates an expectation of parole.[79] The existence of an "expectation of parole" varies from state to state and depends on whether the statute contains mandatory language creating such an expectation.[80] For example, if a statute contains language such as "shall" or "unless," such an expectation may exist.[81] work release to the regimentation of life within four walls" may have been a significant deprivation, it was not atypical); Hamilton v. Peters, 919 F. Supp. 1168, 1172 (N.D. Ill. 1996) (finding no liberty interest under Sandin when prisoner was removed from work release in a disciplinary transfer).

---

74. Quartararo v. Catterson, 917 F. Supp. 919, 940 (E.D.N.Y. 1996) (affirming the "continued vitality of Tracy [v. Salamack] in light of Sandin"). Tracy v. Salamack, 572 F.2d 393, 396 (2d Cir. 1978) (holding that the State of New York, in establishing the Temporary Release Program, created a liberty interest that may not be terminated without an individualized due process hearing). In Anderson v. Recore, 317 F.3d 194 (2d Cir. 2003), the Second Circuit concluded that the Supreme Court in Sandin, by affirming the validity of Morrissey v. Brewer, 408 U.S. 471, 92 S. Ct. 2593, 33 L. Ed. 2d 484 (1972) and Meachum v. Fano, 427 U.S. 215, 96 S. Ct. 2532, 49 L. Ed. 2d 451 (1976), implicitly affirmed by Tracy v. Salamack, 572 F.2d 393, because Tracy explicitly rests upon Morrissey and Meachum. But see Duffy v. Selsky, No. 95 CIV 0474, 1996 WL 407225, at *11 (S.D.N.Y. Jul. 18, 1996) (unpublished) (holding no liberty interest in admission to the Temporary Release Program).

75. Tracy v. Salamack, 572 F.2d 393, 396 (2d Cir. 1978) (defining the circumstances under which removal would be proper after a due process hearing).

76. Friedl v. City of N.Y., 210 F.3d 79, 85 (2d Cir. 2000) (quoting Superintendent, Mass. Corr. Inst. v. Hill, 472 U.S. 445, 454, 105 S. Ct. 2768, 2773, 86 L. Ed. 2d 356, 364 (1985)).

77. See Bd. of Pardons v. Allen, 482 U.S. 369, 373, 107 S. Ct. 2415, 2418, 96 L. Ed. 2d 303, 309–10 (1987) (citing Greenholtz v. Prisoners of Neb. Penal and Corr. Complex, 442 U.S. 1, 11, 99 S. Ct. 2100, 2106, 60 L. Ed. 2d 668, 677–78 (1979)) (stating that "the presence of a parole system by itself does not give rise to a constitutionally protected liberty interest in parole release"); see also Bowser v. Vose, 968 F.2d 105, 106 (1st Cir. 1992) (holding that there is no liberty interest in continuing to participate in furlough).

78. See Morrissey v. Brewer, 408 U.S. 471, 485–88, 92 S. Ct. 2593, 2602–04, 33 L. Ed. 2d 484, 496–98 (1972) (holding that minimum due process requirements for parole revocation include preliminary hearing to determine probable cause "as promptly as convenient after arrest," as well as revocation hearing).

79. See Bd. of Pardons v. Allen, 482 U.S. 369, 376–78, 107 S. Ct. 2415, 2420–21, 96 L. Ed. 2d 303, 311–13 (1987) (finding the Montana statute, which includes mandatory language, "creates a liberty interest in parole release"). This remains true even under Sandin. See Wilson v. Kelkhoff, 86 F.3d 1438, 1446 n.9 (7th Cir. 1996) ("It appears that the Court [in Sandin] intended to leave undisturbed the cases holding that a protectable liberty interest exists in parole statutes that create an 'expectancy of release.'"); Ellis v. Dist. of Columbia, 84 F.3d 1413, 1417–18, 318 U.S. App. D.C. 39 (D.C. Cir. 1996) (noting that Sandin did not overrule Greenholtz v. Prisoners of Neb. Penal and Correctional Complex or Board of Pardons v. Allen, and holding that liberty interest in parole stems from state parole statutes).

80. See, e.g., Watson v. DiSabato, 933 F. Supp. 390, 394 (D.N.J. 1996) (New Jersey parole statute creates a sufficient expectation of parole eligibility to give rise to liberty interest); Allison v. Kyle, 66 F.3d 71, 73–74 (5th Cir. 1995) (no state-created liberty interest in parole procedures in Texas); Harper v. Young, 64 F.3d 563, 564–65 (10th Cir. 1995), aff'd, 520 U.S. 143, 117 S. Ct. 1148, 137 L. Ed. 2d 270 (1997) (declining to address whether state-created liberty

Generally, confinement in either administrative or disciplinary segregation that may also affect your parole opportunities does not give rise to a protected liberty interest under Sandin.[82] Therefore, even if your release date has been postponed because you have spent time in segregation, you still do not have a liberty interest at stake when you are initially charged with a violation.

D. Prisoners' Basic Rights in Disciplinary Procedures

In Wolff v. McDonnell,[83] the Supreme Court described how prison disciplinary procedures should be conducted in order to comply with constitutional due process requirements. The due process safeguards for disciplinary action described below do not apply to your placement in administrative segregation. The procedural requirements for administrative segregation are described in Part F of this Chapter. If you have suffered a deprivation of a recognized liberty interest, such as a loss of good-time credits or some similarly severe punishment, this Part will provide a detailed explanation of the Wolff due process rights you can assert to defend yourself at your disciplinary proceeding or to challenge it on appeal in court. Once you establish that a disciplinary action was an atypical and significant hardship affecting a protected liberty interest, the court then addresses "whether the deprivation of that liberty interest occurred without due process of law."[84] Even if the punishment you face is not severe enough to trigger due process, your prison regulations may state that certain disciplinary procedures must be followed. Prison officials are still required to follow their own rules.[85] Therefore, while you might not be able to appeal the outcome in federal court, you may still be able to file an administrative appeal within the prison system. In any case, you will have a better chance of success if you are familiar with the procedures that your prison provides and if you take advantage of them at your disciplinary hearing.

1. The Prison Must Publish Rules Governing Your Conduct

Although it was not discussed in Wolff, one of your most basic due process rights is that you generally cannot be punished for an act not prohibited by prison regulations unless that act violates state criminal laws. For example, in Richardson v. Coughlin,[86] prison officials disciplined a prisoner for circulating a petition without their authorization. The court in that case ruled in favor of the prisoner, stating that the punishment violated due process because none of the prison's rules required prisoners to seek official authorization before circulating petitions.[87] Therefore, it was unfair to punish the prisoner for an activity that he reasonably believed the prison allowed. The Supreme Court described this principle of fairness in interest remained in Oklahoma parole revocation proceedings after Sandin, but holding that "program participation is sufficiently similar to parole or probation to merit protection by the Due Process Clause itself"); Clarkson v. Coughlin, 898 F. Supp. 1019, 1040 (S.D.N.Y. 1995) (holding that the state-created limited protected liberty interest in New York parole proceedings extends as far as prisoner's right to be heard and right to know reasons for parole denial); Wilson v. Kelkhoff, 86 F.3d 1438, 1446 (7th Cir. 1996) (holding that the Illinois parole statute provides "for protectable liberty interest in release" for most prisoners).

---

81. See Watson v. DiSabato, 933 F. Supp. 390, 392–93 (D.N.J. 1996) (holding that mandatory language created "expectancy of release," and that Greenholtz and Allen remain good law after Sandin on the subject of liberty interest in parole); see Clarkson v. Coughlin, 898 F. Supp. 1019, 1040 (S.D.N.Y. 1995) ("Mandatory language in a state parole statute may create such an interest" in parole board proceedings).

82. See Meachum v. Fano, 427 U.S. 215, 229 n.8, 96 S. Ct. 2532, 2540 n.8, 49 L. Ed. 2d 451, 462 n.8 (1976) (noting that possible effect on parole decision does not create liberty interest); Haff v. Cooke, 923 F. Supp. 1104, 1119 (E.D. Wis. 1996) (citing Sandin v. Conner, 515 U.S. 472, 487, 115 S. Ct. 2293, 2302, 132 L. Ed. 2d 418, 431–32 (1995)) (noting that a disciplinary violation that may "later affect a parole decision does not implicate a liberty interest because prisoner's disciplinary record is only one of many criteria used to determine parole").

83. Wolff v. McDonnell, 418 U.S. 539, 94 S. Ct. 2963, 41 L. Ed. 2d 935 (1974).

84. Sealey v. Giltner, 116 F.3d 47, 51–52 (2d Cir. 1997) (quoting Bedoya v. Coughlin, 91 F.3d 349, 351–52 (2d Cir. 1996)) (finding that plaintiff must be given opportunity to develop facts relevant to establishing a liberty interest because the plaintiff had no notice that the lower court intended to consider dismissal of his complaint based on the absence of a liberty interest).

85. See Uzzell v. Scully, 893 F. Supp. 259, 263 n.10 (S.D.N.Y. 1995) (finding that though a prisoner's treatment did not amount to a deprivation of his right to due process, the prisoner remained free to raise a claim of procedural error on the ground that the State failed to adhere to its own rule requiring a prisoner to be given 24-hour notice of charges filed against him that resulted in his administrative segregation).

86. Richardson v. Coughlin, 763 F. Supp. 1228 (S.D.N.Y. 1991).

87. Richardson v. Coughlin, 763 F. Supp. 1228, 1235 (S.D.N.Y. 1991).

Grayned v. City of Rockford,[88] stating that "because we assume that man is free to steer between lawful and unlawful conduct, we insist that laws give the person of ordinary intelligence a reasonable opportunity to know what is prohibited, so that he may act accordingly."[89]

Prison officials may also be violating your right to due process when they punish you for conduct that is prohibited only by vague (unclear) regulations. For example, a federal court in Ohio struck down as unconstitutionally vague a regulation that prohibited "objectionable" conduct between a prisoner and his or her visitor.[90] The word "objectionable" was considered vague because it can mean different things to different people. To meet the standard of due process, the regulation should spell out exactly what type of conduct qualifies as "objectionable." A regulation can also be found vague as applied to your particular case. In Rios v. Lane,[91] the court found a regulation that prohibited "engaging or pressuring others to engage in gang activities" unconstitutionally vague when it was applied to a prisoner who allegedly shared information about Spanish-language political radio stations. In other words, a regulation that is not vague when you read it may be considered vague in your particular situation if it is used to punish you for an activity that is typically considered lawful.

Nevertheless, you are presumed to have knowledge of the penal law (criminal statutes). Therefore, you cannot claim that your rights have been violated if prison officials fail to post and distribute copies of your state's penal law.[92] As one court put it, "the law presumes that everyone knows the law, and ignorance of the law is no excuse for its violation."[93] You are also presumed to have knowledge of statewide rules of misbehavior if you have previously served time in another prison in New York and were provided with a copy of the statewide rules.[94]

Although you cannot be punished for violating a prison regulation that is temporarily posted on a bulletin board,[95] you can be punished if the regulation is posted permanently.[96] New York law requires that every prisoner be given a personal copy of the prison rules.[97] If required by the chief administrative officer of the prison, the prisoner must acknowledge in writing his receipt of the prison disciplinary handbook.[98] All

88. Grayned v. City of Rockford, 408 U.S. 104, 121, 92 S. Ct. 2294, 2306, 33 L. Ed. 2d 222, 235 (1972) (holding that anti-noise ordinance was not unconstitutionally vague or overbroad).

89. Grayned v. City of Rockford, 408 U.S. 104, 108, 92 S. Ct. 2294, 2298–99, 33 L. Ed. 2d 222, 227 (1972) (concluding that an anti-noise ordinance was not impermissibly vague because it was written specifically for its context, enabling the impact of prohibited disturbances to be easily measured, but an anti-picketing ordinance was found unconstitutional on equal protection grounds).

90. See Taylor v. Perini, 413 F. Supp. 189, 233–34 (N.D. Ohio 1976); see also Jenkins v. Werger, 564 F. Supp. 806, 807 (D. Wyo. 1983) (invalidating rule against "unruly or disorderly" conduct for vagueness); Laaman v. Helgemoe, 437 F. Supp. 269, 321–22 (D.N.H. 1977) (invalidating prison rule forbidding "poor conduct" for vagueness). But see El-Amin v. Tirey, 817 F. Supp. 694, 701 (W.D. Tenn. 1993) (holding that while due process requires certain minimum standards of specificity in prison regulations, it does not require the same degree of specificity that is required in criminal laws or in statutes that apply outside of prison), aff'd, 35 F.3d 565 (6th Cir. 1994).

91. Rios v. Lane, 812 F.2d 1032, 1037 (7th Cir. 1987); see also Adams v. Gunnell, 729 F.2d 362, 369–70 (5th Cir. 1984) (finding a regulation that prohibited "conduct which disrupts the orderly running of the institution" was unconstitutionally vague when used to punish a prisoner for writing and circulating a petition).

92. See McRae v. State, 157 S.E.2d 646, 648, 116 Ga. App. 407, 410 (Ga. Ct. App. 1967) (holding that prison is not required to inform every prisoner of consequences of escape or attempt to escape and failure to so inform prisoner did not render sentence for escape void).

93. McRae v. State, 157 S.E.2d 646, 648, 116 Ga. App. 407, 410 (Ga. Ct. App. 1967).

94. See Johnson v. Coughlin, 205 A.D.2d 537, 539, 613 N.Y.S.2d 192, 193 (2d Dept 1994) (holding that prisoner's due process rights were not violated by officials' failure to provide him with prisoner rule book in timely manner where prisoner had previously been incarcerated and received various manuals governing prisoner conduct at another facility).

95. See Taylor v. Perini, 413 F. Supp. 189, 235 (N.D. Ohio 1976) (finding that a prisoner manual did not adequately inform prisoners of prohibited conduct since the posting of regulations on a bulletin board does not constitute fair notice).

96. See Forbes v. Trigg, 976 F.2d 308, 314–15 (7th Cir. 1992) (finding that a prisoner had fair notice of a prison rule requiring urine tests since the posting of the rule was not temporary or transitory).

97. N.Y. Correct. Law § 138(2) (McKinney 2005).

98. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 9, § 7002.9(d) (2005).

regulations must be printed in both English and Spanish,[99] and the range of punishments for each type of violation must be clearly noted.[100]

If you do not have a copy of your prison's regulations, ask prison officials to give you one. If you do not understand English, or if you read Spanish better than English, ask for a copy of the regulations in Spanish.[101] If you are brought before a prison disciplinary board, remember that you generally cannot be punished for violating a rule that is not published in the prison regulations, nor can you be punished if you have not been issued a copy of the regulations.

2. Written Notice Requirement

Under Wolff v. McDonnell,[102] you have the right to receive notice of (know about) the charges against you at least twenty-four hours before your disciplinary hearing is scheduled to begin. An oral (spoken) explanation of the charges is not sufficient. The charges must be in writing, and they must be clear enough to allow you to prepare your defense.[103] At least one court has found that a prisoner was denied due process because although he was given notice twenty-four hours in advance, he was only allowed to review the actual written charges five hours in advance of his hearing.[104] With only five hours to study the twelve charges against him, the prisoner had to rely largely on his memory in gathering evidence and preparing his defense, putting him at a great disadvantage.[105] The purpose of the twenty-four hour notice requirement is to give prisoners a fair chance to prepare their defense by informing them of the specific nature of the charges.[106]

New York law also requires that prisoners receive written notice of the formal charges at least twenty-four hours before the hearing begins.[107] Unlike Wolff v. McDonnell, which did not require the notice to have a particular content,[108] New York regulations require notice to contain the date, time, place, and nature of the allegation (including particulars of the alleged misbehavior and the applicable rule allegedly violated),

---

99. N.Y. Correct. Law § 138(1) (McKinney 1987); see Burgos v. Kuhlmann, 137 Misc. 2d 1039, 1040, 523 N.Y.S.2d 367, 368 (Sup. Ct. Sullivan County 1987) (holding that disciplinary charges must be dismissed and the prisoner's record cleared on the ground that the Spanish-speaking prisoner did not have meaningful notice of prison rules where he was only provided with the English version of the rules).

100. N.Y. Correct. Law § 138(3) (McKinney 2005).

101. If you are incarcerated outside New York, the prison may not be required to provide you with a copy of the prison regulations. Copies may also be available in Spanish. Research the rules and regulations of your state to see if this is the case where you are incarcerated. See Chapter 2 of the JLM for information on conducting legal research.

102. Wolff v. McDonnell, 418 U.S. 539, 564, 94 S. Ct. 2963, 2979, 41 L. Ed. 2d 935, 956 (1974).

103. See Spellmon-Bey v. Lynaugh, 778 F. Supp. 338, 344 (E.D. Tex. 1991) (holding that prison disciplinary board could not, consistent with due process, rely solely on testimony of charging officer regarding hearsay statements of unidentified informer to support revocation of prisoner's good-time credit).

104. See Benitez v. Wolff, 985 F.2d 662, 665 (2d Cir. 1993) ("Although Wolff v. McDonnell did not state expressly that the inmate must be allowed to retain for 24 hours the written notice given him, we think this requirement is fairly inferred from the requirements that there be advance notice, that it be in writing, and that it be given to the inmate at least 24 hours in advance.").

105. Benitez v. Wolff, 985 F.2d 662, 665 (2d Cir. 1993).

106. See Wolff v. McDonnell, 418 U.S. 539, 564, 94 S. Ct. 2963, 2978, 41 L. Ed. 2d 955, 956 (1974) ("Part of the function of notice is to give the charged party a chance to marshal the facts in his defense and to clarify what the charges are, in fact."); see also McKinnon v. Patterson, 568 F.2d 930, 940 (2d Cir.1977), cert. denied, 434 U.S. 1087, 98 S. Ct. 1282, 55 L. Ed. 2d 792 (1978) (listing "inform[ing] the inmate of what he allegedly has done so that he can prepare a defense, if he chooses, to the specific charges set forth, based on whatever evidence he can muster, given the limited time available and the lack of an opportunity to interview or call witnesses" among the purposes of the notice requirement); Hameed v. Mann, 849 F. Supp. 169, 172 (N.D.N.Y. 1994) (holding that notice received by prisoner prior to disciplinary hearing was sufficient, but acknowledging that "a notice lacking the required specifics which fail to apprise the accused party of the charges brought against him must be found to be unconstitutional because then, the accused party cannot adequately prepare a defense").

107. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 253.6(a) (2000).

108. Wolff v. McDonnell, 418 U.S. 539, 563–65, 94 S. Ct. 2963, 2978–79, 41 L. Ed. 2d 955, 956 (1974) (holding advance written notice "of the charges against him" is required by due process but not providing details for the content of the notice). Some federal courts have created certain minimum standards. For example, in Spellmon-Bey v. Lynaugh, the court held that notice must contain at least a description of the specific acts upon which the charges are based, as well as the times that these acts allegedly occurred, unless it is an exceptional situation where the threat to prison security interests outweighs the prisoner's interests. Spellmon-Bey v. Lynaugh, 778 F. Supp. 338, 342–43 (E.D. Tex. 1991).

and, if more than one inmate was involved in the incident, the specific role played by each inmate.[109] The regulations also require that prison officials provide translations of the notice of the charges and statements of evidence to non-English speaking prisoners.[110] In addition, non-English speaking prisoners are entitled to have a translator present at the disciplinary hearing.[111] Similar accommodations must be made for prisoners who are deaf or hard of hearing.[112]

Prison staff should bring you a copy of the written charges or "ticket." Since you may not know exactly when the proceedings will be held, you should immediately begin preparing a defense, as outlined below.

3. "Substitute Counsel" (Employee Assistant)

In Baxter v. Palmigiano,[113] the Supreme Court held that prisoners do not have a right to either retained or appointed counsel at disciplinary proceedings. The Wolff Court did, however, recognize two circumstances in which you are entitled to a "counsel-substitute" (a phrase referring either to a prison employee or a fellow prisoner who assists you in the preparation of your case). First, the Court made an exception for illiterate prisoners, who must be given assistance in preparing their cases.[114] Second, the Court stated that all prisoners should be provided assistance where "the complexity of the issue makes it unlikely that the prisoner will be able to collect and present the evidence necessary for an adequate comprehension of the case."[115] The Court did not define "complexity." Therefore, it is unclear how complex the facts involved in the alleged violation must be before you can demand the aid of an employee assistant. If you face some clear personal barrier to preparing your defense (for example: illiteracy, language, mental illness, or restrictive confinement), your claim for assistance will be stronger, and you should raise that fact with prison officials.

The New York regulations governing employee assistants are slightly more expansive than the Wolff standard. The regulations guarantee an employee assistant for certain prisoners, including

(1) Non-English speaking prisoners;
(2) Illiterate prisoners;
(3) Prisoners who are deaf or hard-of-hearing (who may be provided with sign language interpreters);
(4) Prisoners who are charged with drug use as a result of urinalysis tests; and
(5) Prisoners confined to a special housing unit (SHU) pending a superintendent's hearing.[116]

In the case of non-English speaking prisoners, a court held a prisoner who spoke only Spanish was entitled to meet with a Spanish-speaking assistant at least twenty-four hours before the disciplinary hearing.[117] In the case of segregated prisoners, a court ruled a prisoner who is unable to adequately prepare his or her defense because he is confined in a SHU, or has been transferred to another prison, has a due process right to assistance.[118] In such situations, correction officers have an obligation to perform

---

109. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 251-3.1(c)(1992); see also Howard v. Coughlin, 190 A.D.2d 1090, 1090, 593 N.Y.S.2d 707, 708–09 (4th Dept 1993) (finding notice insufficient when it provided the wrong date for when the alleged misconduct occurred); McCleary v. LeFevre, 98 A.D.2d 866, 868, 470 N.Y.S.2d 841, 843–44 (3d Dept 1983) (finding notice was insufficient when it failed to inform prisoners of facts upon which charges were based). But see Vogelsang v. Coombe, 105 A.D.2d 913, 914, 482 N.Y.S.2d 348, 350 (3d Dept 1984) (referring to the disciplinary problem in question as the "incident" was sufficient notice where notice contained references to a "readily identifiable" event: a four-day riot, rule violations, and prisoner's offensive conduct).

110. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 254.2 (1997); see also Reyes v. Henderson, 121 Misc. 2d 970, 971–72, 469 N.Y.S.2d 520, 521 (Sup. Ct. Albany County 1983) (holding that Spanish-speaking prisoner was denied procedural due process where he was given notice of the charges against him in English only).

111. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 254.2 (1997).

112. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 254.2 (1997).

113. Baxter v. Palmigiano, 425 U.S. 308, 315, 96 S. Ct. 1551, 1556–67, 47 L. Ed. 2d 810, 819–20 (1976).

114. Wolff v. McDonnell, 418 U.S. 539, 570, 94 S. Ct. 2963, 2982, 41 L. Ed. 2d 935, 959 (1974).

115. Wolff v. McDonnell, 418 U.S. 539, 570, 94 S. Ct. 2963, 2982, 41 L. Ed. 2d 935, 959 (1974).

116. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 251-4.1(a) (1997).

117. Rivera v. Smith, 110 A.D.2d 1043, 1043–44, 489 N.Y.S.2d 131, 131 (4th Dept 1985). But see Valles v. Smith, 116 A.D.2d 1002, 1002, 498 N.Y.S.2d 623, 624 (4th Dept 1986) rev'd on other grounds Davidson v. Smith, 69 N.Y.2d 677, 504 N.E.2d 380, 512 N.Y.S.2d 13 (N.Y. Dec 18, 1986) (finding Spanish-speaking prisoner not entitled to have employee assistant translate for him at disciplinary proceeding just as English speakers are not entitled to the employee assistants' presence at the proceeding; translation assistance from Spanish-speaking prisoner was enough).

118. See Eng v. Coughlin, 858 F.2d 889, 898 (2d Cir. 1988) ("[A]n assigned assistant who does nothing to assist a disabled prisoner—one who is segregated from the general prison population—has failed to accord the prisoner his limited constitutional due process right of assistance.").

investigatory tasks that the prisoner would perform for himself were he able.[119] However, note that assistants are only required to answer questions you specifically ask, and to perform tasks you specifically request.[120] Finally, if you are entitled to an assistant, New York law requires your hearing take place no less than twenty-four hours after your initial meeting with that assistant.[121]

When you receive notice of the charges against you, you will be given a list of employees who serve as employee assistants.[122] You are entitled to choose an employee assistant from the list, but you might not get your first choice. If you are given someone whom you do not want as an employee assistant, inform that person that you object to the assignment.[123] If at the time of the hearing you are still not satisfied with your employee assistant, be sure to inform the hearing officer of your objection. It is important to realize that your failure to select an employee assistant from the available list may constitute a "waiver" of any right you have to assistance (meaning you would be considered to have given up your right to assistance).[124]

The employee assistant should assist you in preparing for the hearing by explaining the charges, interviewing witnesses, and helping you obtain documentary evidence or written statements.[125] However, do not expect the employee assistant to do anything that you do not specifically ask him or her to do.[126] You must ask for assistance. If you fail to make an affirmative request, you waive your right to assistance. For example, in Newman v. Coughlin, the prisoner made a general request for assistance from the law library staff, but did not specifically request that the employee assistant help him prepare his case.[127] As a result, the prisoner bore responsibility for his own lack of representation.

On the other hand, neither due process nor New York law requires that the assistant act as your advocate the way a lawyer would, or even that the assistant be present at your hearing.[128] However, due process does require that your assigned assistant carry out basic, reasonable, and non-disruptive requests.[129] For example, one court held that an employee assistant's refusal to collect necessary and available evidence violated the prisoner's due process rights.[130] Another court held that an employee assistant, who did not

---

119. Eng v. Coughlin, 858 F.2d 889, 898 (2d Cir. 1988) (describing the role of the employee assistant as corresponding to "those actions that an inmate facing disciplinary charges can undertake himself" when not separated from others).

120. See Serrano v. Coughlin, 152 A.D.2d 790, 792–93, 543 N.Y.S.2d 571, 573 (3d Dept 1989) (holding that prisoner was not denied meaningful employee assistance because he did not specify the documents he wanted produced).

121. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 253.6(a) (2000).

122. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 251-4.1(a) (1997); see also Jones v. Coughlin, 112 Misc. 2d 232, 234, 446 N.Y.S.2d 849, 850–51 (Sup. Ct. Albany County 1982) (finding that prisoner's due process rights were violated when prison designated employee assistant other than one prisoner had selected, despite prisoner's oral and written objections).

123. You may also write to the superintendent and request your original choice.

124. See Walker v. Coughlin, 202 A.D.2d 1034, 1034, 609 N.Y.S.2d 471, 471 (4th Dept 1994) (holding that prisoner waived his right to employee assistant by refusing to sign employee assistant selection form).

125. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 251-4.2 (1997).

126. See Horne v. Coughlin, 155 F.3d 26, 29, 31 (2d Cir. 1998), amended by 191 F.3d 244 (2d Cir. 1999). In the case, a mentally retarded prisoner was sentenced to six months in the SHU and six months recommended loss of good time. The prisoner argued that his employee assistant should not have merely followed his instructions but should also have developed a defense strategy. The court disagreed, saying that the assistant was not required to do anything besides follow the specific instructions of the inmate. The court also found that six months in the SHU did not constitute cruel and unusual punishment of a retarded person.

127. Newman v. Coughlin, 110 A.D.2d 981, 981, 488 N.Y.S.2d 273, 274 (3d Dept 1985).

128. See Gunn v. Ward, 71 A.D. 2d 856, 856, 419 N.Y.S. 2d 182, 183 (2d Dept 1981) (holding failure of employee assistant to appear at superintendent's proceeding violates neither New York law nor a prisoner's right to due process).

129. See Silva v. Casey, 992 F.2d 20, 22 (2d Cir. 1993) (discussing the duties of employee assistants and holding that (1) prisoner has no constitutional right of assistance per Wolff v. McDonnell so that failure of assistant to call other prisoners involved in alleged violation did not violate prisoner's due process rights, and (2) assistant had no obligation to go beyond bounds of prisoner's specific instructions in interviewing prisoners and gathering evidence); see also Tumminia v. Coughlin, 100 A.D.2d 732–33, 732, 473 N.Y.S.2d 618, 619 (4th Dept 1984) (finding that assistant's failure to investigate prisoner's reasonable factual claim violates due process); Hilton v. Dalsheim, 81 A.D.2d 887, 888, 439 N.Y.S.2d 157, 158 (2d Dept 1981) (finding that assistant's failure to interview witnesses as requested by prisoner violates the prisoner's rights under New York law).

130. See Giano v. Sullivan, 709 F. Supp. 1209, 1215 (S.D.N.Y. 1989) (holding that the prisoner was denied his constitutional right to assistance in a disciplinary hearing when the employee assistant refused to obtain documentary evidence for the prisoner, and then proceeded with the hearing despite the prisoner's protest that he was not prepared).

report back to the prisoner with the results of his investigation and witness interviews, deprived the prisoner of his right to defend himself.[131]

You may or may not want to give the employee assistant "your side of the story." The advantage to telling your story is that the employee assistant might be able to use this information to help you exercise your limited right to find witnesses, as described in the next Section. However, one disadvantage is that if the story you tell your employee assistant differs from the testimony you give at your hearing, prison officials can hold this against you. The discrepancy may damage your credibility and give prison officials an excuse to discredit your testimony.

4. Witnesses

Wolff v. McDonnell recognized your limited constitutional right to call witnesses at disciplinary hearings.[132] In Wolff, the Court stated that a prisoner in a disciplinary proceeding "should be allowed to call witnesses and present documentary evidence in his defense when permitting him to do so will not be unduly hazardous to institutional safety or correctional goals."[133] In other words, you can call witnesses unless prison officials decide that allowing you to do so would negatively impact either the safety of the prison or the prison officials' ability to operate the prison. Furthermore, prison officials are not required to call every witness you request to testify for you. A prison official may exercise his "discretion to keep the hearing within reasonable limits."[134] This has been interpreted to mean that the official may decline to call witnesses whose testimony would be immaterial[135] or unduly redundant.[136]

This qualified constitutional right to call witnesses was initially expanded and clarified in Powell v. Ward, also known as Powell II.[137] In Powell II, the court stated that while prisoners may not be able to call witnesses to testify in the prisoner's presence at a hearing, "witnesses must be allowed to be present at disciplinary proceedings, unless the appropriate officials determine that their presence would jeopardize institutional safety or correctional goals."[138] If it is determined that witnesses may not be present at the disciplinary hearing, the witness may be interviewed and tape-recorded out of your presence. The tape or transcript of the interview must be made available to you before or at the hearing, unless the hearing officer decides that this also "would jeopardize institutional safety or correctional goals."[139] In such a case, you must be given an explanation for the denial.[140]

Under New York regulations, the notice that you receive before the hearing must inform you of your right to call witnesses.[141] You may request a witness either by informing your employee assistant or hearing officer before the hearing, or by informing your hearing officer during the hearing.[142] You have a right to request that your employee assistant interview prisoner witnesses. If your employee assistant interviews witnesses outside of your presence, you also have a right to receive a tape or transcript of the interview or an explanation of their denial.[143]

---

131. See Brooks v. Scully, 132 Misc. 2d 517, 519, 504 N.Y.S.2d 387, 389 (Sup. Ct. Dutchess County 1986) (holding that the failure of the employee assistant to inform the prisoner of investigation results and interviews with witnesses deprived the prisoner of meaningful and effective assistance in preparation for a disciplinary hearing).

132. Wolff v. McDonnell, 418 U.S. 539, 566–67, 94 S. Ct. 2963, 2979–80, 41 L. Ed. 2d 935, 956–57 (1974).

133. Wolff v. McDonnell, 418 U.S. 539, 566, 94 S. Ct. 2963, 2979, 41 L. Ed. 2d 935, 956 (1974).

134. Wolff v. McDonnell, 418 U.S. 539, 566, 94 S. Ct. 2963, 2980, 41 L. Ed. 2d 935, 956–57 (1974).

135. See Finney v. Coughlin, 2 F. App'x. 186, 191(2d Cir. 2001) (stating that a prison hearing officer may exercise his "discretion to keep the hearing within reasonable limits" by declining to call immaterial witnesses to testify).

136. See Russell v. Selsky, 35 F.3d 55, 59 (2d Cir. 1994) (finding that disciplinary hearing officer did not violate any of the prisoner's rights in excluding certain witness testimony as "cumulative," where the officer had already heard substantially identical testimony from earlier witnesses).

137. Powell v. Ward, 487 F. Supp. 917 (S.D.N.Y. 1980), aff'd, 643 F.2d 924 (2d Cir. 1981).

138. Powell v. Ward, 487 F. Supp. 917, 929 (S.D.N.Y. 1980).

139. Powell v. Ward, 487 F. Supp. 917, 929 (S.D.N.Y. 1980).

140. Powell v. Ward, 487 F. Supp. 917, 929 (S.D.N.Y. 1980); see also Ponte v. Real, 471 U.S. 491, 492, 105 S. Ct. 2192, 2193–94, 85 L. Ed. 2d 553, 556 (1985) (although due process requires that prison officials state their reasons for refusing to call witnesses, such reasons do not have to be in writing or made part of the administrative record).

141. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 251-3.1(d)(2) (1995).

142. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 253.5(c) (2000); N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 254.5(c) (2004).

143. See Burke v. Coughlin, 97 A.D.2d 862, 863, 469 N.Y.S.2d 240, 242 (3d Dept 1983) (stating that New York State regulations give prisoners the right to have a chosen employee interview any witnesses requested in investigating the prisoner's reasonable factual claims and submit a written report including witness statements).

If permission to call a witness is denied, you must receive a written statement from the hearing officer that specifically states the reasons for the denial, including the specific threat to institutional safety or correctional goals presented.[144] Statements that give a conclusion without an explanation, like "[it] does not meet with Security Procedure or Correctional goals for you to be present during those interviews," have been found by courts to be insufficient.[145] Although the explanation that a witness' testimony is "redundant" (meaning it repeats evidence available from other sources) can be a valid reason to deny you a witness, prison officials do not always have unlimited discretion to decide that fact.[146] On the other hand, courts do not require these explanations to be detailed. Rather, the court "must accord due deference to the decision of the [prison] administrator."[147] The court will uphold the prison official's denial even if the witness could have provided testimony that might have cleared the prisoner.[148] When prison officials base their decision to deny witnesses on security concerns, courts will almost always uphold that determination.[149]

5. Confronting and Cross-Examining Witnesses

Even though you generally have the right to call witnesses on your behalf, the Supreme Court in Wolff v. McDonnell held that you do not have a constitutionally guaranteed right to confront and cross-examine the other side's witnesses (ask them questions). The Court found that such a right would create "considerable potential for havoc [problems] inside prison walls."[150] One court interpreting Wolff described the security issues posed by confrontation and cross-examination as being concerned with the likelihood of retaliation against adverse witnesses and informants (those testifying unfavorably or against you), which can often result in death or injury, in addition to the "potential for breakdown in authority."[151] Due to the prison's strong interest in preserving safety, the right to confront and cross-examine adverse witnesses is much more limited than the right to present witnesses who testify on your behalf. Whether you will be allowed to confront and cross-examine witnesses is left up to the prison officials.[152] Prison officers are not required

144. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 253.5(a) (2000), N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 254.5(a) (2004); see also Moye v. Selsky, 826 F. Supp. 712, 716–17 (S.D.N.Y. 1993) (prison officials may have to give prisoners an explanation for exclusion of witnesses from disciplinary hearing).

145. See People ex rel. Selcov v. Coughlin, 98 A.D.2d 733, 735, 469 N.Y.S.2d 148, 151 (2d Dept 1983) (holding that without evidence that prisoner's presence would create any threat to prison security or correctional goals, prisoner's due process rights were violated).

146. See Fox v. Coughlin, 893 F.2d 475, 477–78 (2d Cir. 1990) (holding that officials did not deprive prisoner of clearly established statutory or constitutional rights where they called only some of the witnesses he requested); Wong v. Coughlin, 137 A.D.2d 272, 274, 529 N.Y.S.2d 45, 46 (3d Dept 1988) (removing disciplinary violation from prisoner's record where hearing officer's basis for refusing to allow officer who had prepared misbehavior report to testify was based only on guessing or predicting that his testimony would be redundant); Fox v. Dalsheim, 112 A.D.2d 368, 369, 491 N.Y.S.2d 820, 821 (2d Dept 1985) (holding that hearing officer abused his discretion where he refused to call two of the witnesses requested by prisoner due to "redundancy of the testimony"). In Fox v. Dalsheim, the court said that "[a]lthough the revised superintendent's hearing rules and regulations ... now permit exclusion of a witness' testimony when it is redundant or immaterial, this provision does not afford the hearing officer the unlimited right to exclude testimony relevant to an inmate's defense." Fox v. Dalsheim, 112 A.D.2d 368, 369, 491 N.Y.S.2d 820, 821 (2d Dept 1985).

147. Zamakshari v. Dvoskin, 899 F. Supp. 1097, 1107 (S.D.N.Y. 1995) (holding hearing officer's denial of request for gallery listing so prisoner could identify other possible witnesses did not violate due process).

148. Zamakshari v. Dvoskin, 899 F. Supp. 1097, 1107 (S.D.N.Y. 1995).

149. See, e.g., Laureano v. Kuhlmann, 75 N.Y.2d 141, 147–48, 550 N.E.2d 437, 440–41, 551 N.Y.S.2d 184, 187–88 (1990) (denial of right to call witness upheld where hearing officer informed prisoner that victim of assault feared retaliation, and officer showed prisoner form where witness indicated desire not to testify); Cortez v. Coughlin, 67 N.Y.2d 907, 909, 492 N.E.2d 1225, 1225, 501 N.Y.S.2d 809, 809 (1986) (exclusion of prisoner from his disciplinary hearing during prisoner testimony upheld on the basis of institutional safety and disciplinary reports documenting violent behavior; prisoner allowed to listen to taped testimony instead).

150. Wolff v. McDonnell, 418 U.S. 539, 567, 94 S. Ct. 2963, 2980, 41 L. Ed. 2d 935, 957 (1974).

151. Smith v. Farley, 858 F. Supp. 806, 817 (N.D. Ind. 1994) (citing Young v. Kann, 926 F.2d 1396, 1400 (3d Cir. 1991)), aff'd, Smith v. Parke, 56 F.3d 67 (7th Cir. 1995) (finding violation of prisoner's due process rights where prisoner was denied his request to admit a letter that could potentially clear his name, without valid security concerns being provided for the denial).

152. See Sanchez v. Roth, 891 F. Supp. 452, 458 (N.D. Ill. 1995) (holding that where prisoner did not follow proper procedure for requesting witnesses, prison officials' refusal to allow witnesses to testify at disciplinary proceeding did not violate prisoner's due process rights).

under the Due Process Clause to provide you with a written report of the reasons for denying you the right to confront your accusers or to cross-examine witnesses.[153]

In New York, courts have held that prisoners do not have the right to be present when adverse witnesses testify.[154] But, prison officials must provide some objective evidence to support a decision to interview witnesses outside your presence.[155] They may also be required to give you a tape or transcript of the testimony, if doing so does not undermine the prison's interest in safety. For example, in Martin v. Coughlin, a disciplinary ruling was dismissed where the state refused to provide the prisoner with a tape or transcript of a witness' testimony without giving any reason for the denial.[156] Also, if a hearing officer intends to consider information that will be kept confidential from the prisoner, he must at least inform the prisoner of that intention and give some reason for keeping the information confidential.[157] Despite these limits, you can always ask the hearing officer to question adverse witnesses for you. However, prison officials are not required to ensure informants are telling the truth; the Due Process Clause does not usually require prison officials to assess the reliability of confidential informants testifying during disciplinary hearings. Prison officials are only required to judge the reliability of confidential informants in situations where the prisoner has an established right to such a judgment. If your version of the event differs from the witness' version, point this difference out to the hearing officer and comment on the evidence presented at the hearing.

6. "Impartial" Hearing Officer

According to Wolff v. McDonnell, you have the right to have an impartial (unbiased) hearing officer preside over your disciplinary proceeding.[158] The hearing officer does not have to meet the strict standard of impartiality that applies to judges.[159] But, the officer must not be so biased against you as to create a "hazard of arbitrary decision making ... violative of due process."[160] To prove bias, you must provide "evidence that the decision maker has actually prejudged the case or [had a] direct personal involvement in the underlying charge."[161] For example, one court found a hearing officer's refusal to consider introduced evidence to be proof of possible bias.[162] The court explained, "where a hearing officer indicates on the record

---

153. See Ponte v. Real, 471 U.S. 491, 492, 105 S. Ct. 2192, 2193–94, 85 L. Ed. 2d 553, 556 (1985) (holding that the superintendent was not constitutionally required to provide reasons in the administrative record for refusing to allow respondent to call requested witnesses). But see Scarpa v. Ponte, 638 F. Supp. 1019, 1023 (D. Mass. 1986) (distinguishing Ponte because in that case, prison officials failing to provide reasons in the administrative record had an explanation related to safety or correctional goals).

154. See Graham v. N.Y. State Dept. of Corr. Servs., 178 A.D.2d 870, 870, 577 N.Y.S.2d 728, 729 (3d Dept 1991) (holding that the prisoner did not have the right to be present during the testimony of a witness called by the Hearing Officer because "the right to be present applies only when an inmate calls a witness"); Honoret v. Coughlin, 160 A.D.2d 1093, 1094, 533 N.Y.S.2d 573, 574–75 (3d Dept 1990) (dismissing the prisoner's claim that his due process rights were violated when he was not allowed to be present at the testimony of a witness called by the Hearing Officer).

155. See Burnell v. Smith, 122 Misc. 2d 342, 347, 471 N.Y.S.2d 493, 497 (Sup. Ct. Wyoming County 1984) (removing disciplinary violation from prisoner's record where no substantive reason was given for refusal to allow prisoner to be present during witness's testimony).

156. Martin v. Coughlin, 139 A.D.2d 650, 651, 526 N.Y.S.2d 1018, 1018 (2d Dept 1988).

157. See Boyd v. Coughlin, 105 A.D.2d 532, 533, 481 N.Y.S.2d 769, 770 (3d Dept 1984) (holding that "it is fundamental that the hearing officer must, at the time of the hearing, inform the inmate that he will consider certain information which will remain confidential and articulate some reason for keeping the information confidential"); Freeman v. Coughlin, 138 A.D.2d 824, 826 (3d Dept 1988) (applying the Boyd rule to find the hearing officer's decision to keep information confidential without informing the prisoner was not a harmless error, resulting in a new hearing for the prisoner). But see Laureano v. Kuhlman, 75 N.Y.2d 141, 147, 550 N.E.2d 437, 440, 551 N.Y.S.2d 184, 187 (N.Y. 1990) ("[A] disciplinary determination cannot stand when a denial of the inmate's request to call a witness, or to be present when his witness testifies, is wholly unexplained, but will not be set aside if the record discloses the basis for denial.").

158. Wolff v. McDonnell, 418 U.S. 539, 592, 94 S. Ct. 2963, 2992, 41 L. Ed. 2d 935, 972 (1974).

159. Moore v. Selsky, 900 F. Supp. 670, 676 (S.D.N.Y. 1995) (finding that a hearing officer may be allowed to have a predetermined view that a scientific test for evidence is reliable, so long as the hearing officer would be willing to consider impartially that he may be mistaken in his view).

160. Wolff v. McDonnell, 418 U.S. 539, 571, 94 S. Ct. 2963, 2982, 41 L. Ed. 2d 935, 959–60 (1974).

161. Wade v. Farley, 869 F. Supp. 1365, 1376 (N.D. Ind. 1994) (citing Underwood v. Chrans, 1992 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 12616, at *10 (N.D. Ill. Aug. 20, 1992) (unpublished)) (holding that although hearing officer had been involved in prisoner's previous disciplinary proceeding, he was impartial with respect to present proceeding); see, e.g., Francis v. Coughlin, 891 F.2d 43, 46 (2d Cir. 1989) (noting that a prison disciplinary hearing in which the result is arbitrarily and adversely predetermined violates a prisoner's right to due process).

162. See Colon v. Coughlin, 58 F.3d 865, 871 (2d Cir. 1995) (holding that where a hearing officer "indicates on the

that, without considering the evidence, he finds a prisoner's factual defense inconceivable, we cannot conclude that the prisoner had a full and fair opportunity to litigate the issue."[163] In another case, the court dismissed a disciplinary determination where a hearing officer's remarks and attitude (especially the remark, "Okay now. You have to convince me that you're not guilty") suggested bias against the prisoner.[164]

The New York regulations touch on the issue of impartiality, but they do not in any way guarantee you an impartial hearing officer. There are different rules for disciplinary hearings and for superintendent hearings. An officer of the rank of lieutenant or above may preside over a disciplinary hearing.[165] In a disciplinary hearing, the regulations prohibit the appointment of a hearing officer who has (1) participated in the investigation; or (2) prepared or ordered the preparation of the misbehavior report.[166] Generally, a superintendent's hearing will be conducted by the superintendent, deputy superintendent, captain, or commissioner's hearing officer. In superintendent hearings, the regulations prohibit the use of a hearing officer who: (1) actually witnessed the event; (2) was directly involved in the incident; (3) is a review officer who reviewed the misbehavior report; or (4) has investigated the incident.[167] Note that the superintendent may in his discretion permit other correctional facility employees to act as hearing officers in a superintendent's or disciplinary hearing.[168]

If you feel your hearing officer is biased, you should think about making an objection. You should also consider objecting if your hearing officer is closely connected to prison security or known to have a strong dislike for prisoners. Remember that it is usually to your advantage to make any possible objections at your hearing so that you create a strong "record" for future appeals.

7. "Use" Immunity

Most violations of prison regulations are punished solely through disciplinary proceedings within the prison. Sometimes a violation of a prison rule will also be a violation of a criminal statute. To take an extreme example, stabbing a guard is certainly a severe violation of prison regulations. More importantly, it is also a criminal offense for which a prisoner can be tried and convicted in court.

A situation like the one described above raises special problems. You might feel compelled to testify at the proceeding in order to avoid a potentially severe punishment. On the other hand, you may worry that something you say at your hearing could incriminate you in a later criminal trial.

To avoid this problem, prisoners often seek "use" immunity in disciplinary hearings. "Use" immunity does not immunize you from prosecution, but it prevents any statements you make at your disciplinary hearing from being used against you in such prosecution. Immunity in criminal proceedings comes from the U.S. Constitution's Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination. An individual accused of a crime has the right to remain silent. Nonetheless, when the state demands that you testify, the state must grant "use" immunity. If you choose not to testify in your disciplinary hearing and your silence is used as evidence of your guilt, you must also be granted "use immunity." If that was not the case, the state would be punishing you for exercising your Fifth Amendment right.

The Supreme Court faced this dilemma in Baxter v. Palmigiano,[169] which involved a prisoner facing disciplinary action for violations that were also crimes under state law. The Baxter Court held that while a prisoner's silence can be considered evidence of guilt in a disciplinary proceeding,[170] silence alone is not enough. Other evidence must be produced in order to establish guilt.[171]

If a prisoner chooses to testify in cases where he is not required or compelled to testify, according to Baxter, any statements he makes at disciplinary hearings can be used against him in subsequent criminal record that, without considering the evidence, he finds a prisoner's factual defense inconceivable," the prisoner did not have "a full and fair opportunity to litigate the issue").

---

163. Colon v. Coughlin, 58 F.3d 865, 871 (2d Cir. 1995).

164. Tumminia v. Kuhlmann, 139 Misc. 2d 394, 397, 527 N.Y.S.2d 673, 675 (Sup. Ct. Sullivan County 1988).

165. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 253.1(a) (2000).

166. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 253.1(b) (2000).

167. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 254.1 (2004). See Part E of this Chapter for an explanation of "superintendent's," "disciplinary," and "violation" hearings, which are the three types of hearings in New York State.

168. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 253.1(a) (2000); N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 254.1 (2004).

169. Baxter v. Palmigiano, 425 U.S. 308, 96 S. Ct. 1551, 47 L. Ed. 2d 810 (1976).

170. Baxter v. Palmigiano, 425 U.S. 308, 317–18, 96 S. Ct. 1551, 1557–58, 47 L. Ed. 2d 810, 821 (1976).

171. Baxter v. Palmigiano, 425 U.S. 308, 317–18, 96 S. Ct. 1551, 1557–58, 47 L. Ed. 2d 810, 821 (1976).

proceedings.[172] Therefore, a prisoner does not have a constitutional right to immunity in those cases. Where the prisoner must testify, however, "use" immunity must be granted to protect his Fifth Amendment right to remain silent.[173] In reality, it is unlikely that after Baxter prison officials will compel a prisoner to testify since: (1) adverse inferences may be drawn from a prisoner's silence; and (2) the problem of whether to grant immunity can be avoided if the official does not compel testimony.

New York currently grants prisoners "use" immunity at all disciplinary proceedings.[174] You have the right to "use" immunity even if criminal charges have not been filed against you. You must be notified of your right in the following language: "You are hereby advised that no statement made by you in response to the charge, or information derived therefrom may be used against you in a criminal proceeding."[175] This warning will appear in the notice of charges, which must be given to you at least twenty-four hours before the proceeding. Because there are grave dangers associated with disciplinary proceedings that could be followed by a criminal trial, you should consult with your criminal attorney, if you have one, before you make any formal or informal statements in regard to the events in question.

8. The Ruling and the Requirement of a Written Record

At the close of the proceeding, the hearing officer may, at his discretion, do one of several things. He may affirm or dismiss charges, or he may affirm some charges and dismiss others.[176] The only requirement is that some evidence support the hearing officer's final decision. This standard is very low. It does not require the hearing officer to produce substantial evidence or a preponderance of evidence against you. Generally, if any evidence exists at all, the court will uphold the hearing officer's conclusion. Also, the fact finder (here, the hearing officer) is not required to make a decision solely upon the evidence presented at the hearing. In Baxter v. Palmigiano,[177] the Supreme Court explained that, in the unique prison environment, facts that may not come to light until after the formal hearing should not be excluded in determining what happened, since they may help officials understand the incident and tailor penalties to further penal goals. The Court also clarified that the fact finder must provide a written statement of the evidence that he relied on and the reasons for the disciplinary action taken.[178]

Often, the only or primary evidence against a prisoner is the misbehavior report itself. New York's regulations require that misbehavior reports present a detailed written account of the alleged incident, so the report alone may provide enough evidence to support a disciplinary ruling.[179] In one case where reports merely restated that all of the prisoners in the mess hall were part of a disturbance, without describing their specific misbehavior, the evidence was found insufficient to support a disciplinary finding against them.[180]

With certain exceptions, Wolff v. McDonnell also guarantees your constitutional right to receive, from the hearing officer, a written statement of the evidence relied upon, and a statement of the reasons for the 172. Baxter v. Palmigiano, 425 U.S. 308, 316, 96 S. Ct. 1551, 1557, 47 L. Ed. 2d 810, 820 (1976). Please note that you can be compelled to testify at your prison disciplinary proceeding.

---

173. Baxter v. Palmigiano, 425 U.S. 308, 316, 96 S. Ct. 1551, 1557, 47 L. Ed. 2d 810, 820 (1976). "Use" immunity must be granted where a defendant is forced to give up his right to remain silent, but immunity need not be granted where no right to remain silent exists. If you are incarcerated outside of New York, you should research your state's rules and regulations governing disciplinary proceedings to find out whether you can get some form of immunity at your disciplinary proceeding. See Chapter 2 of the JLM on how to conduct legal research.

174. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 251-3.1(d)(1) (1995). New York City, on the other hand, differs from New York state, such that prisoners in city jails are ordinarily not granted "use" immunity. Interview with Kenneth Stephens, Esq., The Legal Aid Society, Prisoners' Rights Project (Dec. 1, 1999).

175. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 251-3.1(d)(1) (1995).

176. Superintendent, Mass. Correctional Inst., Walpole v. Hill, 472 U.S. 445, 455–56, 105 S. Ct. 2768, 2774, 86 L. Ed. 2d 356, 365 (1985) (stating that the due process standard that determines whether the decision of a prison disciplinary board is justified, is whether there is any evidence in the record that could support the board's conclusion).

177. Baxter v. Palmigiano, 425 U.S. 308, 322 n.5, 96 S. Ct. 1551, 1560 n.5, 47 L. Ed. 2d 810, 824 n.5 (1976).

178. Baxter v. Palmigiano, 425 U.S. 308, 322 n.5, 96 S. Ct. 1551, 1560 n.5, 47 L. Ed. 2d 810, 824 n.5 (1976).

179. See James v. Strack, 214 A.D.2d 674, 675, 625 N.Y.S.2d 265, 266 (2d Dept 1995) (holding that the misbehavior report was "sufficiently detailed, relevant and probative to constitute substantial evidence supporting the Hearing Officer's finding of guilt"); Nelson v. Coughlin, 209 A.D.2d 621, 621, 619 N.Y.S.2d 298, 299 (2d Dept 1994) (holding misbehavior report provided substantial evidence that prisoner violated rule prohibiting prisoners from making or possessing alcoholic beverages and that officials were not required to chemically test beverage for presence of alcohol).

180. See Bryant v. Coughlin, 77 N.Y.2d 642, 649–50, 572 N.E.2d 23, 26–27, 569 N.Y.S.2d 582, 585–86 (1991) (concluding that misbehavior reports, which did not specify the particulars of prisoner misconduct and only alleged a mass incident, were insufficient).

decision.[181] This requirement prevents the hearing officer from merely stating that you were found guilty of a particular offense based on certain interviews and reports without providing enough detail. The hearing record must include reasons for the decision, copies of any reports relied on, and summaries of any interviews conducted.[182] In addition, New York regulations provide that you must receive the written statement as soon as possible, and no later than twenty-four hours after the end of the hearing.[183]

Constitutional and New York standards allow the hearing officer to exclude (keep out) items of evidence from the written statement that, if presented, would threaten "personal or institutional safety." For example, in Laureano v. Kuhlmann, New York's highest court ruled a hearing officer did not have to disclose to the prisoner the details of a confidential informant's testimony or circumstances that might reveal his identity, where the officer provided a revised summary of essential points of the testimony.[184] If evidence has been excluded, the written statement you receive informing you of the decision must explain this.[185]

The written statement and the tape recording of the hearing will be central parts of your disciplinary hearing "record." This record is very important; the court will examine it if you seek judicial review of an unfavorable disciplinary hearing decision in state or federal court.

E. New York Disciplinary Proceedings and Appeal Procedures

1. Types of Disciplinary Proceedings

New York regulations create a three-tier disciplinary system. Violation hearings, which are used for minor offenses, make up the first tier. Disciplinary hearings, which are used for serious offenses, make up the second tier. Finally, superintendent's hearings, which are for the most serious offenses, make up the third tier. The nature of the wrongdoing of which you are accused determines both the type of hearing that you face and the type of punishment you can receive. Sandin v. Conner drastically affects New York's three-tier system. Under that case, prisoners are entitled to due process only when the punishment they receive constitutes an "atypical and significant hardship ... in relation to the ordinary incidents of prison life."[186] In other words, if the court does not regard the punishment you are given as especially severe, there is no requirement to hold a hearing beforehand. Whether a punishment is severe is based on the specific facts of your case.[187] The punishments imposed after violation and disciplinary hearings, such as loss of privileges and placement in disciplinary segregation, do not satisfy Sandin's "atypical and significant hardship" test. Only the more severe punishments imposed after superintendent's hearings—loss of good-time credits or segregated confinement for lengthy periods—can trigger due process protection under Sandin.

Accordingly, New York is not constitutionally required to conduct violation and disciplinary hearings at all. However, the regulations still provide for all three types of hearings, and prison officials are required to follow their own rules.[188] For example, if a prison official decided to revoke your visiting privileges or to place you in a SHU for no reason at all without giving you a hearing, you could file an appeal within the prison system. In a case like the one above, however, you could not seek relief in federal court because according to Sandin, you no longer have a constitutional right to be free from all arbitrary and unfair punishment, only from "atypical and significant" punishment.[189] It is still unclear whether you could appeal your case

---

181. Wolff v. McDonnell, 418 U.S. 539, 564, 94 S. Ct. 2963, 2979, 41 L. Ed. 2d 935, 956 (1974).

182. See McQueen v. Vincent, 53 A.D.2d 630, 631, 384 N.Y.S.2d 475, 476–77 (2d Dept 1976) (remanding case to determine whether due process requirements were met in light of incomplete hearing record); see also People ex rel. Lloyd v. Smith, 115 A.D.2d 254, 255, 496 N.Y.S.2d 716, 717 (4th Dept 1985) (holding failure to include superintendent's proceeding minutes in the record made adequate review impossible, resulting in remand for review of minutes).

183. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 253.7(a)(5) (2007); N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 254.7(a)(5) (2007).

184. Laureano v. Kuhlmann, 550 N.E.2d 437, 441, 75 N.Y.2d 141,148, 551 N.Y.S.2d 184, 188 (1990).

185. Wolff v. McDonnell, 418 U.S. 539, 565, 94 S. Ct. 2963, 2979, 41 L. Ed. 2d 935, 956 (1974).

186. Sandin v. Conner, 515 U.S. 472, 484, 115 S. Ct. 2293, 2300, 132 L. Ed 2d 418, 430 (1995).

187. Miller v. Selsky, 111 F.3d 7, 8 (2d Cir. 1997) ("Sandin did not create a per se blanket rule that disciplinary confinement may never implicate a liberty interest."); Lee v. Coughlin, 26 F. Supp. 2d 615, 635 (S.D.N.Y. 1998) (arguing Sandin "did not say that segregated confinement could never constitute an atypical and significant hardship").

188. See Uzzell v. Scully, 893 F. Supp. 259, 263 n.10 (S.D.N.Y. 1995) (stating that, because prison officials must adhere to their own rules, prisoners may administratively challenge their keeplock confinement by raising procedural error claims).

189. See Cliff v. De Celle, 260 A.D.2d 812, 814, 687 N.Y.S.2d 834, 835 (3d Dept 1999), app. denied, 93 N.Y.2d 814, 719 N.E.2d 922, 697 N.Y.S.2d 561 (1999) (holding that because the maximum penalty that could be imposed would be successfully in a New York state court. New York must follow the minimum due process rules set out in Sandin, which means it has to comply with due process of law before it can subject a prisoner to an "atypical and significant hardship."[190] New York can choose to give prisoners more rights than federal law requires, but it cannot provide fewer rights. Therefore, when reviewing the rest of this Section, bear in mind that if prison officials violate these rules, the federal courts will not be able to remedy the situation unless your case involves revocation of good-time credits or some similarly severe punishment.

Under New York's regulations, both disciplinary and superintendent's hearings may result in loss of one or more specified privileges for a specific period.[191] Where the prisoner has been involved in improper conduct related to correspondence or visiting privileges with a particular person, a superintendent's hearing may result in loss of those privileges with that person.[192] Disciplinary hearings may not result in loss of correspondence privileges and cannot lead to the loss of visiting privileges for more than thirty days.[193] Both types of hearings may result in confinement in your cell (keeplock) or in a SHU, but disciplinary hearings may only result in such confinement for up to thirty days.[194] Restitution (the payment of money) may be required for loss or intentional damage to property at both hearings.[195] A superintendent's hearing may result in a restricted diet[196] and loss of a specific period of good time.[197] Both types of hearings may allow for a delay before any penalty is imposed.[198]

The punishments that violation officers may impose after violation hearings are less severe than the punishments listed above. If the violation officer finds you guilty of committing an offense, he or she can order any two of the following penalties to be served within a thirteen-day period:[199]

(1) Loss of all or part of recreation (for example, game room, day room, television, movies, yard, gym, special events) for up to thirteen days;[200]

(2) Loss of at most two of the following privileges: one commissary buy (excluding items related to your health and sanitary needs), withholding of radio for up to thirteen days, withholding of packages for up to thirteen days (excluding perishables that cannot be returned);[201]

(3) The imposition of one work task per day, other than a regular work assignment, for a maximum of seven days (excluding Sundays and public holidays), to be performed on the prisoner's housing unit or other designated area (must be not more than eight hours per day); and[202]

(4) Counsel and/or reprimand.[203]

The violation officer has discretion to suspend these punishments for thirteen days.[204] loss of privileges and/or confinement of no longer than 30 days, the punishment is not "atypical or significant").

---

190. Sandin v. Conner, 515 U.S. 472, 483–84, 115 S. Ct. 2293, 2300, 132 L. Ed 2d 418, 430 (1995).

191. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 253.7(a)(1)(ii) (2000) (period specified for loss of privileges as a result of disciplinary hearings is "up to 30 days"); N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 254.7(a)(1) (2007).

192. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 254.7(a)(1)(ii) (2004).

193. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 253.7(a)(1)(ii) (2000). New York procedures for the suspension of visitation rights are contained within a consent decree issued in Kozlowski v. Coughlin, 539 F. Supp. 852 (S.D.N.Y. 1982), den. of modif. aff'd, 871 F.2d 241 (2d Cir. 1989).

194. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 253.7(a)(1)(iii) (2000); N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 254.7(a)(1)(iii) (2004).

195. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 254.7(a)(1)(v) (2004); N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 253.7(a)(1)(iv) (1996). At disciplinary hearings, restitution is limited to $100.

196. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 254.7(a)(1)(iv) (2004). The diet must at all times contain a "sufficient quantity of wholesome and nutritious food." N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 304.2(e) (2007). While there has not been litigation about this, it is possible that at some point, the diet provided may be so unhealthy as to amount to "cruel and unusual punishment" in violation of the 8th Amendment. For a discussion of the 8th Amendment, see JLM, Chapter 16, "42 U.S.C. § 1983 and 28 U.S.C. § 1331 to Obtain Relief From Violations of Federal Law."

197. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 254.7(a)(1)(vii) (2004).

198. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 254.7(a)(4) (2004); N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 253.7(a)(4) (1996). The specified time period for suspensions is up to 180 days from a superintendent's hearing and up to 90 days from a disciplinary hearing.

199. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 252.5(a) (1997).

200. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 252.5(a)(1) (1997).

201. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 252.5(a)(2) (1997).

202. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 252.5(a)(3) (1997).

203. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 252.5(a)(4) (1997).

204. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 252.5(a) (1997).

A review officer can order any one of the three types of hearings to be held (violation, disciplinary, or superintendent's hearings). The choice will depend on the seriousness of the reported offense.[205] Reports of prisoner misbehavior may come to the attention of the review officer in the following way: if a guard, or any other prison employee, believes that you have committed a violation that creates a "danger to life, health, security, or property," a formal report of your conduct (referred to by prisoners as a "ticket") must be filed "as soon as practicable" with the review officer.[206] The staff person who observed the alleged violation (or who got the facts) must report in writing the nature, date, time, and place of its occurrence.[207] An employee is not required to be absolutely certain or even have a reasonable suspicion that a prisoner broke the rules before formal charges may be filed. Minor infractions or other violations of rules and policies governing prisoner behavior "that do not involve danger to life, health, security, or property" need not be reported.[208] The misbehavior report becomes the basis for the review of an officer's choice of the type of hearing to be held.

An officer will place you in solitary confinement if he or she believes you present an "immediate threat to the safety, security or order of the facility, or an immediate danger to other persons or to property."[209] The regulations state that you may not be confined to your cell or elsewhere for more than seven days without a hearing.[210] Such a hearing must be completed within fourteen days, unless a delay is authorized.[211] If you are placed in keeplock or a Special Housing Unit (SHU) solely because of the charges against you, your hearing must begin within seven days of being confined, unless special circumstances exist.[212] An officer may also confine you to your cell or room for your own protection, but you can only be confined for seventy-two hours and, within that time period, you must be transferred to another housing unit, scheduled for transfer to another facility, released from confinement, or placed in protective custody.[213]

The validity of the rules stated above is questionable in light of Sandin v. Conner. A federal court in New York has suggested that Sandin v. Conner undermines the validity of New York regulations that afford prisoners liberty interests in remaining free from administrative and disciplinary segregation.[214] You may be able to assert rights under these regulations within the prison system or possibly in state court, but you will not be able to assert constitutional rights in federal court.

2. Important Exceptions at Violation Hearings

At violation hearings, you will not be entitled to all of the rights you have at disciplinary or superintendent's hearings. For example, before disciplinary and superintendent's hearings, you must receive written notice about the hearing, but violation hearings do not require written notice. Therefore, you may not have enough time to prepare your defense. However, once the misbehavior report is written against you, the violation hearing must be held within seven days.[215]

The regulations grant you the right to be present at your violation hearing.[216] This right gives you a chance to defend yourself by orally explaining your version of the events to the violation officer, presenting documentary evidence (for example, a time card showing your presence at your work-station rather than at the scene of the alleged incident), or submitting a written statement on your own behalf.[217] You do not,

---

205. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 251-2.2(b) (2004).
206. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 251-3.1(a) (1995).
207. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 251-3.1(b), (c) (1995).
208. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 251-1.5 (1995).
209. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 251-1.6(a) (1995).
210. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, §§ 251-5.1(a)–(c) (1995).
211. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 251-5.1(b) (1995).
212. See Gittens v. LeFevre, 891 F.2d 38, 42–43 (2d Cir. 1989) (holding that failure of New York regulations to provide prisoners an adequate opportunity to be heard within a reasonable time of their administrative confinement (more than a seven days wait was unreasonable) violates due process requirements, but that officials had acted reasonably in reliance on New York regulations which were unclear at that time). But see Scott v. Coughlin, 727 F. Supp. 806, 809–10 (W.D.N.Y. 1990) (holding that prisoner's due process rights were violated where he was confined to keeplock for 14 days without a misbehavior report being issued or a disciplinary hearing being conducted).
213. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 251-1.6(b) (1995).
214. See Rodriguez v. Phillips, 66 F.3d 470, 479–80 (2d Cir. 1995) (holding that prison officials' belief that prisoner's three-day administrative confinement, without opportunity to be heard, did not violate prisoner's 14th Amendment due process rights was reasonable).
215. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 251-5.1(c) (1995).
216. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 252.3(a)(2) (1997).
217. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 252.3(a)(3) (1997).

however, have the right to call witnesses at violation hearings,[218] which might make it difficult for you to prove your version of the events. If you believe you have been accused of an offense you did not commit, request the violation officer to investigate further before issuing a decision.

The differences among the three types of disciplinary proceedings can be confusing. To simplify matters, the differences among the rights you have are illustrated in Figure I:

Disciplinary/Superintendent's Hearing	Violation Hearing
Written notice that a proceeding will be held at least twenty-four hours before the hearing.[219]	Written notice of charges at the hearing.[220]
Hearing must be completed within fourteen days after report, unless authorized by the commissioner.[221]	Hearing must be completed within 7 days after report.[222]
Limited right to substitute counsel.[223]	No right to substitute counsel.
Right to appear before the hearing officer.[224]	Right to appear before the violation officer.[225]
Limited right to call witnesses.[226]	No right to call witnesses.[227]
Right to "use" immunity. (Statements you make in response to a charge of misbehavior cannot be used against you in criminal proceedings.)[228]	Right to "use" immunity. (Statements you make in response to a charge of misbehavior cannot be used against you in criminal proceedings.)[229]
Right to an impartial hearing officer.[230]	No declared right to an impartial violation officer.
Right to receive a copy of a written record of the disposition.[231]	Right to receive a copy of a written record of the disposition.[232]

218. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 252.3(a)(3) (1997).

219. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 253.6(a) (2000) (rule governing disciplinary hearings); N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 254.6(a)(1) (2004) (rule governing superintendent hearings); Wolff v. McDonnell, 418 U.S. 539, 564, 94 S. Ct. 2963, 2979, 41 L. Ed. 2d 935, 956 (1974) (holding that notice is only required for hearings where more rights are at stake such as a disciplinary or superintendent hearing but not a violation hearing).

220. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 252.3(a)(1) (1997).

221. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 251-5.1(b) (1995).

222. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 251-5.1(c) (1995).

223. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 253.4 (2000) (rule governing disciplinary hearings); N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 254.4 (2004) (rule governing superintendent hearings); Wolff v. McDonnell, 418 U.S. 539, 566–70, 94 S. Ct. 2963, 2979–82, 41 L. Ed. 2d 935, 956-59 (1974) (holding that prisoners do not have a right to an attorney but can collect documents and have a fellow prisoner assist them when they are illiterate or unlikely to understand the charges against them so long as these rights will not create a "risk of reprisal or undermine authority").

224. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 253.6(b) (2000) (rule governing disciplinary hearings); N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 254.6(a)(2) (2004) (rule governing superintendent hearings).

225. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7 § 252.3(a)(2) (1997).

226. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 253.5 (2000) (rule governing disciplinary hearings); N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 254.5 (2004) (rule governing superintendent hearings); Wolff v. McDonnell, 418 U.S. 539, 566, 94 S. Ct. 2963, 2979–80, 41 L. Ed. 2d 935, 957 (1974) (holding that an inmate should be permitted to call witnesses "when permitting him to do so will not be unduly hazardous to institutional safety or correctional goals").

227. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 252.3(a)(3) (1997).

228. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 251-3.1(d)(1) (1995).

229. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 251-3.1(d)(1) (1995).

230. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 253.1(b) (2000) (rule governing disciplinary hearings); N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 254.1 (2004) (rule governing superintendent hearings); Wolff v. McDonnell, 418 U.S. 539, 571, 94 S. Ct. 2963, 2982, 41 L. Ed. 2d 935, 959 (1974).

231. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 253.7(a)(5) (1996) (rule governing disciplinary hearings); N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 254.7(a)(5) (2004) (rule governing superintendent hearings); Wolff v. McDonnell, 418 U.S. 539, 564, 94 S. Ct. 2963, 2979, 41 L. Ed. 2d 935, 956 (1974).

232. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 252.5(b) (1997).

Disciplinary/Superintendent's Hearing	Violation Hearing
Disposition of hearing may be made part of prisoner's institutional records.	Disposition of violation hearing not made part of prisoner's institutional records.[233]

Figure I: Comparison of the Rights of Prisoners at Disciplinary or Superintendent's Hearings and Violation Hearings in New York[234]

Once you receive written charges, you know that a disciplinary proceeding will take place in the near future. If you are in solitary confinement as a result of the charges, the regulations require that the disciplinary or superintendent's hearing begin within seven days from the time you were first confined.[235] If you are not confined, the hearing must be completed within fourteen days from the time the written charges were made against you.[236] The Commissioner of Correctional Services or a person designated to act for the Commissioner can, however, authorize a delay beyond these time limits.[237] Such delays are often authorized.

3. Appeal Procedures

In New York, prisoners have an absolute right to make an administrative appeal to another prison official.[238] You must pursue this administrative appeal process in order to preserve your right to pursue further appeals in the courts (your right to judicial review).[239] This means that in order to have a court hear your case at a later stage, you must make an administrative appeal. Most other states also provide appeal procedures. If you are incarcerated elsewhere, you should research the rules and regulations governing disciplinary proceedings in your state. The appeal procedures differ for disciplinary hearings, superintendent's hearings, and violation hearings. For this reason, they are discussed separately below.

(a) Disciplinary Hearings

You can begin the review process by writing to the superintendent of your facility and requesting that he or she review the decision made at your disciplinary hearing. You must submit your request no later than seventy-two hours (three days) after you receive your hearing disposition (the decision).[240] If your written request is submitted after the seventy-two hour deadline, you may lose your right to have your hearing reviewed.[241] After receiving your appeal, the superintendent or a person designated to act for the superintendent must review your case and issue a decision within fifteen days.[242]

When appealing a disciplinary hearing, you should also consider writing the superintendent. A superintendent has the power to reduce your penalty at any time an imposed penalty is in effect.[243]

It is important to note if you appeal a disciplinary hearing, you could possibly face a harsher penalty.[244]

---

233. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 252.5(d) (1997).

234. See Part E(1) of this Chapter for more information on the different levels of disciplinary proceedings.

235. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, §§ 251-5.1(a) (1995).

236. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, §§ 251-5.1(b) (1995).

237. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, §§ 251-5.1(a), 251-5.1(b) (1995).

238. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 253.8 (1996) (rule governing disciplinary hearings); N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 254.8 (2004) (rule governing superintendent hearings).

239. To institute a New York Article 78 proceeding or a federal § 1983 claim, you must first exhaust your administrative appeal possibilities. For more information, see JLM, Chapter 22, "How to Challenge Administrative Decisions Using Article 78 of the New York Civil Practice Law and Rules," JLM, Chapter 16, "42 U.S.C. § 1983 and 28 U.S.C. § 1331 to Obtain Relief From Violations of Federal Law," and JLM, Chapter 14 on the Prison Litigation Reform Act.

240. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 253.8 (1996).

241. See Lane v. Hanberry, 593 F.2d 648, 649 (5th Cir. 1979) (holding that constitutional due process does not require that prisoner, when advised of his right to administrative appeal, also be advised that if he chooses not to make an administrative appeal, he will not be allowed to challenge the disciplinary hearing in a court of law).

242. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 253.8 (1996).

243. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 253.9 (1996).

244. See N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 253.8 (1996).

(b) Superintendent's Hearings

The process by which you may appeal a superintendent's decision is similar to the appeal procedure for disciplinary hearings discussed above. The major differences are (1) the person you write to, (2) the number of days you have to submit your written appeal, and (3) an appeal can never result in a harsher penalty.

After a superintendent's hearing, you should submit your appeal in writing to the Commissioner of Correctional Services, not to the superintendent.[245] You have thirty days after you receive the superintendent's decision to submit your written request to have your superintendent's hearing reviewed.[246] Address your appeal to:

Commissioner _____
New York State Department of Correctional Services
State Office Campus, Building 2
1220 Washington Avenue
Albany, New York 12226

The Commissioner or person designated to act for him or her must issue a decision within sixty days.[247]

Another important consideration when appealing a superintendent hearing is that under no circumstances can the appeal result in a harsher penalty.[248]

When appealing a superintendent's hearing to the Commissioner, you should also consider writing to the superintendent. A superintendent has the authority to reduce your penalty imposed at the superintendant's hearing at any time during which an imposed penalty is in effect.[249] Even if the Commissioner decides not to reverse or modify the decision made at your superintendent's hearing, the superintendent can reduce your penalty. It may be particularly worthwhile to write to your superintendent if he or she did not preside over your hearing.

(c) Violation Hearings

To appeal the decision in your violation hearing, you must write to your superintendent and request that he or she review your case no later than twenty-four hours after you receive notification of the decision.[250] The superintendent or the person designated to act for the superintendent must then issue a decision within seven days.[251] The superintendent may reduce the penalty imposed at your hearing.[252]

After a superintendent's hearing, you may want to appeal an unfavorable decision to a court of law.[253] However, after Sandin v. Conner,[254] it is not likely that you would be able to successfully appeal an unfavorable decision from a violation or disciplinary hearing. Furthermore, if the penalty imposed at your violation hearing is relatively minor, filing an appeal may not be worth the trouble. Since an appeal creates more work for prison officials, submitting an appeal may only annoy them. Moreover, violation hearings cannot be made part of a prisoner's institutional records.[255] In any event, the minor infraction cannot be held against you at a later date.

F. Administrative Segregation Proceedings

As with disciplinary confinement, for you to receive procedural protection in the context of administrative segregation a court must find the laws or regulations applicable to your prison create a protected liberty interest.[256] In other words, unless your state has a law or regulation that entitles you to

245. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 254.8 (2004).
246. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 254.8 (2004).
247. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 254.8 (2004).
248. See N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 254.8 (2004).
249. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 254.9 (2004).
250. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 252.6 (1997).
251. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 252.6 (1997).
252. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 252.7 (1997).
253. Remember that you must exhaust your administrative remedies before petitioning the courts. You should review Chapter 22 of the JLM, "How to Challenge Administrative Decisions Using Article 78 of the New York Civil Practice Law and Rules," for more information on Article 78 appeals in New York State court.
254. Sandin v. Conner, 515 U.S. 472, 115 S. Ct. 2293, 123 L. Ed. 2d 418 (1995).
255. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 252.5(d) (1997).
256. See Sandin v. Conner, 515 U.S. 472, 484, 115 S. Ct. 2293, 2300, 132 L. Ed. 2d 418, 430 (1995) (holding that a avoid segregation from the general prison population, you do not have due process rights to a formal hearing before being confined in administrative or protective custody. Not all jurisdictions have found a protected liberty interest in the context of administrative segregation. But, courts in the Second Circuit have found some state and federal regulations regarding administrative segregation create a protected liberty interest.[257] This Part will first discuss the procedures officials in New York must follow and then those that federal prisons within the Second Circuit must follow before and during your administrative detention.

The due process safeguards outlined above for disciplinary action do not apply to your placement in administrative segregation. This means that the requirements of Wolff v. McDonnell[258] do not apply to administrative segregation. The guiding case for basic procedural requirements in the administrative segregation context is Hewitt v. Helms.[259] Hewitt concerned a prisoner who was placed in administrative segregation after a riot occurred in a state prison. The following day, he was given notice of a misconduct charge against him. After five days of confinement, a hearing committee reviewed the evidence against him, including a report of his version of the events at issue. Although the committee did not reach a decision about the prisoner's guilt, the hearing committee decided that he posed a threat to the safety of other prisoners and prison officials and that his confinement in administrative segregation should be continued. The Supreme Court examined these events and found that state law created a protected liberty interest in staying out of administrative segregation. Even so, the Supreme Court concluded that the review process conducted by prison officials did not violate the prisoner's due process rights.

The Supreme Court established a standard for hearings to determine whether a prisoner represents a security threat, or whether he should be confined to administrative segregation pending an investigation into misconduct charges. The Court stated that an informal, non-adversarial (not focused on the dispute or conflict) review of the evidence will satisfy the due process requirements of the Fourteenth Amendment. Thus, for administrative segregation hearings, the procedural safeguards you are entitled to are:

(1) Some notice of the charges against you;
(2) An opportunity to present your views orally or in writing to the prison officer who will decide whether or not to transfer you to administrative segregation;
(3) An informal proceeding held within a reasonable time after your transfer to administrative segregation; and
(4) Periodic review of the charges and available evidence by the decision-maker.[260]

These are the minimum procedural requirements prison officials must follow. State or federal regulations applicable to your prison may set out additional, specific guidelines.

New York State prisons may place you in administrative segregation only if prison officials find that your presence in the general prison population poses a threat to the general safety and security of the facility.[261] You are entitled to submit a written statement responding to the charges against you. Prison officials may, in their discretion, let you make your case in person. Although you are not entitled to be present at each review hearing, you may be entitled to a report of the results of the review hearings and an opportunity to respond to those findings.[262] You are also entitled to have a committee review your status of confinement in administrative segregation every sixty days.[263] A three-member committee consisting of a prisoner has a liberty interest protected by the Constitution's Due Process Clause only when his administrative segregation reaches levels of atypical and significant hardship); Hewitt v. Helms, 459 U.S. 460, 472, 103 S. Ct. 864, 871–72, 74 L. Ed. 2d 675, 688–89 (1983) (holding that the proceeding involving an informal non-adversarial review of evidence provided to a prisoner who was placed in administrative segregation satisfied the due process requirements for continued confinement).

---

257. See Tellier v. Fields, 280 F.3d 69, 83 (2d Cir. 2000) (holding that federal rule 28 C.F.R. § 541.22 "contains mandatory language that gives rise to" a liberty interest); Gonzalez v. Coughlin, 969 F. Supp. 256, 257–58 (S.D.N.Y. 1997) (concluding that New York rules regarding administrative confinement create a protected liberty interest).

258. Wolff v. McDonnell, 418 U.S. 539, 94 S. Ct. 2963, 41 L. Ed. 2d 935 (1974).

259. Hewitt v. Helms, 459 U.S. 460, 103 S. Ct. 864, 74 L. Ed. 2d 675 (1983).

260. See Hewitt v. Helms, 459 U.S. 460, 476–77, 103 S. Ct. 864, 874, 74 L. Ed. 2d 675, 691–92 (1983).

261. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 301.4(b) (2002).

262. See Giano v. Kelly, No. 89-CV-727(C), 2000 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 9138, at *50–51 (W.D.N.Y. May 16, 2000) (unpublished) (suggesting that to constitute sufficient notice and opportunity to respond to charges, a prisoner should be informed of the dates and results of his reviews, how long he can expect to be confined and what he might do to change his status, and should have a real opportunity to present information in his defense that he was no longer a threat to the facility).

263. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 301.4(d) (2002).

representative of the facility executive staff, a security supervisor, and a member of the guidance and counseling staff will examine your institutional record and prepare and submit a report to the superintendent.[264] The report must state

(1) Reasons why you were initially determined to be appropriate for administrative segregation;
(2) Information on your subsequent behavior and attitude; and
(3) Any other factors that favor keeping you in or releasing you from administrative segregation.[265]

The law that applies to prisoners in federal prison is slightly different. Under federal law, if you are placed in administrative detention in a federal prison, unless you were placed in detention as a direct result of your holdover status, you are entitled to a copy of the "Administrative Detention Order" prepared by the warden detailing the reasons for administrative detention within twenty-four hours of placement in a Special Housing Unit (SHU).[266] Officials must conduct an initial record review to evaluate the merits of the segregation within three days of your placement in a SHU and then conduct a formal review after the first seven continuous days that you spend in the SHU. After that, there must be periodic informal hearings every seven days before a Segregation Review Official (SRO). If the administrative detention lasts longer than thirty days, formal hearings are required every thirty days and your record should be reviewed on a weekly basis.

Unlike in New York State, some formal hearings are required by federal laws for federal prisons, meaning that you have the right to appear and present your opinion at those hearings about your detention status. After the first thirty days, and every thirty days afterwards, staff must interview you and do a psychiatric or psychological assessment for the purpose of preparing written reports on how you are adjusting to the SHU and whether you pose a threat to the facility. So long as the security of the prison is not compromised, you are entitled to a copy of the written reports.[267] This section of federal law also states that if the reasons for your confinement no longer exist, you must be released from administrative detention.[268] However, courts have held that the warden's original decision to place you in administrative detention is discretionary, and courts will generally respect and uphold the warden's decision as long as certain procedural requirements are met.[269] Long-term administrative detention may only be allowed where there are "exceptional circumstances, ordinarily tied to security or complex investigative concerns."[270] The need for longer detention must be documented by the Segregation Review Official.[271]

For both federal and state prisons in the Second Circuit, the reasons for placing you in confinement, and, upon periodic review, continuing your confinement in administrative segregation, must be compelling.[272] The reason given at a later review hearing may be the same as the original reason, but it must be deemed compelling, and it must take into account all the evidence available at the time of each review.[273] Thus, if new, relevant information arises after your initial hearing, the committee must consider that new evidence in determining whether you still pose a threat to the safety or security of the prison. If a review of all the then-available evidence does not support a finding that you pose such a threat, prison officials may not keep you in administrative segregation.[274] If the reason for your confinement in administrative segregation changes, you have the right to know the new reason and to respond to it.[275]

---

264. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 301.4(d)(1) (2002).
265. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 301.4(d) (2002).
266. 28 C.F.R. § 541.22(b) (2006).
267. 28 C.F.R. § 541.22(c)(1) (2006).
268. 28 C.F.R. § 541.22(c)(1) (2006).
269. See Tellier v. Fields, 280 F.3d 69, 82 (2d Cir. 2000) (stating that although a warden's decision to place a prisoner in administrative detention is discretionary, this discretion is not "boundless and continuing").
270. 28 C.F.R. § 541.22(c)(1) (2006).
271. 28 C.F.R. § 541.22(c)(1) (2006).
272. Giano v. Kelly, No. 89-CV-727(C), 2000 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 9138, at *48 (W.D.N.Y. May 16, 2000) (unpublished) (holding that confinement in administrative segregation must be based on a compelling reason, and upon review the decision-maker must determine if that reason is still valid).
273. Giano v. Kelly, No. 89-CV-727(c), 2000 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 9138, at *48–49 (W.D.N.Y. May 16, 2000) (unpublished); see Hewitt v. Helms, 459 U.S. 460, 477, 103 S. Ct. 864, 874, 74 L. Ed. 2d 675, 692 (1983).
274. See Giano v. Kelly, No. 89-CV-727(c), 2000 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 9138, at *49 (W.D.N.Y. May 16, 2000) (unpublished) (noting periodic review hearings must consider all evidence available at the time of the review hearing).
275. See Young Ah Kim v. Hurston, 182 F.3d 113, 119 (2d Cir. 1999) (holding that liability exists for failure to inform a prisoner of the correct reason for removal from a temporary release program).

There must be a record of those meetings showing the weekly review was not just a pro forma exercise (only going through the motions), and there was actually "meaningful consideration" of the reasons for the segregation status.[276] In the case Giano v. Kelly, one district court in New York found that the committee did not in fact conduct "meaningful" reviews of a New York State prisoner's segregation status and this violated the prisoner's due process rights. There were two main reasons for this finding. First, records of the committee meetings did not show that there was deliberation on evidence available after he was first confined. Second, the records of the reviews contained no conclusions reached by the committee on the specific question of whether the prisoner continued to pose a threat to the safety or security of the prison.[277]

Reviewing courts in general will not scrutinize the prison officials' reasons but rather will give great deference to those decisions. But, the court in Giano v. Kelly did conclude the reason for the plaintiff's initial confinement was no longer an adequate reason for his continued confinement.[278] The decision as to what constitutes a threat to the security of the prison does not need to be based on any single determining factor, and there does not need to be a finding that the prisoner committed some sort of misconduct. In making the decision, the committee may consider the character of prisoners confined in the particular facility, as well as recent and long-standing relations among prisoners and between prisoners and guards.[279]

In Taylor v. Rodriguez, the Second Circuit addressed what constitutes meaningful review for administrative segregation in the context of gang affiliation.[280] In that case, a prisoner confined to a Connecticut prison was placed in administrative segregation because of "recent tension in B-Unit involving gang activity" and "statements by independent confidential informants."[281] The prisoner's request for specific factual allegations was denied. The Second Circuit concluded that this notice was not enough to allow the prisoner to adequately prepare his defense. This means that if there are allegations that you are currently involved in a gang, prison officials have to tell you the specific facts supporting those allegations.[282] Unclear statements or definitive statements of fact without evidence are not enough. The court made clear in Taylor that prison officials do not have to reveal the identity of confidential informants, or have those informants testify at the hearing, in order to give sufficient notice of the charges. However, the prison officials are required to make an independent assessment of a confidential informant's credibility.[283]

In Taylor, the Second Circuit also found that the review of evidence at the prisoner's hearing did not meet due process requirements. To satisfy due process, "the relevant question is whether there is any evidence in the record that could support the conclusion reached by the disciplinary board."[284] The report of the hearing provided no details to support the decision to segregate the prisoner in administrative housing. The report referred to attached statements of confidential informants, but no such statements were actually attached for review by the court. Furthermore, prison officials have to make an individual assessment about 276. See Taylor v. Rodriguez, 238 F.3d 188, 193 (2d Cir. 2001) (stating that a hearing for placement in administrative segregation "is not 'meaningful' if a prisoner is given inadequate information about the basis of the charges against him"); Giano v. Kelly, No. 89-CV-727(C), 2000 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 9138, at *49–55 (W.D.N.Y. May 16, 2000) (unpublished) (holding that an administrative segregation committee did not give meaningful consideration to a prisoner's confinement in part because the prisoner was neither permitted to appear before nor submit information to the committee, and did not regularly receive information regarding the committee's recommendations); see also Mathews v. Eldridge, 424 U.S. 319, 333, 47 L. Ed. 2d 18, 32, 96 S. Ct. 893, 902 (1976) (establishing that the kind of meaningful consideration that satisfies due process is not satisfied by a standard set of procedures, but depends on the context in which the hearing is held).

---

277. Giano v. Kelly, No. 89-CV-727(C), 2000 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 9138, at *49 (W.D.N.Y. May 16, 2000) (unpublished).

278. Giano v. Kelly, No. 89-CV-727(C), 2000 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 9138, at *54 (W.D.N.Y. May 16, 2000) (unpublished) (concluding that since his attacker was now at a different facility, the prisoner could no longer pose a security risk).

279. See Giano v. Kelly, No. 89-CV-727(c), 2000 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 9138, at *49 (W.D.N.Y. May 16, 2000) (unpublished).

280. Taylor v. Rodriguez, 238 F.3d 188, 193–94 (2d Cir. 2001) (holding notice given to a prisoner was too vague to allow him to prepare a defense, and a decision-maker must assess the reliability of a confidential informant if relying on the informant's testimony). See JLM, Chapter 31, "Security Classification and Gang Validation," for more information.

281. Taylor v. Rodriguez, 238 F.3d 188, 193 (2d Cir. 2001).

282. Taylor v. Rodriguez, 238 F.3d 188, 193 (2d Cir. 2001).

283. Taylor v. Rodriguez, 238 F.3d 188, 193–94 (2d Cir. 2001) (citing Giakoumelos v. Coughlin, 88 F.3d 56, 61–62 (2d Cir. 1996)) (reasoning that confidential informant's identity in prison disciplinary hearing need not be disclosed because the "requirements of prison security are unique").

284. Superintendent v. Hill, 472 U.S. 445, 455–56, 105 S. Ct. 2768, 2774, 86 L. Ed. 2d 356, 365 (1985) (holding due process is satisfied if some evidence supports a prison disciplinary board's decision to reverse good-time credits).

an informant's credibility,[285] and the record did not show any findings on that issue made around the time of the hearing. The only thing on record about reliability of the informant was an official statement by a prison officer, and this was submitted two years after the hearing. The court found that this official statement was not enough. The court held that, without findings on the reliability of the informant, a decision to place a prisoner in administrative detention cannot be based on "some evidence"[286] if the prisoner does not have adequate information about the basis of the charges against him. If the prisoner's due process right to a meaningful hearing is violated, his detention in administrative housing is unlawful.

G. Conclusion

If prison officials have changed the conditions of your confinement for the worse, and you believe they acted unfairly (for example, by not allowing you to present evidence on your behalf), you may be able to bring a due process challenge in federal court. This will depend on whether your state has made a law or regulation creating a protected liberty interest, and whether the change in your confinement taking away that liberty is "atypical and significant." Even if the change in your confinement does not meet this standard, you still may be able to challenge it through the prison administrative process or in state court. Prison officials must follow their own rules, and you can challenge the change in your confinement if these rules have been violated. In all cases, your first step is to go through your prison's administrative process. You should learn what steps you need to take to do so. Sometimes, your prison must provide you help in bringing your case, but you must ask for this help.

285. Giakoumelos v. Coughlin, 88 F.3d 56, 61 (2d Cir. 1996) (stating that a confidential informant's testimony is sufficient to support a prison disciplinary finding as long as there has been some examination of the informant's credibility); Russell v. Scully, 15 F.3d 219, 223 (2d Cir. 1993) (holding that the prisoner had not been deprived of a protected liberty interest because he was only subject to administrative confinement pending his hearing and appeal; as a result the question of whether or not the prisoner had a clearly established right to an independent examination of the credibility of confidential informants did not need to be decided).

286. Taylor v. Rodriguez, 238 F.3d 188, 194 (2d Cir. 2001).

A JAILHOUSE LAWYER'S MANUAL

Chapter 19: Your Right to Communicate with the Outside World

Columbia Human Rights Law Review

Ninth Edition 2011

Legal Disclaimer

A Jailhouse Lawyer's Manual is written and updated by members of the Columbia Human Rights Law Review. The law prohibits us from providing any legal advice to prisoners. This information is not intended as legal advice or representation nor should you consider or rely upon it as such. Neither the JLM nor any information contained herein is intended to or shall constitute a contract between the JLM and any reader, and the JLM does not guarantee the accuracy of the information contained herein. Additionally, your use of the JLM should not be construed as creating an attorney-client relationship with the JLM staff or anyone at Columbia Law School. Finally, while we have attempted to provide information that is up-to-date and useful, because the law changes frequently, we cannot guarantee that all information is current.

CHAPTER 19

YOUR RIGHT TO COMMUNICATE WITH THE OUTSIDE WORLD*

A. Introduction

Prison administrators often restrict your right to communicate with courts, attorneys, family, friends, and the news media. They may also limit the types and sources of materials that you may read. Prison authorities do not, however, have absolute power to limit your right to communicate. The U.S. Constitution, state constitutions, and federal, state, and city regulations limit prison authorities' power to restrict your access to the outside world. Upon imprisonment, you keep some constitutional rights, including some of your First Amendment protections of speech, press, and association.[1] Within prisons, however, these rights can be limited under certain circumstances to accommodate the prison's "legitimate penological interests."[2]

Part B of this Chapter discusses your rights to correspond with the general public (friends, relatives, etc.). This Part first addresses the constitutional protections that apply to all prisoners in the United States. It then outlines the protections that state and federal regulations add to your right to correspond with the general public. This Chapter mainly focuses on New York State and federal law. Although federal law is a minimum applied everywhere within the United States, your own state's law may be different than the New York laws discussed here and might provide additional protections. See Chapter 2 of the JLM for information on how to conduct thorough legal research.

Part C addresses your right to correspond with courts, public officials, and attorneys. This kind of legal correspondence is often privileged, which means it receives greater protection than correspondence with the general public. Part D discusses your right to communicate over the Internet, both directly and indirectly (through third parties). Part E provides a general outline of your right to receive publications such as magazines and books and includes a discussion of your right to receive sexually explicit materials. Part F examines your right to communicate with the news media, and Part G discusses your right to receive visitors. Finally, Part H discusses telephone access.

The validity of a prison's restrictions on all of these rights, with the exception of legal mail and outgoing general correspondence, is determined by a four-part test: courts consider whether (1) the regulation is rationally related to a legitimate goal of the prison, (2) there is an alternative way for the prisoner or outside communicator to exercise the right even with the restriction in place, (3) the burden on or cost to the prison if the right is accommodated is too great, (4) there are available alternative procedures the prison could put in place.[3] For instance, prison officials may not arbitrarily restrict your right to communicate, but they may legally do so in circumstances where exercising that right might endanger the security or order of the prison, or the rehabilitation of prisoners. This Chapter refers to this test as the Turner reasonableness standard.

Another important term that this Chapter will use is discretion. As you will learn, although the courts will independently examine all four of the Turner factors, they often give a great deal of weight to the prison officials' own reasoning for the decision of whether or not to restrict your right to communicate. Black's Law Dictionary contains this definition for discretion: "A public official's power or right to act in certain circumstances according to personal judgment and conscience, often in an official or representative capacity."[4] This means that the courts will allow the prison officials to decide whether or not to restrict your

---

1. U.S. Const. amend. I; Bell v. Wolfish, 441 U.S. 520, 545, 99 S. Ct. 1861, 1877, 60 L. Ed. 2d 447, 472 (1979). Courts generally avoid deciding to what extent rights survive incarceration and instead determine whether the restriction is reasonable regardless of whether the right survives. See, e.g., Overton v. Bazzetta, 539 U.S. 126, 131–32, 123 S. Ct. 2162, 2167–68, 156 L. Ed. 2d 162, 169–70 (2003).

2. Thornburgh v. Abbott, 490 U.S. 401, 404, 109 S. Ct. 1874, 1877, 104 L. Ed. 2d 459, 467 (1989) (citing Turner v. Safley, 482 U.S. 78, 89, 107 S. Ct. 2254, 2262, 96 L. Ed. 2d 64, 79 (1987)) (noting that the warden may only reject communication if it is determined to be detrimental to the security, good order, or discipline of the institution or if it might facilitate criminal activity).

3. Turner v. Safley, 482 U.S. 78, 89–91, 107 S. Ct. 2254, 2262, 96 L. Ed. 2d 64, 79–80 (1987). See also Thornburgh v. Abbott, 490 U.S. 401, 414–16, 109 S. Ct. 1874, 1882–83, 104 L. Ed. 2d 459, 473–77 (1989) (applying Turner test to incoming mail); Overton v. Bazzetta, 539 U.S. 126, 132, 123 S. Ct. 2162, 2168, 156 L. Ed. 2d 162, 170 (2003) (applying Turner test to visitation restrictions); Beard v. Banks, 548 U.S. 521, 126 S. Ct. 2572, 2578, 165 L. Ed. 2d 697, 705 (2006) (applying Turner test to denial of publications and photographs).

4. Black's Law Dictionary 499 (8th ed. 2004).

right to communicate based on their understanding of the effect that the exercise of the particular right would have on penological interests, as long as their decision does not violate the Constitution. The reasoning is that prison officials understand the prison conditions better than judges and are, therefore, can better determine how certain acts will affect the prison.

The rights this Chapter describes are about the conditions of your confinement, and are subject to the Prison Litigation Reform Act. Because of this, if you believe your right to communicate has been improperly denied, you must first raise the problem through your institution's administrative grievance procedure, if there is one, before you can file a federal claim. So, you must first try to protect your rights through your institution's administrative grievance procedure. See Chapter 15 of the JLM for further information on inmate grievance procedures. If you are unsuccessful or do not receive a satisfactory result through the inmate grievance procedure, you can bring a case under a federal law, 42 U.S.C. § 1983, in federal or state court. You could choose instead to file a tort action in state court (in the Court of Claims if you are in New York), or to file an Article 78 petition in state court if you are in New York. More information on all of these types of cases can be found in Chapter 5 (on choosing a court and a lawsuit), Chapter 14 (on the Prison Litigation Reform Act), Chapter 16 (42 U.S.C. § 1983 and Bivens Actions), Chapter 17 (Tort Actions), and Chapter 22 (New York's Article 78) of the JLM.

If you decide to pursue a claim in federal court, you need to read JLM, Chapter 14, on the Prison Litigation Reform Act ("PLRA"). Failure to follow the PLRA's requirements can lead, among other things, to the loss of good time credits and the right to bring future claims in federal court without paying the full filing fee.

B. The Right to General (Non-Legal) Correspondence

If you are a state prisoner, your right to communicate with the outside world is protected by the U.S. Constitution, and the constitution, statutes, and regulations of the state in which you are imprisoned. If you are a federal prisoner, the U.S. Constitution, and federal statutes and regulations protect your rights.

1. Federal Constitutional Protections

The First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution creates a minimum level of protection of your right to communicate with the outside world. No government body may pass laws or regulations falling below this level of protection. Some states may also provide more protection of your right to communicate with the outside world, through state constitutions and statutes. The following is a discussion of the U.S. Constitution's minimum guarantees of your right to communicate. While reading the information below, it is important to keep in mind that courts distinguish between incoming and outgoing mail. Restrictions on incoming mail are greater than on outgoing mail because incoming mail can pose a greater security threat.

In Procunier v. Martinez,[5] later partially overruled, the U.S. Supreme Court held that arbitrary censorship of both incoming and outgoing general prison correspondence (regulations preventing you from sending or receiving all or part of your mail) violated the First Amendment right to free speech of both prisoners and their correspondents.[6] The Court held that censorship of prison mail was allowed only to further certain substantial government interests such as prison order, security, and rehabilitation.[7] The Court also held that when some censorship was justified, the censorship could not be greater than necessary to serve valid government interests.[8] This case applied to both incoming and outgoing mail.

Martinez was applied by lower state and federal courts when they reviewed acts of prison censorship, and courts often, but not always, found such acts unconstitutional.[9] In 1989, however, the Supreme Court in

---

5. Procunier v. Martinez, 416 U.S. 396, 94 S. Ct. 1800, 40 L. Ed. 2d 224 (1974).

6. Procunier v. Martinez, 416 U.S. 396, 411–12, 94 S. Ct. 1800, 1810, 40 L. Ed. 2d 224, 239 (1974).

7. Procunier v. Martinez, 416 U.S. 396, 412, 94 S. Ct. 1800, 1811, 40 L. Ed. 2d 224, 240 (1974).

8. Procunier v. Martinez, 416 U.S. 396, 412–13, 94 S. Ct. 1800, 1811, 40 L. Ed. 2d 224, 240 (1974). Note that the Supreme Court has severely limited the force of this requirement by refusing to interpret it as imposing a "least restrictive means" test. This means that lower courts will not invalidate a regulation simply because a less restrictive alternative is proposed. Thornburgh v. Abbott, 490 U.S. 401, 410–11, 109 S. Ct. 1874, 1880, 104 L. Ed. 2d 459, 471 (1989).

9. See McNamara v. Moody, 606 F.2d 621, 624 (5th Cir. 1979). In McNamara, the court held that prison officials violated a prisoner's constitutional rights by refusing to mail a letter from the prisoner to his girlfriend in which the prisoner charged that the mail censoring officer, while reading mail, engaged in masturbation and "had sex" with a cat. The court further noted that prison officials could not justify their conduct on the grounds that to allow such letters Thornburgh v. Abbott[10] partially overruled Martinez. This means that you must be very careful in relying on cases decided before 1989 as they may no longer be good law.

In Abbott, the Court partially overruled Martinez by specifying that the Martinez standard applies only to outgoing correspondence—correspondence sent by a prisoner to someone outside the prison. For incoming correspondence (correspondence received by a prisoner from the outside), a different standard applies. This standard comes from Turner v. Safley,[11] and states that restrictions on incoming mail are valid if they are reasonably related to a legitimate penological interest.[12] Four factors must be considered in determining whether a limitation on your incoming mail meets this standard: (1) the rational connection between the mail restriction and the prison's penological interest; (2) alternatives available to prisoners to exercise their rights; (3) the burden of accommodating rights; and (4) the lack of alternatives available to prisons in satisfying their interests.[13] The reason the Abbott Court gave for treating incoming and outgoing mail differently was that mail containing contraband that comes into the prison is more of a security threat than mail that leaves the prison.[14]

Although the Turner standard may appear to be similar to the Martinez standard, there is a significant difference between the two. To satisfy the Turner standard (for incoming correspondence), prison officials must simply show the regulation could potentially achieve a legitimate goal. To meet the Martinez standard (for outgoing correspondence), officials must demonstrate that the restriction actually achieves an important goal. Thus, there are two main differences between the two standards: (1) the purposes that restrictions on outgoing mail are meant to serve must be important and not just legitimate; and (2) restrictions on outgoing mail must be shown to be more effective than restrictions on incoming mail need to be. As a result, it is easier to convince a judge that restrictions on outgoing mail are unconstitutional than it is to show restrictions on incoming mail are unconstitutional. The standards for incoming and outgoing correspondence are explained further below with the help of examples to indicate how courts have interpreted them.

(a) Outgoing Correspondence

Restrictions on outgoing, non-legal mail must further an important governmental objective, and the restriction must be no greater than necessary.[15] Courts have generally upheld four important types of regulations on outgoing mail under this standard: (1) regulations banning letter kiting (including mail to a third party in your letter to someone else),[16] (2) setting postage limits,[17] (3) banning inmate-to-inmate correspondence,[18] and (4) requiring approved correspondence lists.[19]

Under New York State regulations, when the prison authorities have a reason to suspect that a prisoner is kiting mail (sending third party messages through sealed general correspondence), they may open a prisoner's outgoing mail.[20] However, they must have proof that the officials reasonably believed the prisoner would result in a breakdown in prison security and discipline, or on the grounds that the letter was obscene or libelous.

---

10. Thornburgh v. Abbott, 490 U.S. 401, 412–14, 109 S. Ct. 1874, 1881–82, 104 L. Ed. 2d 459, 473 (1989).

11. Turner v. Safley, 482 U.S. 78, 107 S. Ct. 2254, 96 L. Ed. 2d 64 (1987).

12. Thornburgh v. Abbott, 490 U.S. 401, 412–14, 109 S. Ct. 1874, 1881–82, 104 L. Ed. 2d 459, 473 (1989) (finding that outgoing materials are less likely to cause disorder than incoming materials and determining that incoming materials should be held to a higher standard of inspection than outgoing mail).

13. Turner v. Safley, 482 U.S. 78, 89–91, 107 S. Ct. 2254, 2262, 96 L. Ed. 2d 64, 79–80 (1987).

14. Thornburgh v. Abbott, 490 U.S. 401, 413, 109 S. Ct. 1874, 1881–82, 104 L. Ed. 2d 459, 473 (1989).

15. Procunier v. Martinez, 416 U.S. 396, 413–14, 94 S. Ct. 1800, 1811, 40 L. Ed. 2d 224, 240 (1974) (holding that restrictions on mail must satisfy this test); Thornburgh v. Abbott, 490 U.S. 401, 413, 109 S. Ct. 1874, 1881, 104 L. Ed. 2d 459, 473 (1989) (limiting the Martinez test to outgoing mail).

16. See, e.g., United States v. Felipe, 148 F.3d 101, 110 (2d Cir. 1998).

17. See, e.g., Davidson v. Mann, 129 F.3d 700, 702 (2d Cir. 1997).

18. See, e.g., Purnell v. Lord, 952 F.2d 679, 683 (2d Cir. 1992).

19. See, e.g., Palmigiano v. Travisono, 317 F. Supp. 776, 791 (D.R.I. 1970).

20. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 720.3(p) (2007); see United States v. Felipe, 148 F.3d 101, 110 (2d Cir. 1998) (upholding restrictions on kiting).

was kiting mail.[21] Receiving incoming kited mail is also prohibited, though it is permissible for someone to send you the writing of a minor child within an adult's correspondence.[22]

Courts have also held that prison authorities are permitted to restrict the amount of postage you can spend on outgoing mail.[23] Similarly, courts have generally upheld prison policies that restrict receiving postage in the mail and providing free postage.[24] These restrictions relate to the legitimate penological interest of security because postage stamps can be used as currency (and thus lead to increased theft and unregulated transactions) and because drugs can be smuggled on stamps.[25]

Many prisons completely ban inmate-to-inmate correspondence, and these restrictions have generally been upheld as reasonably relating to prison security.[26] As this situation involves both outgoing and incoming correspondence, it presents a slightly different case from purely outgoing mail. But, because only the rights of prisoners and not those of the general public are involved, the courts are generally not as concerned about the restriction of rights. Inmate-to-inmate correspondence was at issue in Turner v. Safley, in which the Supreme Court announced the reasonable relation standard that is applied in all incoming correspondence cases and even in many outgoing correspondence cases.[27] In addition, courts have also found restrictions barring correspondence between current and former inmates to be constitutional because they are rationally related to security interests such as preventing escapes and violent acts.[28]

Whether "approved correspondence lists" for outgoing non-legal mail are constitutional is unclear. In Milburn v. McNiff,[29] a New York court found unconstitutional a policy requiring prisoners who wanted to communicate with people not on their "approved correspondence lists" to submit a "request to correspond form" to the addressee. On the other hand, various federal district courts have found such a regulation to be "a reasonable method of maintaining prison security without undue restriction on the First Amendment rights of prisoners."[30] Such lists, of course, must pass Martinez and have only been upheld when a substantial penological (prison-related) interest in security or rehabilitation is involved.[31] In New York, state courts might follow McNiff and prohibit the use of this type of list all together. But, in other states or in federal court, the lists may be upheld, provided they are legitimately used to further prison security or rehabilitation.[32]

---

21. See Ode v. Kelly, 159 A.D.2d 1000, 1000, 552 N.Y.S.2d 475, 476 (4th Dept. 1990) (finding inspection of prisoner's outgoing mail violated his rights where the superintendent had no reason to suspect prisoner was kiting mail). But see Minigan v. Irvin, 977 F. Supp. 607, 609–10 (W.D.N.Y. 1997) (permitting screening of prisoner's outgoing mail provided there is "good cause pursuant to legitimate prison regulations and directives.").

22. State of New York, Department of Correctional Services, Handbook for Families and Friends of New York State DOCS Inmates 5 (2007).

23. See Gittens v. Sullivan, 670 F. Supp. 119, 123 (S.D.N.Y. 1987) (finding $1.10 per week for stamps and an additional advance of $36 for legal mailings satisfied the constitutional minimum for access to the courts); see also Davidson v. Mann, 129 F.3d 700, 702 (2d Cir. 1997) (upholding limits on prisoner's access to stamps for non-legal mail).

24. See Johnson v. Goord, 445 F.3d 532, 534–35 (2d Cir. 2006).

25. Johnson v. Goord, 445 F.3d 532, 535 (2d Cir. 2006).

26. See, e.g., Purnell v. Lord, 952 F.2d 679, 683 (2d Cir. 1992) (finding restriction on correspondence between inmates at different facilities reasonably related to security interests); Farrell v. Peters, 951 F.2d 862, 863 (7th Cir. 1992) (finding preventing correspondence between inmates reasonably related to security).

27. See generally Turner v. Safley, 482 U.S. 78, 107 S. Ct. 2254, 96 L. Ed. 2d 64 (1987).

28. Nasir v. Morgan, 350 F.3d 366, 371–72 (3d Cir. 2003).

29. Milburn v. McNiff, 81 A.D.2d 587, 589, 437 N.Y.S.2d 445, 448 (2d Dept. 1981).

30. Palmigiano v. Travisono, 317 F. Supp. 776, 791 (D.R.I. 1970); see also George v. Smith, No. 05-C-403-C, 2005 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 16139, at *20 (D. Wis. Aug. 2, 2005) (unpublished) ("In the interest of maintaining prison security, prison officials may lawfully limit an inmate to corresponding with individuals on a pre-approved list."). But see Collins v. Schoonfield, 344 F. Supp. 257, 276 (D. Md. 1972) (criticizing the broad prohibition on reading inmate mail in Palmigiano v. Travisono); Guajardo v. Estelle, 580 F.2d 748, 755 (5th Cir. 1978) (finding unconstitutional a policy limiting letters sent by prisoners to family and an approved list of 10 individuals because it is not essential to further legitimate security interests and is often abused as applied); Finney v. Arkansas Bd. of Corr., 505 F.2d 194, 211–12 (8th Cir. 1974) (rejecting an approved correspondence list procedure because the justifications of prospectively investigating potential visitors, universally prohibiting correspondence with former inmates, and assuring that no unwanted mail was received by unapproved recipients were not enough).

31. See Finney v. Arkansas Bd. of Corr., 505 F.2d 194, 211 (8th Cir. 1974) (finding an approved correspondence list unconstitutional where the prison justified it as pre-screening potential visitors and protecting those who might not want to receive mail from prisoners).

32. Cf. United States v. Felipe, 148 F.3d 101, 110–11 (2d Cir. 1998) (upholding as serving security interests the

In addition to the above, you generally must provide a return address on all outgoing mail.[33]

Finally, courts do not allow prison officials to censor and discipline prisoners based on statements in mail that are intended to insult prison personnel, even if such statements would be prohibited if expressed verbally.[34] Courts have also upheld regulations that call for the routine inspection of all non-legal outgoing mail.[35] They have distinguished between censorship and inspection for security reasons.[36] One court has even upheld the censorship of outgoing mail under the Martinez standard.[37]

When the regulation at issue involves both incoming and outgoing correspondence, courts have applied the Turner standard.[38] A few courts have even departed entirely from the Martinez standard, instead applying the Turner reasonableness standard to outgoing mail as well. In general, courts are increasingly deferring to prison officials' reasons for placing restrictions on outgoing correspondence.[39]

(b) Incoming Correspondence

Regarding the restriction of incoming correspondence (mail and publications sent to you), the Court in Thornburgh v. Abbott held that the proper standard of review was the one stated in Turner v. Safley.[40] In Turner the Court held that "[w]here the regulations at issue concern the entry of materials into the prison, ... a regulation that gives prison authorities broad discretion is appropriate."[41] Under the Turner standard, restrictions are valid if they are reasonably related to a legitimate penological interest (for example, security, order, or rehabilitation). This "reasonably related" standard is more general than the Martinez standard and less protective of your right to communicate.

---

unique, severe restrictions on mail and visitation to a court-approved list for gang member convicted of racketeering).

33. See, e.g., 28 C.F.R. § 540.14(c)(1)(iv) (2007) (staff at a minimum- or low-security federal prison may open the prisoner's outgoing mail if the prisoner has not filled out the return address properly); N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 720.3(i) (2005) (requiring New York State prisoners to include their return addresses on outgoing mail).

34. Cases where prisoners are not certain if their defamatory (insulting) comments will be read should be treated differently than cases involving defamatory comments directed at prison officials. See Loggins v. Delo, 999 F.2d 364, 367 (8th Cir. 1993) (finding that prison official violated prisoner's 1st Amendment rights by disciplining a prisoner after reading a prisoner's letter to his brother that commented about prison guards where the letter did not raise a security risk and was not directed towards staff); Brooks v. Andolina, 826 F.2d 1266, 1268 (3d Cir. 1987) (finding no government interest in censorship); Hall v. Curran, 818 F.2d 1040, 1044–45 (2d Cir. 1987) (finding the district court should not have granted summary judgment to prison administrator against a prisoner's 1st Amendment claim for censorship of his statements critical of prison administration). But see Leonard v. Nix, 55 F.3d 370, 376 (8th Cir. 1995) (finding that prisoners cannot send letters as personal communication that are extremely offensive to prison personnel if their purpose is only to defame (insult) prison personnel and not to communicate).

35. Bell-Bey v. Williams, 87 F.3d 832, 838 (6th Cir. 1996) (holding that a mail inspection procedure did not violate a prisoner's 1st Amendment rights because the procedure was limited to protecting the legitimate government interest of managing scarce prison resources); Stow v. Grimaldi, 993 F.2d 1002, 1004 (1st Cir. 1993) (finding that inspection procedures served the legitimate government interest of safety).

36. Altizer v. Deeds, 191 F.3d 540, 549 (4th Cir. 1999) (holding that inspection of prisoner's mail was not a constitutional violation since there is a substantial government interest in censoring materials harmful to security).

37. Martyr v. Mazur-Hart, 789 F. Supp. 1081, 1085–86 (D. Or. 1992) (allowing a mental institution's refusal to send letters written by a prisoner because the censorship furthered the important governmental interest of rehabilitation; the writing hindered the prisoner's progress).

38. See Duamutef v. Hollins, 297 F.3d 108, 113 (2d Cir. 2002) (upholding mail watch on all incoming and outgoing mail based on Turner standard as furthering the government interest of security where inflammatory material had previously circulated through the mail); Sisneros v. Nix, 884 F. Supp. 1313, 1331–33 (S.D. Iowa 1995) (upholding under the Turner standard a regulation that prohibited the delivery to or from a prisoner of letters written in a language other than English unless that language was the only one a prisoner spoke); Martin v. Rison, 741 F. Supp. 1406, 1413, 1417 (N.D. Cal. 1990) (upholding a regulation that prohibited prisoners from acting as reporters for newspapers published outside the prison; the court based its decision in part on the fact that the article, although published outside the prison, was read within the prison and caused agitation amongst prisoners resulting in a need for security adjustment and meriting application of the Turner standard to the regulation).

39. Altizer v. Deeds, 191 F.3d 540, 549 (4th Cir. 1999) (holding that the inspection of outgoing mail was not a 1st Amendment violation under the Turner standard); Butti v. Unger, No. 04-5381, 2005 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 14408, at *9 (S.D.N.Y. Jan. 15, 2005) (unpublished) (citing Turner standard as basis for surveillance of prisoner's outgoing mail when officials were suspicious of prisoner's creating fake names to send mail to recipients other than those the letters addressed).

40. Thornburgh v. Abbott, 490 U.S. 401, 404, 109 S. Ct. 1874, 1877, 104 L. Ed. 2d 459, 467 (1989) (citing Turner v. Safley, 482 U.S. 78, 89, 107 S. Ct. 2254, 2261–62, 96 L. Ed. 2d 64, 79 (1987)).

41. Thornburgh v. Abbott, 490 U.S. 401, 416, 109 S. Ct. 1874, 1883, 104 L. Ed. 2d 459, 475 (1989).

The Court has identified four factors for determining whether a restriction meets the reasonably related standard. The first and most important factor is whether the regulation is both neutral and rationally related to the alleged legitimate government interest.[42] This factor can be broken down into three subparts:

(1) Whether the government interest or goal is legitimate;
(2) Whether the regulation is rationally related to that interest or goal; and
(3) Whether the regulation is neutral.

Regarding subpart (1), the government interest used to justify restrictions on mail is usually either maintenance of prison security or screening for contraband. Courts almost always hold these two interests to be legitimate.[43] Under the Turner standard, the relationship between a mail restriction and the stated government interest does not need to be very close. Prisons do not need to prove the restrictions will actually promote security or screen contraband in all cases; they only need to convince the court that the restriction might achieve these goals. Courts usually find the government's argument to be valid.[44] Nevertheless, when courts invalidate restrictions on mail, they usually do so because no rational relation exists between the regulation and the government interest.[45] Finally, regulations are considered neutral under subpart (3) as long as the government interest is unrelated to suppressing expression. In other words, as long as the purpose of the restriction is something other than stopping you from expressing yourself, the restriction will be considered neutral.[46]

The second factor of the reasonably related standard is whether the regulation leaves open an alternate way for the prisoner to exercise the right asserted.[47] Courts usually define the right in question broadly, making it easier to show how a prisoner can still exercise that right. For example, in Thornburgh v. Abbott, where the regulation at issue prohibited publications containing sexually explicit material, the court defined the right in question not as the right to receive sexually explicit materials but simply as the right to expression, which it held could be exercised through the many other publications that were not prohibited.[48]

The third and fourth factors are usually interrelated. The third factor is the impact that accommodating the right will have on other prisoners, guards, and prison resources. The fourth factor is whether there are any ready alternatives to the proposed regulation.[49] Because the accommodation of a right will usually require alternatives to the regulation, these two factors are often combined. For example, accommodating a prisoner's right to receive blank greeting cards from non-vendors would require extensive searches of an increased volume of incoming mail. Such searches may be considered both an unacceptable impact of the accommodation of the right and an unacceptable alternative to the regulation at issue.[50]

(c) "As Applied" versus "Facial" Challenges

Most cases discussed in this Chapter so far involve facial challenges—challenges to the regulation as written. But, because many prison regulations are vague, it is often hard for judges to object to them. In such cases, prisoners may instead bring an as applied challenge. As applied challenges are brought when a prisoner objects to the way prison officials apply a regulation to him, rather than to the regulation itself.

---

42. Thornburgh v. Abbott, 490 U.S. 401, 414, 109 S. Ct. 1874, 1882, 104 L. Ed. 2d 459, 473 (1989).

43. See, e.g., Pell v. Procunier, 417 U.S. 817, 823, 94 S. Ct. 2800, 2804, 41 L. Ed. 2d 495, 502 (1974) ("[C]entral to all other corrections goals is the institutional consideration of internal security within the corrections facilities themselves.").

44. E.g., Waterman v. Farmer, 183 F.3d 208, 214–15 (3d Cir. 1999) (finding a regulation that prohibited sex offenders from receiving sexually explicit publications to be rationally connected to the interest of rehabilitation where a psychologist testified that such materials could hinder rehabilitation); Avery v. Powell, 806 F. Supp. 7, 7–8 (D.N.H. 1992) (finding a regulation that prohibited prisoners from receiving blank greeting cards from anyone other than the vendor to be rationally connected to the interests of promoting security and screening for contraband; the court noted that cards are often multipart, contained within envelopes, or decorated with metals or flammable substances, so cards received from non-vendors would necessitate time-consuming searches).

45. See, e.g., Crofton v. Roe, 170 F.3d 957, 960–61 (9th Cir. 1999) (invalidating a regulation that limited the publications prisoners can receive to those ordered and paid for directly by the prisoner because the court found no rational relation between the regulation and the asserted interests of screening for contraband, minimizing fire hazards, or preventing overcrowding).

46. See Thornburgh v. Abbott, 490 U.S. 401, 415–16, 109 S. Ct. 1874, 1882–83, 104 L. Ed. 2d 459, 474 (1989).

47. Thornburgh v. Abbott, 490 U.S. 401, 417, 109 S. Ct. 1874, 1883, 104 L. Ed. 2d 459, 476 (1989).

48. Thornburgh v. Abbott, 490 U.S. 401, 418, 109 S. Ct. 1874, 1884, 104 L. Ed. 2d 459, 476 (1989).

49. Thornburgh v. Abbott, 490 U.S. 401, 418, 109 S. Ct. 1874, 1884, 104 L. Ed. 2d 459, 476 (1989).

50. Avery v. Powell, 806 F. Supp. 7, 10–11 (D.N.H. 1992).

Nichols v. Nix[51] and Lyon v. Grossheim[52] are good examples of as applied challenges to prison policies.[53] In both cases, the regulation at issue simply gave the superintendent the power to deny a prisoner any publication likely to be disruptive or to produce violence. Because preventing disruptions and violence is always a legitimate goal, and because the regulation only applies to publications that are likely to hinder these goals, the regulation facially passed the Turner standard. Therefore, the court upheld both regulations as they were written. However, the court held that prison officials applied the regulations in an unconstitutional manner. In both cases, the court held that there was no evidence that the publications at issue were likely to threaten prison security because other prisoners had possessed similar publications without incident.[54]

If you think a prison policy is being applied in an unconstitutional way, you can challenge it even though it may look, as written, like policies that courts have upheld in the past.

(d) Procedural Safeguards

Note that several important procedural safeguards established by Procunier v. Martinez[55] must still be respected by prison officials. First, a prisoner should be notified if prison officials return a letter addressed to him or if a letter by a prisoner is returned to the prison. Second, the author of the returned letter should be given a reasonable opportunity to protest the decision to restrict.[56]

2. State and Federal Protections of the Right to General (Non-Legal) Correspondence

State and federal regulations may give you more rights than those the U.S. Constitution provides—they cannot take away any rights guaranteed by the Constitution, but they can provide more than the Constitution does. The following is a discussion of New York State and City regulations, as well as federal regulations governing your right to communicate in writing with the general public. Prisoners in other states must consult their state and local regulations.[57]

(a) New York State and City Regulations

In New York, the specific regulations governing your right to communicate with the outside world depend on the type of institution in which you are imprisoned. There are three different sets of regulations. One set applies only to prisons run by the New York State Department of Correctional Services (for example, Attica). The second applies to all city and county prisons and jails (for example, Nassau County Jail), and the third applies only to New York City prisons and jails (for example, Rikers Island). The Department of Correctional Services issued the first set of regulations, the New York State Commission of Correction the second, and the New York City Department of Correction and/or the Board of Correction the third. If you are in a New York City jail, both the second and third sets of regulations apply to you. If more than one set of regulations applies to you, courts will use the ones that give you more protection.

New York State regulations, which apply to prisons run by the Department of Correctional Services, provide additional protections to your right to communicate beyond the minimum the Constitution requires. These regulations allow prisoners, with some restrictions, to correspond with any person.[58] State regulations only prohibit prisoners from corresponding with people who have indicated they do not wish to receive mail from the prisoner or with persons listed on a court order of protection.[59] Furthermore, prisoners must receive 51. Nichols v. Nix, 810 F. Supp. 1448, 1467 (S.D. Iowa 1993) (striking down a regulation as it was used to restrict publications that promoted racial segregation).

---

52. Lyon v. Grossheim, 803 F. Supp. 1538, 1555 (S.D. Iowa 1992) (invalidating an official action denying prisoners access to "anti-Catholic" comic books which also contained negative references to homosexuality and the Soviet Union).

53. The cases were both decided in the Southern District of Iowa. Though they are only binding on prisons in that district, they provide good examples of as-applied challenges that you can bring elsewhere.

54. Nichols v. Nix, 810 F. Supp. 1448, 1463 (S.D. Iowa 1993) ("[T]he record is ... devoid of evidence of past inmate confrontations as a result of other inmates possessing or reading [such] publications."); Lyon v. Grossheim, 803 F. Supp. 1538, 1552–53 (S.D. Iowa 1992).

55. Procunier v. Martinez, 416 U.S. 396, 418–19, 94 S. Ct. 1800, 1814, 40 L. Ed. 2d 224, 243 (1974). See Sheldon Krantz, The Law of Corrections and Prisoners' Rights in a Nutshell § 17, at 142 (3d ed. 1988).

56. Procunier v. Martinez, 416 U.S. 396, 418–19, 94 S. Ct. 1800, 1814, 40 L. Ed. 2d 224, 243 (1974).

57. JLM, Chapter 2, "Introduction to Legal Research," will be helpful in conducting this research.

58. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 720.3 (2007).

59. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 720.3(a) (2007).

advance approval in order to correspond with unrelated minors, persons on parole or probation, other New York prisoners, employees or former employees of the Department of Correctional Services, and victims of the prisoner's crime(s).[60] State regulations also prohibit prison officials from opening, inspecting, or reading outgoing correspondence (except for oversized envelopes, parcels, and prisoner-to-prisoner correspondence) without written authorization from the facility superintendent.[61] The superintendent cannot provide such authorization unless there is a reason to believe that the correspondence violates the department's regulations or that it threatens the safety, security, or good order of the prison. If authorization is given, the superintendent must set forth, in writing, the specific facts justifying it.[62] With respect to incoming mail, New York State regulations require the inspection of all such mail,[63] but prohibit the reading of incoming correspondence (except for prisoner-to-prisoner letters and prisoner business mail) unless there is evidence that the mail contains plans for sending contraband in or out of the prison, plans for criminal activity, or information that would create a danger to others or to the prison's security and good order.[64] The facility superintendent must provide written authorization to read incoming correspondence and must specify why reading the mail is necessary.[65] It is also important to be aware of your facility's specific restrictions on what can be sent through the mail; failing to follow these rules can result in your mail not reaching you.[66]

The local county jail regulations also provide protections.[67] These regulations provide that you may correspond, with a few restrictions, with anyone you wish. Prison officials may not impose restrictions based on the amount of mail sent or received, or based on the language in which the correspondence is written.[68] Outgoing correspondence may not be opened or read unless the chief administrative officer gives written approval based on a "reasonable suspicion" that the correspondence threatens the security of the prison or of another person.[69] Incoming correspondence may be opened outside the presence of the prisoner-recipient to ensure the absence of contraband, but it may not be read without the written approval of the chief administrative officer.[70] Any information prison officials obtain by opening your incoming correspondence without the superintendent's authorization may not be used in a disciplinary hearing against you.[71]

New York City has additional standards set out in the "Minimum Standards for New York City Correctional Facilities."[72] New York City prisoners are urged to familiarize themselves with these standards. Find out if your prison library has a copy; if it does not, ask the librarian to get one. Copies of "Minimum Standards" can be obtained by writing to:

City of New York
Board of Correction
51 Chambers Street, Room 923
New York, NY 10007

60. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 720.3(b) (2007).
61. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, §§ 720.3(c)–(e) (2007).
62. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 720.3(e) (2007).
63. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 720.4(a)(2) (2007).
64. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 720.4(e) (2007).
65. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 720.4(f) (2007).
66. Items prohibited in incoming correspondence include obscene, threatening, or fraudulent materials, nude photographs, Polaroid pictures, postage stamps, and letters from others (kiting) except minor children. There is also a five-page limit on incoming correspondence. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, §§ 720.4(c)–(d) (2008). See http://www.docs.state.ny.us/directives/4911.pdf for additional restrictions on packages brought or sent to you in prison.
67. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 9, § 7004 (2008).
68. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 9, § 7004.1(b) (2008).
69. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 9, §§ 7004.2 (f)–(g) (2008).
70. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 9, §§ 7004.3 (a)–(b) (2008).
71. See Chavis. v. Goord, 265 A.D.2d 798, 798, 697 N.Y.S.2d 409, 410 (4th Dept. 1999) (reversing a disciplinary decision because prison investigation relied on information obtained through unauthorized review of prisoner's mail).
72. Codified at Chapter 1 of Title 40 of the Rules of the City of New York, available at http://24.97.137.100/nyc/rcny/entered.htm (last visited Sept. 19, 2010).

The Board of Correction approved changes to these standards in early 2008; these revisions are the first since the Minimum Standards were enacted in 1978.[73] These changes, which have implications for mail and telephone surveillance in New York City facilities,[74] went into effect on June 16, 2008.[75]

(b) Federal Regulations

If you are a federal prisoner (in a prison run by the Bureau of Prisons), you are subject to mail regulations the Federal Bureau of Prisons has issued. Some rules concerning general correspondence follow.

The warden of each prison has the authority to establish your rules of correspondence.[76] The specific rules the warden develops must be communicated to you in writing upon his arrival at the prison.[77] Prison authorities may open and read your mail if they determine doing so is necessary to maintain security or monitor a specific problem.[78] They may not read mail that is "special" or "privileged," although they may open it (in your presence only) to ensure that there is no contraband in the envelope.[79] "Special" or "privileged" mail includes mail from attorneys, law enforcement officers, courts, and public officials. Regulations governing privileged mail are discussed further in Part C of this Chapter.

Prison officials may not open and read mail you are sending from a minimum- or low-security prison unless they have "reason to believe [the mail] would interfere with the orderly running [of the prison], that it would be threatening to the recipient, or that it would facilitate criminal activity."[80] In medium- and high-security institutions, prison officials may read all mail other than "special mail."[81]

Federal prisons must supply you with paper and envelopes at no cost, but you must pay for stamps. If you cannot afford postage, the warden must provide stamps for a reasonable number of letters per month.[82]

For more information and details about the federal regulations, you should consult the relevant regulations themselves. They can be found in the Code of Federal Regulations, 28 C.F.R. § 540.

3. A Note on Foreign-Language Materials

The ability of prisons to restrict correspondence in foreign languages remains unclear. Some courts have found that regulations prohibiting prisoners from writing and receiving letters in languages that cannot be understood by prison officials are permissible as reasonably related to the legitimate prison interest of security.[83] On the other hand, some courts have held that a complete ban on all foreign-language

---

73. See City of N.Y. Bd. of Corr., Notice of Adoption of Amendments to the Minimum Standards, Coalition to Raise the Minimum Standards, available at http://www.nycjailreform.org/documents/MINIMUM%20STANDARDS%20FINAL%20APPROVED%20AMENDMENTS%20051908.pdf (last visited Sept. 19, 2010).

74. For instance, an amendment to § 1-10(h) allows correctional facilities to monitor prisoner phone calls with prior notice but without a warrant (with the exception of calls to attorneys, physicians, and like parties). An amendment to § 1-11(c)(6) and (e)(1) allows prison officials to read general correspondence with a warden's written order instead of only with a court order. An amendment to § 1-11(a) allows curtailment of general correspondence privileges where reasonably necessary to protect public safety or maintain prison security. See http://www.nycjailreform.org/newrules.html (last visited Sept. 19, 2010).

75. See Coalition to Raise the Minimum Standards, http://www.nycjailreform.org/newrules.html (last visited Sept. 19, 2010).

76. 28 C.F.R. § 540.10 (2007).

77. 28 C.F.R. § 540.12(b) (2007).

78. 28 C.F.R. §§ 540.12, 540.14(a) (2007).

79. 28 C.F.R. § 540.12 (2007).

80. 28 C.F.R. § 540.14 (c)(1)(i) (2007). Prison authorities can also read this mail if you are on a restricted correspondence list, if the mail is being sent to another prisoner, or if the return address on the envelope is incomplete. 28 C.F.R. §§ 540.14 (c)(1)(ii)–(iv) (2007).

81. 28 C.F.R. § 540.14(c)(2) (2007).

82. 28 C.F.R. §§ 540.21(a), (b), (d), (e) (2007). See also Gittens v. Sullivan, 670 F. Supp. 119, 121, 123 (S.D.N.Y. 1987) (finding reasonable the provision of an amount equal to five free stamps per week for all correspondence, in addition to a $20 advance for legal mail, where the superintendent may advance additional funds for postage on legal mail if the inmate exceeds the twenty dollar limit), aff'd, 848 F.2d 389 (2nd Cir. 1988).

83. See, e.g., Ortiz v. Fort Dodge Corr. Facility, 368 F.3d 1024, 1026–27 (8th Cir. 2004) (finding acceptable a regulation that prohibited inmates from writing letters in Spanish absent a ready alternative interpreter option). See also Sisneros v. Nix, 884 F. Supp. 1313, 1331–33 (S.D. Iowa 1995) (upholding a regulation that prohibited the delivery of letters to or from a prisoner written in a language other than English unless that language was the only one spoken by a prisoner), aff'd in part and rev'd in part on other grounds, 95 F.3d 749, 750 (8th Cir. 1996); Nelson v. Woodford, No. C 04-03684 CRB (PR), 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 11120, at *25–30 (N.D. Cal. Mar. 2, 2006) (stating that a ban on foreign-language publications was rationally related to the security goal of preventing coded communication by gangs), aff'd, 249 correspondence is not rational.[84] Additionally, some courts have found the exclusion of foreign-language publications unreasonable under this standard.[85] By statute in New York State, prison officials may not impose restrictions based on the language in which the mail is written.[86] Make sure to check statutes, regulations, and court decisions in your state to find out what the law is.

C. Legal Correspondence with Courts, Public Officials, and Attorneys: Privileged Correspondence

Procunier v. Martinez[87] and Thornburgh v. Abbott,[88] two important cases discussed in Part B(1) of this Chapter, do not distinguish between legal and non-legal correspondence. As a result, both kinds of mail generally receive the same level of First Amendment protection under those cases. However, legal mail—correspondence with courts, public officials, and attorneys—receives heightened protection because censorship of this mail implicates two other important concerns: your right of meaningful access to the courts and the attorney-client privilege. This Section discusses each of these sources of protection separately. Mail to and from attorneys, courts, paralegals, and legal organizations is treated as privileged and receives heightened protection (for instance, this mail cannot usually be censored). Mail to and from other public officials and agencies is also usually treated as privileged and given more protection than regular mail.

1. First Amendment Protections of Martinez and Abbott

Some courts have held that legal mail is entitled to a higher degree of First Amendment protection than other mail and that "prison policies or practices which interfere with legal mail on a regular basis ... must be supported by a legitimate penological interest other than mere general security concerns which permit interference with regular mail."[89] Even when this analysis is not applied, courts generally give legal mail more consideration than non-legal mail in evaluating restrictions.[90]

(a) Incoming Legal Correspondence

Correspondence from your attorney is incoming mail, and so restrictions on it are evaluated under the Turner standard.[91] Restrictions on privileged incoming mail do not violate the First Amendment if the restrictions are reasonably related to a legitimate need to manage the prison or carry out your penalty. In Wolff v. McDonnell,[92] the U.S. Supreme Court held a state can require your lawyer to clearly mark her letters as coming from an attorney, and can require that her address be written on the envelope if the letters are to receive special treatment,[93] and finally, can require your lawyer to identify herself to prison officials before correspondence with the prisoner begins.[94] For example, in 2009, the Ninth Circuit of the U.S. Court of Appeals denied a prisoner's constitutional claims because the return address on his legal mail did not indicate that it came from an attorney, a valid prerequisite under California law for legal mail to receive

---

Fed. Appx. 529, 530 (9th Cir. 2007).

84. Thongvanh v. Thalacker, 17 F.3d 256, 259 (8th Cir. 1994) (holding that since the prison could have secured free translation services, the ban on a Lao prisoner's correspondence was not rational).

85. See, e.g., Kikimura v. Turner, 28 F.3d 592, 598–600 (7th Cir. 1994) (invalidating a complete ban on foreign-language materials).

86. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 9, § 7004.1(b)(2) (2007).

87. Procunier v. Martinez, 416 U.S. 396, 94 S. Ct. 1800, 40 L. Ed. 2d 224 (1974).

88. Thornburgh v. Abbott, 490 U.S. 401, 109 S. Ct. 1874, 104 L. Ed. 2d 459 (1989).

89. Cancel v. Goord, No. 00 CIV 2042 LMM, 2001 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 3440, at *17 (S.D.N.Y. Mar. 29, 2001) (unpublished).

90. Davis v. Goord, 320 F.3d 346, 351 (2d Cir. 2003) ("In balancing the competing interests implicated in restrictions on prison mail, courts have consistently afforded greater protection to legal mail than to non-legal mail...."); Sallier v. Brooks, 343 F.3d 868, 874 (6th Cir. 2003) ("[W]hen the incoming mail is "legal mail," we have heightened concern with allowing prison officials unfettered discretion to open and read an inmate's mail because a prison's security needs do not automatically trump a prisoner's First Amendment right to receive mail, especially correspondence that impacts upon or has import for the prisoner's legal rights, the attorney-client privilege, or the right of access to the courts.").

91. Thornburgh v. Abbott, 490 U.S. 401, 414–19, 109 S. Ct. 1874, 1882–85, 104 L. Ed. 2d 459, 473–77 (1989).

92. Wolff v. McDonnell, 418 U.S. 539, 576, 94 S. Ct. 2963, 2984–85, 41 L. Ed. 2d 935, 963 (1974).

93. Wolff v. McDonnell, 418 U.S. 539, 576, 94 S. Ct. 2963, 2984–85, 41 L. Ed. 2d 935, 963 (1974).

94. Wolff v. McDonnell, 418 U.S. 539, 576–77, 94 S. Ct. 2963, 2985, 41 L. Ed. 2d 935, 963 (1974).

special treatment.[95] Wolff seems to imply that prison officials cannot read or censor correspondence with your attorney if there is no suspicion that the correspondence is illegal, but this is not entirely clear.[96] According to Wolff, a requirement that letters from an attorney to a prisoner be opened by prison officials only in the presence of the prisoner may be more than what the Constitution demands.[97] Many courts, however, have since ruled that the prisoner must be present if the prison is opening his letters, or that the prisoner at least be given the opportunity to request such a safeguard.[98]

(b) Outgoing Legal Correspondence

Prisons cannot restrict correspondence sent to attorneys unless the restriction furthers an important or substantial governmental interest.[99] Some courts have found that outgoing legal correspondence does not present the same security threat as non-legal correspondence, and so there is minimal government interest in restricting it.[100] Letters to some government agencies, elected officials, and legal assistance and civil liberties groups enjoy the same protection as mail addressed to your attorney.[101] Also, the government has a duty to provide indigent prisoners with stationery and a reasonable amount of postage for legal mail.[102]

---

95. See Paulino v. Todd, No. 08-16081, 2009 U.S. App. LEXIS 16789, at *1 (9th Cir. July 28, 2009) (unpublished).

96. See Wolff v. McDonnell, 418 U.S. 539, 577, 94 S. Ct. 2963, 2985, 41 L. Ed. 2d 925, 963 (1974) ("As to the ability to open the mail in the presence of inmates, this could in no way constitute censorship, since the mail would not be read. Neither could it chill such communications, since the inmate's presence ensures that prison officials will not read the mail.").

97. Wolff v. McDonnell, 418 U.S. 539, 577, 94 S. Ct. 2963, 2985, 41 L. Ed. 2d 935, 963 (1974); see also Brewer v. Wilkinson, 3 F.3d 816, 825 (5th Cir. 1993) (holding "that the violation of the prison regulation requiring that a prisoner be present when his incoming legal mail is opened and inspected is not a violation of a prisoner's constitutional rights.").

98. See Sallier v. Brooks, 343 F.3d 868, 874 (6th Cir. 2003) (reaffirming that an opt-in policy, where a prisoner had to request being present when legal mail was opened, is constitutional so long as the prisoner is given written notice of it); Bach v. Illinois, 504 F.2d 1100, 1102 (7th Cir. 1974) (per curiam) (holding that because "prison officials in inspecting incoming mail outside the presence of an inmate are provided with an opportunity to obtain advanced warning of potential litigation which might involve the prison and, more significantly, could become privy to stratagems being formulated between attorney and client with regard to pending litigation," the prisoner is entitled to be present during the opening of legal mail addressed to him). Later cases with similar holdings to Bach include Powells v. Minnehaha County Sheriff Dept., 198 F.3d 711, 712 (8th Cir. 1999); Fontroy v. Beard, 485 F. Supp. 2d 592, 593, 601 (E.D. Pa. 2007) (finding that a Pennsylvania policy allowing prison staff to open incoming legal mail outside prisoners' presence is unconstitutional); and Kensu v. Haigh, 87 F.3d 172, 174 (6th Cir. 1996) (holding that a prisoner's right to be present during opening of his legal mail extends to hand-delivered correspondence as well as correspondence received through the U.S. Postal Service). But see John v. New York City Dept. of Corr., 183 F. Supp. 2d 619, 627–29 (S.D.N.Y. 2002) (dismissing prisoner's claim for denial of access to courts when prison officials opened mail outside his presence because he failed to prove either that the officials acted "deliberately and maliciously" in doing so or that he suffered any injury).

99. Procunier v. Martinez, 416 U.S. 396, 412–15, 94 S. Ct. 1800, 1811–12, 40 L. Ed. 2d 224, 239–42 (1974).

100. See Cancel v. Goord, No. 00 Civ. 2042 (LMM), 2001 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 3440, at *17 (S.D.N.Y. Mar. 21, 2001) (unpublished) (finding that without more than general security interests, interference with outgoing legal mail is unconstitutional) (citing Davidson v. Scully, 694 F.2d 50, 53 (2d Cir. 1982)); Taylor v. Sterrett, 532 F.2d 462, 473–475, 480 (5th Cir. 1976) (finding that censoring outgoing mail to attorneys, the courts or to government agencies is not significantly related to the advancement of jail security and thus unconstitutional).; Palmigiano v. Travisono, 317 F. Supp. 776, 792 (D.R.I. 1970)) (holding that the reading of any outgoing mail violates the 1st Amendment unless pursuant to a duly obtained search warrant).

101. See Davidson v. Scully, 694 F.2d 50, 53–54 (2d Cir. 1982) (striking down regulation restricting outgoing mail to government agencies because "[i]f prison officials are able to deny inmates free access to public officials and agencies, the fundamental right [of access to the courts] is restricted just as surely as if the government denied prisoners access to traditional legal materials. In many cases an inmate's claim might be substantially furthered by information or aid available through government agencies."). But see O'Keefe v. Van Boening, 82 F.3d 322, 323 (9th Cir. 1996) (upholding regulation treating grievance mail to state agencies as non-legal); Jackson v. Mowery, 743 F. Supp. 600, 606 (D. Ind. 1990) ("[T]he legal mail protected by the Constitution extends only to safeguard communications between an inmate and his attorney, and [defendant] has no basis for his claim of interference with 'legal mail' to and from his family and friends.").

102. See Bounds v. Smith, 430 U.S. 817, 824–25, 97 S. Ct. 1491, 1496, 52 L. Ed. 2d 72, 81 (1977) (stating that it is "indisputable that indigent inmates must be provided at state expense with paper and pen to draft legal documents with notary services to authenticate them, and with stamps to mail them"). But see Gaines v. Lane, 790 F.2d 1299, 1308 (7th Cir. 1986) (citing Bach v. Coughlin, 508 F.2d 303, 307 (7th Cir. 1974)) (explaining that while prisoners have a right to access the courts, they are not entitled to unlimited free postage, and prison officials can balance prisoners' rights to use the mails against budgetary concerns); Chandler v. Coughlin, 763 F.2d 110, 114 (2d Cir. 1985) (finding that state is not required to provide indigent prisoners unlimited free postage, but only a "reasonably adequate" amount of postage for

However, one federal district court case found that a ten-day delay in sending a prisoner's legal mail did not violate his limited constitutional right to freedom of association.[103] The mail was initially delayed because of insufficient funds on two occasions.[104]

2. Your Right to Meaningful Access to the Courts and Assistance of Counsel

You have a constitutional right to meaningful court access and assistance of counsel.[105] In Davidson v. Scully, the Second Circuit held that restrictions on a prisoner's legal mail can violate this right.[106] For example, courts have stated that allowing prison officials to read mail to courts or between attorneys and prisoners can prevent prisoners from bringing abuses to the attention of courts because they fear retaliation.[107] Thus, even if your First Amendment claim fails because the restriction at issue is related to an important government objective, you can still challenge the restriction if it prevents you from having meaningful court access.

However, these claims will not likely succeed unless you also prove that there was some actual harm to your ability to assert a legal claim.[108] In one recent New York case, the district court reiterated that to state a claim for denial of access to the courts, the plaintiff must show that the defendant's actions actually hindered his pursuit of legal claims and caused actual injury.[109] The court determined that the prisoner in this case experienced only inconvenience and a delay in sending outgoing mail, neither of which reach the threshold.[110] Some courts have also required that the interference be "deliberate and malicious."[111] In other access to the courts); Gittens v. Sullivan, 670 F.Supp. 119, 123 (S.D.N.Y. 1987) (finding that "$1.10 per week for stamps and an additional advance of $36.00 for legal mailings satisfies the constitutional minimum for access to the courts"), aff'd, 848 F.2d 389, 390 (2d Cir. 1988). Even though this right has been cut back somewhat, the Court has clearly held that a state violates prisoners' fundamental constitutional rights of access to the courts by failing to provide them with adequate legal library facilities. The right of access to the courts requires that prison officials assist prisoners in the preparation and filing of meaningful legal papers by providing law libraries and adequate assistance from persons trained in the law. Bounds v. Smith, 430 U.S. 817, 828, 97 S. Ct. 1491, 1498, 52 L. Ed. 2d 72, 83 (1977).

---

103. See Branham v. Mansfield, No. 2:04-CV-286, 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 87195 at *15 (W.D. Mich. 2009).

104. See Branham v. Mansfield, No. 2:04-CV-286, 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 87195 at *15 (W.D. Mich. 2009).

105. See Bounds v. Smith, 430 U.S. 817, 821–23, 97 S. Ct. 1491, 1494–95, 52 L. Ed. 2d 72, 78–80 (1977) (reviewing the history of Supreme Court decisions that have established a right of access to the courts and the assistance of counsel). But see Lewis v. Casey, 518 U.S. 343, 351, 116 S. Ct. 2174, 2180, 135 L. Ed. 2d 606, 618 (1996) (holding that a prisoner must prove that lack of necessary legal assistance or library actually hindered case). See Chapter 12 and Chapter 9, Part H of the JLM for a full discussion of the right to effective assistance of counsel.

106. Davidson v. Scully, 694 F.2d 50, 53 (2d Cir. 1982) (holding that prison officials who did not allow a prisoner to mail sealed letters to the Army Board for Corrections of Military Records, the Commanding Officer, United States Army Reserve Components Personnel Center, the Judge Advocate General, and the American Civil Liberties Union violated prisoner's right to meaningful access to the courts).

107. See Taylor v. Sterrett, 532 F.2d 462, 476 (5th Cir. 1976); Martin v. Brewer, 830 F.2d 76, 78–79 (7th Cir. 1987) (distinguishing incoming from outgoing mail to the courts on this ground).

108. See Lewis v. Casey, 518 U.S. 343, 351, 116 S. Ct. 2174, 2180, 135 L. Ed. 2d 606, 618 (1996) (holding the prisoner must prove his prison's law library or legal assistance program was lacking in a way actually hindering his efforts to pursue a legal claim); Bourdon v. Loughren, 386 F.3d 88, 98–99 (2d Cir. 2004) (holding appointment of counsel to a prisoner was sufficient to satisfy the prisoner's right of access to the courts; the attorney's performance did not have to be "effective" as long as it did not prevent the prisoner from pursuing a particular legal claim); DeLeon v. Doe, 361 F.3d 93, 94 (2d Cir. 2004) (dismissing prisoner's claim for denial of court access when prison officials caused delays to his legal mail); Oliver v. Fauver, 118 F.3d 175, 178 (3d Cir. 1997) (holding interference with mail, if it reaches its intended destination, is insufficient to show actual injury); Taylor v. Coughlin, 29 F.3d 39, 40 (2d. Cir. 1994) (per curiam) (holding prison's failure to supply prisoners with adequate typewriters did not cause any injury; prisoners were able to access the courts through handwritten documents); Jones v. Smith, 784 F.2d 149, 152 (2d Cir. 1986) (holding 30-day deprivation of access to prison law library during confinement in Special Housing Unit was insufficient to claim lack of meaningful access to courts); Richardson v. McDonnell, 841 F.2d 120, 122 (5th Cir. 1988) (holding that the loss of outgoing court documents was not a sufficient injury because the error was noted in time to allow the plaintiff to re-file the documents); Jermosen v. Coughlin, 877 F. Supp. 864, 871 (S.D.N.Y. 1995) (holding that the confiscation of a tape mailed to a prisoner did not qualify as a sufficient injury because the prisoner had access to the tape when preparing his civil action, and at the time the tape was taken, the prisoner's case had already been settled). But see Key v. Artuz, No. 95 CV 0392 (HB), 1995 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 13201, at *5–6 (S.D.N.Y. Sept. 13, 1995) (unpublished) (holding that a prison's mishandling of legal mail that resulted in the prisoner missing a court-imposed deadline was a sufficient showing of injury).

109. See Wesolowski v. Washburn, 615 F.Supp.2d 126, 129 (W.D.N.Y. 2009).

110. See Wesolowski v. Washburn, 615 F.Supp.2d 126, 129 (W.D.N.Y. 2009).

111. Smith v. O'Connor, 901 F. Supp. 644, 649 (S.D.N.Y. 1995) (holding that although corrections officials destroyed a prisoner's personal property, including his legal papers, the prisoner failed to show prejudice and thus failed words, they require that the prison authorities have intentionally interfered with a prisoner's legal mail with the purpose of denying him access to the courts. Many courts, however, do not mention this additional requirement.[112]

3. Attorney-Client Privilege

For communications with your attorney, you have the additional shield of the attorney-client privilege.[113] This privilege allows you to refuse to disclose, and to prevent any other person from disclosing, confidential communications between you and your attorney. The protection that it provides is limited in two ways. First, because the privilege only protects you against disclosure of your legal correspondence, it may only be used to challenge the reading of your legal mail, not the inspection of it.[114] However, even though prisons may declare temporary emergencies requiring them to open your mail, they may not continue to justify mail opening by stating that the emergency is indefinite.[115] Second, there are exceptions to the kinds of communication that are protected by the privilege. For the attorney-client privilege to apply, you must intend for the communication to remain confidential.[116] In other words, if you disclose information to someone other than your attorney, this information will no longer be considered privileged. Disclosure to representatives of the attorney, such as his or her secretary or student clerk, however, is considered the same as communication with the attorney and is covered under the privilege.[117] An exception is that you cannot claim the attorney-client privilege if the communication furthers future wrongdoing.[118] It does not matter if your communications with your lawyer are written or oral; both are equally privileged.[119]

4. Legal Correspondence and New York State and City Regulations

The following is a discussion of additional New York rules governing legal mail restrictions. Prisoners in other states must consult their state and local regulations. The New York Department of Correctional Services regulations state incoming legal mail should be opened and examined only in the presence of the to state a claim that he was denied access to the courts); Herrera v. Scully, 815 F. Supp. 713, 723–24 (S.D.N.Y. 1993) (holding that prison officials did not act in an "intentional and deliberate manner to deprive [the prisoner] of his constitutional rights by preventing his legal mail from arriving at court in a timely manner.").

---

112. See, e.g., Key v. Artuz, No. 95 CV 0392 (HB), 1995 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 13201, at *7 (S.D.N.Y. Sept. 13, 1995) (unpublished) (denying defendant motion to dismiss where interference caused prisoner to miss court-imposed deadline, the Court stated that the plaintiff's failure to allege invidious intent did not fall short of the pleading standards due to the Court's liberal reading of the complaint as if alleging this element).

113. Statute generally sets forth this privilege. In New York, the relevant statute can be found at N.Y. C.P.L.R. 4503.1 (McKinney 2007).

114. Frye v. Henderson, 474 F.2d 1263, 1264 (5th Cir. 1973) (per curiam) (stating opening mail to check for contraband is legitimate); People v. Poe, 193 Cal. Rptr. 2d 479, 481, 145 Cal. App. 3d 574, 578 (Cal. Ct. App. 1983) (citing Wolff v. McDonnell, 418 U.S. 539, 577, 94 S. Ct. 2963, 2985, 41 L. Ed. 2d 935, 963 (1974)). Some courts have even held prison officials can open mail from a court outside your presence, since court documents are public records and therefore not subject to the same protections. See Martin v. Brewer, 830 F.2d 76, 78–79 (7th Cir. 1987) (incoming court mail is not privileged and does not involve the same concerns about retaliation for filing a lawsuit as outgoing mail from a prisoner to a judge); Keenan v. Hall, 83 F.3d 1083, 1094 (9th Cir. 1996) (finding incoming mail from a court not "legal mail").

115. See Jones v. Brown, 461 F.3d 353, 362–63 (3d Cir. 2006) (finding that though a risk of anthrax terrorism might have justified temporarily opening prisoner mail after September 11, 2001, there was no rational basis for continuing this policy more than three years later).

116. United States v. Robinson, 121 F.3d 971, 976 (5th Cir. 1997) (holding that the fact that a meeting between a prisoner and his attorney "take[s] place away from public view" is not enough to prove that the prisoner intended the communication between them to be confidential); Colton v. United States, 306 F.2d 633, 638 (2d Cir. 1962) (holding that in the case of an attorney preparing a tax return, no privilege could be expected since the form is not intended to be confidential but "is given for transmittal by the attorney to others"); Priest v. Hennessy, 51 N.Y.2d 62, 68–69, 409 N.E.2d 983, 986, 431 N.Y.S.2d 511, 514 (1980)("[N]ot all communications to an attorney are privileged. In order to make a valid claim of privilege, it must be shown that the information sought to be protected from disclosure was a 'confidential communication' made to the attorney for the purpose of obtaining legal advice or services.") (citing Matter of Jacqueline F., 47 N.Y.2d 215, 219, 391 N.E.2d 967, 969; 417 N.Y.S.2d 884, 886, (1979); People ex rel. Vogelstein v Warden of County Jail of County of N.Y., 150 Misc 417, 717–18, 270 N.Y.S. 362, 366 (1934); 8 Wigmore § 2292).

117. See N.Y. C.P.L.R. 4503(a)(1) (2007).

118. In re Associated Homeowners & Businessmen's Org., Inc., 87 Misc. 2d 67, 68, 385 N.Y.S.2d 449, 450 (Sup. Ct. N.Y. County 1976) (pointing towards the exception for communications "in furtherance of fraudulent or other unlawful acts" as reason for a denial of an application to quash subpoena of an attorney).

119. LeLong v. Siebrecht, 196 A.D. 74, 76, 187 N.Y.S. 150, 150 (2d Dept. 1921).

prisoner and will not be read by prison authorities without written superintendent authorization.[120] Outgoing privileged mail may not be opened, inspected, or read without written superintendent authorization. The regulations applying to city and county jails in New York have essentially the same provisions, except they additionally state that mailed communications with attorneys may not be read without a search warrant.[121]

The standards applicable to jails in New York City have recently been changed and now distinguish between privileged and non-privileged mail. Your privileged incoming mail cannot be opened except in your presence or pursuant to a search warrant, and your privileged outgoing correspondence can only be opened or read pursuant to a search warrant.[122]

5. Legal Correspondence and Federal Regulations

Privileged mail is referred to as "special mail" in the federal regulations governing the Federal Bureau of Prisons.[123] This includes mail from state and federal courts, attorneys, the President and Vice-President, governors, members of the U.S. Congress, embassies and consulates, federal law enforcement officers, and the Department of Justice (excluding the Bureau of Prisons, but including U.S. Attorneys).[124] Mail from any of these sources should be marked as follows on the envelope: "Special Mail—Open only in the presence of the inmate."[125] Prison authorities may still open these letters to ensure there is no contraband and to confirm the enclosed letter does in fact qualify as special mail. But, they may not read the letter. If the envelope is not marked as special mail, the correspondence will be treated as general correspondence.[126] Mail from attorneys must be marked as described above and must indicate the attorney's name and the fact that he or she is an attorney. While the word "Attorney" does not need to appear on the envelope, the court states that there must be some indication that the person sending the letter is an attorney. This indication does not have to be placed on any particular place on the envelope.[127] For more information, see the relevant federal regulations.[128]

As a practical matter, whether you are a state or federal prisoner, you should clearly label envelopes of privileged correspondence: "Privileged Correspondence (Special Mail)—Do Not Open Except in the Presence of Intended Inmate-Recipient." You may also want to suggest your lawyer tape shut all mail sent to you. This will let you know whether your mail had been opened and read when you were not present, since you would be able to see where the tape was removed from the envelope.

D. Internet Communication

The right of a prisoner to access the Internet, whether directly or indirectly, is a relatively new subject, since the Internet has only recently become common in day-to-day life. Therefore, there are not many cases testing to what extent a prisoner has a right to communicate through the Internet. However, the Turner standard clearly applies to cases involving Internet communication.[129]

Most, if not all, states ban prisoners from direct, unsupervised access to the Internet.[130] Federal legislation prevents prisoners from access without official supervision.[131] Though this statute has not yet been tested in court, it will likely be upheld because it is narrowly tailored (does not ban access, just requires

120. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 721 (2007).

121. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 9, § 7004.4 (2007). Note that this section of the regulations distinguishes legal privileged correspondence from general privileged correspondence.

122. Minimum Standards for New York City Correctional Facilities 1-11(c)–(e), available at http://www.nyc.gov/html/boc/downloads/pdf/minimum_standards.pdf. The amendments became effective June 16, 2008.

123. 28 C.F.R. § 540.2(c) (2007).

124. 28 C.F.R. § 540.12(b) (2007).

125. 28 C.F.R. § 540.12(b) (2007).

126. 28 C.F.R. § 540.18(b) (2007).

127. Merriweather v. Zamora, 569 F.3d 307, 313–14 (6th Cir. 2009).

128. 28 C.F.R. § 540 (2007).

129. See Part A of this Chapter for an explanation of the Turner standard.

130. See Titia A. Holtz, Note, Reaching Out from Behind Bars: The Constitutionality of Laws Barring Prisoners from the Internet, 67 Brook. L. Rev. 855, 859 (2002).

131. Protection of Children from Sexual Predators Act of 1998, Title VIII, sec. 801, Pub. L. No. 105-314, 112 Stat. 2974, 2990 (1998) (withholding federal funding from any federal program that allows prisoners unsupervised access to the Internet). This statue was enacted in response to a specific case in which a prisoner who had been granted access to participate in online classes instead used his unsupervised time to download child pornography.

supervision) to a valid prison interest (security). Some states allow certain prisoners to access the Internet under supervision for educational and vocational courses. Similarly, the Federal Bureau of Prisons is piloting a program called The Trust Fund Limited Inmate Computer System (TRULINCS), through which prisoners can send electronic messages to families and attorneys without actually accessing the Internet.[132] You should look into the regulations of your own state to find out its specific restrictions and allowances.

Prisoners commonly access the Internet indirectly, using third parties for assistance. For instance, a prisoner might write a regular letter to a third party describing the information he wants posted on the Internet or that he wants sent in an e-mail. The third party would then post the information or send the e-mail, and afterwards would print any Internet response and mail it to the prisoner.[133] Though it would seem this access should be governed by the same rules that regulate mail, some states have begun to regulate this type of indirect Internet communication in a much stricter way. For instance, Ohio prevents any access, direct or indirect, except for that related to educational programs.[134] Arizona has a similar statute that eliminates inmates' direct and indirect access to the internet and e-mail.[135] Other statutes of this kind have also been enacted in Minnesota, California, Kansas, and Wisconsin.[136] These statutes have only begun to be tested in the courts, and most of the recent litigation in this area has centered on these state legislative schemes. The reaction in various courts has been mixed.

In an unpublished opinion in 2002, the Seventh Circuit decided that a prison's ban on all internet-generated material sent in the mail did not violate the inmate's First Amendment rights.[137] The prison's justification for this policy was that allowing such items increased the chance that sensitive material would enter the prison.[138] More recently, the Ninth Circuit invalidated a California policy prohibiting prisoners from receiving by mail any material downloaded from the Internet.[139] The court, applying the Turner standard, found no logical relationship between the regulation and the legitimate concerns of security and of increased workload for the mailroom.[140] A 2008 California case, while acknowledging this Ninth Circuit precedent, reaffirmed that prisoners may be denied direct internet access, stating that there is no free-standing First Amendment right to computer and internet access.[141]

The response at the district court level has been similarly mixed. A judge in Arizona found the state law to be unconstitutional,[142] while a judge in Kansas upheld a similar law.[143] Much seems to turn on the courts' interpretation of the Turner factors in this context.[144] The Ninth circuit case and the Arizona district court case indicate that the policies prohibiting indirect access to the internet through the receipt of internet-generated materials in the mail might be more vulnerable to constitutional First Amendment challenges than policies dealing with direct internet access. However, it is important to note there have not yet been enough cases on this matter to determine exactly how various courts will handle the issue of Internet communication.

E. Receipt and Possession of Publications

The same standards that govern censorship of incoming mail apply to your right to receive and possess books, magazines, and other reading material. Prior to 1989, Procunier v. Martinez[145] held that a publication

---

132. BOP: TRULINCS Frequently Asked Questions, Federal Bureau of Prisons, http://www.bop.gov/inmate_programs/trulincs_faq.jsp (last visited July 26, 2008) (discussing the Bureau of Prisons' e-mail program).

133. At least one court has held prisoners cannot be punished if third parties post information on the Internet for them. See Canadian Coalition against the Death Penalty v. Ryan, 269 F. Supp. 2d 1199, 1201, 1203 (D. Ariz. 2003).

134. Ohio Rev. Code Ann. § 5145.31C(1) (a).

135. Ariz. Rev. Stat. Ann. §§ 31-235(c), 31-242, 41-1604.

136. See Valerie Alter, Jailhouse Informants: A Lesson in E-Snitching, 10 J. Tech. L. & Pol'y 223, 232 (2005).

137. Rogers v. Morris, No. 01-3903, 2002 WL 453706 (7th Cir. 2002).

138. Rogers v. Morris, No. 01-3903, 2002 WL 453706 (7th Cir. 2002).

139. Clement v. Cal. Dept. of Corr., 364 F.3d 1148, 1152 (9th Cir. 2004).

140. Clement v. Cal. Dept. of Corr., 364 F.3d 1148, 1152 (9th Cir. 2004).

141. Carmony v. County of Sacramento, 2008 WL 435343, 17–18 (E.D. Cal. 2008).

142. Canadian Coalition Against the Death Penalty v. Ryan, 269 F. Supp. 2d 1199, 1203 (D. Ariz. 2003).

143. Waterman v. Commandant, 337 F. Supp. 2d 1237, 1243 (D. Kan. 2004).

144. Valerie Alter, Jailhouse Informants: A Lesson in E-Snitching, 10 J. Tech. L. & Pol'y 223, 233–34 (2005).

145. Procunier v. Martinez, 416 U.S. 396, 94 S. Ct. 1800, 40 L. Ed. 2d 224 (1974).

could not be prohibited unless officials could show that the particular publication constituted a threat to prison security or order or would negatively affect a prisoner's rehabilitation.[146]

But, in 1989, in Thornburgh v. Abbott, the U.S. Supreme Court replaced the Martinez standard with a standard easier for prison officials to meet: the Turner standard.[147] Lower federal and state court decisions that invalidated restrictions under the Martinez standard almost surely do not reflect current law, so you probably cannot cite to them in any court papers. This means that you cannot rely on cases decided before 1989. See the discussion of Martinez and Abbott in Part B of this Chapter.

1. General Standards for Receiving Publications

You have a First Amendment right to receive publications, and a publisher has a First Amendment right to send you publications. But, restrictions of this right are valid if reasonably related to a legitimate prison interest (the Turner standard).[148] The Supreme Court has noted deference should be paid to the "informed discretion of correction officials."[149] This means it will be relatively easy for officials to restrict access to publications, but censorship is not allowed just because the publication's content is unpopular or offensive.[150]

Most courts, applying the Turner standard, have upheld restrictions on receiving incoming publications. Generally, they have held such restrictions are rationally related to the legitimate governmental interests of security,[151] screening contraband,[152] preventing fire,[153] and promoting rehabilitation.[154] In Frost v. Symington, a federal appeals court upheld regulations withholding sexually explicit magazines from prisoners.[155] In Malik v. Coughlin,[156] a New York state court, citing Abbott, allowed censorship of an incoming article in which the author made critical and exaggerated allegations concerning prison medical personnel. The censored article alleged correctional facilities used prisoners as guinea pigs for drug testing.[157] The court held the censorship did not violate the prisoner's right to free speech, despite the fact that the article was read at two other prisons without any disruptions.[158] The withholding of publications that contain racist statements has also been upheld by federal courts relying on Abbott.[159] Prison officials can probably ban the distribution of an internal prisoners' newsletter as contrary to prison security if it contains similar forbidden content. However, as one court held in Epps v. Smith,[160] a prison cannot ban distribution of an outside newsletter that does not contain prohibited content (in this case, a self-described "revolutionary prisoners' newspaper" published in California and distributed in a New York penitentiary). The court there relied heavily on the rights of those outside the prison to air their political views.[161]

---

146. Procunier v. Martinez, 416 U.S. 396, 413, 94 S. Ct. 1800, 1811, 40 L. Ed. 2d 224, 240 (1974).

147. Thornburgh v. Abbott, 490 U.S. 401, 109 S. Ct. 1874, 104 L. Ed. 2d 459 (1989).

148. Thornburgh v. Abbott, 490 U.S. 401, 404, 109 S. Ct. 1874, 1877, 104 L. Ed. 2d 459, 467 (1989).

149. Thornburgh v. Abbott, 490 U.S. 401, 418, 109 S. Ct. 1874, 1884, 104 L. Ed. 2d 459, 476 (1989) (quoting Turner v. Safley, 482 U.S. 78, 90, 107 S. Ct. 2254, 2263, 96 L. Ed. 2d 64, 80 (1982)).

150. Thornburgh v. Abbott, 490 U.S. 401, 415–16, 109 S. Ct. 1874, 1882–83, 104 L. Ed. 2d 459, 474 (1989).

151. See, e.g., Malik v. Coughlin, 154 A.D.2d 135, 137–38, 552 N.Y.S.2d 182, 184 (3d Dept. 1990) (holding that the inflammatory accusations contained in the publication would have incited disobedience).

152. See, e.g., Skelton v. Pri-Cor, 963 F.2d 100, 103 (6th Cir. 1991) (holding because hardback books can be used to smuggle contraband, a ban on such books was valid). But see Prison Legal News v. Lehman, 397 F.3d 692, 700 (9th Cir. 2005) (finding no rational relation between preventing contraband and banning bulk mailings and catalogs).

153. See, e.g., Morrison v. Hall, 261 F.3d 896, 902 (9th Cir. 2001) (holding that reducing fire hazards is a legitimate government interest but banning bulk mailings does not rationally serve that interest). Cf. Prison Legal News v. Lehman, 397 F.3d 692, 700 (9th Cir. 2005) (finding that banning catalogs and bulk mailings is not rationally related to decreasing the risk of fire, since limitations already exist on the number of possessions in prisoners' cells).

154. See, e.g., Waterman v. Farmer, 183 F.3d 208, 217–18 (3d Cir. 1999) (holding that a state statute prohibiting pornographic materials for prisoners had a rational relationship to rehabilitation); Dawson v. Scurr, 986 F.2d 257, 260 (8th Cir. 1993) (holding that exposing psychologically unfit prisoners to sexually explicit materials would interfere with their rehabilitation).

155. Frost v. Symington, 197 F.3d 348, 357–58 (9th Cir. 1999) (finding that regulation of pornographic materials promotes security interests).

156. Malik v. Coughlin, 154 A.D.2d 135, 552 N.Y.S.2d 182 (3d Dept. 1990).

157. Malik v. Coughlin, 154 A.D.2d 135, 136, 552 N.Y.S.2d 182, 183 (3d Dept. 1990).

158. Malik v. Coughlin, 154 A.D.2d 135, 138–39, 552 N.Y.S.2d 182, 184 (3d Dept. 1990).

159. See, e.g., Thomas v. U.S. Sec'y of Def., 730 F. Supp. 362, 364–65 (D. Kan. 1990); Chriceol v. Phillips, 169 F.3d 313, 315–17 (5th Cir. 1999); Winburn v. Bologna, 979 F. Supp. 531, 534–35 (W.D. Mich. 1997).

160. Epps v. Smith, 112 Misc. 2d 724, 447 N.Y.S.2d 577 (Sup. Ct. Wyoming County 1981).

161. See Epps v. Smith, 112 Misc. 2d 724, 728–29, 447 N.Y.S.2d 577, 580–81 (Sup. Ct. Wyoming County 1981).

Occasionally, courts will invalidate restrictions on publications because they bear no rational relationship to the asserted government interest. In Crofton v. Roe,[162] the court found a regulation limiting the publications that a prisoner can receive to those he ordered and paid for directly bore no relationship to the interest of screening for contraband. In Spellman v. Hopper,[163] the court found no rational relationship between the government interests of security and fire prevention, and a restriction that prohibited prisoners in administrative segregation (as opposed to in disciplinary segregation) from receiving any subscriptions. Similarly, in Aiello v. Litscher,[164] the court held a restriction on publications that contained any nudity could be invalidated as too broad because the restriction included scientific texts and works of art.[165]

A common restriction imposed by prisons is the "publishers-only" rule, which permits "inmates to receive newspapers, magazines, and books from publishers or book clubs only."[166] The Supreme Court in Bell v. Wolfish[167] held that if your prison adopts a publishers-only rule for hardcover books, you have no right to receive publications directly from friends or family, as the rule might be necessary to ensure prison security by preventing contraband smuggling. Bell only dealt with hardcover books, so it is unclear how far its reasoning can extend. Lower courts have extended the publishers-only rule to other publications like magazines and soft-cover books because courts accept the argument by prison officials that requiring prisoners to receive such materials directly from the publisher is a minor inconvenience, compared to the greater inconvenience of searching all materials not sent in factory-sealed packages.[168] But, courts have found that some restrictions on your ability to receive publications are not rational and have struck them down. For example, one circuit court has stated that prisons may not require books ordered from approved vendors to have special shipping labels.[169] Also, some courts have held that prisons cannot place certain restrictions on bulk mail.[170] In a recent California case, a federal court held that a policy of prohibiting a vendor from sending free, softbound, religious materials to prisoners was not rational.[171] Finally, banning gift subscriptions may not be rational.[172]

In addition, bans on certain publications, beyond sexually explicit ones, can be found reasonably related to rehabilitation interests. In Beard v. Banks, the Supreme Court upheld a Pennsylvania regulation denying all newspapers and magazines to prisoners held in segregation and temporarily classified as particularly dangerous or unmanageable.[173] Applying the Turner test, the Court found that such a restriction was reasonably related to the prison's interest in promoting good behavior.[174] It was important in this case that the prisoners' placement in segregation was not permanent, and that they could earn back their privilege to

---

But see Nasir v. Morgan, 350 F.3d 366, 375–76 (3d Cir. 2003) (upholding ban on correspondence between prisoners and former prisoners under Turner balancing test, despite the 1st Amendment interests of the non-prisoner).

162. Crofton v. Roe, 170 F.3d 957, 961 (9th Cir. 1999).

163. Spellman v. Hopper, 95 F. Supp. 2d 1267, 1282 (M.D. Ala. 1999) (distinguishing from cases upholding subscription bans for prisoners in disciplinary segregation, since their lack of access to publications could provide a disincentive to commit infractions).

164. Aiello v. Litscher, 104 F. Supp. 2d 1068, 1082 (W.D. Wis. 2000).

165. But see Mauro v. Arpaio, 188 F.3d 1054, 1060 n.4 (9th Cir. 1999) (upholding restriction on sexually explicit materials, even if it includes art and science texts, as not unconstitutionally overbroad).

166. See, e.g., Ward v. Washtenaw Cnty. Sheriff's Dept., 881 F.2d 325, 326–27. (6th Cir. 1989).

167. Bell v. Wolfish, 441 U.S. 520, 550–52, 99 S. Ct. 1861, 1880–81, 60 L. Ed. 2d 447, 475–77 (1979).

168. See Avery v. Powell, 806 F. Supp. 7, 8–11 (D.N.H. 1992) (finding a prison regulation prohibiting prisoners from receiving blank greeting cards, unless sent from a vendor, was reasonably related to a legitimate interest in maintaining prison security, as greeting cards received from non-vendors would necessitate time-consuming searches for contraband).

169. Ashker v. Cal. Dept. of Corr., 350 F.3d 917, 924 (9th Cir. 2003).

170. Morrison v. Hall, 261 F.3d 896, 900 (9th Cir. 2001) (holding prison cannot ban prisoners from receiving subscriptions sent by bulk, third, or fourth class mail); Prison Legal News v. Lehman, 397 F.3d 692,700–01 (9th Cir. 2005) (finding prison may not prohibit prisoners from receiving non-subscription bulk mail and catalogs).

171. Jesus Christ Prison Ministry v. Cal. Dept. of Corr., 456 F. Supp. 2d 1188, 1201–02 (E.D. Cal. 2006).

172. Prison Legal News v. Werholtz, No. 02-4054-MLB, 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 73629, at *13 (D. Kan. Oct. 1, 2007) (finding a Kansas policy of banning gift subscriptions was not rational and therefore unconstitutional).

173. Beard v. Banks, 548 U.S. 521, 525, 126 S. Ct. 2572, 2576–77, 165 L. Ed. 2d 697, 702–03 (2006).

174. Beard v. Banks, 548 U.S. 521, 533, 126 S. Ct. 2572, 2580, 165 L. Ed. 2d 697, 707 (2006) ("[W]ithholding such privileges 'is a proper and even necessary management technique to induce compliance with the rules of inmate behavior, especially for high-security prisoners who have few other privileges to lose.'" (quoting Overton v. Bazzetta, 539 U.S. 126, 134, 123 S. Ct. 2162, 2168–69, 156 L. Ed. 2d 162, 171 (2003)).

possess publications.[175] One of the Supreme Court justices, Justice Stevens, dissented (disagreed with the outcome) because he thought that the rationale of rehabilitation was too broad and could theoretically justify taking away any right or privilege in prison.[176] As this case is relatively recent, it is important to note that there is some disagreement on the issue, even within the Supreme Court.

You cannot be punished for having literature that is prohibited if it is prohibited by an unconstitutional or illegal rule. If you are punished for having this literature, Chapter 18 of the JLM, "Your Rights at Prison Disciplinary Proceedings," should help you understand your rights during prison disciplinary proceedings.

Finally, you should remember that state law, and state and federal regulations, might give you additional protections regarding access to literature. For instance, federal regulations allow prisoners in minimum- and low-security facilities to receive soft-cover books from any source, though they can receive hardcover books only from the publisher, a book club, or a bookstore.[177] Prisoners in medium- or high-security facilities must receive all books from the publisher, a book club, or a bookstore.[178] In addition, facility administrators have the ability to reject publications if they contain content, like depictions of violence and sexually explicit material (discussed in more detail below), that would be a security risk.[179] So, you should research additional regulations or laws that might apply to you.

2. Receiving Sexually Explicit Materials

Some regulations specifically prohibit sexually explicit materials. Courts have upheld such regulations based on two different government interests: (1) promoting rehabilitation, and (2) protecting prison security. In Ballance v. Virginia, the court upheld the confiscation of photographs of partially nude children from a convicted pedophile, reasoning that "due ... to the prison's interest in rehabilitating this disease," prison officials acted reasonably in confiscating the photographs.[180] Similarly, in Dawson v. Scurr,[181] the court held that restrictions on sexually explicit materials were justified for psychologically unfit prisoners because exposure to such materials would interfere with their rehabilitation.

The Thornburgh v. Abbott[182] rule gives prison officials discretion to ban sexually explicit material if officials reasonably believe the material poses a threat to prison order. Prison officials are given this discretion because allowing a prisoner to possess such material may lead other prisoners to make assumptions about that prisoner's beliefs, sexual orientation, or gang affiliations, and encourage violence.[183] At least one federal circuit court has held that a ban on sexually explicit material is reasonable in order to prevent sexual harassment of female staff.[184] But, some courts have struck down blanket bans on sexually explicit material and instead require the prison to show that giving a specific publication to prisoners will harm their rehabilitation.[185]

Even if the prison decides to ban sexually explicit materials, some courts have held that both the prisoner and also the publisher are entitled to notice of the ban and an opportunity to respond.[186] The reason

---

175. Beard v. Banks, 548 U.S. 521, 532, 126 S. Ct. 2572, 2579–80, 165 L. Ed. 2d 697, 707 (2006).

176. Beard v. Banks, 548 U.S. 521, 547–48, 126 S. Ct. 2572, 2588–89, 165 L. Ed. 2d 697, 716–17 (2006) (Stevens, J., dissenting).

177. 28 C.F.R. § 540.71(a) (2007).

178. 28 C.F.R. § 540.71(a) (2007).

179. For an explanation of content that can amount to a security risk, see 28 C.F.R. § 540.71(b) (2007).

180. Ballance v. Virginia, 130 F. Supp. 2d 754, 760 (W.D. Va. 2000).

181. Dawson v. Scurr, 986 F.2d 257, 260–62 (8th Cir. 1993).

182. Thornburgh v. Abbott, 490 U.S. 401, 109 S. Ct. 1874, 104 L. Ed. 2d 459 (1989).

183. Thornburgh v. Abbott, 490 U.S. 401, 412–13, 109 S. Ct. 1874, 1881, 104 L. Ed. 2d 459, 472–73 (1989).

184. Mauro v. Arpaio, 188 F.3d 1054, 1059–60 (9th Cir. 1999).

185. See Ramirez v. Pugh, 379 F.3d 122, 129 (3d Cir. 2004) (finding that "the connection between the [restrictive statute] and the government's rehabilitative interest" is not "obvious upon consideration of the entire federal inmate population, including those prisoners not incarcerated for sex-related crimes"); Guajardo v. Estelle, 580 F.2d 748, 762 (5th Cir. 1978) ("Before delivery of a publication may be refused, prison administrators must review the particular issue of the publication in question and make a specific, factual determination that the publication is detrimental to prisoner rehabilitation because it would encourage deviate, criminal sexual behavior.").

186. Montcalm Publ'g Corp. v. Beck, 80 F.3d 105, 106 (4th Cir. 1996) (finding that "publishers are entitled to notice and an opportunity to be heard when their publications are disapproved for receipt by inmate-suscribers"); Jacklovich v. Simmon, 392 F.3d 420, 433 (10th Cir. 2004) (holding that publishers as well as prisoners have a right to be notified when inmate subscribers are prohibited from receiving the publishers' publications). Note that the 10th Circuit for granting notice to publishers is that they have a First Amendment right to communicate with individual prisoners if they so choose.[187] Additionally, at least one court has held that prisoners have a right to appeal censorship decisions to someone other than the official who ordered the censorship.[188]

In Thornburgh v. Abbott, one of the regulations at issue allowed the warden to ban homosexually explicit material depicting the same gender as the prison population.[189] The Supreme Court held the rule was valid. In doing so, the Court upheld the regulation allowing the warden to permit heterosexual material and reject homosexual material. The regulation also directed non-explicit homosexual material to be permitted.[190] The Court reasoned, "[P]risoners may observe particular material in the possession of a fellow prisoner, draw inferences about their fellow [prisoner]'s ... sexual orientation ... and cause disorder by acting accordingly ... [I]t is essential that prison officials be given broad discretion to prevent such disorder."[191]

"Disorder" presumably means sexual or violent assault. The Court did not explain why explicitly homosexual material would cause disorder or violence. Others have offered at least two theories: identification and cueing. The identification theory holds that possession of explicit homosexual material will identify that prisoner as gay and make that prisoner a target for assault.[192] The cueing theory reasons that dissemination of such material in prison will "lead inmates to believe that homosexual activity is condoned there."[193]

What this means for the prisoner wishing to receive sexually explicit homosexual material is unclear because the discretion given to officials in Thornburgh v. Abbott may result in many different decisions and regulations.[194] At least one court has stated in dicta (language not critical to the case's holding and therefore not binding on later courts) that because exposure of one's sexual identity in a maximum-security prison is more likely to lead to assault by others than in a minimum-security facility, prison security concerns are more legitimate in a maximum-security facility.[195] Such reasoning could mean that incoming sexually explicit homosexual material may be denied at maximum-security, but not minimum-security, facilities.

---

later clarified that Jacklovich governed only intentional rejections of the publications, rather than accidents such as a mistake in the mailroom. Jones v. Salt Lake County, 503 F.3d 1147, 1163 (10th Cir. 2007).

187. Montcalm Publ'g Corp. v. Beck, 80 F.3d 105, 109 (4th Cir. 1996).

188. Krug v. Lutz, 329 F.3d 692, 699–700 (9th Cir. 2003).

189. The Program Statement No. 5266.5, which added to the regulation at issue, 28 C.F.R. § 540.71(b)(7) (2007), allowed the warden to reject the following types of sexually explicit material: (1) homosexual (of the same sex as the prison population), (2) sado-masochistic, (3) bestial, or (4) involving children. Thornburgh v. Abbott, 490 U.S. 401, 405 n.6, 109 S. Ct. 1874, 1877 n.6, 104 L. Ed. 2d 459, 468 n.6 (1989).

190. Thornburgh v. Abbott, 490 U.S. 401, 405 n.6, 109 S. Ct. 1874, 1877 n.6, 104 L. Ed. 2d 459, 468 n.6 (1989) (citing Program Statement supplementing 28 C.F.R. § 540.71(b)(7) (2007)).

191. Thornburgh v. Abbott, 490 U.S. 401, 412–13, 109 S. Ct. 1874, 1881, 104 L. Ed. 2d 459, 472–73 (1989) (emphasis added).

192. Clair A. Cripe & Ira Kirschbaum, Prisons as Censors, in 1 Prisoners and the Law 3–3, 3–14 (Ira P. Robbins ed., 2010).

193. Clair A. Cripe & Ira Kirschbaum, Prisons as Censors, in 1 Prisoners and the Law 3–3, 3–14 (Ira P. Robbins ed., 2010).

194. Thornburgh v. Abbott, 490 U.S. 401, 417 n.15, 109 S. Ct. 1874, 1883 n.15, 104 L. Ed. 2d 459, 475 n.15 (1989) (noting that "the exercise of discretion called for by these regulations may produce seeming 'inconsistencies,'" but that this does not necessarily mean "arbitrariness or irrationality"). Compare Inosencio v. Johnson, 547 F. Supp. 130, 135–36 (E.D. Mich. 1982), aff'd sub nom. Brown v. Johnson, 743 F.2d 408 (6th Cir. 1984) (holding the prohibition of a homosexual worship service to be constitutional based on the reasoning that prisoners attending such services would be exposing themselves to attacks from other prisoners), with Lipp v. Procunier, 395 F. Supp. 871, 877–78 (N.D. Cal. 1975) (holding the prohibition of homosexual worship services to be a possible violation of prisoners' 1st Amendment right to religious freedom and requiring prison officials to present findings of fact that clearly supported their assertion that such a service would present a danger to the prison population). The Second Circuit has not considered the issue of sexually explicit homosexual materials in prisons, but it has upheld a regulation banning prisoners from keeping sexually explicit photos of their wives and girlfriends on the grounds that such photos may create violence among prisoners due to their personal nature. Giano v. Senkowski, 54 F.3d 1050, 1057 (2d Cir. 1995). See also Thomas v. Scully, No. 89 Civ. 4715, 1990 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 16229 at *3 (S.D.N.Y. Dec. 5, 1990) (unpublished) (following the Giano holding). Presumably the court would extend these holdings to sexually explicit photos of gay partners as well.

195. See Inosencio v. Johnson, 547 F. Supp. 130, 135 (E.D. Mich. 1982), aff'd sub nom. Brown v. Johnson, 743 F.2d 408 (6th Cir. 1984) (citing testimony by the director of the California Department of Corrections that the Department could make a good case for denying prisoners the ability to attend homosexual church service in a maximum-security prison while allowing those in a medium-security facility to attend). See also C.F.R. § 540.71(b)(7) (2007).

As a general rule, gay and lesbian prisoners may seek to obtain non-sexually explicit homosexual material through the mail. Federal regulations seem to allow the wholesale admission of these materials into the federal prison environment.[196] State prisoners who desire such material, however, may encounter the same arguments used by prison officials to ban sexually explicit homosexual materials. For instance, one court applied an identification theory in Harper v. Wallingford[197] to find that a prisoner's First Amendment rights were not violated when non-explicit mail promoting consensual sexual relationships between adult men and juvenile males was withheld from him. The court found legitimate the prison officials' concern that the material, when seen by other prisoners, would make the prisoner a target as a homosexual and would thus make him vulnerable to assault. However, because one of the main arguments used by prison officials to legitimize their security interests in these restrictions is one of identification, such arguments might fail to persuade courts where it is clear that the prisoner is already known to be gay.[198] For more information on gay, lesbian, bisexual, and transgender issues, see JLM, Chapter 30.

Courts have also upheld restrictions on explicit heterosexual materials,[199] including sexually explicit photographs of prisoners' wives or girlfriends.[200] While these restrictions are almost always found to be constitutional, a few courts have scrutinized such regulations much more closely. In Aiello v. Litscher,[201] the court held that a regulation banning all written or visual materials containing nudity or sexual behavior was too vague because it would also ban important works of art and literature. It noted that a jury could find that the prohibition of such works is not reasonably related to legitimate penological interests. It also concluded that there was no evidence that such materials threaten security or rehabilitation.[202]

F. Access to the News Media

You may want to publicize your case by attracting the media's attention. The Supreme Court has held that a reasonable and effective means of communication between prisoners and the media must exist.[203] But, prisons have a legitimate security interest in limiting access to outside visitors, including the press.[204] The court held that limiting or prohibiting face-to-face interviews with the press does not violate the First Amendment as long as prisoners can still communicate with the press through writing or those allowed to visit.[205] In Houchins v. KQED, the Supreme Court repeated that freedom of the press does not grant the media special access to prisons.[206] As such, physical access by the news media (through visitation, tours, photographs, etc.) can be restricted just as physical access by the public based on security interests can. In a

---

196. See Thornburgh v. Abbott, 490 U.S. 401, 404, 109 S. Ct. 1874, 1877, 104 L. Ed. 2d 459, 467 (1989) (noting that publications must be "detrimental to the security, good order, or discipline of the institution or facilitate criminal activity" before their access can be restricted).

197. Harper v. Wallingford, 877 F.2d 728, 733 (9th Cir. 1989).

198. See Espinoza v. Wilson, 814 F.2d 1093, 1098–99 (6th Cir. 1987) (finding that protecting the sexual identity of the prisoners was not a valid reason for restricting access to homosexual publications since the prisoners were already open about being gay but finding in favor of the warden because he stated other legitimate reasons for restricting access).

199. Mauro v. Arpaio, 188 F.3d 1054, 1059–60 (9th Cir. 1999) (upholding restrictions on explicit heterosexual materials as reasonably related to the goal of preventing sexual harassment of female prison guards).

200. Giano v. Senkowski, 54 F.3d 1050, 1055–56 (2d Cir. 1995) (holding that the regulation was rationally related to the prevention of prisoner violence; the court pointed out that other avenues are available for reinforcing emotional bonds, such as non-nude photographs or romantic letters, and for satisfying the right to graphic sexual imagery, such as commercially produced erotica or sexually graphic letters).

201. Aiello v. Litscher, 104 F. Supp. 2d 1068 (W.D. Wis. 2000).

202. Aiello v. Litscher, 104 F. Supp. 2d 1068, 1079–81 (W.D. Wis. 2000). See also Kaufman v. McCaughtry, 419 F.3d 678, 685 (7th Cir. 2005) (following Aiello in finding that a definition of "pornography" agreed to in a settlement by the parties could not be contested as overly broad).

203. Pell v. Procunier, 417 U.S. 817, 94 S. Ct. 2800, 41 L. Ed. 2d 495 (1974).

204. Pell v. Procunier, 417 U.S. 817, 826, 94 S. Ct. 2800, 2806, 41 L. Ed. 2d 495, 503–04 (1974); see also Saxbe v. Washington Post Co., 417 U.S. 843, 850, 94 S. Ct. 2811, 2815, 41 L. Ed. 2d 514, 519–20 (1974) (Pell's companion case, finding that under the Federal Bureau of Prisons regulations, the media does not have the right to access prisons and inmates beyond the rights granted to members of the general public. Saxbe differs from Pell in that Saxbe only looks at the rights of the media, while Pell also addresses the rights of prisoners to communicate with the media).

205. Pell v. Procunier, 417 U.S. 817, 94 S. Ct. 2800, 41 L. Ed. 2d 495 (1974). For example, the California policy in Pell allowed prisoners face to face visits with members of their family, their clergy, their attorneys, and friends of prior acquaintance. Pell v. Procunier, 417 U.S. 817, 824–25, 94 S. Ct. 2800, 2085, 41 L. Ed. 2d 495, 503 (1974).

206. Houchins v. KQED, 438 U.S. 1, 98 S. Ct. 2588, 57 L. Ed. 2d 553 (1978).

recent case, a court noted that these kinds of restrictions can vary depending on the security of a particular prison or unit.[207]

Federal regulations governing prisoners held by the Federal Bureau of Prisons provide that correspondence sent to the media be treated as if it were privileged[208] and is considered special mail.[209] The rules discussed in Part C of this Chapter for privileged correspondence therefore apply to letters to the media for those prisoners. Correspondence from the media is subject to inspections for contraband, qualification as media correspondence, and content likey to promote either illegal activity or conduct contrary to Bureau regulations.[210] But, a prisoner may not receive pay for any correspondence with the media, act as a reporter, or publish under a byline.[211] This restriction on publishing under a byline was recently successfully challenged in a federal district court in Jordan v. Pugh.[212] The court found the absolute restriction was too broad for the stated interest of maintaining prison security, especially considering prisoners were allowed other publishing opportunities.[213] As this is a recent development, you should watch to see if other courts agree.

The warden of a federal prison has a duty to provide information to the media about certain events that take place in the prison. These include deaths, inside escapes, and institutional emergencies.[214] The warden must also provide basic information about a prisoner that is a matter of public record if it is requested by the media, unless the information is confidential.[215]

G. Visitation

Convicted prisoners' constitutional rights to visitation may be severely restricted, although pretrial detainees are almost certainly allowed reasonable visitation rights,[216] since lack of access to visitors like attorneys can infringe the right to due process and counsel.[217] In Overton v. Bazzetta, the Supreme Court did not state the scope of a prisoner's constitutional right to freedom of association, instead finding that a regulation restricting visits was reasonably related to the penological interest of security and therefore not a violation of the prisoner's constitutional rights.[218] Regardless of the type of prisoner, visitation rights may be restricted for considerations of institutional administration, security, and rehabilitation.[219] Prison officials may regulate the time, place, and manner of visits,[220] though such regulations, at least regarding pretrial

---

207. Hammer v. Ashcroft, 570 F. 3d, 798, 801 (7th Cir. 2009) (upholding a ban on person to person meetings between the media and prisoners in the Special Confinement Unit, which contains most federal death penalty prisoners), cert. denied, 130 S. Ct. 1735, 176 L. Ed. 2d 212 (2010).

208. 28 C.F.R. § 540.20(a) (2007).

209. 28 C.F.R. § 540.2c (2007).

210. 28 C.F.R. § 540.20(c) (2007).

211. 28 C.F.R. § 540.20(b) (2007).

212. Jordan v. Pugh, 504 F. Supp. 2d 1109 (D. Colo. 2007).

213. Jordan v. Pugh, 504 F. Supp. 2d 1109, 1124–26 (D. Colo. 2007) (reaching the same outcome under both the Turner and Martinez standards).

214. 28 C.F.R. § 540.65(a) (2007).

215. 28 C.F.R. § 540.65(b) (2007).

216. See Jones v. Diamond, 594 F.2d 997, 1013–14 (5th Cir. 1979), on reh'g, 636 F.2d 1364 (1981); see also Ky. Dept. of Corr. v. Thompson, 490 U.S. 454, 465, 109 S. Ct. 1904, 1911, 104 L. Ed. 2d 506, 518 (1989) (holding that state regulations setting forth categories of visitors who might be excluded from visitation did not implicate a prisoner's liberty interest in receiving visitors under the Due Process Clause of the 14th Amendment).

217. See Procunier v. Martinez, 416 U.S. 396, 419, 94 S. Ct. 1800, 1814, 40 L. Ed. 2d 224, 243 (1974) ("[I]nmates must have a reasonable opportunity to seek and receive the assistance of attorneys. Regulations and practices that unjustifiably obstruct the availability of professional representation or other aspects of the right of access to the courts are invalid.").

218. Overton v. Bazzetta, 539 U.S. 126, 131–32, 123 S. Ct. 2162, 2167, 156 L. Ed. 2d 162, 170 (2003) ("We need not attempt to explore or define the asserted right of association at any length or determine the extent to which it survives incarceration because the challenged regulations bear a rational relation to legitimate penological interests. This suffices to sustain the regulation in question.").

219. See Overton v. Bazzetta, 539 U.S. 126, 129, 123 S. Ct. 2162, 2166, 156 L. Ed. 2d 162, 168 (2003) (finding that rehabilitation, maintenance of basic order, and prevention of violence are legitimate objectives of the correctional system); Pell v. Procunier, 417 U.S. 817, 822, 94 S. Ct. 2800, 2804, 41 L. Ed. 2d 495, 501 (1974) (finding that a prisoner retains 1st Amendment rights that are not inconsistent with legitimate penological objectives).

220. See Martin v. Tyson, 845 F.2d 1451, 1455–56 (7th Cir. 1988) (holding that legitimate safety concerns and other practical constraints justified restrictions imposed on pretrial detainees).

detainees, must be reasonable.[221] Prison officials may also restrict some of the rights of visitors.[222] The Turner reasonableness standard also applies to visitation, and so courts can invalidate unreasonable restrictions.[223] Contact visits are not constitutionally required for pretrial detainees or for prisoners.[224]

The decision as to who may visit may be a matter of legitimate security concerns and is largely up to prison officials' discretion. If this is the case, it is up to the prison official to produce evidence that visitation restriction was in response to a security concern. It is then the inmate's burden to show by substantial evidence that the prison officials' response was exaggerated and unjustified. However, within the realm of justified restrictions, methods such as visit lists that only allow certain types of people to visit have been used held to be lawful.[225] In Overton, for instance, the Supreme Court upheld a regulation requiring an approved visitor list as reasonably related to security interests.[226] Courts have also upheld rules restricting visits to those who have a personal or professional relationship with the prisoner and rules denying visits by ex-convicts[227] and parties suspected of smuggling contraband.[228] The Supreme Court upheld similar regulations in Overton.[229] The Seventh Circuit of the U.S. Court of Appeals recently denied the constitutional claims of a prisoner whose niece and daughter had been removed from his visitor list and who had previously been convicted of violent sex offenses and admitted to raping two children.[230] Based on the holdings in Overton and Turner, the Seventh Circuit stated that a prison policy that restricts a prisoner's constitutional rights is valid if rationally related to legitimate penological interests, an analysis that requires the court to consider four issues: (1) whether a rational relationship exists between the policy and the interest it purports to advance; (2) whether there exists other ways to exercise the right in question; (3) the impact that accommodating the right will have on prison resources; and, (4) the absence of alternatives to the policy.[231] A 2009 New York case held that the Commissioner of Correctional Services had a rational basis for denying the prisoner's request to participate in a family reunion program, emphasizing that this decision is highly discretionary and will be upheld as long as there is a rational basis.[232] Since the Commissioner in this case considered the appropriate factors, including the prisoner's disciplinary record and participation in counseling sessions, the Commissioner's decision based upon the brutal nature of the prisoner's crimes was completely rational.[233]

---

221. See Martin v. Tyson, 845 F.2d 1451, 1458 (7th Cir. 1988) (per curiam) (upholding policy limiting pre-trial detainee's telephone access to every other day).

222. See Gray v. Bruce, 26 Fed. Appx. 819, 823–24 (10th Cir. 2001) (holding that subjecting a prisoner's wife to an "ion spectrometer test," which tests for the presence of illegal drugs, was not a per se violation of her 4th Amendment privacy rights; however, the court ultimately held that she had stated enough facts to show that the particular search method applied to her could be unconstitutional because of its unreliability and could violate her Fifth Amendment right to be free from self-incrimination).

223. Overton v. Bazzetta, 539 U.S. 126, 132, 123 S. Ct. 2162, 2168, 156 L. Ed. 2d 162, 170 (2003) (applying Turner test to Michigan regulations restricting visits).

224. See Block v. Rutherford, 468 U.S. 576, 589, 104 S. Ct. 3227, 3234, 82 L. Ed. 2d 438, 449 (1984) (holding contact visits are a privilege, not a right and that visits can be denied due to security concerns).

225. See Pell v. Procunier, 417 U.S. 817, 826–28, 94 S. Ct. 2800, 2806–07, 41 L. Ed. 2d 495, 503–05 (1974) (holding that placing certain restrictions on visitations may further significant governmental interests and is therefore permitted).

226. Overton v. Bazzetta, 539 U.S. 126, 129, 123 S. Ct. 2162, 2166 156 L. Ed. 2d 162, 168 (2003).

227. See Farmer v. Loving, 392 F. Supp. 27, 31 (W.D. Va. 1975) (allowing ban on visitation by ex-prisoners).

228. See Robinson v. Palmer, 841 F.2d 1151, 1156–57 (D.C. Cir. 1988) (finding a ban on visits by prisoner's wife, who was caught smuggling marijuana into prison, was justified by prison's interest in preventing drug smuggling and because prisoner had other ways to communicate with his wife); Thorne v. Jones, 765 F.2d 1270, 1275 (5th Cir. 1985) (finding a ban on visits from prisoner's mother, who was suspected of smuggling drugs and refused to submit to a strip search, was justified by security interests); Rowland v. Wolff, 336 F. Supp. 257, 260 (Neb. 1971) (holding the interest of the state in preventing the introduction of lethal weapons outweighs a prisoner's interest in being visited by his sisters).

229. Overton v. Bazzetta, 539 U.S. 126, 133–34, 123 S. Ct. 2162, 2168, 156 L. Ed. 2d 162, 171 (2003).

230. Stojanovic v. Humphreys, 309 Fed. Appx. 48 (7th Cir. 2009).

231. Stojanovic v. Humphreys, 309 Fed. Appx. 48, 52 (7th Cir. 2009).(held that not all prongs must be addressed for the restriction to be valid if the other factors speak overwhelmingly in favor of the restriction).

232. Philips v. Commissioner of Correctional Services, 885 N.Y.S.2d 138, 138 (N.Y. App. Div. 2009). See also Cabassa v. Gourd, 836 N.Y.S.2d 351 (N.Y. App. Div. 2007) (decision to deny an inmate convicted of sexually assaulting four teenage girls, three of them at gunpoint, from participating in a family reunion program was supported by rational basis and his involuntary protective custody status and the associated security concern).

233. Philips v. Commissioner of Correctional Services, 885 N.Y.S.2d 138, 139 (N.Y. App. Div. 2009).

Visits by immediate family will generally receive greater protection. Nevertheless, protection of children plays an important role in cases involving the intersection of visitation restrictions and parental rights. The primary consideration in such cases is the best interests of the children involved, and, at least in New York, Family Court is given enormous discretion in making these decisions.[234] In one 2001 New York case, the court found that an incarcerated father's petition for visitation with his daughters was properly denied based on the children's best interests.[235] The court said that while the mere fact of incarceration is not alone sufficient to deny visitation, the court has discretion to study the record and make a decision based on its totality.[236] In this case, the incarcerated father had virtually no contact with his children since his incarceration began five years previously; the children would have to travel many hours with a paternal grandmother they barely knew in order to visit; and, the children themselves did not express any interest in seeing their father.[237]

Regulations restricting the visits of minor children who are not closely related to the prisoner are routinely upheld as reasonably related to interests both in prison security and in protecting the children.[238] In one case, the court upheld the prison's decision to disallow visitation by a three-month-old niece of an prisoner who had been convicted of sexual assault, despite the prisoner's claims that this restriction violated his familial association rights.[239] The prisoner also argued that the decision to deny visitation was irrational and unreasonable; however, the court found that the restriction bore a connection to legitimate penological interests in safety and rehabilitation because the decision was based on a recommendation by the prisoner's social worker that the prisoner not see female minors because of his past conduct of sexual assaults and failure to receive sexual offender treatment.[240]

Visitation restrictions can also be justified with rehabilitation interests. In such cases, the restrictions usually take away visitation privileges from prisoners who have broken institutional rules. In Overton, the Supreme Court found that a Michigan regulation that prevented prisoners with two substance abuse disciplinary violations from receiving visitors (except legal and religious) was reasonably related to prison interests in rehabilitation.[241] But, it was important in this case that the visitation ban was not permanent but could be reinstated for good behavior, and that the prisoners had other ways to communicate with the persons who were denied visitation.[242] A federal court in New York similarly held a prisoner's suspension from the Family Reunion Program did not violate the Constitution, as contact visitation is a priviledge, not a right.[243] If the regulation in your case differs from these regulations (for example, if it is permanent), you may be able to challenge it in court. But, be careful of filing a claim that might be dismissed as frivolous (having no legal merit), since it would become a strike under the Prison Litigation Reform Act ("PLRA").[244] JLM, Chapter 14 has more information on the PLRA. In one New York case, the court questioned the legitimacy of the prison's revocation of a prisoner's right to contact visits in response to a failed urine drug test, as well as the apparent lack of connection to any safety or security concerns. The court concluded that the restriction was arbitrary and capricious and therefore a due process violation.[245]

Gay and lesbian prisoners who want visitation from their partners should note the case Doe v. Sparks.[246] There, a lesbian prisoner challenged officials' refusal to allow visits from her lover. Prison rules only permitted visits between heterosexual prisoners and their opposite sex partners. The court found the

---

234. See e.g., Williams v. Tillman, 734 N.Y.S.2d 727, 728 (N.Y.Sup.Ct. 2001).

235. See e.g., Williams v. Tillman, 734 N.Y.S.2d 727, 728 (N.Y.Sup.Ct. 2001).

236. See e.g., Williams v. Tillman, 734 N.Y.S.2d 727, 728 (N.Y.Sup.Ct. 2001).

237. See e.g., Williams v. Tillman, 734 N.Y.S.2d 727, 728 (N.Y.Sup.Ct. 2001).

238. Overton v. Bazzetta, 539 U.S. 126, 133, 123 S. Ct. 2162, 2168, 156 L. Ed. 2d 162, 170–71 (2003). See also Wirsching v. Colorado, 360 F.3d 1191, 1199–1200 (10th Cir. 2004) (upholding rule barring sex-offender prisoner from visits with his minor daughter as reasonably related to promoting his rehabilitation and to the child's best interest).

239. Phillips v. Thurmer, 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 46331 (W.D. Wis. 2009).

240. Phillips v. Thurmer, 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 46331 (W.D. Wis. 2009).

241. Overton v. Bazzetta, 539 U.S. 126, 134, 123 S. Ct. 2162, 2168–69, 156 L. Ed. 2d 162, 171–72 (2003).

242. Overton v. Bazzetta, 539 U.S. 126, 134, 135, 123 S. Ct. 2162, 2168–69, 156 L. Ed. 2d 162, 171–72 (2003).

243. See Giano v. Goord, 9 F. Supp. 2d 235, 241 (W.D.N.Y. 1998) (holding that prisoner has no right to visitation even if removal from the program was based on a faulty urine test).

244. Giano v. Goord, 9 F. Supp. 2d 235, 242 (W.D.N.Y. 1998).

245. Matter of Rivera v. New York City Dept. of Corr., 24 Misc. 3d 536, 541, 876 N.Y.S.2d 631, 635, 2009 NY Slip Op 29144 4, 4 (N.Y. Sup. Ct. 2009).

246. Doe v. Sparks, 733 F. Supp. 227 (W.D. Pa. 1990).

visitation policy, supposedly established to meet security and disciplinary needs, had a rational relationship to those needs, but that other prison policies undercut this rational relationship.[247] Thus, the court held the policy unconstitutional. In its opinion, the court found the connection between the prison policy and the asserted goals of security and discipline "so remote as to be arbitrary."[248] Whitmire v. Arizona[249] is another helpful decision for gay and lesbian couples. There, the court reversed a decision dismissing a gay couple's equal protection challenge to an Arizona policy prohibiting same-sex kissing and hugging but allowing heterosexuals to embrace during visits, finding this policy was not rationally related to prison safety.[250]

The analysis in courts today would likely be even more protective of the rights of same-sex couples. For one thing, the Supreme Court has grown increasingly suspicious of classifications based on sexual orientation, even though the Court has not definitively decided whether such classifications should receive the highest level of scrutiny.[251] And, after Lawrence v. Texas,[252] decided ten years after Sparks and one year after Whitmire, the Court would likely recognize a constitutional right of privacy to homosexual conduct protected under the Due Process and Equal Protection clauses of the Constitution.[253]

One area in which the rights of same-sex couples is particularly relevant is extended family visitation programs, which allow certain prisoners visitation with their family for several days at a time at a private location on the prison campus. In June 2007, California became the first state to grant lesbian and gay prisoners in registered domestic partnerships the same rights to conjugal visits, or extended family visitations, as married heterosexual couples.[254] The extent of such rights provided in other states remains untested and uncertain.[255] New York has instituted a Family Reunion Program in about one-third of its correctional facilities. The program allows inmates to spend up to several days in privacy with their spouse, children, or parents. In January 2009, the Department of Correctional Services updated its "eligible relations" policy to include same-sex partners validly married to a prisoner in a jurisdiction that recognizes same-sex marriage.[256] At the same time, same-sex partners who are not married in this way and who have instead registered their relationship through New York's domestic partnership program are still excluded from participating in the Family Reunion Program.[257] However, New York courts may be receptive to discrimination claims, because New York law explicitly prohibits discrimination on the basis of sexual

---

247. Policies limiting the freedoms of gay prisoners often focus, in the case of the prison's security interests, on the danger of the gay prisoner being identified as such and thus becoming a target for sexual or non-sexual assault. As for the prison's disciplinary interests, the usual rationale is the prison runs the risk of appearing to condone gay relations in prison if it does not limit some of these prisoners' freedoms. Doe v. Sparks, 733 F. Supp. 227, 233 (W.D. Pa. 1990).

248. Doe v. Sparks, 733 F. Supp. 227, 234 (W.D. Pa. 1990).

249. Whitmire v. Arizona, 298 F.3d 1134 (9th Cir. 2002).

250. Whitmire v. Arizona, 298 F.3d 1134, 1135–37 (9th Cir. 2002).

251. Kacy Elizabeth Wiggum, Defining Family in American Prisons, 30 Women's Rts. L. Rep. 357, 387 (2009); See e.g., Romer v. Evans, 513 U.S. 1146, 115 S. Ct. 1092, 130 L. Ed. 2d 1061 (1995).

252. Lawrence v. Texas, 539 U.S. 558, 123 S. Ct. 2472, 156 L. Ed. 2d 508 (2003) (holding that a Texas law that made it a crime for persons of the same sex to engage in certain intimate conduct was unconstitutional because it violated the due process right to privacy).

253. Kacy Elizabeth Wiggum, Defining Family in American Prisons, 30 Women's Rts. L. Rep. 357, 388–89 (2009).

254. Kacy Elizabeth Wiggum, Defining Family in American Prisons, 30 Women's Rts. L. Rep. 357, 369 (2009). See also Cal. Fam. Code § 297.5(h) (2010).

255. In Connecticut, the extended family visitation program is available to spouses if their children are present. Since the Supreme Court of Connecticut held in 2008 that marriage could not be restricted to opposite-sex couples, it would appear that same-sex couples share an equal opportunity to participate in these programs, so long as their children or adopted children are present. See Kacy Elizabeth Wiggum, Defining Family in American Prisons, 30 Women's Rts. L. Rep. 357, 372 (2009). New Mexico is another state that has instituted extended family visitation programs, open to spouses and other nuclear family members, in several of its correctional facilities. Although New Mexico does not perform same-sex marriage and has rejected domestic partnership recognition for same-sex couples, the state does recognize same-sex marriages legally performed in other states or countries and has a non-discrimination law that extends to sexual orientation. Kacy Elizabeth Wiggum, Defining Family in American Prisons, 30 Women's Rts. L. Rep. 357, 375–77 (2009). Finally, in Washington State, the Department of Corrections allows an extended family visiting program for eligible inmates and members of their immediate family, defined as children, grandchildren, parents, siblings, or spouse. Washington State's Domestic Partnership Law, which grants a number of rights to registered same-sex couples, together with the state's anti-discrimination laws, may provide a legal foundation through which a court could compel the Department of Corrections to open the extended visitation program to registered same-sex couples. Kacy Elizabeth Wiggum, Defining Family in American Prisons, 30 Women's Rts. L. Rep. 357, 379–80 (2009).

256. Kacy Elizabeth Wiggum, Defining Family in American Prisons, 30 Women's Rts. L. Rep. 357, 377–78 (2009).

257. Kacy Elizabeth Wiggum, Defining Family in American Prisons, 30 Women's Rts. L. Rep. 357, 378 (2009).

orientation, and New York domestic partners have the same right to visitation as any spouse at hospitals, nursing homes, and other health care facilities.[258]

Because Turner reasonableness governs visitation, the availability of other means of communicating with those who cannot visit is important.[259] For instance, prisoners can still communicate through telephone calls and letters with those restricted from visiting.[260] In addition, Turner says courts should consider the burden of accommodating rights, like security and personnel costs of allowing many visitors. [261]

Keep in mind that federal, state, and local regulations may give you additional visitation rights that courts have not found constitutionally mandated. Prisoners in facilities run by the New York Department of Correctional Services should consult the Family Handbook for visitation restrictions. Most visitors do not need special permission, but the Superintendent must approve in advance in writing visitors under parole or probation, with past or pending criminal histories, or who are also Department employees or volunteers.[262] The Superintendent also has the power to deny visitation as necessary for security or other interests.[263]

H. Using Telephones

While some courts have held prisoners have a First Amendment right to telephone access,[264] some refuse to hold prisoners have such a right.[265] Even courts recognizing a right to telephone access say the right can be severely limited.[266] Restrictions on phone use are also governed by Turner reasonableness. While courts point to prison security as a valid reason for restricting phone use,[267] they also reason that other ways of 258. Kacy Elizabeth Wiggum, Defining Family in American Prisons, 30 Women's Rts. L. Rep. 357, 379 (2009).

---

259. Turner v. Safley, 482 U.S. 78, 107 S. Ct. 2254, 96 L. Ed. 2d 64 (1987).

260. See, e.g., Overton v. Bazzetta, 539 U.S. 126, 135, 123 S. Ct. 2162, 2169, 156 L. Ed. 2d 162, 172 (2003) (finding prisoners have other means of communication and noting these alternatives need not be ideal, just available).

261. See, e.g., Overton v. Bazzetta, 539 U.S. 126, 135, 123 S. Ct. 2162, 2169, 156 L. Ed. 2d 162, 172 (2003) (finding that accommodating visitation would have a significant negative impact on financial resources and visitor safety).

262. State of New York, Department of Correctional Services, Handbook for Families and Friends of New York State DOCS Inmates, 8 (2007).

263. State of New York, Department of Correctional Services, Handbook for Families and Friends of New York State DOCS Inmates, 9 (2007).

264. See Johnson v. California, 207 F.3d 650, 656 (9th Cir. 1999) (affirming that prisoners have a First Amendment right to telephone access but holding that prisoners are not entitled to a specific rate for their telephone calls); see also Walton v. N.Y. State Dept. of Corr. Servs., 18 Misc. 3d 775, 787, 849 N.Y.S.2d 395, 405 (N.Y. Sup. Ct. 2007) (on remand from New York Court of Appeals, upholding constitutional right to telephone access but dismissing claim that rates under a contract between the Department of Correctional Services and MCI, a telephone provider, violated families' and others' rights under the New York constitution). Many decisions involve pretrial detainees' phone access rights. See Johnson v. Galli, 596 F. Supp. 135, 138 (D.C. Nev. 1984) (holding that the First Amendment protects reasonable access to telephone communication for a pretrial detainee); Moore v. Janing, 427 F. Supp. 567, 576 (D.C. Neb. 1976) (affirming the unconstitutionality of institutional eavesdropping on the telephone calls of pretrial detainees but finding timing restrictions on telephone access reasonable); Johnson-El v. Schoemehl, 878 F.2d 1043, 1051–52 (8th Cir. 1989) (finding a policy limiting pretrial detainees to one call to their lawyers every two weeks "patently inadequate" to secure assistance of counsel); Johnson v. Brelje, 701 F.2d 1201, 1207–08 (7th Cir. 1983) (finding limiting pretrial detainee to two 10-minute calls a week and no incoming calls violated his right to court access). Check if your state has enacted laws granting prisoners rights to phone access.

265. United States v. Footman, 215 F.3d 145, 155 (1st Cir. 2000) (stating that "[p]risoners have no per se constitutional right to use a telephone"); Pitsley v. Ricks, No. 96-CV-372 (NAM/DRH), 1999 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 21612, at *10 (N.D.N.Y. Sept. 3, 1999) (unpublished) (granting defendants superintendants' motion for summary judgment based on qualified immunity because there was no clear constitutional right to access to telephones by prisoners).

266. See, e.g., United States v. Felipe, 148 F.3d 101, 110 (2d Cir. 1998) (upholding the constitutionality of severe restrictions on a prisoner's telephone use where those restrictions were related to the state's interest in preventing him from ordering further crime from within the prison); Carter v. O'Sullivan, 924 F. Supp. 903, 909 (C.D. Ill. 1996) (holding the computerized collect calling system employed by a prison, which blocked certain callers and prevented three way calling, was a "reasonable restriction" on the constitutional right to telephone communication and finding "[m]onitoring of inmate telephone calls is acceptable because of legitimate concerns regarding prison security."); Strandberg v. City of Helena, 791 F.2d 744, 747 (9th Cir. 1986) (holding that prisoners have a 1st Amendment right to telephone access but this right can be limited for the legitimate security interests of the prison and finding that denial of access to a telephone in the 30 minutes of imprisonment was not a violation of the prisoner's rights).

267. United States v. Felipe, 148 F.3d 101, 110 (2d Cir. 1998) (applying the Turner test to severe limitations on communications and finding the goal of prison security legitimate to justify restrictions); Gilday v. Dubois, 124 F.3d 277, 293–94 (1st Cir. 1997) (finding no right for a prisoner to use the telephone "on his own terms" and holding that interference of calls by prisoners to numbers not on a pre-approved list was not a violation of their constitutional rights communicating, like letter-writing and visits, limit the need for telephones.[268] So, unless telephone access is eliminated entirely or impedes attorney representation,[269] courts usually uphold phone use restrictions.

In Johnson v. California,[270] the court said prisoners were not entitled to a specific telephone rate and found it valid to charge prisoners higher rates than non-prisoners. In Shoot v. Roop,[271] the court upheld a rule requiring all calls to be operator-assisted and collect (preventing prisoners from calling toll-free numbers). In Washington v. Reno,[272] the court upheld a regulation restricting calls to persons on an approved list. Courts have also upheld restrictions on the number of calls prisoners can make.[273]

Many courts have held prisons must provide for unmonitored phone calls between a prisoner and his attorney, so long as it is arranged in advance.[274] Without advance arrangement, these calls can be monitored like any other call. Call monitoring in the absence of other arrangements does not violate prisoners' Fourth Amendment privacy rights for two reasons. First, there is no reasonable expectation of privacy in outbound calls from prison.[275] Second, prisoners are considered to have consented to monitoring when they receive notice of the surveillance, either by signs near the telephones or informational handbooks.[276] Courts also note prisoners have the alternative of corresponding with their lawyers confidentially through the mail.[277] or of the Massachusetts Wiretap Act); Carter v. O'Sullivan, 924 F. Supp. 903, 909 (C.D. Ill. 1996) (upholding the constitutionality of the computerized collect calling system employed by a prison, which blocked certain callers and prevented three way calling); Wooden v. Norris, 637 F. Supp. 543, 555 (M.D. Tenn. 1986) (holding a coinless telephone system requiring operator assistance did not infringe on prisoners' 1st Amendment rights); Hutchings v. Corum, 501 F. Supp. 1276, 1296 (W.D. Mo. 1980) (holding restriction of telephone access to only one five minute call per week sufficient to meet prisoners' constitutional rights).

---

268. United States v. Lentz, 419 F. Supp. 2d 820, 835–36 (E.D. Va. 2005) (holding that monitoring telephone calls to counsel was not an infringement on prisoners' 6th Amendment rights because prisoners "are not entitled to any particular method of access to the courts or to their lawyers" and they had other means for confidential communication); Bellamy v. McMickens, 692 F. Supp. 205, 214 (S.D.N.Y. 1988) (declaring "states have no obligation to provide the best manner of access to counsel" and denying a claim of deprivation when the restrictions on the prisoner's calls were not an absolute denial of access to counsel); Pino v. Dalsheim, 558 F. Supp. 673, 675 (S.D.N.Y. 1983) (holding "the procedures providing for unlimited personal and mail communication with an attorney are constitutionally sufficient;" although prisoners and their attorneys may prefer to communicate by telephone, the state was not constitutionally obligated to ease restrictions); Wooden v. Norris, 637 F. Supp. 543, 554 (M.D. Tenn. 1986) (stating "in evaluating plaintiffs' claims in the instant case with regard to the effect the current telephone system and policies have on the ability of inmates' families to communicate with them, the Court will consider the alternative means of communication offered by the prison administration and the justification offered by the defendants for utilizing this particular telephone system").

269. See Keenan v. Hall, 83 F.3d 1083, 1092 (9th Cir. 1996) (denying prisoner's claim that he had been deprived his 1st Amendment right to telephone access when he was given access to telephone calls for specific emergencies and calls to his lawyer); see also Johnson-El v. Schoemehl, 878 F.2d 1043, 1051–52 (8th Cir. 1989) (finding a policy limiting pretrial detainees to one call to their attorney every two weeks "patently inadequate" to secure assistance of counsel); see also McClendon v. City of Albuquerque, 272 F.Supp.2d 1250, 1258 (D.N.M. 2003) (finding restrictions including a ban on attorney visits and a five-minute limit on attorney phone calls "would 'unjustifiably obstruct the availability of professional representation'").

270. Johnson v. California, 207 F.3d 650, 656 (9th Cir. 1999), rev'd on other grounds, Johnson v. California, 543 U.S. 499, 125 S. Ct. 1141, 160 L. Ed. 2d 949 (2005).

271. Shoot v. Roop, No. 92-35532, 1993 U.S. App. LEXIS 5890, at *5–6 (9th Cir. Mar. 16, 1993) (unpublished).

272. Washington v. Reno, 35 F.3d 1093, 1100 (6th Cir. 1994). see also Carter v. O'Sullivan, 924 F. Supp. 903, 906 (C.D. Ill. 1996) (upholding collect call system requiring prisoners to provide officials with a list of up to 30 individuals the prisoner wished to call).

273. See Pope v. Hightower, 101 F.3d 1382, 1385 (11th Cir. 1996) (upholding a restriction limiting number of persons a prisoner can call to 10); Robbins v. South, 595 F. Supp. 785, 789 (D. Mont. 1984) (upholding a restriction of one call per week); Moore v. Janing, 427 F. Supp. 567, 576–77 (D. Neb. 1976) (upholding a restriction of three five-minute calls per week).

274. See Tucker v. Randall, 948 F.2d 388, 391 (7th Cir. 1991) ("[O]fficials may tape a prisoner's telephone conversations with an attorney only if such taping does not substantially affect the prisoner's right to confer with counsel."); Martin v. Tyson, 845 F.2d 1451, 1458 (5th Cir. 1988) (allowing unmonitored line for legal and monitored for other calls).

275. United States v. Van Poyck, 77 F.3d 285, 291 (9th Cir. 1996) (holding that "any expectation of privacy in outbound calls from prison is not objectively reasonable and that the Fourth Amendment is therefore not triggered by the routine taping of such calls.").

276. United States v. Workman, 80 F.3d 688, 693–94 (2d Cir. 1996) (holding a sign placed below telephones warning that calls would be monitored constituted sufficient notice of surveillance and use of the telephones after such notice indicated implied consent); see also United States v. Verdin-Garcia, 516 F.3d 884, 894 (10th Cir. 2008) (holding "[a] prisoner's voluntarily made choice ... to use a telephone he knows may be monitored implies his consent to be

I. Conclusion

Limitations on your right to communicate with the outside world, as discussed in this Chapter, may be among the most frustrating restrictions you have to face. In most circumstances, prison authorities have great discretion to restrict your right to communicate based on the way they think the exercise of your right affects penological interests. If you feel the discretion prison officials exercise is not reasonably related to a legitimate prison interest, and as such violates your constitutional rights, you may want to challenge the restriction or its application to you, but you should be careful that your claim does not appear frivolous.[278] monitored.").

277. See e.g., United States v. Felipe, 148 F.3d 101, 110–11 (2d Cir. 1998); Gilday v. Dubois, 124 F.3d 277, 294 (1st Cir. 1997) (citing retention of the right to correspond with counsel and family through the mail as one factor in establishing the reasonableness of a restrictive telephone system); Pino v. Dalsheim, 558 F. Supp. 673, 675 (S.D.N.Y. 1983) (holding "the procedures providing for unlimited personal and mail communication with an attorney are constitutionally sufficient").

278. The Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA) has a "three strikes" provision requiring prisoners to pay court costs if three of their suits have been dismissed as frivolous (without legal merit) or as failing to state a claim. So, proceed carefully, using this Chapter as a guide to successful and unsuccessful suits. 42 U.S.C. §1997e (2010). For more information on the PLRA, see Chapter 14 of the JLM.

A JAILHOUSE LAWYER'S MANUAL

Chapter 20: Using Article 440 of the New York Criminal Procedure Law to Attack Your Unfair Conviction or Illegal Sentence

Columbia Human Rights Law Review

Ninth Edition 2011

Legal Disclaimer

A Jailhouse Lawyer's Manual is written and updated by members of the Columbia Human Rights Law Review. The law prohibits us from providing any legal advice to prisoners. This information is not intended as legal advice or representation nor should you consider or rely upon it as such. Neither the JLM nor any information contained herein is intended to or shall constitute a contract between the JLM and any reader, and the JLM does not guarantee the accuracy of the information contained herein. Additionally, your use of the JLM should not be construed as creating an attorney-client relationship with the JLM staff or anyone at Columbia Law School. Finally, while we have attempted to provide information that is up-to-date and useful, because the law changes frequently, we cannot guarantee that all information is current.

CHAPTER 20

USING ARTICLE 440 OF THE NEW YORK CRIMINAL PROCEDURE LAW TO ATTACK YOUR UNFAIR CONVICTION OR ILLEGAL SENTENCE*

A. Introduction

If you have been convicted in a New York state court, it may be possible for you to challenge your conviction, and possibly have your conviction overturned. Under certain circumstances (such as the discovery of new evidence or when important evidence wasn't included at your trial) you may ask the trial court to either vacate (cancel) the judgment or set aside your sentence. You can make this request in a motion[1] brought under Article 440 of the New York Criminal Procedure Law.[2] Part B of this Chapter explains what Article 440 motions are, the grounds upon which you may make an Article 440 motion, and the circumstances under which a court will consider your Article 440 motion. Part C explains how to make an Article 440 motion. Part D describes what usually happens after you make an Article 440 motion. Part E details the kinds of favorable decisions possible through an Article 440 motion. Part F explains how to appeal a court's denial of your Article 440 motion. Part G summarizes important things to think about when making an Article 440 motion. Finally, Appendix B to this Chapter contains forms for filing Article 440 motions.

If you have been convicted in another state court (besides New York), see Appendix A for a list of similar post-conviction relief statutes from other states.

B. When to Use Article 440

1. What is an Article 440 Motion?

An Article 440 motion challenges the legality of your conviction or sentence.[3] If your Article 440 motion succeeds, you will receive a new trial or a new sentence. An Article 440 motion is not an appeal[4] and is not a substitute for an appeal or second appeal.[5] In an appeal, you request a higher court (i.e., the appellate division or a court of appeals) to review errors of the trial court. In a traditional appeal, you may only raise issues appearing in the trial record. The following list describes information included within your trial record. This information is part of a traditional appeal and is not usually included in an Article 440 motion:

(1) The complaint and the indictment;
(2) The minutes of any hearing to suppress evidence (a hearing to exclude evidence resulting from an illegal search or seizure) and other hearings; and
(3) The report of the formal proceedings in the trial court. This includes:
  (a) the pleadings and motions made by both sides;
  (b) the minutes of a guilty plea if you made one;
  (c) the minutes of the trial court, including objections made by both sides and court rulings;
  (d) the charges to the jury, if it was a jury trial;
  (e) the minutes of the arraignment and the sentencing;
  (f) the minutes of any adjournment; and

---

* This Chapter was revised by Geoffrey Gordon based on previous versions by Melissa Elstein, Maia P. Sloss, members of the 1977 Columbia Human Rights Law Review, Terry Dixon, and Joe Pellican. Special thanks to Harold Ferguson at the Legal Aid Society for his helpful comments.

1. A motion is a request to a court or judge asking for a ruling or order in your favor.

2. The laws pertaining to Article 440 motions can be found in §§ 440.10–440.60 of the New York Criminal Procedure Law ("N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law").

3. Other ways of attacking your conviction include filing a state or federal writ of habeas corpus. Please see Chapter 13, "Federal Habeas Corpus," and Chapter 21, "State Habeas Corpus," of the JLM, which describe the federal writ of habeas corpus and the state writ of habeas corpus, respectively. Both of these writs can be used to obtain post-conviction relief for state and federal constitutional violations.

4. For more on how to appeal your conviction, see JLM, Chapter 9, "Appealing Your Conviction or Sentence."

5. See People v. Harris, 109 A.D.2d 351, 353, 491 N.Y.S.2d 678, 682 (2d Dept. 1985) (explaining that an Article 440 motion "is designed to inform the court of facts not reflected in the record and not known at the time of judgment that would, as a matter of law, undermine the judgment.").

(g) any trial testimony and evidence such as documents, photographs, reports, etc.

An Article 440 motion allows you to inform the trial court of facts that cannot be raised on appeal because they were not in the trial record,[6] since facts presented for the first time on appeal cannot be considered by an appellate court.[7] There are two types of Article 440 motions: a "motion to vacate judgment" and a "motion to set aside sentence."

A motion to vacate (cancel) a judgment can be found in Section 440.10 of the New York Criminal Procedure Law. This motion challenges the fairness and/or legality of your conviction. It allows you to attack your conviction by stating that the trial court acted improperly when it found you guilty. If this motion is granted, you receive a new trial or appeal.

The second kind of motion, a motion to set aside your sentence, is based on Section 440.20 of the New York Criminal Procedure Law. This motion enables you to attack your sentence. In this motion you cannot challenge your guilt; rather, you argue that the punishment is too harsh for the crime. For example, you can challenge your sentence if it exceeds the maximum sentence allowed by the law.

Article 440 was created to partially replace the remedy of coram nobis, although some courts may still refer to an Article 440 motion as a writ of coram nobis.[8] A writ of coram nobis is an order by an appeals court to a lower court to consider facts not on the trial record, which might have changed the outcome of the lower court case if known at the time of trial. Though a writ of coram nobis is not available in situations covered by Article 440,[9] it may still be brought in situations in which an Article 440 motion is unavailable. For example, a coram nobis motion, not an Article 440 motion, should be used to raise a claim of ineffective assistance of appellate counsel.[10]

Article 440 was also created to replace the remedy of state habeas corpus, which challenges the government's right to keep you in prison by evaluating whether your imprisonment is legal. State habeas corpus is still available for New York state prisoners in some situations, but courts generally require you to make an Article 440 motion instead (most frequently, state habeas can still be used to challenge parole and bail decisions). The remedy for a habeas corpus violation is immediate release from custody. Under an Article 440 motion, the relief granted is not immediate release but rather a new trial, appeal, or sentence.[11]

---

6. See People v. Bell, 161 A.D.2d 772, 772–73, 556 N.Y.S.2d 118, 119 (2d Dept. 1990) (holding that direct appeal cannot be had for matters based outside of the record); People v. Piparo, 134 A.D.2d 295, 295, 520 N.Y.S.2d 621, 622 (2d Dept. 1987) (stating that facts not contained in the record are not reviewable on direct appeal).

7. However, in a death penalty case, an Article 440 motion is heard directly by the Court of Appeals (New York's highest court). N.Y. Ct. App. R. 510.4.

8. See People v. Crimmins, 38 N.Y.2d 407, 414, 343 N.E.2d 719, 724, 381 N.Y.S.2d 1, 6 (1975) (stating that "motion to vacate judgment" was formerly known as "coram nobis"); People v. Donovan, 107 A.D.2d 433, 443, 487 N.Y.S.2d 345, 352 (2d Dept. 1985) (stating that CPL 440.10 represents the codification of common law post-judgment coram nobis proceedings); People v. Lyon, 143 Misc. 2d 690, 692, 541 N.Y.S.2d 702, 704 (Suffolk County Ct. 1989) (referring to CPL 440.10 as a post-judgment writ of coram nobis).

9. See People v. Perez, 162 Misc. 2d 750, 763, 616 N.Y.S.2d 928, 937 (1994) (holding that writ of coram nobis is unavailable where an Article 440 motion is applicable).

10. See People v. Bachert, 69 N.Y.2d 593, 600, 509 N.E.2d 318, 323, 516 N.Y.S.2d 623, 628 (1987) (stating that a claim of ineffective assistance of appellate counsel is covered by a writ of coram nobis and not an Article 440 motion). If you file a coram nobis motion in New York on the basis that you received ineffective assistance of appellate counsel or that you were wrongfully deprived of counsel on appeal, and the Appellate Division denies your motion, you may be able to appeal the denial to the Court of Appeals. However, the denial of your coram nobis motion must have occurred on or after November 1, 2002, and you must first be granted a certificate of leave to appeal by either a judge of the Court of Appeals or a justice of the Appellate Division department that denied your motion. N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 450.90 (McKinney 2005 & Supp. 2009); N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 450.90 practice cmnt. at 273 (McKinney 2005). Remember that you should still use an Article 440 motion for a claim of ineffective assistance of trial (versus appellate) counsel, at least where the trial record does not contain sufficient facts for an appellate court to review your claim on appeal. See Part B(2)(a) of this Chapter for a discussion of the standard under which a court will examine ineffective assistance of trial counsel.

11. See JLM, Chapter 21, "State Habeas Corpus," for more information.

2. What You Can Complain About In an Article 440 Motion

(a) Motion to Vacate Judgment

Article 440.10 lists eight wrongs that you may complain about in a motion to vacate judgment.[12] These eight wrongs are as follows.

(1) The trial court lacked jurisdiction to decide your case.[13]

(2) The judge or prosecutor (or a person representing one of them) used fraud, misrepresentation (false statements), or duress (physical or undue psychological pressure) to secure your conviction.[14] You cannot simply claim, however, that the judge or district attorney used fraud or misrepresentation.[15] As with every Article 440 motion, you must support your claim with specific facts in the form of an affidavit and, if possible, witnesses.[16]

(3) At trial, the prosecutor introduced (or the judge allowed in) material (important) evidence which the prosecutor or judge knew was false at the time of trial.[17] Again, you cannot just state that the judge or district attorney knew certain facts were false; you must show that they knew the facts to be false.[18]

(4) The prosecutor introduced material evidence that was obtained in violation of your rights under the U.S. or New York State Constitutions.[19]

(5) You could not understand or participate in the trial because you suffered from a mental disability of some kind.[20] For instance, in one case, a prisoner claimed in his Article 440 motion that he did not remember or understand his plea or the sentencing proceedings. In support of his motion, the prisoner noted that he had been diagnosed after the judgment as suffering from psychosis associated with brain trauma. In light of this fact, the court held that there should be a hearing on the prisoner's motion to vacate the conviction for manslaughter.[21]

(6) The record of your case failed to include prejudicial (improper and biased) conduct that occurred at your trial and that would have led an appellate court to reverse the judgment against you if the appellate court could have learned of the conduct from the record.[22] Such conduct includes the prosecutor's failure to supply you with Brady material, which is any evidence in the prosecutor's possession or knowledge that is favorable to the defense and material to guilt or punishment.[23] This material is often referred to as exculpatory evidence. To have a conviction overturned based upon the failure to produce Brady material there must be a reasonable probability that the evidence would have affected the ultimate outcome of the trial.[24] However, if your trial was in a New York state

---

12. N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law §§ 440.10(1)(a)–(h) (McKinney 2005 & Supp. 2009).

13. N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 440.10(1)(a) (McKinney 2005 & Supp. 2009). For an explanation of jurisdiction, see Chapter 2 of the JLM, "Introduction to Legal Research."

14. N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 440.10(1)(b) (McKinney 2005 & Supp. 2009).

15. See People v. Gates, 168 A.D.2d 995, 996, 564 N.Y.S.2d 938, 938 (4th Dept. 1990) (finding that an unsupported claim of fraud is not enough to overturn a conviction).

16. See People v. Session, 34 N.Y.2d 254, 256, 313 N.E.2d 728, 729, 357 N.Y.S.2d 409, 411 (1974) (finding that affidavits from co-defendants stating that the Assistant District Attorney had threatened them with increased charges if they testified on behalf of defendant were insufficient to require a hearing on Article 440 motion because the affidavits did not contain any supporting evidentiary facts useful to the defendant's case).

17. N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 440.10(1)(c) (McKinney 2005 & Supp. 2009).

18. See People v. Brown, 56 N.Y.2d 242, 246–47, 436 N.E.2d 1295, 1297, 451 N.Y.S.2d 693, 695 (1982) (upholding trial court's denial of defendant's motion to vacate judgment because defendant's motion papers did not contain any evidence demonstrating that prosecution was aware of witness' false testimony).

19. N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 440.10(1)(d) (McKinney 2005 & Supp. 2009). For more information on such violations, see JLM, Chapter 13, "Federal Habeas Corpus", which lists possible violations of the U.S. Constitution, and Chapter 21, "State Habeas Corpus," which lists possible violations of New York State's Constitution. Be aware you may not be able to raise these constitutional violations if you raised them unsuccessfully on appeal. See Part B(3) of this Chapter.

20. N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 440.10(1)(e) (McKinney 2005 & Supp. 2009).

21. People v. Fixter, 79 A.D.2d 861, 861, 434 N.Y.S.2d 484, 485 (4th Dept. 1980).

22. N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 440.10(1)(f) (McKinney 2005 & Supp. 2009); see People v. Cleveland, 132 A.D.2d 921, 921, 518 N.Y.S.2d 477, 478 (4th Dept. 1987) (finding that defendant's claim that the District Attorney had previously represented him on other charges and was therefore disqualified from prosecuting him could be raised in an Article 440 motion since the conduct which was claimed to be improper and prejudicial did not appear in record).

23. Brady v. Maryland, 373 U.S. 83, 87, 83 S. Ct. 1194, 1196–97, 10 L. Ed. 2d 215, 218 (1963) (holding that the suppression of evidence by the prosecution denied petitioner due process).

24. Kyles v. Whitley, 514 U.S. 419, 434, 115 S. Ct. 1555, 1566, 131 L. Ed. 2d 490, 506 (1995) (holding that for court and your defense counsel made a specific request for the evidence in question, and such evidence was not disclosed, there need only be a reasonable possibility that disclosure would have changed the outcome.[25] The reasonable probability test is harder to satisfy than the reasonable possibility test. Under the reasonable probability test, the undisclosed evidence receives no more weight than it would have been given had it been introduced at trial. Thus, the trial court reviewing an Article 440 motion must determine how the evidence would have affected the jury's deliberations. While you do not have to show that, with the evidence, you would not have originally been convicted, the evidence must be substantial enough as to call into question the fairness of your conviction.[26] On the other hand, the reasonable possibility test focuses on the evidence withheld, and the court must determine whether the failure to disclose it may have contributed to the verdict.[27] Additionally, the evidence in both cases must be admissible in court. For example, polygraph (lie detector) test results suggesting that a witness lied are of no use since they are not admissible as evidence.[28] Brady material may also include evidence in the possession of other law enforcement agencies involved in your prosecution (for example, FBI Crime Lab notes). However, if an out-of-state agency refuses to turn over materials, the prosecution cannot be held responsible for failure to disclose.[29]

(7) After your trial, you uncovered new evidence that you could not have discovered before or during your trial. To succeed on this ground, you must show that the evidence (a) will probably change the result in your case if a new trial is granted; (b) was discovered after the trial; (c) could not have been discovered before or during the trial by the exercise of due diligence (proper research); (d) is material to the issue of your guilt; and (e) does not simply duplicate or contradict other evidence.[30] Furthermore, if you would like to make an Article 440 motion on the grounds of newly-discovered evidence, you must make the motion within a reasonable time after you find the new evidence. But you can only make an Article 440 motion on the basis of newly discovered evidence if you were found

---

Brady purposes, "[t]he question [of reasonable probability] is not whether the defendant would more likely than not have received a different verdict with the evidence, but whether in its absence he received a fair trial, understood as a trial resulting in a verdict worthy of confidence; a 'reasonable probability' of a different result is accordingly shown when the government's evidentiary suppression 'undermines confidence in the outcome of the trial.'" (quoting U.S. v. Bagley, 473 U.S. 667, 678, 501 S. Ct. 3375, 3382, 87 L. Ed. 2d 481, 492 (1985))).

25. See People v. Bond, 95 N.Y.2d 840, 843, 735 N.E.2d 1279, 1281, 713 N.Y.S.2d 514, 516 (2000) (vacating second degree murder conviction because a reasonable possibility existed that the result would have been different if prosecutor had disclosed, in response to a specific Brady request, key witness' denial of having seen the shooting); People v. Vilardi 76 N.Y.2d 67, 77–78, 555 N.E.2d 915, 920–21, 556 N.Y.S.2d 518, 523–24 (1990) (ordering retrial on arson charges because prosecution withheld material and exculpatory evidence from defense; holding that a showing of "reasonable possibility" that failure to disclose favorable evidence contributed to verdict is the appropriate standard under New York State constitutional law where the defendant has made a specific request for the exculpatory material).

26. Kyles v. Whitley, 514 U.S. 419, 434, 115 S. Ct. 1555, 1566, 131 L. Ed. 2d 490, 506 (1995) ("A 'reasonable probability' of a different result is … shown when the government's evidentiary suppression 'undermines confidence in the outcome of the trial.'" (quoting U.S. v. Bagley, 473 U.S. 667, 678, 501 S. Ct. 3375, 3382, 87 L. Ed. 2d 481, 492 (1985))).

27. See, e.g., People v. Bond, 95 N.Y.2d 840, 843, 735 N.E.2d 1279, 1281, 713 N.Y.S.2d 514, 516 (2000) (vacating second degree murder conviction because a reasonable possibility existed that the result would have been different if prosecutor had disclosed, in response to a specific Brady request, key witness' denial of having seen shooting); People v. Williams, 50 A.D. 3d 1177, 1179–80, 854 N.Y.S. 2d 586, 589–90 (3d Dept. 2008) (finding a "reasonable possibility" existed of a different result if requested evidence that would have impeached a key witness had been properly disclosed); cf. People v. Phillips, 55 A.D. 3d 1145, 1149, 865 N.Y.S. 2d 787, 791 (3d Dept. 2008) (finding no "reasonable possibility" that disclosure of a witness' investigation for drug-related offenses would have produced a different result since witness' credibility was already blemished during cross-examination).

28. See People v. Scott, 88 N.Y.2d 888, 891, 667 N.E.2d 923, 924, 644 N.Y.S.2d 913, 915 (1996) (finding failure to produce scratch sheet alluding to polygraph examination of witness is not grounds for vacating conviction in part because polygraph results would have been inadmissible as evidence).

29. See People v. Santorelli, 95 N.Y.2d 412, 421–22, 741 N.E.2d 493, 497–98, 718 N.Y.S.2d 696, 700–01 (2000) (refusing to vacate conviction based upon prosecutor's failure to provide reports from a parallel FBI investigation where the FBI, "an independent Federal law enforcement agency not subject to State control," was unwilling to turn over the reports to the prosecutor).

30. N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 440.10(1)(g) (McKinney 2005 & Supp. 2009); see People v. Latella, 112 A.D.2d 321, 322, 491 N.Y.S.2d 771, 772–73 (2d Dept. 1985) (setting standards for newly discovered evidence); People v. Sherman, 83 Misc. 2d 563, 565, 372 N.Y.S.2d 546, 548–49 (Sup. Ct. N.Y. County 1975) (holding indictment of police officer who testified at trial and investigation of judge who signed search warrant was not enough to grant an Article 440 motion).

guilty after a full trial; if you pled guilty, you cannot make an Article 440 motion on the basis of newly discovered evidence.[31]

(8) Your conviction was obtained in violation of your constitutional rights.[32] Chapter 13 of the JLM, "Federal Habeas Corpus," provides a long list of possible violations of your rights under the U.S. Constitution. You may raise any of these violations in your Article 440 motion as long as they are applicable to your case and your motion satisfies the conditions described in Part B(3) of this Chapter.[33] For example, if you fail to present your constitutional attack in your direct appeal of your conviction, you will not be able to make an Article 440 motion based on that constitutional claim later on, unless your claim falls into one of the exceptions described in Part B(3) of this Chapter.[34]

In addition to federal constitutional violations, you may also raise violations of your rights under New York State's Constitution. These rights are generally very similar to your federal constitutional rights. For example, the law under both constitutions forbids attorneys from purposefully discriminating against people by race or gender in selecting a jury.[35] This claim could therefore be raised as a violation of your rights under the New York State Constitution, as well under the U.S. Constitution.

You should be aware that some of your rights under the New York State Constitution are broader than the same rights under the U.S. Constitution. For example, the New York State Constitution provides you with greater protection against unreasonable police searches than the U.S. Constitution.[36] The New York State Constitution also provides you with greater protection against a court imposing a longer sentence upon you after a successful appeal.[37] In addition, the New York State Constitution requires a prosecutor to supply you with a wider category of evidence than the U.S. Constitution requires.[38] Finally, your right to a lawyer is broader under the New York State Constitution than the U.S. Constitution.[39]

---

31. See People v. Latella, 112 A.D.2d 321, 322, 491 N.Y.S.2d 771, 772–73 (2d Dept. 1985) (holding that a guilty plea forecloses an Article 440 motion); People v. Sherman, 83 Misc. 2d 563, 565, 372 N.Y.S.2d 546, 548 (Sup. Ct. N.Y. County 1975) ("There was no verdict after trial here. The defendant pleaded guilty before trial. Thus, on its face, defendant's pleading requires a denial of this motion.").

32. N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 440.10(1)(h) (McKinney 2005 & Supp. 2009).

33. As noted in JLM, Chapter 13, "Federal Habeas Corpus," raising a federal constitutional violation in an Article 440 motion is often necessary to satisfy exhaustion (doing all you can to get state courts to change your conviction or sentence), which is required to raise the violation in a petition for federal habeas corpus.

34. See People v. Skinner, 154 A.D.2d 216, 221, 552 N.Y.S.2d 932, 934–35 (1st Dept. 1990) (holding that failure to raise an issue on appeal when defendant had knowledge to do so forecloses an Article 440 motion).

35. See, e.g., People v. Kern, 75 N.Y.2d 638, 649–53, 554 N.E.2d 1235, 1241–43, 555 N.Y.S.2d 647, 653–55 (1990) (discussing the New York State Constitution's ban on racial discrimination in jury selection); see also Batson v. Kentucky, 476 U.S. 79, 84–98, 106 S. Ct. 1712, 1716–1724, 90 L. Ed. 2d 69, 79–89 (1986) (discussing the Federal Constitution's ban on racial discrimination in jury selection).

36. See People v. Dunn, 77 N.Y.2d 19, 25, 564 N.E.2d 1054, 1058, 563 N.Y.S.2d 388, 392 (1990) (finding that police use of a specially trained narcotics detection dog to conduct "canine sniff" outside defendant's apartment is a search under the New York Constitution).

37. See People v. Van Pelt, 76 N.Y.2d 156, 161–62, 556 N.E.2d 423, 425–26, 556 N.Y.S.2d 984, 986–87 (1990) (finding that a sentence following retrial that was for a longer period than the sentence from the first trial was presumed to be vindictive and must be set aside, even if the second trial judge was different from the first trial judge).

38. See People v. Vilardi, 76 N.Y.2d 67, 77, 555 N.E.2d 915, 920, 556 N.Y.S.2d 518, 523 (1990) (holding where the prosecutor was made aware by a specific discovery request that defendant considered exculpatory material important to the defense, standard of materiality is "reasonable possibility" that failure to disclose the material contributed to the verdict, instead of "reasonable probability"); cf. People v. Lesiuk, 161 A.D.2d 21, 25, 560 N.Y.S.2d 711, 713 (3d Dept. 1990) (stating that standard is "reasonable probability" where the prosecution has tried hard to produce a missing exculpatory police informant), aff'd 81 N.Y.2d 485, 617 N.E.2d 1047, 600 N.Y.S.2d 931 (1993). A reasonable probability test is harder to satisfy than the reasonable possibility test. The difference between the tests is that under the reasonable probability test, the undisclosed evidence receives no more weight than it would have been given had it been introduced at trial. Thus, the trial court reviewing an Article 440 motion must determine how that evidence would have affected the jury's deliberations. On the other hand, the reasonable possibility test focuses on the evidence withheld and the court must determine whether the failure to disclose it possibly contributed to the verdict. See People v. Vilardi, 76 N.Y.2d 67, 77, 555 N.E.2d 915, 920, 556 N.Y.S.2d 518, 523 (1990); People v. Lesiuk, 161 A.D.2d 21, 25, 560 N.Y.S.2d 711, 713 (3d Dept. 1990).

39. See People v. Velasquez, 68 N.Y.2d 533, 536, 503 N.E.2d 481, 483, 510 N.Y.S.2d 833, 835 (1986) ("In this State the right to counsel, both as to the time of its attachment and as to its waiver, is broader than the protection afforded under Federal law."); People v. Hobson, 39 N.Y.2d 479, 483–84, 348 N.E.2d 894, 897, 384 N.Y.S.2d 419, 422 (1976) (detailing New York case law that extended protections for the defendant under the State Constitution beyond those guaranteed by the Federal Constitution).

Because you may have greater rights under the New York Constitution than the U.S. Constitution, be sure to include claims of state constitutional violations in your Article 440 motion. Indeed, it is a good idea when claiming a violation of a specific federal constitutional provision (for example, the Fourth Amendment's prohibition against unreasonable searches and seizures) to cite the equivalent state constitutional provision (which, in this example, would be Article I, Section 12 of New York's Constitution).

Another example of state and federal constitutional violations that can be raised in an Article 440 motion is ineffective assistance of counsel at trial; in other words, you had a lawyer, but he or she did not represent you effectively at your trial. You should be aware though, that it is firmly established in New York that a claim of ineffective assistance of counsel may not be based solely upon your lawyer's unsuccessful use of a certain trial strategy even if that strategy was offensive, outrageous,[40] daring, or innovative.[41] In addition, it is not enough to simply claim that your lawyer was ineffective. You must identify the specific acts or omissions of counsel that you believe were so ineffective that you were, in essence, deprived of your right to counsel. Then, you must also show that this lack of counsel prejudiced your defense to such an extent that the trial result is unreliable.[42] For example, an error by counsel, even if professionally unreasonable, does not warrant setting aside the judgment if the error had no effect on the judgment. However, if you can show that your attorney had a conflict of interest while representing you, and that this conflict made the attorney's performance worse, courts will presume there was prejudice.[43] Your attorney would have had a conflict of interest if your attorney had a work-related reason or a substantial personal reason to give you less than a full effort. One possible reason would be if your attorney, without telling you or the judge, also represented a witness who testified against you.[44]

(b) Motion to Set Aside Sentence

Unlike the Article 440.10 motion to challenge your conviction (discussed above), an Article 440.20 motion allows you to attack your sentence as unauthorized, illegally imposed, or in some other way invalid.[45] A sentence is unauthorized if it exceeds the maximum length of time allowed by law.[46] For example, third

---

40. See People v. Sullivan, 153 A.D.2d 223, 226–27, 550 N.Y.S.2d 358, 359–60 (2d Dept. 1990) (holding that defense attorney's reference to victims as "skells," "pimps," or "junkies" was not ineffective counsel because it must, in the absence of any proof to the contrary, be presumed to have been devised as part of a trial strategy).

41. See People v. Baldi, 54 N.Y.2d 137, 151–52, 429 N.E.2d 400, 407–08, 444 N.Y.S.2d 893, 900–01 (1981) (holding that defense attorney's strategy of testifying at his client's trial in an attempt to present an insanity defense was not ineffective assistance even though the attorney did not pursue a claim of innocence).

42. See Strickland v. Washington, 466 U.S. 668, 687, 104 S. Ct. 2052, 2064, 80 L. Ed. 2d 674, 693 (1984) (stating you must first specify the error made by counsel, and then show that the error prejudiced your defense to such an extent that it affected the result of the trial). In New York, you are entitled to meaningful representation. People v. Baldi, 54 N.Y.2d 137, 147, 429 N.E.2d 400, 405, 444 N.Y.S.2d 893, 898 (1981) ("So long as the evidence, the law, and the circumstances of a particular case, viewed in totality and as of the time of the representation, reveal that the attorney provided meaningful representation, the constitutional requirement will have been met."). New York has retained the Baldi "meaningful representaton" standard in preference to the federal Strickland standard in evaluating claims of ineffective assistance of trial counsel. People v. Stultz, 2 N.Y.3d 277, 282, 810 N.E.2d 883, 886, 778 N.Y.S.2d 431, 434 (2004) (stating that the appropriate standard for effective assistance of counsel is the same meaningful representation standard as People v. Baldi). You should note, however, "meaningful representation" does not mean perfect representation. People v. Benevento, 91 N.Y.2d 708, 697 N.E.2d 584, 587, 629 N.Y.S.2d 629, 632 (1998) (quoting People v. Modica, 64 N.Y.2d 828, 829, 476 N.E.2d 330, 331, 486 N.Y.S.2d 931, 932 (1985)).

43. See Cuyler v. Sullivan, 446 U.S. 335, 349–50, 100 S. Ct. 1708, 1719, 64 L. Ed. 2d 333, 347 (1980) (stating that a defendant who shows that a conflict of interest actually affected the adequacy of his representation need not demonstrate prejudice); see also Winkler v. Keane, 812 F. Supp 426, 431 (S.D.N.Y. 1993) (finding that existence of a contingency fee arrangement between defendant and his attorney does not amount to a per se claim of ineffective assistance of counsel); People v. Wandell, 75 N.Y.2d 951, 952, 554 N.E.2d 1274, 1275, 555 N.Y.S.2d 686, 687 (1990) (stating that attorney must inform client and trial court of conflicting interests so that court may conduct a record inquiry to determine whether client understands the implications of the conflict); People v. Gomberg, 38 N.Y.2d 307, 314–16, 342 N.E.2d 550, 555, 379 N.Y.S. 2d 769, 776–77 (1975) (holding that trial judge's inquiry into possible conflict of interest between defendants and their counsel, and defendants' opportunity to retain separate counsel, fulfilled obligation to protect defendants' rights).

44. See JLM, Chapter 12, "Appealing Your Conviction Based on Ineffective Assistance of Counsel," for more examples of conflicts of interest.

45. N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 440.20(1) (McKinney 2005 & Supp. 2009).

46. See People v. Fuller, 119 A.D.2d 692, 692, 501 N.Y.S.2d 116, 116 (2d Dept. 1986) (vacating sentence longer than length of time imposable for the crime committed).

degree burglary, a Class D felony,[47] carries a maximum sentence of seven years if you are a first or second felony offender.[48] Thus, you could make an Article 440 motion to attack a sentence of seven years and one day for third degree burglary if you are a first or second felony offender. However, you could not attack a sentence of seven years. Although this sentence may seem long or excessive in comparison to sentences that other defendants have received for the same crime, the Penal Law authorizes a seven-year sentence.[49] You cannot raise a claim that your sentence was too harsh or excessive under this motion as long as the sentence was authorized.[50]

In addition to the unauthorized sentence described above, there may be other grounds upon which you can raise an Article 440 motion to set your sentence aside as illegal. Some of these grounds include:

(1) Due process errors in the sentencing procedures;[51]
(2) The sentencing court disregarded your right of allocution, which means that the judge failed to ask you at your sentencing if you wished to address the court on your own behalf;[52]
(3) The sentencing court disregarded your right to be present at sentencing;[53]
(4) The court violated your First Amendment right of free association by, for example, considering at sentencing your membership in a racist organization where this membership was not relevant to any of the issues at your trial;[54]

---

47. N.Y. Penal Law § 140.20 (McKinney 1999). The N.Y. Penal Law describes and classifies every felony. In order to determine whether your sentence was authorized by law, you should first find out what class of felony you were convicted of by looking up your offense in the Penal Law. Burglary and related offenses, for example, are defined in § 140.20 through § 140.35 of the Penal Law. Then, consult § 70.00 of the Penal Law, which specifies the maximum and minimum terms of sentence which can be imposed for the various classes of felonies.

48. N.Y. Penal Law § 70.00 (McKinney 2009).

49. See People v. Baraka, 109 Misc. 2d 271, 272–73, 439 N.Y.S.2d 827, 829–30 (N.Y. County Crim. Ct. 1981) (holding that the court deciding an Article 440 motion has no authority to disturb a sentence that conforms to the Penal Law).

50. N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 440.20(1) (McKinney 2005 & Supp. 2009); N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 440.20 practice cmt. at 10 (McKinney 2005). See Chapter 9 of the JLM, "Appealing Your Conviction or Sentence," for more information on appeals.

51. See People v. Bellamy, 160 A.D.2d 886, 887–88, 554 N.Y.S.2d 320, 321 (2d Dept. 1990) (vacating sentence and finding that, while judge had authority to vacate a previously-imposed minimum permissible sentence, defendant's right to due process was violated when judge then imposed maximum permissible sentence, without offering any justification for doing so).

52. N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 380.50(1) (McKinney 2005 & Supp. 2009) gives you the right to make such a statement. To have your sentence set aside on this ground, you must show that, had your right been honored, you would have said or revealed something that would have required the court to conduct further inquiry before sentencing you. See People v. St. Claire, 99 A.D.2d 982, 982, 473 N.Y.S.2d 19, 20 (1st Dept. 1984) (stating that violation of right to allocution should be raised in Article 440.20 motion); People v. Quiles, 72 A.D.2d 610, 610, 421 N.Y.S.2d 119, 119–20 (2d Dept. 1979) (where defendant at sentencing raised the possibility of a defense—behavior that possibly negated his criminal intent—the trial court was obligated to conduct further inquiry); People ex rel. Boddingham v. LaVallee, 50 A.D.2d 692, 692, 375 N.Y.S.2d 477, 478 (3d Dept. 1975) (holding that defendant who was denied right of allocution is entitled only to resentencing and not release from incarceration).

53. N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 380.40 (McKinney 2005 & Supp. 2009) gives you the right to be present at sentencing and at resentencing. See People v. Brown, 155 A.D.2d 608, 608, 547 N.Y.S.2d 664, 664 (2d Dept. 1989) (finding that the court's failure to produce the defendant at resentencing denied him his statutory right to be present). You may waive this right if you are being charged with a misdemeanor or petty offense, in which case a court may sentence you in your absence. N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 380.40(2) (McKinney 2005 & Supp. 2009). To succeed on an Article 440 motion based on a denial of this right, you must show that, had you been present, you would have said something that would have obligated the court to investigate your case further. However, your right to be present may have been forfeited by your actions if you were removed from the courtroom due to misbehavior. See People v. Herrera, 160 A.D.2d 416, 416, 554 N.Y.S.2d 30, 30–31 (1st Dept. 1990) (based on defendant's behavior "it is clear that defendant voluntarily absented himself from the sentencing proceedings, thereby waiving such right."). You may also have forfeited your right to be present if you failed to appear after being advised that sentence would be pronounced in your absence. See People v. Griffin, 135 A.D.2d 730, 731, 522 N.Y.S.2d 632, 634 (2d Dept. 1987) (holding that defendant waived his right to be present at his predicate felony hearing and sentencing by not appearing even though "he knew when he refused to attend that the hearing court would proceed in his absence."). Finally, if you willfully failed to appear in order to frustrate the sentencing process, your right to be present may have been forfeited by your actions. See People v. Corley, 67 N.Y.2d 105, 110, 491 N.E.2d 1090, 1092, 500 N.Y.S.2d 633, 635 (1986) (affirming sentence imposed in defendant's absence where "defendant willfully absented himself from the court for the purpose of frustrating the sentencing process.").

54. See Dawson v. Delaware, 503 U.S. 159, 160, 112 S. Ct. 1093, 1095, 117 L. Ed. 2d 309, 314 (1992) (holding that

(5) The court sentenced you as a second- or third-time offender, but the prior conviction was obtained in violation of your constitutional rights or was in some other way invalid.[55] For example, you may challenge the constitutional validity of the prior convictions or the decision to count them as predicates (prior convictions). Perhaps the most common error in this area is the use of out-of-state convictions as predicate felonies. Your out-of-state conviction will only count as a felony if your criminal conduct would have been a felony in New York, or if in the other state your conduct was punishable by a sentence of more than one year imprisonment and is also punishable by a sentence of more than one year under New York law.[56] For example, if you were convicted of promoting prostitution by soliciting persons to patronize a prostitute in New Jersey, where such activity is a felony, your conviction cannot be used as a predicate felony in New York since the equivalent New York crime, promoting prostitution in the fourth degree, is a misdemeanor;[57]

(6) The court erroneously imposed consecutive sentences (one sentence running after another) when you should have been sentenced to concurrent sentences (two sentences running at the same time).[58] In general, consecutive sentences cannot be imposed where (1) a single act constitutes two or more offenses, or (2) a single act constitutes one offense and is a material element of another.[59] For example, if you committed armed robbery, you can be charged with the crimes of robbery and weapons possession. However, you cannot be sentenced consecutively for these crimes as they were part of the same act.

Remember, a motion under Section 440.20 deals solely with your sentence and has no effect on your underlying conviction. If your motion is granted, the court will vacate your sentence and resentence you in accordance with the law.[60]

(c) Request for DNA Testing

In a relatively new section of Article 440, a defendant may request in his or her 440 motion that a forensic DNA test be done on evidence introduced at trial.[61] The court will order that a test be done if it determines that the following requirements are met: admitting evidence at the capital sentencing proceeding of defendant's membership in racist gang was error where that evidence was not relevant to any issue in the punishment phase).

---

55. See People v. Simmons, 143 A.D.2d 153, 154, 531 N.Y.S.2d 928, 928–29 (2d Dept. 1988) (finding that defendant's prior conviction for buying, receiving, and concealing stolen property under an Alabama statute that did not specify monetary value for stolen property did not qualify as a predicate felony for purposes of second felony offender status, as the New York statute required proof that the value of the stolen property exceeded $250). If you did not raise an objection at the time the prosecution identified to you the prior felony to be used for sentencing enhancement, an appeals court will not review this sentencing issue. See People v. Sullivan, 153 A.D.2d 223, 232–33, 550 N.Y.S.2d 358, 364 (2d Dept. 1990) ("When the defendant fails to raise an objection, and when, as a result, the legality of the sentence cannot be determined by this court upon the information contained in the appellate record, review as a matter of law should be denied."). If no objection was made due to mutual mistake, the appellate court can still reverse if the use of the predicate (prior) felony was clear error (meaning that it was apparent on the record). See People v. Eason, 168 Misc. 2d 44, 46–47, 641 N.Y.S.2d 1018, 1020 (Sup. Ct. Queens County 1996) (setting aside sentence where the defendant was improperly determined to be a second felony offender because of a mutual mistake (the prior felony had not yet been sentenced, and so was not actually available as a predicate), and the error was clear on the record); see also N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law §§ 400.15(7)(b), 400.16, 400.20(6), & 400.21(7)(b) (McKinney 2005 & Supp. 2009).

56. N.Y. Penal Law § 70.06(1)(b)(i) (McKinney 2009) ("The conviction must have been in this state of a felony, or in any other jurisdiction of an offense for which a sentence to a term of imprisonment in excess of one year or a sentence of death was authorized and is authorized in this state irrespective of whether such sentence was imposed").

57. People v. Johnson, 127 A.D.2d 1003, 1003, 513 N.Y.S.2d 60, 60 (4th Dept. 1987) (holding New Jersey felony conviction for promoting prostitution did not constitute felony for New York sentencing purposes because crime would have been misdemeanor in New York, for which a term of imprisonment in excess of one year was not authorized).

58. See People v. Riggins, 164 A.D.2d 797, 797, 559 N.Y.S.2d 535, 536 (1st Dept. 1990) (finding that Court had no authority to change concurrent sentences to consecutive ones on its own without being asked by either side).

59. See N.Y. Penal Law § 70.25(2) (McKinney 2009); People v. Jeanty, 268 A.D.2d 675, 679–81, 702 N.Y.S.2d 194, 200–01 (3d Dept. 2000) (holding that the lower court erred in making a sentence for robbery in the first degree and burglary in the first degree consecutive to a felony murder sentence because the conduct constituting the robbery and burglary offense could have been a material element of the felony murder; however, the court also held that aggregate sentence of 75 years to life was proper).

60. N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 440.20(4) (McKinney 2005 & Supp. 2009); N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 440.20 practice cmt. at 9 (McKinney 2005).

61. N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 440.30(1-a) (McKinney 2005 & Supp 2009).

(1) Your 440 motion requests forensic testing on specific and particular evidence, which is clearly identified;
(2) The evidence upon which you are requesting a DNA test was obtained in connection with the trial that resulted in your conviction; and
(3) There is a reasonable probability that if the results of a DNA test had been admitted at the trial, the verdict would have been more favorable to you.[62]

The third requirement is probably the most important one. The court will not order a DNA test if it believes there is no reasonable probability the verdict would have been different even if you are right about whatever you are trying to prove with the DNA test.[63] For more information on DNA testing, see Chapter 11 of the JLM, "Using Post-Conviction DNA Testing to Attack Your Conviction or Sentence."

3. When You Can Get Relief Under Article 440

There are strict requirements as to when you may make a motion to vacate judgment under Section 440.10. In contrast, the requirements for making a motion to set aside a sentence under Section 440.20 are more relaxed. The requirements for making each type of motion are discussed separately below.

(a) When You Are Not Entitled to Move to Vacate a Judgment Under Section 440.10

There are four circumstances in which the court has no choice but to deny your motion to vacate a judgment under Section 440.10.[64] These four circumstances are as follows:

(1) You cannot make a Section 440.10 motion if your claim was raised on appeal and the court denied your complaint on the merits (in other words, when the appellate court found that your legal arguments could not overcome your guilty conviction).[65] There is an exception to this rule that applies when the law has changed after your appeal was decided, and the courts have agreed to apply the new law retroactively (in other words, when courts apply a new law to cases which have been tried, decided, or appealed before the change in the law occurred).[66] The Court of Appeals will only give full retroactivity to new laws when the purpose of the new law is to protect the fact-finding process from unreliably obtained information which relates directly and substantially to guilt or innocence.[67] "Full retroactivity" means you can raise the new law in a post-conviction proceeding, such as an Article 440 motion, in order to attack a conviction that was handed down and appealed before the new law came into effect. However, full retroactivity has been applied very rarely in New York.[68] The courts decide whether a new rule should apply retroactively after considering the following three factors:

---

62. N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 440.30(1-a) (McKinney 2005 & Supp. 2009). See note 38 of this Chapter for an explanation of "reasonable probability."

63. N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 440.30(1-a) (McKinney 2005 & Supp. 2009); see also People v. Tookes, 167 Misc. 2d 601, 605–06, 639 N.Y.S.2d 913, 916 (Sup. Ct. N.Y. County 1996) (finding no reasonable probability where: (1) there was no case for mistaken identity, (2) there was clear evidence of rape, (3) defendant failed earlier to pursue an enzyme analysis, and (4) a showing that defendant's DNA did not match the crime scene sample would not likely have resulted in a "verdict more favorable to the defendant"). See note 38 of this Chapter for an explanation of "reasonable probability."

64. N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law §§ 440.10(2)(a)–(d) (McKinney 2005 & Supp. 2009).

65. N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 440.10(2)(a) (McKinney 2005 & Supp. 2009); see, e.g., People v. Skinner, 154 A.D.2d 216, 221, 552 N.Y.S.2d 932, 934 (1st Dept. 1990) (holding that arguments raised and rejected on their merits on direct appeal may not be subsequently raised in an Article 440 motion).

66. N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 440.10(2)(a) (McKinney 2005 & Supp. 2009).

67. People v. Laffman, 161 A.D.2d 111, 112–13, 554 N.Y.S.2d 840, 841 (1st Dept. 1990) ("Where a new rule … has as its purpose preserving the fact-finding process from unreliably obtained information bearing directly and substantially on a defendant's guilt or innocence, the rule should be applied retroactively ….").

68. See People v. Hill, 85 N.Y.2d 256, 263, 648 N.E.2d 455, 458, 624 N.Y.S.2d 79, 82 (1995) (vacating the conviction and remanding for a new trial in holding that the new Ryan rule, requiring the defendant to have been aware of the amount of illegal drugs he possessed, should be applied retroactively to prevent someone from being held guilty even though one of the elements of the crime had not been shown); People v. Laffman, 161 A.D.2d 111, 111–13, 554 N.Y.S.2d 840, 841 (1st Dept. 1990) (vacating the judgment and remanding for a new trial where the defendant was shown to the victim handcuffed and alone with one other suspect in the police station for identification. The station house identification procedures were found to be improper in a subsequent case which applied retroactively to these cases). But see People v. Pepper, 53 N.Y.2d 213, 221–22, 423 N.E.2d 366, 369–70, 440 N.Y.S.2d 889, 892–93 (1981) (finding the defendant was not entitled to retroactive application of a court decision that held that once an indictment or

(a) the new rule's purpose;
(b) the extent of the reliance on the old rule (in other words, whether there were a great number of cases and, as a result, a large number of defendants convicted and incarcerated under the old rule); and
(c) the effect on the administration of justice in applying the new rule retroactively (in other words, whether the reliance on the old rule has been so great that applying the new rule retroactively would result in so many overrulings and retrials that it would over-burden the criminal courts. In such a situation, the courts are unwilling to apply the new rule retroactively).[69]

(2) You cannot make a Section 440.10 motion on the basis of an error that you may still raise in an appeal of your conviction, or that you have already raised in an appeal that is pending (if the appeals court has not yet handed down a decision).[70] Remember, Article 440 is not a substitute for an appeal. However, you may complain in a Section 440.10 motion about an error without first appealing the error if the record of your trial does not contain sufficient facts to allow an appeals court to review the error.[71] For example, if you have found new evidence that was not available at the time of the trial, and therefore was not included in the record, you may bring a Section 440.10 motion directly.[72] But be very careful about deciding to use an Article 440 motion to complain about a decision without first bringing a direct appeal. The court reviewing your Article 440 motion will decide whether the record of your trial contains sufficient facts for an appeal. If the court finds that the record was sufficient for direct appeal, your 440 motion will be dismissed, and if you did not file or pursue a direct appeal, it may be too late to do so.[73] Sometimes there may be doubt as to whether there are complaint has been filed, a defendant cannot waive his constitutional right to counsel unless in presence of counsel); People v. Douglas, 205 A.D.2d 280, 292, 617 N.Y.S.2d 733, 740 (1st Dept. 1994) (stating that the Ryan decision, which held that defendant's knowledge of drug weight was to be proved by the prosecution, will not be applied retroactively); People v. Byrdsong, 161 Misc. 2d 232, 235, 613 N.Y.S.2d 543, 544–45 (Sup. Ct. Queens County 1994) (holding that the retroactivity of a rule, which stated that defendants generally had the right to be present during Sandoval hearings to determine whether the prosecution should be permitted to raise prior convictions and bad acts on cross-examination of the defendant, was limited to only direct appeals and not to post-conviction hearings); People v. Alvarez, 151 Misc. 2d 697, 701, 573 N.Y.S.2d 592, 594–95 (Sup. Ct. Kings County 1991) (stating that the Van Pelt decision, which held that a presumption of vindictiveness applies where a second sentence is higher after retrial than the original sentence, will not be applied retroactively).

---

69. People v. Pepper, 53 N.Y.2d 213, 220, 423 N.E.2d 366, 369, 440 N.Y.S.2d 889, 891–92 (1981) (outlining the three-part test for retroactivity but holding that the defendant was not entitled to the benefit of retroactivity because changes in the rules governing a defendant's right to pre-trial counsel were applied retroactively only to cases still on direct review at the time of the change in law); see also People v. Mitchell, 80 N.Y.2d 519, 528–29, 606 N.E.2d 1381, 1386, 591 N.Y.S.2d 990, 995 (1992) (applying the three-part Pepper test in holding that a new state statutory right applied only prospectively and not retroactively because (1) the new rule did not fix any constitutional problems and only indirectly related to the fact-finding process, (2) the courts had substantially relied on the old rule, and (3) retroactive application would substantially burden the justice system); People v. Douglas, 205 A.D.2d 280, 290, 617 N.Y.S.2d 733, 739 (1st Dept. 1994) (holding that retroactivity cannot apply because, despite the compelling argument that could be made for the first prong of this test, the second prong was violated because the vast majority of drug cases relied on the old rule, and the third prong would therefore be violated because retroactivity would place a substantial burden on the administration of justice); People v. Perez, 162 Misc. 2d 750, 762–63, 616 N.Y.S.2d 928, 936 (Sup. Ct. Kings County 1994) (observing as dicta that a certain new rule would not apply retroactively, even though retroactive application would further the new rule's purpose, because retroactivity would violate the second and third prongs of this three-pronged test due to past substantial reliance and the potential for future substantial burden on the administration of justice).

70. N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 440.10(2)(b) (McKinney 2005 & Supp. 2009); see People v. Cooks, 67 N.Y.2d 100, 104, 491 N.E.2d 676, 678, 500 N.Y.S.2d 503, 505 (1986) (holding that if the record is sufficient for review of the issue on direct appeal, the issue cannot be collaterally reviewed in an Article 440 motion); People v. Griffin, 115 A.D.2d 902, 904, 496 N.Y.S.2d 799, 801 (3d Dept. 1985) (denying the defendant's Article 440 motion because judgment was already on appeal to the Appellate Division and defendant failed to demonstrate the existence of pertinent, new evidence not in the record). Part B(1) of this Chapter contains a list of information found in your trial record.

71. N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 440.10(2)(b) (McKinney 2005 & Supp. 2009). See Chapter 9 of the JLM, "Appealing Your Conviction or Sentence," for a full discussion of how to appeal your sentence and/or conviction.

72. N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 440.10(1)(g) (McKinney 2005 & Supp. 2009).

73. See People v. Cooks, 67 N.Y.2d 100, 104, 491 N.E.2d 676, 678, 500 N.Y.S.2d 503, 505 (1986) (holding that if the defendant could have raised the issue on direct appeal, the judge must dismiss the Article 440 motion); N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 440.10 practice cmt. at 250 (McKinney 2005) ("[S]hould the record be found by the motion court to have been sufficient for review of the point on direct appeal, the motion must be dismissed … and the defendant, having permitted sufficient facts in the record for an appeals court to review. In that situation, you should be careful to file a timely direct appeal, and not just rely on an Article 440 motion, in case your Article 440 motion is denied.[74]

(3) If you failed to raise an error on appeal, either because you did not include the error in your appeal or because you simply did not appeal your conviction at all, you cannot raise that error in an Article 440 motion unless you have a good excuse for not raising the issue on appeal.[75] One example of a good excuse would be where the error was overlooked due to ineffective assistance of counsel. (But if you believe your lawyer was ineffective because your lawyer did not tell you of your right to appeal, you must make a motion instead under N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law Section 460.30.)[76] Another good excuse is where an appeal seemed useless due to the state of the law at the time, but the law changed later and courts applied the new law retroactively; because of those changes, you can argue that your conviction is fundamentally unfair.[77]

(4) The judge must deny your Section 440.10 motion if it is based on an issue that involves only the validity of your sentence, rather than your conviction.[78] You must complain about your sentence in a motion to set aside your sentence under N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 440.20, not Section 440.10.

(b) When You May File a Motion to Vacate Judgment Under Section 440.10

While a judge must deny your Section 440.10 motion in the four circumstances listed above, there are other circumstances in which a judge may, but is not required to deny, deny your Section 440.10 motion.[79] These circumstances are as follows:

(1) You did not "preserve the issue for review on appeal." An issue is not preserved for review on appeal if you failed to object to errors that occurred during trial, or failed to request that the court give a particular instruction to the jury or ruling on an issue, or failed to present facts that would support your claim and which you should have been able to discover through due diligence (proper research), or in some way failed to make sure that an issue would appear in the trial record.[80] The following are the time for perfecting the appeal to elapse, will be left without a remedy.").

---

74. N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 440.10 practice cmt. at 249 (McKinney 2005).

75. N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 440.10(2)(c) (McKinney 2005 & Supp. 2009); see, e.g., People v. Skinner, 154 A.D.2d 216, 221, 552 N.Y.S.2d 932, 934–35 (1st Dept. 1990) (holding that the defendant's failure to present his constitutional attack in his direct appeal prevented any consideration of it in an Article 440 motion); People v. Cunningham, 104 Misc. 2d 298, 304, 428 N.Y.S.2d 183, 188 (Sup. Ct. Bronx County 1980) (holding that a court must deny an Article 440 motion where a defendant could have, but did not, raise the issue on direct appeal, despite a subsequent retroactively effective change in the law regarding that issue).

76. N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 440.10 practice cmt. at 248 (McKinney 2005) (discussing that the writ of coram nobis—where a defendant petitions a court to set aside a conviction on the basis of facts that were not brought up before the judgment due to duress, fraud or excusable mistake—is available in addition to § 440.10 and that the writ of coram nobis can be used to bring a claim of ineffective counsel even though the statute itself does not provide for that remedy); s*ee also* People v. Bachert, 69 N.Y.2d 593, 599, 516 N.Y.S.2d 623, 627, 509 N.E.2d 318, 322 (1987) (holding that § 440.10 did not invalidate the writ of coram nobis and therefore review of ineffective counsel by the appellate court was available).

77. See N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 440.10(3)(b) (McKinney 2005 & Supp. 2009); N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 440.10 practice cmt. at 251 (McKinney 2005) (discussing how a court, under § 440.10(3)(b), may choose not to bar relief if there has been a retroactively effective change in law).

78. N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 440.10(2)(d) (McKinney 2005 & Supp. 2009).

79. N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law §§ 440.10(3)(a)–(c) (McKinney 2005 & Supp. 2009). Although the court may deny the motion under any of the circumstances specified, in the interest of justice and for good cause shown, it can use its discretion to grant the motion and vacate the judgment.

80. N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 440.10(3)(a) (McKinney 2005 & Supp. 2009); see People v. Green, 177 A.D.2d 856, 857, 576 N.Y.S.2d 625, 626 (3d Dept. 1991) (holding that County Court properly denied § 440.10 motion where defendant could have challenged the prosecutor's use of peremptory challenges to eliminate black jurors at trial, but failed to do so); People v. Nuness, 151 A.D.2d 987, 988, 542 N.Y.S.2d 76, 77 (4th Dept. 1989) (holding that because defendant did not object at trial to prosecutor's failure to turn over police notes or request a hearing to determine the existence of the notes, the issue was not preserved for appeal and could not be raised in a § 440.10 proceeding); People v. Craft, 123 A.D.2d 481, 482, 506 N.Y.S.2d 492, 493 (3d Dept. 1986) (holding that the shackling of the defendant in the presence of the jury was not a basis for a § 440.10 motion because defendant did not object at trial nor request an instruction to the jury to disregard the shackling); People v. Donovon, 107 A.D.2d 433, 443–44, 487 N.Y.S.2d 345, 352–53 (2d Dept. 1985) (holding that because the defendant did not claim at trial that his confession was obtained in violation of his right to counsel, the defendant could not raise this issue for the first time in a § 440.10 motion). As explained in Chapter 9 of the JLM, "Appealing Your Conviction or Sentence," you or your lawyer must protest errors that occur at trial when they happen in examples of some of the issues you may raise in an Article 440 motion even though the issues were not preserved for review on appeal.

(a) You may complain that you received ineffective assistance of counsel at trial, depending upon what information is contained in your trial record. Since details of your lawyer's performance at trial are not usually obvious from the trial record, the New York Court of Appeals believes that an Article 440 motion is usually better than an appeal for an ineffective assistance of counsel claim.[81] However, if the trial record does contain facts that would allow an appellate court to review a claim of ineffective assistance of counsel, it is important that you raise the claim on direct appeal.[82]

(b) You may raise an issue in your motion if you could not have raised the issue at trial because, at that time, you could not have discovered the relevant facts.[83] For example, in one Article 440 motion, a defendant complained that the prosecutor had not revealed an agreement to recommend a more lenient sentence for a prosecution witness in exchange for the witness's testimony against the defendant. The trial court denied the motion on the ground that the defendant could have raised this issue at trial and the intermediate appellate court affirmed the trial court's order. But the Court of Appeals disagreed, finding that the defendant could not have known of or discovered the agreement at the time of trial and, therefore, could not have raised the issue at trial.[84]

(c) You may claim that there was prejudicial or harmful newspaper publicity about your case before and during the trial. However, if you did not alert the trial court to such newspaper publicity, and therefore, this negative publicity was not included in the record for the appeals court to review, a judge may decide to deny a Section 440.10 motion which raises this issue.[85]

(2) A trial court has discretion to either consider or reject a second motion to vacate the judgment as long as (i) the issue was not decided on direct appeal and (ii) it was included in your first Article 440 motion.[86] Again, there is an exception to this rule if the law has changed since your earlier motion and the change has been held to apply retroactively.[87]

(3) The third situation where a trial court has discretion to grant or reject your motion is when you could have raised this issue in a previous Section 440.10 motion, but failed to do so. Unless you can demonstrate good cause for failing to include the issue in your prior motion, the court will deny your second motion.[88] It is important, therefore, that you include all possible grounds for complaint when drawing up your Section 440.10 motion since you may not be able to raise any claims you leave out in another Article 440 motion.

---

order to ensure that these errors will be reviewed on appeal.

81. See People v. Brown, 45 N.Y.2d 852, 853–54, 382 N.E.2d 1149, 1149–50, 410 N.Y.S.2d 287, 287 (1978) (observing that often the record does not provide enough information for appeal on effectiveness of counsel, so an Article 440 motion is usually a better method for ineffectiveness of counsel claims); see also N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 440.10(3)(a) (McKinney 2005 & Supp. 2009) (stating that a court may deny a motion to vacate a judgment where the defendant failed to raise an issue prior to sentencing, even though facts in support of the issue raised in the Article 440 motion could have been readily made to appear on the record had the defendant acted with due diligence, but also noting that "[t]his paragraph does not apply to a motion based upon deprivation of the right to counsel at the trial or upon failure of the trial court to advise the defendant of such right.").

82. See People v. Gonzalez, 158 A.D.2d 615, 615, 551 N.Y.S.2d 586, 587 (2d Dept. 1990) (denying an Article 440 motion in part because ineffectiveness of counsel claims were based on matters in the record, so they should have been raised on direct appeal rather than in an Article 440 motion).

83. See People v. Qualls, 70 N.Y.2d 863, 865–66, 517 N.E.2d 1346, 1347, 523 N.Y.S.2d 460, 461–62 (1987) (finding defendant could not have discovered with due diligence evidence of the prosecutor's misconduct based on the prosecutor's misrepresentation of the substance of its cooperation agreement with a witness and its knowing use of perjured testimony, and thus defendant was entitled to a hearing on his Article 440 motion).

84. People v. Qualls, 70 N.Y.2d 863, 867, 517 N.E.2d 1346, 1347, 523 N.Y.S.2d 460, 462 (1987).

85. N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 440.10(3)(b) (McKinney 2005 & Supp. 2009); N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 440.10 practice cmt. at 250 (McKinney 2005).

86. N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 440.10(3)(b) (McKinney 2005 & Supp. 2009); N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 440.10 practice cmt. at 251 (McKinney 2005).

87. N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 440.10(3)(b) (McKinney 2005 & Supp. 2009); N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 440.10 practice cmt. at 251 (McKinney 2005).

88. N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 440.10(3)(c) (McKinney 2005 & Supp. 2009); N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 440.10 practice cmt. at 251 (McKinney 2005).

(c) Alleging Omission of Rosario Materials

You may file a 440 motion if the government failed to give you what is called Rosario material. Rosario material is any recorded statement of a prosecution witness (including police officers) possessed by the police or prosecution that relates to the subject matter of the witness's trial testimony. By law, the prosecutor must provide you with statements that relate to the witness's testimony at your trial.[89] But, note that the prosecutor's failure to disclose such material does not mean that your conviction will be automatically overturned. Instead, a court must find that there is a reasonable possibility that the failure to disclose such statements materially contributed to a verdict against you. Only then will the court reverse your conviction on appeal.[90] Likewise, if you raise the issue of omitted Rosario materials in an Article 440 motion, the court will reverse your conviction only if you can prove that the omission of the materials was not harmless error (in other words, that the omission prejudiced your defense).[91] If you raise this claim for the first time in an Article 440 motion, you must demonstrate there was a reasonable possibility that the failure to disclose these statements contributed to the verdict against you.[92]

Furthermore, it is unlikely that a court will reverse your conviction on this ground if the material withheld by the prosecution duplicates (repeats) material in the record,[93] or if the prosecution merely delayed in producing the material.[94] However, courts construe "duplication" very narrowly. Unless the excluded material appears in the record in nearly identical form, the court will probably not reject your claim on the grounds that the undisclosed Rosario material was duplicative.[95]

---

89. N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 240.45(1)(a) (McKinney 2005 & Supp. 2009); see People v. Rosario, 9 N.Y.2d 286, 290–291, 173 N.E.2d 881, 883–84, 213 N.Y.S.2d 448, 450–51 (1961) (finding that trial court should have turned over to defense counsel, on their request, statements given before trial by prosecution witnesses relating to their trial testimony, so that defense counsel could have used statements on cross-examination).

90. See N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 240.75 (McKinney 2005 & Supp. 2009) (removing the previous rule that failure to turn over Rosario material was per se (automatic) reversible error, and replacing that rule with the "reasonable possibility" standard); People v. Sorbello, 285 A.D.2d 88, 95–96, 729 N.Y.S.2d 747, 753 (2d Dept. 2001) (holding that § 240.75, which replaced the old per se reversible error rule that applied when a Rosario violation was found with a standard of harmless error, applies retroactively to all cases that are being prosecuted or appealed as of its February 1, 2001 effective date); see also People v. Rosas, 297 A.D. 2d 390, 390–91, 746 N.Y.S. 2d 610, 611 (2d Dept. 2002) (finding a reasonable possibility that failure to disclose certain statements that related to the identification of the defendant by the victim's son may have materially affected the verdict); People v. Potter, 283 A.D. 2d 1011, 1011–12, 725 N.Y.S. 2d 778, 779 (4th Dept. 2001) (granting new trial because of the reasonable possibility that failure to disclose tapes and statement relating to the witness' trial testimony materially contributed to the verdict); cf. People v. Delosanto, 3070 A.D. 2d 298, 299, 763 N.Y.S. 2d 629, 630–31 (2d Dept. 2003) (denying reversal despite finding that a Rosario violation was committed because there was no reasonable possibility that disclosure of grand jury minutes would have contributed to the trial).

91. See People v. Jackson, 78 N.Y.2d 638, 641, 585 N.E.2d 795, 797, 578 N.Y.S.2d 483, 485 (1991) (stating that motion for post-conviction relief brought after a completed direct appeal will only be successful if defendant can prove both improper conduct by prosecutor and prejudice to the defense); People v. Machado, 90 N.Y.2d 187, 192, 681 N.E.2d 409, 412, 659 N.Y.S.2d 242, 245 (1997) (holding that in an Article 440 motion, defendant/movant must prove that the failure to turn over Rosario material prejudiced the outcome of the defendant/movant's case, even if an appeal is pending at the time the Article 440 motion is filed).

92. See People v. Nikollaj, 155 Misc. 2d 642, 649, 589 N.Y.S.2d 1013, 1018 (Sup. Ct. Queens County 1992) (granting defendant new trial because prosecution's withholding of Rosario materials prejudiced defendant's case, and there was a reasonable possibility that the violations contributed to the verdict clearly existed); People v. Machado, 90 N.Y.2d 187, 192, 681 N.E.2d 409, 412, 659 N.Y.S.2d 242, 245 (1997) (stating that defendant/movant must prove the omission of materials prejudiced his case and contributed to the verdict against him; conviction will not be automatically reversed regardless of whether defendant's direct appeal is still pending or completed); People v. Vilardi, 76 N.Y.2d 67, 77–78, 555 N.E.2d 915, 920–21, 556 N.Y.S.2d 518, 523–24 (1990) (explaining that the standard for determining whether an omission of Rosario material was prejudicial is whether there was a reasonable possibility that prejudice resulted).

93. See People v. Cortez, 184 A.D.2d 571, 573, 584 N.Y.S.2d 609, 611 (2d Dept. 1992) (finding that conviction need not be reversed if material withheld by prosecution is duplicative of other evidence in the record); People v. Ray, 140 A.D.2d 380, 382–83, 527 N.Y.S.2d 864, 866 (2d Dept. 1988) (stating that prosecution must prove that the undisclosed statements are indeed duplicative).

94. See People v. Blagrove, 183 A.D.2d 837, 837, 584 N.Y.S.2d 86, 87 (2d Dept. 1992) (stating that prosecution's delay in turning over material relating to a prosecution witness' testimony will only result in a reversal if the defense was substantially prejudiced by the delay, and finding no delay where "the defendant received the notes prior to the doctor's testimony, and had a full opportunity to cross-examine him based upon the notes … [and] the defendant was generally apprised of the fact that the notes were based on the autopsy report and other physical evidence.").

95. See People v. Young, 79 N.Y.2d 365, 370–71, 591 N.E.2d 1163, 1166–67, 582 N.Y.S.2d 977, 980–81 (1992) (finding that two documents cannot be duplicative if "there are variations or inconsistencies between them," including

(d) When You May File a Motion to Set Aside a Sentence under Section 440.20

Like a motion to vacate a judgment under Section 440.10, you do not have to wait until you have appealed your conviction to make a motion to vacate your sentence under Section 440.20. You can make this motion at any time after your sentencing.[96] But, if you challenged your sentence when you appealed your conviction and lost, you cannot challenge your sentence again through a Section 440.20 motion.[97] There is an exception to this rule that applies if the law has changed since your appeal and the new law is made retroactive.[98] In addition, the judge may deny your motion if the issue was decided in a previous Section 440.20 motion or a similar non-appeal proceeding, such as a habeas corpus motion. The court may grant your motion, however, if it is in the interest of justice and good cause is shown.[99]

C. How to File an Article 440 Motion

1. Preparing Your Motion Documents

Appendix B of this Chapter contains forms to help you prepare an Article 440 motion. Whether you are making a motion to vacate a judgment or to set aside your sentence, you will need at least two documents. The first document is a Notice of Motion. It informs the court that you are challenging your conviction and/or sentence and also states the basis for your challenge. The notes following the sample Notice of Motion in Appendix B tell you how to fill out this document.

The second document is an affidavit. This is a statement of facts made by someone with firsthand knowledge of the facts. Either you, a witness at your trial, or someone else who knows facts that will convince the court your conviction or sentence was improper can prepare and swear to an affidavit. Appendix B of this Chapter provides a sample affidavit written as though you (the defendant) made the affidavit.[100]

To write an effective affidavit, you must do more than make general claims such as "I was deprived of my constitutional right to counsel" or "the officer had no probable cause to arrest me." If either of these claims is the basis for your motion, you must detail the specific circumstances under which you were denied counsel, or state in a clear and detailed manner what led to your arrest. For example, if you requested a lawyer at trial and the judge told you that you were not entitled to a lawyer, you should include in your affidavit the name of the judge, the exact words he or she used (if you can remember them), the date (or approximate date) that the statement was made, and the names of any witnesses who heard the judge make the statement.

If a judge thinks that there is no reasonable possibility that the facts stated in your affidavit are true, he or she will deny your motion.[101] Therefore, you should be as detailed and precise about the facts of your story as possible. In addition, if any witnesses are available, you should have them write affidavits that support your story. You should also be careful to include all of the possible grounds or issues on which you could omissions; exception to automatic reversal rule for duplicate material is "simply not consistent with the principles underlying our case law," and should be read very narrowly to apply when material is in fact a duplication of material in the record).

---

96. N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 440.20(1) (McKinney 2005 & Supp. 2009); N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 440.20 note 24 at 25 (McKinney 2005).

97. N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 440.20(2) (McKinney 2005 & Supp. 2009); see, e.g., People v. Chapman, 115 A.D.2d 911, 911, 496 N.Y.S.2d 588, 588 (3d Dept. 1985) (finding that appeal to set aside sentence bars the Article 440 motion).

98. A court will review a claim that you raised in a previous Article 440 motion if the law has changed since your appeal and the new law applies to cases decided before the change. N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 440.20(3) (McKinney 2005 & Supp. 2009) ("[T]he court may deny such a motion when the ground or issue raised thereupon was previously determined on the merits upon a prior motion or proceeding in a court of this state, other than an appeal from the judgment, or upon a prior motion or proceeding in a federal court, unless since the time of such determination there has been a retroactively effective change in the law controlling such issue.").

99. N.Y. Crim Proc. Law § 440.20(3) (McKinney 2005 & Supp. 2009). Note, however, that it is rare for the court to grant a 440.20 motion on these grounds. See, e.g., People v. Baraka, 109 Misc. 2d 271, 274, 439 N.Y.S.2d 827, 830 (1981) (reading the "interest of justice" and "good cause" grounds narrowly).

100. A witness affidavit would look almost the same as the defendant's affidavit, except that the witness must identify himself and explain why he is aware of the facts to which he is swearing.

101. See People v. Selikoff, 35 N.Y.2d 227, 244, 318 N.E.2d 784, 795, 360 N.Y.S.2d 623, 638 (1974) (denying motion based on incredible and unsubstantiated claim that trial judge, deceased at time of motion, had made an off-the-record sentencing promise to defendant). But see People v. Seminara, 58 A.D.2d 841, 843, 396 N.Y.S.2d 472, 475 (2d Dept. 1977) (granting motion for hearing where defendant claimed that judge's law secretary made probation promise to defendant and claim was supported by affidavit from his trial attorney).

bring an Article 440 motion.[102] If you leave one out, a court will probably not allow you to raise the ground in a later motion.[103]

You must swear in the presence of a notary that the facts stated in your affidavit are true.[104] If prison officials refuse to provide you with a notary, you can verify your affidavit through a witness. In order to verify your affidavit you should sign your own name at the bottom of the form. You should also ask a friend to witness (watch) as you sign the affidavit and have the friend sign his or her own name under the line that reads "sworn to before me" at the end of the affidavit. Finally, you should write an explanation under the signature of the friend who witnessed your signature regarding the fact that the prison officials refused to provide a notary. Appendix A of JLM, Chapter 17, contains a "Sample Verification" (A-2) that can be filled out by a friend.

2. When and Where to File

(a) When to File

While there is no statute of limitations (time limit) for making an Article 440 motion,[105] a court may decide not grant your motion if you wait too long after your sentencing.[106] For example, one court denied a Section 440.10 motion that was made three years after the defendant's conviction because the defendant could not explain why he could not have discovered the facts underlying his claim earlier.[107] Furthermore, Article 440 itself requires you to make a motion based on the ground of newly discovered evidence within a reasonable time after you discover the new evidence.[108]

(b) Where to File

An Article 440 motion must be brought in the trial court where you were convicted. It cannot be brought in the court of another county where you happen to be imprisoned. To file your motion, mail your Notice of Motion, your affidavit(s), and all supporting documents to the clerk of the court in which you were convicted.[109] See Appendix II of the JLM for the addresses of the supreme courts (the trial courts) for each county in New York State. You must also send a copy of your papers to the district attorney of the county in which you were convicted. See Appendix III in the back of the JLM for a list of the addresses of the district attorneys' offices for each county in New York.

3. How to Get Help From a Lawyer

You do not have a right to a lawyer to help you prepare your Article 440 motion. But, if the court decides to hold a hearing based on your motion and affidavits and you request a lawyer, the court may decide to assign you one.[110] You should request a lawyer because he or she can usually help you present a better case.

To request a lawyer, you need to file poor person's papers. Poor person's papers state that you would like a lawyer, but are unable to pay for one. These papers also allow you to request that the clerk of court serve the district attorney with all of your papers, thereby relieving you of having to serve the papers yourself.

---

102. N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 440.30(1) (McKinney 2005 & Supp. 2009).

103. N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 440.10(3)(c) (McKinney 2005 & Supp. 2009).

104. N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 440.30(1) (McKinney 2005 & Supp. 2009).

105. See People v. Corso, 40 N.Y.2d 578, 580, 357 N.E.2d 357, 359, 388 N.Y.S.2d 886, 889 (1976) (holding that there is no time limit on § 440.10 claims).

106. See People v. Wilson, 81 Misc. 2d 739, 740, 365 N.Y.S.2d 961, 962–63 (Sup. Ct. Nassau County 1975) (denying motion to vacate judgment, and finding that fact that defendant waited almost five years to complain of his conviction was a "significant factor"); People v. Byrdsong, 161 Misc. 2d 232, 236, 613 N.Y.S.2d 543, 545 (Sup. Ct. Queens County 1994) (declaring that a post-conviction motion filed nine years after trial and seven years after appeals was, in the interest of finality, too late to continue further litigation).

107. See People v. Friedgood, 58 N.Y.2d 467, 470–71, 448 N.E.2d 1317, 1319, 462 N.Y.S.2d 406, 408 (1983).

108. N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 440.10(1)(g) (McKinney 2005 & Supp. 2009).

109. If your trial was moved to a different county (for example, to avoid pretrial publicity), you should send your motion to the court in the county where you were indicted. See People v. Klein, 96 Misc. 2d 564, 566, 409 N.Y.S.2d 374, 375–76 (Sup. Ct. Suffolk County 1978) (holding the appropriate venue for a hearing in the nature of coram nobis would be in the county of the indictment, rather than the county to which the case was transferred for the purpose of trial).

110. See N.Y. County Law § 722(4) (McKinney 2004 & Supp. 2009); People ex rel. Anderson v. Warden, 68 Misc. 2d 463, 470, 325 N.Y.S.2d 829, 837 (Sup. Ct. Bronx County 1971) ("Assignment of counsel other than for an evidentiary hearing is discretionary in both habeas corpus and Article 440 proceedings.").

Poor person's papers are also known as a request to proceed in forma pauperis. Chapter 9 of the JLM, "Appealing Your Conviction or Sentence," describes poor person's papers in more detail and also contains sample poor person's papers. You may make and use a copy of the papers in Appendix B, Chapter 9 of the JLM (but do not tear them out of the book), as long as you:

(1) Replace all references to "Appeal" with "Motion to Vacate Judgment" or "Motion to Set Aside Sentence," whichever is applicable;
(2) Delete all references to "Appellate Division" and "Judicial Department" (make sure that "Supreme Court" still appears); and
(3) Make sure that the county in which you were convicted is included wherever there is a reference to the Supreme Court.

D. What to Expect After You Have Filed Your Article 440 Motion

Once you have filed your motion, the district attorney will ordinarily file an answer to your motion with the judge who received your motion. The district attorney must also send you or your lawyer a copy of the answer.[111] The answer will usually deny some or all of the allegations in your motion and supporting papers.

After reviewing the facts and arguments set forth in your motion and supporting affidavits, and in the district attorney's answer, the judge may grant or deny your motion, or hold a hearing. If your papers state a legal ground for vacating the judgment or setting aside your sentence, and the facts in support of that ground are not disputed, the judge will grant your motion.[112] If your papers do not state a legal ground for vacating the judgment or setting aside your sentence, or lack facts to support a legal ground, the judge will deny your motion.[113] The judge will also deny your motion without a hearing if:

(1) The facts you use to support your motion are not supported by sworn statements (affidavits);
(2) A fact necessary to support your motion is clearly shown to be false by documentary proof; or
(3) A fact necessary to support your motion is contradicted by the record from your trial or is made solely by you and unsupported by other evidence, and there is no reasonable possibility the allegations are true.[114]

Otherwise, the judge must grant a hearing on your motion.[115] Whether the court grants you a hearing or not, the court must state for the official record what facts it found to be true, how it viewed the law, and why it decided the way it did.[116]

If the judge decides to hold a hearing, you have the right to attend this hearing, although you may waive (decide not to use) this right.[117] Since at your hearing you will bear the burden of proof, meaning you will have the responsibility of proving that your claims are true,[118] it is recommended that you do not waive the right to appear. To meet your burden of proof, you must persuade the judge that the facts of your story are true by a preponderance of the evidence, which means that the facts are more likely to be true than not true.[119] In other words, you must convince the judge that the evidence supporting your claim outweighs the evidence against your claim.

---

111. N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 440.30(1) (McKinney 2005 & Supp. 2009).

112. N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 440.30(3)(a)–(c) (McKinney 2005 & Supp. 2009). See Part B(2) of this Chapter for information about legal grounds for vacating a judgment.

113. N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 440.30(4)(a) (McKinney 2005 & Supp. 2009); see, e.g., People v. Risalek, 172 A.D.2d 870, 870, 568 N.Y.S.2d 172, 174 (3d Dept. 1991) (denying motion where defendant's allegations of fraud and coercion were contradicted by transcripts and other allegations in motion were not supported by affidavits or other evidence, and defendant failed to preserve the objection to the plea he knowingly entered into); People v. Portalatin, 132 A.D.2d 581, 582, 517 N.Y.S.2d 301, 302 (2d Dept. 1987) (denying hearing because allegations of prosecutorial misconduct were not preserved or without merit); People v. Batts, 96 A.D.2d 842, 842–43, 465 N.Y.S.2d 600, 601 (2d Dept. 1983) (denying motion for failure to set forth sufficient grounds to justify a hearing).

114. N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 440.30(4)(b)–(d) (McKinney 2005 & Supp. 2009).

115. N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 440.30(5) (McKinney 2005 & Supp. 2009); see, e.g., People v. Ferreras, 70 N.Y.2d 630, 631, 512 N.E.2d 301, 302, 518 N.Y.S.2d 780, 781 (1987) (finding that defendant who submitted personal affidavit supporting claim of ineffective counsel due to conflict of interest was entitled to hearing on motion).

116. N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 440.30(7) (McKinney 2005 & Supp. 2009).

117. N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 440.30(5) (McKinney 2005 & Supp. 2009).

118. N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 440.30(6) (McKinney 2005 & Supp. 2009). In contrast, the prosecutor bore the burden of proof at your trial; he had to prove you guilty beyond a reasonable doubt.

119. N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 440.30(6) (McKinney 2005 & Supp. 2009); see, e.g., People v. Richard, 156 A.D.2d 270, 270, 548 N.Y.S.2d 659, 660 (1st Dept. 1989) (denying defendant's Article 440 motion because claims were not supported

Even if the hearing convinces the court that the facts stated in your motion and affidavit are true, the court will not automatically grant your motion. The facts that you use must also persuade the judge that your conviction or sentence was unfair.[120] Part B of this Chapter explains what kinds of acts by the trial judge or prosecutor may make a conviction or sentence unfair for the purposes of Article 440.

E. What Relief the Court Can Provide Under Article 440

1. Motion to Vacate Judgment

In deciding on a Section 440.10 motion, the court has several choices:

(1) As noted above, even if the court finds that the facts you have stated are true, the court may deny your motion if the court does not find that your conviction was unfair;[121]
(2) The court may grant your Section 440.10 motion to vacate judgment and dismiss the indictment or charge against you, entitling you to be either released from prison, or (more likely) to receive a new trial;[122] or
(3) If your motion raises new evidence, the judge may vacate the judgment and order a new trial,[123] or he may reduce your conviction to one for a lesser included offense, provided the district attorney agrees.[124]

2. Motion to Set Aside Sentence

If the judge decides to grant your motion to set aside your sentence under Section 440.20, he will not change your underlying conviction. The court must resentence you in accordance with the New York Penal Code's guidelines and limits for sentences.

F. How to Appeal if Your Article 440 Motion Is Denied

You do not have the automatic right to appeal a denial of your Article 440 motion to an intermediate appellate court (in New York, this is the Appellate Division).[125] To appeal, therefore, you must request leave (permission) from a judge of the intermediate appellate court to which you want to appeal.[126] You must request leave to appeal within thirty days after you receive a copy of the court's order denying your Article by the required preponderance of evidence).

---

120. See, e.g., People v. Lehrman, 155 A.D.2d 693, 693, 548 N.Y.S.2d 260, 261 (2d Dept. 1989) (finding defendant failed to demonstrate that jury misconduct impaired his right to trial); People v. Rhodes, 92 A.D.2d 744, 745, 461 N.Y.S.2d 81, 83 (4th Dept. 1983) (stating that to prevail on Article 440 motion based on claim of juror misconduct, defendant must not only prove misconduct by a preponderance of the evidence, but also show that the misconduct created a substantial risk of prejudice); People v. Dean, 125 A.D.2d 948, 949, 510 N.Y.S.2d 41, 41 (4th Dept. 1986) (denying Article 440 motion because defendant could have raised issue on appeal and defendant failed to show denial of due process).

121. See, e.g., People v. Machado, 90 N.Y.2d 187, 188, 681 N.E.2d 409, 410, 659 N.Y.S.2d 242, 243 (1997) (holding that, even though reversal is required upon a direct appeal when prosecution fails to turn over a pre-trial witness statement, in Article 440 motions made after a direct appeal has concluded, the defendant must demonstrate prejudice); People v. Dean, 125 A.D.2d 948, 949, 510 N.Y.S.2d 41, 41 (4th Dept. 1986) (denying Article 440 motion because defendant could have raised issue on appeal and defendant failed to show denial of due process).

122. N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 440.10(4) (McKinney 2005 & Supp. 2009).

123. N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 440.10(5)(a) (McKinney 2005 & Supp. 2009).

124. N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 440.10(5)(b) (McKinney 2005 & Supp. 2009); see People v. Reyes, 92 A.D.2d 776, 777, 459 N.Y.S.2d 614, 614 (1st Dept. 1983) (reducing defendant's sentence of robbery in first degree to robbery in second degree after evidence showed gun was a toy pistol). See Chapter 9 of the JLM, "Appealing Your Conviction or Sentence," for a detailed explanation and example of lesser included offense.

125. N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 450.15 (McKinney 2005); see People v. Farrell, 85 N.Y.2d 60, 70, 647 N.E.2d 762, 768, 623 N.Y.S.2d 550, 556 (1995) (holding that the New York Constitution does not prevent the Legislature from limiting a defendant's right to appeal a denial of a non-final post-judgment collateral motion), recognized as superseded in part by People v. Cole, 1 Misc. 3d 531, 534, 765 N.Y.S.2d 477, 480 (Sup. Ct. N.Y. County 2003). However, you do have the right to appeal an order that sets aside your sentence after the district attorney makes an Article 440 motion under § 440.40 for the purpose of seeking a longer sentence against you. N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 450.10(4) (McKinney 2005).

126. N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 460.15 (McKinney 2005). Assuming you were convicted in a New York supreme court and filed your Article 440 motion there, you would appeal from a denial of your Article 440 motion to the appellate division of the department in which you were convicted. See note 129 below for a listing of the counties included in each department.

440 motion.[127] When you request this permission, you must apply for a "certificate granting leave to appeal."[128] In order to apply for a certificate, you must also check the appropriate appellate division rules for the department where the intermediate appellate court you are appealing to is located.[129] If the judge of the appellate court grants you permission to appeal, you will receive the certificate indicating that you may appeal.[130] Within fifteen days after you receive this certificate, you must file the certificate and a notice of appeal in the court that denied your Article 440 motion.[131] You must also serve the certificate and notice of appeal upon the district attorney of the county where your trial court is located.[132] Once you have completed these steps, you have "taken" your appeal.[133]

You should be aware that judges seldom grant permission to appeal from denials of Article 440 motions. Nonetheless, it is essential that you seek leave to appeal from a denial of your Article 440 motion. As noted in Chapter 13 of the JLM, "Federal Habeas Corpus", such an appeal is absolutely necessary to satisfy the exhaustion requirements for raising a claim in a federal habeas corpus petition.

If a judge of the intermediate court denies you permission to appeal, the appeals process ends at that stage and cannot be pursued further.[134] (Note, however, that you may still be able to raise your claim in a federal habeas corpus petition as described in Chapter 13, "Federal Habeas Corpus," of the JLM.) If you do receive permission to appeal and the appellate court then denies your appeal, you may appeal the denial to the New York Court of Appeals, the state's highest court.[135] To do so, you must request permission to appeal from a judge of the Court of Appeals.[136] You must make your request within thirty days after the intermediate appellate court hands down the denial you are trying to appeal.[137] Again, if you are granted permission to appeal, you will be issued a certificate indicating you have permission to appeal. Upon issuance of the certificate, your appeal is "taken."[138]

In addition, the district attorney has the right to appeal an Article 440 motion that sets aside either your conviction or your sentence.

G. Conclusion

With an Article 440 motion, you can challenge your conviction (Section 440.10) or your sentence (Section 440.20). Remember that if you have already appealed your case and lost, you cannot raise any issue already decided by the appellate court in the course of your appeal. However, if your appeal is pending, you can still make an Article 440 motion. You can then make a motion to consolidate (combine) the appeal and the 440 motion in the interests of judicial economy (efficiency). If you consolidate, the range of factual matters the

---

127. N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 460.10(4)(a) (McKinney 2005).

128. N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 460.10(4)(a) (McKinney 2005).

129. N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 460.15(2) (McKinney 2005). These rules are located in N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 22, § 600.8(d) (for the 1st Dept.), § 670.6(b) (for the 2d Dept.), § 800.3 (for the 3d Dept.), and 1000.13(o) (for the 4th Dept.). The 1st Department includes the counties of the Bronx and New York. The 2nd Department includes the counties of Dutchess, Kings, Nassau, Orange, Putnam, Queens, Richmond, Rockland, Suffolk, and Westchester. The 3rd Department includes the counties of Albany, Broome, Chemung, Chenango, Clinton, Columbia, Cortland, Delaware, Essex, Franklin, Fulton, Greene, Hamilton, Madison, Montgomery, Otsego, Rensselaer, St. Lawrence, Saratoga, Schenectady, Schoharie, Schuyler, Sullivan, Tioga, Tompkins, Ulster, Warren, and Washington. The 4th Department includes the counties of Allegany, Cattaraugus, Cayuga, Chautauqua, Erie, Genesee, Herkimer, Jefferson, Lewis, Livingston, Monroe, Niagara, Oneida, Onondaga, Ontario, Orleans, Oswego, Seneca, Steuben, Wayne, Wyoming, and Yates.

130. N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 460.15 (McKinney 2005).

131. N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 460.10(4)(b) (McKinney 2005). See Chapter 9 of the JLM, "Appealing Your Conviction or Sentence," for a definition of a notice of appeal and a description of the appeals process, generally, and also for a sample notice of appeal from a denial of an Article 440 motion.

132. N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 460.10(4)(b) (McKinney 2005).

133. See Chapter 9 of the JLM, "Appealing Your Conviction or Sentence," to see what steps may still be necessary to legally perfect your appeal.

134. N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 450.15 (McKinney 2005).

135. N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 460.10(5) (McKinney 2005).

136. You may also seek permission from an appellate division judge if the appellate division denied your motion. See Chapter 9 of the JLM, "Appealing Your Conviction or Sentence" for more information.

137. N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law §§ 460.10(5)(a), 460.20 (McKinney 2005).

138. N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 460.10(5)(b) (McKinney 2005). Again, however, you must still perfect your appeal. See Chapter 9 of the JLM, "Appealing Your Conviction or Sentence."

court may examine will be expanded in the appeal, and all of the errors presented together may more convincingly persuade the court that your trial was unfair.

You must prove that the facts stated in your motion and affidavit are true and that they state a legal ground that is serious enough to require a court to grant your motion. If you are claiming that the court made a mistake during the trial, you must show that the mistake affected your chance of being found innocent, or that the mistake was so serious that defendants must be protected from this type of mistake, even if the mistake may not have affected your verdict. If you could have raised a claim in an earlier Article 440 motion, or if you have already made an Article 440 motion on the same ground(s) and lost, a court will probably deny your present motion.

If you plead guilty at your trial, you will have a harder time succeeding on a motion to vacate judgment.

APPENDIX A

STATE POST-CONVICTION RELIEF STATUTES

Alabama	ALA. CODE § 15-21-1 et seq.
Alaska	ALASKA STAT. § 12.75.010 et seq.
Arizona	ARIZ. R. CRIM. P. 32; ARIZ. REV. STAT. § 13-4121 et seq.
Arkansas	ARK. R. CRIM. P. 37; ARK. CODE ANN. § 16-112-101 et seq.
California	CAL. PENAL CODE § 1473 et seq.
Colorado	COLO. R. CRIM. P. 35; COLO. REV. STAT. § 13-45-101 et seq.
Connecticut	CONN. GEN. STAT. ANN. § 52-466 et seq.
Delaware	DEL. SUP. CT. CRIM. R. 35; DEL. CODE ANN. tit. 10, § 6901 et seq.
D.C.	D.C. CODE § 23-110; D.C. CODE § 16-1901 et seq.
Florida	FLA. R. CRIM. P. 3.850
Georgia	GA. CODE ANN. § 9-14-1 et seq.
Hawaii	HAW. REV. STAT. § 660-3 et seq.
Idaho	IDAHO CODE ANN. § 19-4901 et seq.
Illinois	725 ILL. COMP. STAT. 5/122-1 et seq.
Indiana	IND. CODE ANN. § 34-25.5-1-1 et seq.; IND. R. P. FOR POST-CONVICTION REMEDIES R. PC 1.
Iowa	IOWA CODE ANN. § 663A.1 et seq.
Kansas	KAN. STAT. ANN. § 60-1501 et seq.
Kentucky	KY. R. CRIM. P. 11.42; KY. REV. STAT. ANN. § 419.020 et seq.
Louisiana	LA. CODE CRIM. PROC. ANN. art. 924 et seq.
Maine	ME. REV. STAT. ANN. tit. 15, § 2121 et seq.; ME. REV. STAT. ANN. tit. 14, § 5501 et seq.
Maryland	MD. CODE ANN., CRIM. PROC. §7-101 et seq.; MD. CODE ANN. CTS. & JUD. PROC. § 3-701 et seq.
Massachusetts	MASS. R. CRIM. P. 30; MASS. GEN. LAWS ch. 276, § 19
Michigan	MICH. COMP. LAWS ANN. § 600.4301 et seq.
Minnesota	MINN. STAT. ANN. § 590.01 et seq.
Mississippi	MISS. CODE ANN. § 99-39-1 et seq.
Missouri	MO. S. CT. R. CRIM. P. 29.12-15; MO. ANN. STAT. § 547.360.
Montana	MONT. CODE ANN. § 46-21-101 et seq.; MONT. CODE ANN. § 46-22-101 et seq.
Nebraska	NEB. REV. STAT. § 29-3001 et seq.
Nevada	NEV. REV. STAT. §§ 34.720, 176.515.
New Hampshire	N.H. REV. STAT. ANN. § 534:1 et seq.
New Jersey	N.J. STAT. ANN. § 2A:67-1 et seq.
New Mexico	N.M. STAT. ANN. § 31-11-6
North Carolina	N.C. GEN. STAT. 15A-1411 et seq.; N.C. GEN. STAT. 17-1 et seq.
North Dakota	N.D. CENT. CODE § 32-22-01 et seq.
Ohio	OHIO REV. CODE ANN. § 2953.21 et seq.
Oklahoma	OKLA. STAT. ANN. tit. 22, § 1080 et seq.
Oregon	OR. REV. STAT. § 138.510 et seq.
Pennsylvania	42 PA. CONS. STAT. ANN. § 6501 et seq.
Rhode Island	R.I. GEN. LAWS § 10-9.1-1 et seq.; R.I. GEN. LAWS § 10-9-3 et seq.
South Carolina	S.C. CODE ANN. § 17-27-10 et seq.
South Dakota	S.D. CODIFIED LAWS § 21-27-1 et seq.
Tennessee	TENN. CODE ANN. § 40-9-119 et seq.
Texas	TEX. CODE CRIM. PROC. ANN. art. 11.01 et seq.
Utah	UTAH CODE ANN. § 78B-9-101 et seq.
Vermont	VT. STAT. ANN. tit. 13, § 7131 et seq.
Virginia	VA. CODE ANN. § 8.01-654 et seq.
Washington	WASH. REV. CODE ANN. § 7.36.010 et seq.
West Virginia	W. VA. CODE § 53-4A-1 et seq.
Wisconsin	WIS. STAT. ANN. § 974.06 et seq.
Wyoming	WYO. STAT. ANN. § 7-14-101 et seq.; WYO. STAT. ANN. § 1-27-101 et seq.

APPENDIX B

SAMPLE ARTICLE 440 MOTIONS AND SUPPORTING PAPERS

This Appendix contains the following materials:

B-1. Sample Notice of Motion by Defendant to Vacate Judgment
B-2. Sample Defendant's Affidavit in Support of Motion to Vacate Judgment
B-3. Sample Notice of Motion by Defendant to Set Aside Sentence
B-4. Sample Defendant's Affidavit in Support of Motion to Set Aside Sentence

DO NOT TEAR THESE FORMS OUT OF THE JLM. Copy them on your own paper and fill them out according to the facts of your particular case. The endnotes following the sample documents tell you how to fill in the necessary information. Remember, your affidavit is a sworn statement; you can be punished if you intentionally include any statements that you know are false. Change the wording of the forms, if necessary, so that all the statements apply to your case. You must sign your affidavit in the presence of a notary public.

No poor person's papers (in forma pauperis) have been included in these forms. Part C(3) of this Chapter tells you how to use poor person's papers to obtain a lawyer in an Article 440 proceeding. Sample poor person's papers may be found in Chapter 9 of the JLM.

Appendix II at the end of the JLM lists the addresses and jurisdictions of the New York state courts to which these papers should be addressed.

B-1. Sample Notice of Motion by Defendant to Vacate Judgment

SUPREME COURT OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK
COUNTY OF _____ [1]

The People of the State of New York Plaintiffs, - against - _____,[3] Defendant.	NOTICE OF MOTION TO VACATE JUDGMENT Indictment No._____[2]

PLEASE TAKE NOTICE that upon the annexed affidavit of _____,[4] duly sworn to the ____ day of _____, _____,[5] (and documents attached thereto) and upon the accusatory instrument and_____ _____,[6] and all proceedings previously held herein, defendant will move this Court at Criminal Term, Part _____[7] thereof, at the Courthouse located at_____,[8] on the _____ day of _____, _____ at ____ a.m.,[9] or as soon thereafter as counsel may be heard, for:

An order pursuant to Criminal Procedure Law § 440.10(__)[10] vacating the judgment entered against the above-named defendant on the _____ day of _____, _____,[11] on the following grounds:

1. _____
2. _____[12]

[if applicable, include:] An order pursuant to N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 440.30(1-a), directing that forensic Deoxyribonucleic Acid (DNA) testing be performed on evidence specified in the annexed affidavit;

An order, pursuant to N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 440.30(5), to produce the defendant at any hearing to be conducted for the purpose of determining this motion; and Such other and further relief as the Court may deem just and proper.

Dated: _____
_____, _____[13]
_____[14]
_____[15]
Defendant, pro se.[16]

To:
District Attorney of _____ County,
_____, New York[17]

B-2. Sample Defendant's Affidavit in Support of Motion to Vacate Judgment

SUPREME COURT OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK
COUNTY OF _____[18]

The People of the State of New York Plaintiffs, - against - _____,[20] Defendant.	AFFIDAVIT Indictment No._____[19]

State of New York)
County of _____[21] ss.:)

_____,[22] being duly sworn, deposes and says:

1. I am the defendant in the above-entitled proceeding. I make this affidavit in support of a motion, pursuant to section 440.10, subdivision _____,[23] to vacate the judgment of conviction herein, upon the ground that _____.[24]

2. I was indicted for _____.[25] At the arraignment I entered a plea of "not guilty" and posted bail in the amount of $_____.[26] I was tried in this court before Hon. Judge_____[27] on_____, _____.[28] The case was submitted to a jury, which rendered a verdict of guilty.[29]

3. On _____, _____,[30] I was sentenced to _____.[31]

4. The evidence adduced at my trial may be summarized as follows:

_____
_____
_____.[32]

5. _____.[33]

6. [If applicable, include:] Among the evidence gathered by the State in its investigation of the crime and admitted at my trial [or] but not admitted at my trial was _____, which contains Deoxyribonucleic Acid (DNA). DNA testing of _____ is relevant to proof of guilt in that _____ _____. My conviction occurred prior to January 1, 1996, to wit, on _____ _____, _____.[34]

7. The ground(s) for relief raised upon this motion has (have) not previously been determined on the merits upon a prior motion or proceeding in a court of this state, or upon an appeal from the judgment, or upon a prior motion or proceeding in a federal court.[35]

WHEREFORE, I respectfully request that my conviction be vacated on the ground that_____ _____,[36] and that this Court grant such other and further relief as it may deem just and proper [or if applicable:] WHEREFORE, I respectfully request an Order of this Court pursuant to N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 440.30(1-a), directing that forensic Deoxyribonucleic Acid (DNA) testing be conducted upon _____ _____.[37]

_____[38]

_____[39]

Sworn to before me this:
day of _____, 20____

_____[40]
NOTARY PUBLIC

B-3. Sample Notice of Motion by Defendant to Set Aside Sentence

SUPREME COURT OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK
COUNTY OF _____[41]

The People of the State of New York Plaintiffs, - against - _____,[43] Defendant.	NOTICE OF MOTION TO SET ASIDE SENTENCE Indictment No._____[42]

PLEASE TAKE NOTICE that upon the annexed affidavit of _____,[44] sworn to the _____ day of _____, 20___,[45] (and documents attached thereto) and upon the accusatory instrument and all other papers filed and proceedings had herein, defendant will move this Court, Part _____[46] thereof, at the Courthouse located at _____,[47] on the _____ day of _____, 20____, at ____ a.m.,[48] or as soon thereafter as counsel may be heard, for:

(1) an order, pursuant to Criminal Procedure Law, section 440.20, setting aside the sentence heretofore imposed upon the above-named defendant on the _____ day of _____, _____;[49] or, in the alternative, ordering a hearing to determine whether such sentence should be set aside on the ground(s) that:

_____[reasons],[50]

(2) An order, pursuant to Crim. Proc. Law § 440.30(5), to produce the defendant at any hearing conducted to determine this motion; and

(3) Such other and further relief as the Court may deem just and proper.

PLEASE TAKE FURTHER NOTICE that answering affidavits, if any, are to be served upon the undersigned at least __[51] days prior to the return of this motion.

Dated:_____

_____[52]

_____[53]

Defendant, pro se.

To:

District Attorney of _____ County,

_____, New York[54]

B-4. Sample Defendant's Affidavit in Support of Motion to Set Aside Sentence

SUPREME COURT OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK
COUNTY OF _____[55]

The People of the State of New York Plaintiffs, - against - _____,[57] Defendant.	AFFIDAVIT Indictment No._____[56]

State of New York)
County of _____[58] ss.:)

_____,[59] being duly sworn, deposes and says:

1. I am the defendant in the above-entitled proceeding. I make this affidavit in support of a motion, pursuant to section 440.20 to set aside the sentence herein, upon the ground that _____ _____.[60]

2. I was indicted for _____.[61] At the arraignment I entered a plea of "not guilty" and posted bail in the amount of $_____.[62] I was tried in this court before Hon. Judge _____ _____[63] on _____, _____.[64]

3. After a trial[65] held on _____ _____, _____,[66] I was found guilty of count(s) _____[67] of the indictment charging _____ in the _____ degree, a Class _____ felony.[68] Bail was revoked and I was held in the _____, located at _____, _____,[69] New York, until the sentencing for my conviction held on _____, _____[70] before Hon. Judge _____ _____[71] in Criminal Term Part _____ of the _____[72] County Supreme Court.

4. I was sentenced to a _____ term of imprisonment at _____Correction Facility, ___ _____,[73] New York.

5. _____.[74]

6. _____.[75]

7. The ground(s) for relief described by this affidavit has (have) not previously been determined on the merits upon a prior motion or proceeding in a court of this state other than an appeal from the judgment, or upon a prior motion or proceeding in a federal court.[76]

WHEREFORE, I respectfully request that this Court enter an order, pursuant to section 440.20 of the Criminal Procedure Law, setting aside the sentence imposed upon me and resentencing me in accordance with law, and granting such other and further relief as the Court may deem just and proper.

_____
_____[77]
Sworn to before me this:
day of _____, 20____
_____[78]
NOTARY PUBLIC

Fill in the blanks indicated in the sample documents as follows:

1. Fill in the name of the county in which the court hearing your motion is located.
2. Fill in your indictment number.
3. Fill in your name.
4. Since you should submit an affidavit with your motion, you should fill your name in here. Also, if you are submitting affidavits of other people who have taken part in your case, their names should be filled in, and the word "affidavit" changed to "affidavits."
5. Fill in the date or dates on which you or others signed your affidavits: day, month, year.
6. Describe briefly other documents, if any, that you are attaching because they will help you make your case to the court. For example, you can mention a transcript of your trial.
7. Fill in the "Part" number of the court, if you know it.
8. Fill in the address of the court.
9. Fill in the date on which the hearing will be held.
10. Fill in the subsection of § 440.10 that corresponds to the ground upon which you are making your motion. See Section B(2) of this Chapter for information on these subsections.
11. Fill in the day, month, and year on which the judgment of conviction was entered against you.
12. List the reasons why you think the court should vacate the judgment against you. See Section B(2) of this Chapter for more information.
13. Fill in date on which you signed this notice, and the city and state in which you signed it.
14. Sign your name here.
15. Fill in your complete mailing address here.
16. Pro se means that you are acting as your own legal representative (without a lawyer).
17. Fill in the name of the district attorney, and the county and town in which he or she is located.
18. Fill in the name of the county in which the court hearing your motion is located.
19. Fill in your indictment number.
20. Fill in your name.
21. Fill in the name of the county in which you are signing this affidavit.
22. Your name, in capital letters.
23. Fill in the subsection of § 440.10 that corresponds to the ground upon which you are making your motion. See Section B(2) of this Chapter.
24. List briefly the ground that corresponds to the subsection of N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 440.10 provided above. See Section B(2) of this Chapter for a list of grounds.
25. Fill in the name of the offense for which you were indicted.
26. Fill in the amount of bail you posted.
27. Fill in the trial judge's name.
28. Fill in the date or dates including the day, month, and year on which your trial took place.
29. If you did not have a jury trial, simply indicate that the judge found you guilty.
30. Fill in the day, month, and year on which judgment was given in your case.
31. Fill in the sentence ordered in your case.
32. Summarize the evidence that the prosecution relied upon and that the jury was allowed to consider.
33. Summarize the facts which support the reasons you set out in numbers 1 through 8, above, for challenging your conviction.
34. Fill in the evidence, if any, containing DNA samples; how that evidence proves your innocence; and the date, prior to January 1, 1996, that your conviction occurred, if applicable.
35. If you have previously raised the issues on which you are basing this motion, you should change this paragraph to reflect that fact. If the law has changed since you previously litigated the issues, you should state this.
36. Briefly state the reasons for your motion.
37. Fill in the evidence upon which you want DNA testing performed.
38. Sign your name, in the presence of a notary public. If your prison will not give you access to a notary, see Appendix A, Endnote 102 to Chapter 16 of the JLM.
39. Print your complete mailing address below your signature.
40. The notary will sign and fill in the date here after seeing you sign the document.
41. Fill in the name of the county in which the court hearing your motion is located.
42. Fill in your indictment number.
43. Fill in your name.
44. Since you should submit an affidavit with your motion, your name should be filled in here. Also, if you are submitting affidavits of other people who took part in the case, their names should be filled in, and the word "affidavit" changed to "affidavits."
45. Fill in the date you signed your affidavit.
46. Enter the number of the court part, if you know it.

47. Enter the address and city of the court hearing your motion.
48. Enter the date and time of your hearing.
49. Enter the day, month, and year on which you were sentenced.
50. Give the reasons your sentence should be set aside. See Section B(2) of this Chapter. The three grounds are (a) sentence unauthorized; (b) sentence illegally imposed; or (c) sentence invalid otherwise, as a matter of law. If you can raise more than one ground, you should include all that apply.
51. Fill in the amount of notice you feel is necessary, considering the length of time you will need to develop arguments to answer their affidavit.
52. Fill in date on which you signed this notice, and the city and state in which you signed it.
53. Sign your name and print your complete mailing address underneath.
54. Enter the name of the district attorney, followed by his or her county and address.
55. Fill in the name of the county in which the court hearing your motion is located.
56. Fill in your indictment number.
57. Fill in your name.
58. Fill in the name of the county in which you are signing this affidavit.
59. Your name, in capital letters.
60. List briefly the reasons why you think the court should vacate the sentence against you. See Section B(2) of this Chapter for a list of possible reasons.
61. Fill in the name of the offense for which you were indicted.
62. Fill in the amount of bail you posted.
63. Fill in the trial judge's name.
64. Fill in the date or dates, including day, month, and year on which your trial took place.
65. If you pled guilty, leave out this first sentence in paragraph 3. Instead, write: "I entered a plea of guilty to (give the name of the crime), a Class (give the class of the felony: A, B, C, etc.) felony."
66. If you had a trial, fill in the date or dates, including the day, month, and year of the trial.
67. If you had a trial, fill in the numbers of the counts of the indictment of which you were convicted.
68. If you had a trial, fill in the names, degrees (if any), and classes of the offenses of which you were convicted.
69. Give the name and address of the facility where you were held while you were waiting to be sentenced.
70. Fill in the date, including the day, month, and year of your sentencing.
71. Fill in the name of the judge who sentenced you.
72. Enter the county and part number of the court that sentenced you.
73. Enter the terms of the sentence that you received and the name and address of the facility in which you are to serve your sentence.
74. Indicate whether or not an appeal has been taken in your case. If so, give the name of the court, the date and the name of the judge who heard your appeal.
75. Give the reasons why you think your sentence is illegal. See Section B(2) of this Chapter for a list of possible reasons.
76. If you have previously raised the issues on which you are basing this motion, you should change this paragraph to reflect the previous court proceedings. If the law has changed since you previously litigated the issues, you should state this.
77. Sign your name, in the presence of a notary public, and print your complete mailing address below your signature.
78. The notary will sign and fill in the date here after seeing you sign the document.

A JAILHOUSE LAWYER'S MANUAL

Chapter 21: State Habeas Corpus: Florida, New York, and Texas

Columbia Human Rights Law Review

Ninth Edition 2011

Legal Disclaimer

A Jailhouse Lawyer's Manual is written and updated by members of the Columbia Human Rights Law Review. The law prohibits us from providing any legal advice to prisoners. This information is not intended as legal advice or representation nor should you consider or rely upon it as such. Neither the JLM nor any information contained herein is intended to or shall constitute a contract between the JLM and any reader, and the JLM does not guarantee the accuracy of the information contained herein. Additionally, your use of the JLM should not be construed as creating an attorney-client relationship with the JLM staff or anyone at Columbia Law School. Finally, while we have attempted to provide information that is up-to-date and useful, because the law changes frequently, we cannot guarantee that all information is current.

CHAPTER 21

STATE HABEAS CORPUS: FLORIDA, NEW YORK, AND MICHIGAN*

A. Introduction

This Chapter discusses how the writ of habeas corpus is applied in three states: Florida, New York, and Michigan.[1] The rules about habeas corpus in Florida, New York, and Michigan are often similar. This Introduction will give you a short overview of habeas corpus. Part B has specific information about Florida petitions, Part C has specific information about New York petitions, and Part D has specific information about Michigan petitions. These Parts offer important information, including how, where, and when to file your petition. If you are in prison in a state other than Florida, New York or Michigan, and wish to file a habeas corpus petition in state court, the laws may differ in important ways from the ones described below.[2] You should be sure to check the laws in your own state before filing a state habeas petition.[3]

1. What is a Writ of Habeas Corpus?

When you file a petition for a writ of habeas corpus, you are asking a judge for a hearing to determine whether your imprisonment is lawful. This hearing is not another trial. Instead of deciding whether you were guilty or not, the judge will evaluate the fairness of the procedure used to convict and sentence you. To get a writ of habeas corpus, you must file a petition for a civil (not criminal) proceeding in either state or federal court. A prisoner filing a habeas corpus petition is often referred to as a "petitioner" or "relator." This chapter will cover filing a petition in state, not federal, court. To learn more about federal habeas corpus, you should read JLM, Chapter 13, "Federal Habeas Corpus."

2. Requirements for Habeas Relief

There are four requirements you must fulfill in order to get state habeas relief:

(1) you must be in custody;
(2) you must be entitled to immediate release if your petition is successful;
(3) you must be a state prisoner; and
(4) there must be no other legal procedure to get the relief you want.

(a) Custody

Custody means you must be confined by the state in some way. Therefore, usually you cannot challenge a sentence you have not yet begun to serve. In Florida, New York and Michigan, you may apply for habeas corpus if you are in jail or prison. However, whether you may apply for habeas corpus if you are on parole, released on a bond, or released on your own recognizance ("ROR")[4], depends on which state convicted you. See Parts A(3)(c), B(3)(c), C(2)(c), and D(2)(c) of this Chapter for more information about habeas corpus petitions if you are on probation or parole.

(b) Immediate Release

Florida,[5] New York,[6] and Michigan[7] courts will usually refuse to consider your habeas corpus petition unless a successful petition will result in your immediate release. For example, if you are serving time for

---

* This Chapter was revised by Tanya Sehgal based in part on previous versions by Renate Lunn, Alison Wright and Jennifer Morrison.

1. "Habeas corpus" is often shortened to "habeas." Also, "petition for a writ of habeas corpus" is sometimes shortened to "petition for habeas corpus."

2. See JLM, Chapter 20, "Using Article 440 of the New York Criminal Procedural Law to Attack Your Conviction or Illegal Sentence," for a list of statutes for state post-conviction relief in other states. JLM, Chapter 2, "Introduction to Legal Research" can help you to conduct further research on the laws in your state.

3. If you are incarcerated in a federal prison, you cannot file for state habeas corpus. You must file a petition for federal habeas corpus. See JLM, Chapter 13 for more information about federal habeas corpus.

4. Released on your own recognizance (often shortened to "ROR'd" or simply "ROR") means that the court has released you because you have given a written promise to appear at your next court date.

5. See North v. State, 217 So. 2d 608, 609 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1st Dist. 1969) (denying petition for writ of habeas corpus when defendant was no longer in custody). See also Schmunk v. State ex rel Sandstrom, 353 So. 2d 907, 907 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 4th Dist. 1977) (denying petition when defendant was fined for a traffic violation, but never in custody).

6. See People ex rel. Daniels v. Beaver, 303 A.D.2d 1025, 1025, 757 N.Y.S.2d 195, 195 (4th Dept. 2003) (holding several convictions, you may not petition for a writ of habeas corpus to challenge only one conviction or sentence, since you will remain imprisoned for the other convictions regardless of the outcome of your petition.[8]

However, you may be able to petition for habeas corpus even though it will not result in your immediate release if you complain about a specific aspect of your incarceration. For example, if you are incarcerated at the wrong facility or your bail was set too high, you may petition for a writ of habeas corpus. Though you will not be released when your petition is granted, you will be transferred to the correct facility or your bail will be lowered.

(c) State Prisoner

If you are a federal prisoner, state habeas corpus relief is not available to you.[9] See JLM, Chapter 13, "Federal Habeas Corpus," for help with applying for a habeas writ in federal court if you are a federal prisoner or if you are unsure about whether you are a federal prisoner. Importantly, if you are a state prisoner, you must submit your petition in the state where you are incarcerated.[10]

(d) No Other Options

You may not petition the court for a writ of habeas corpus if there are other ways to get the relief you seek. Other procedures include appeal, administrative procedures, and grievance procedures. If you have not yet finished your appeal or are in the middle of a grievance hearing, you should not file a habeas petition until you are done with those other procedures. When you appeal, you are asking the court to reconsider the decision of the lower court. When you file a habeas petition, on the other hand, you are asking the court to consider whether the conviction and sentencing procedure was fair. You should read JLM, Chapter 15, that trial court properly dismissed habeas petition where, even if petitioner had been denied the right to appear before the Parole Board, he would not have been entitled to immediate release); People ex rel. Chaikin v. Warden, 63 N.Y.2d 120, 125, 470 N.E.2d 146, 148, 480 N.Y.S.2d 719, 721 (App. Div. 1984) ("[H]abeas corpus generally will lie only where the defendant would become entitled to his immediate release upon the writ being sustained."); People ex rel. Kaplan v. Comm'r of Corr., 60 N.Y.2d 648, 649, 454 N.E.2d 1309, 1309, 467 N.Y.S.2d 566, 566 (App. Div. 1983) (denying writ of habeas corpus because only remedy to which petitioner was entitled would be a new trial or new appeal, not immediate release). See also People ex rel. DeFlumer v. Strack, 212 A.D.2d 555, 555, 623 N.Y.S.2d 1, 1 (2d Dept. 1995) (denying habeas petition where petitioner challenged several conditions of his conditional release); People ex rel. Travis v. Coombe, 219 A.D.2d 881, 881, 632 N.Y.S.2d 340, 340 (4th Dept. 1995) (denying habeas petition where conditions for conditional release were not met and petitioner was therefore not entitled to immediate release even if the writ was sustained).

---

7. See People v. Scott, 739 N.W.2d 702, 704, 275 Mich. App. 521, 523 (Mich. Ct. App. 2007) (finding that the conditional writ of habeas corpus granted to the defendant (stating that he be retried in 90 days or released) was legitimate, but that the state does not lose its right to re-prosecute if it does not retry within the allotted time).

8. In Florida: see Alderman v. State, 188 So.2d 803, 804 (Fla. 1966) (denying writ of habeas corpus when relator was legally incarcerated on concurrent sentence); Gorman v. Cochran, 127 So. 2d 667, 667–68 (Fla. 1961) (denying writ of habeas corpus to relator who was attacking future sentences he had not yet begun to serve).
In New York: see People ex rel. Brown v. New York State Div. of Parole, 70 N.Y.2d 391, 398, 516 N.E.2d 194, 197, 521 N.Y.S.2d 657, 660 (App. Div. 1987) (denying writ of habeas corpus because "relator, in addition to being held on the parole violation, is being held on unrelated pending criminal charges. Because success on the merits in this proceeding would not entitle him to immediate release from custody, the remedy of habeas corpus is unavailable.").
In Texas: see Ex parte Padgett, 230 S.W.2d 813, 814 (Tex. Crim. App. 1950) (holding prisoner confined under two different sentences, only one challenged in his habeas petition, was not entitled to discharge on a writ of habeas corpus).

9. In Florida: see Simmons v. State, 579 So. 2d 874, 874 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1st Dist. 1991) (holding that the state circuit court is without power to issue a writ of habeas corpus for a prisoner who is not in the custody of the state).
In New York: see N.Y. C.P.L.R. 7002(a) (2009); N.Y. C.P.L.R. 7002(c)(3) (2009) ("The petition … shall state … that a court or judge of the United States does not have exclusive jurisdiction to order [the petitioner] released.").
In Texas: see Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 11.63 (Vernon 2005 & Supp. 2009) (prohibiting state habeas corpus relief to prisoner held under federal authority); see also Ex parte Di Van Nguyen, 31 S.W.3d 815, 816 (Tex. Crim. App. 2000) (denying habeas corpus relief to a petitioner in Immigration and Naturalization Service custody, stating that only a federal court could issue a writ of habeas corpus to petitioner).

10. In New York: see People ex rel. Warren v. People, 171 A.D.2d 768, 768, 567 N.Y.S.2d 321, 321 (2d Dept. 1991) (dismissing federal prisoner's habeas corpus petition because the petitioner was incarcerated outside of New York).
In Texas: see Ex parte Rodriguez, 169 Tex. Crim. 367, 367–68, 334 S.W.2d 294, 294 (Tex. Crim. App. 1960) (holding that relator must apply for habeas corpus relief first to the judge of the trial court).
In Florida: see Dugger v. Jackson, 598 So. 2d 280, 282, 17 Fla. L. Weekly 1264, 1266 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1st Dist. 1992) (vacating lower court's grant of habeas corpus writ because the state of conviction, South Carolina, had not given its authority for the Florida court to hear such claim).

"Inmate Grievance Procedures," for more information about prisoner grievance proceedings, and JLM, Chapter 9, "Appealing Your Conviction or Sentence," for a discussion of an appeal. Each state has its own exceptions to and standards for the general rule that other procedures must not be available.

3. What You Can Complain About in Your Habeas Petition

(a) Before Trial[11]

If you are incarcerated before your trial (detained), you may be able to claim one of the following grounds for habeas relief: improper extradition, excessive bail, or delay. In Florida, you can also challenge a search warrant or probable cause. These grounds are discussed in detail in Part B of this Chapter.

(i) Extradition

An extradition is a warrant for arrest demanding that the arrested person be returned to and tried in the state issuing the warrant. If you were arrested in Florida, New York, or Michigan on an extradition warrant from another state, you may contest extradition to that state by petitioning the court in the state in which you are in custody for a writ of habeas corpus.[12] But, the Supreme Court has held that in such circumstances the state court may only consider the following issues: whether the documents from the demanding state[13] are in order, whether you are a fugitive, whether you have been charged with a crime in the demanding state, and whether you are the person named in the extradition warrant.[14]

You may challenge the extradition warrant on the following two grounds: (1) if you can prove by conclusive evidence that you were not in the demanding state at the time the crime was committed,[15] or (2) if you have been held longer than allowed by the laws of the state in which you are held.

---

11. See JLM, Chapter 3, "Your Right to Learn the Law and Go to Court" for more information generally on your rights before trial.

12. For example, if you are arrested in Florida on an extradition warrant from Georgia, you could contest your extradition to Georgia using the Florida state habeas corpus procedures.

13. The demanding state is the state that requested the arrest and the state to which the prisoner will be extradited (sent) for prosecution. The state in which the prisoner is being held is known as the asylum state.

14. See Michigan v. Doran, 439 U.S. 282, 289, 99 S. Ct. 530, 535, 58 L. Ed. 2d 521, 527 (1978) ("[A] court considering release on habeas corpus can do no more than decide (a) whether the extradition documents on their face are in order; (b) whether the petitioner has been charged with a crime in the demanding state; (c) whether the petitioner is the person named in the request for extradition; and (d) whether the petitioner is a fugitive."); State v. Luster, 596 So. 2d 454, 456, 17 Fla. L. Weekly 206, (Fla. 1992) (adopting Michigan v. Doran in Florida); Ex parte Potter, 21 S.W.3d 290, 299 (Tex. Crim. App. 2000) (applying Michigan v. Doran to Texas); People ex rel. Coster v. Andrews, 104 Misc. 2d 506, 512, 428 N.Y.S. 2d 594, 597–98 (Sup. Ct. Broome County 1980) (applying Michigan v. Doran to New York).
In New York: see also People v. Culwell, 163 Misc. 2d 576, 579–80, 621 N.Y.S.2d 490, 492 (Sup. Ct. Schoharie County 1995) (granting writ of habeas corpus and finding that petitioner was not a fugitive where the demanding state failed to comply with N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 570.16 (McKinney 2009), which required proof that petitioner either committed a crime in the demanding state or did acts in New York which would constitute a crime in the demanding state).

15. In Florida, this ties into the other factors. If you were not in the demanding state at the time of the incident then you are also not a fugitive from justice. See Galloway v. Josey, 507 So. 2d 590, 594, 12 Fla. L. Weekly 182, 182 (Fla. 1987) (granting habeas petition and holding that once a petitioner comes forward with clear and convincing evidence to rebut the presumption that he was a fugitive, the burden shifts to the state to produce competent evidence discrediting the prisoner's proof to such a degree that it ceases to be clear and convincing). See also State v. Cox, 306 So. 2d 156, 159, (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 2d Dist. 1974) ("[T]he question of whether an accused is a fugitive from justice asks nothing more than whether he was bodily present in the demanding state at the time of the offense and thereafter departed from that state."); State ex rel. Smith v. Clark, 33 So. 2d 721, 722, 160 Fla. 113, 114 (1948) (denying habeas petition where record determined that petitioner was in the state at the time of the commission of the robbery); Trent v. McLeod, 179 So. 906, 907, 131 Fla. 617, 618–19 (1938) (denying habeas petition where nothing in the record supported petitioner's claim that he was not in the demanding state); State ex rel. Stringer v. Quigg, 107 So. 409, 412, 91 Fla. 197, 203 (1926) (holding that the court must consider, among other things, whether the warrant shows that he was in the demanding state at the time that the offense was committed); Kuney v. State, 102 So. 547, 549, 88 Fla. 354, 358 (1924) (reversing lower court because it did not consider whether petitioner was in the demanding state at the time of the alleged offense).
In New York: see People ex rel. Friedman v. Comm'r of New York City Dept. of Corr., 66 A.D.2d 689, 690, 411 N.Y.S.2d 267, 268–69 (1st Dept. 1978) (holding that failure to specify when crime was committed deprived petitioner of the right to prove that he was out of the state at the time). But see People ex rel. Pata v. Lindemann, 75 A.D.2d 654, 655, 427 N.Y.S.2d 445, 446 (2d Dept. 1980) (denying habeas petition and holding that where the indictment charged crimes of a continuing nature which allegedly took place throughout the entire period covered by the indictment, it was up to the accused to prove his absence from the demanding state throughout the entire period).

(ii) Bail

You do not have a constitutional right to bail, but if you are granted bail, it must not be excessive. Florida, New York, and Michigan all permit you to ask for habeas relief if you have been denied bail, or if the bail was excessive.[16] Each state, however, has different criteria for determining when bail is excessive. Make sure to read the state-specific parts of this Chapter and research your state's laws.

(iii) Delay

You may file for habeas corpus if you have been incarcerated without formal charges filed against you for a period of time longer than the maximum your state allows. There are two types of formal charges. The first is called an information. This is a formal charging document. An information may be filed by a prosecutor without a grand jury. In New York, prosecutors usually charge misdemeanors using an information. The second type of formal charge is an indictment, which a grand jury issues.

(b) After Your Conviction

If you are incarcerated after your conviction, you may be able to claim one of the following grounds for habeas relief:

(1) confinement beyond your sentence or a miscalculation of sentence;
(2) violation of fundamental constitutional or statutory rights;
(3) new or void law;
(4) ineffective assistance of counsel; or
(5) discovery of new evidence.

In New York, you can also file on the grounds of unreasonable delay[17] or violation of the conditions of your sentence.[18] Each state has a different approach. For more information on grounds for habeas petitions in particular states, see Parts B (Florida), C (New York), and D (Michigan) of this Chapter.

(c) While You Are On Probation or Parole

You can also file a habeas corpus petition if your parole or probation is withdrawn. No matter which state you are in, you have the right to a probable cause hearing to determine whether you violated the conditions of your parole.[19] You must be given notice of this hearing and you have the right to appear, speak on your own behalf, present witnesses, and cross-examine witnesses testifying against you. This hearing is to determine whether you will be held in custody until the decision on whether to revoke (take away) your parole is issued. You also have the right to a final revocation hearing "within a reasonable time" after you have been taken into custody.[20] For more information about parole, see JLM, Chapter 35, "Getting Out Early: Conditional and Early Release," and JLM, Chapter 36, "Parole."

In Florida, you may challenge errors in parole revocation proceedings and orders of the Florida Probation and Parole Commission by petitioning for a writ of habeas corpus.[21] You may file a habeas petition

16. In Florida: see Fla. R. Crim. P. 3.850(a) (West 2009). In New York: see N.Y. C.P.L.R. 7010(b) (McKinney 1998 and Supp. 2010).

17. See People ex rel. Anderson v. Warden, New York City Corr. Inst. for Men, 68 Misc. 2d 463, 468, 325 N.Y.S.2d 829, 835 (Sup. Ct. Bronx County 1971) ("[I]f there is an unreasonable delay in the disposition of an article 440 motion, the defendant can, perhaps, properly bring a writ of habeas corpus."); see also People ex rel. Lee v. Smith, 58 A.D.2d 987, 987, 397 N.Y.S.2d 266, 267 (4th Dept. 1977) (granting a hearing on the merits of relator's habeas corpus petition, even though an appeal was pending, because the relator's appeal had been pending for more than four years). You should read Part C(2)(b)(vi) of this Chapter for more information about "unreasonable delay" habeas grounds in New York.

18. See People ex rel. Brown v. Johnston, 9 N.Y.2d 482, 485, 174 N.E.2d 725, 726, 215 N.Y.S.2d 44, 45 (App. Div. 1961) ("[I]t seems quite obvious that any further restraint in excess of that permitted by the judgment or constitutional guarantees should be subject to inquiry."). You should read Part C(2)(b)(vii) of this Chapter for more information about "violation of the conditions of your sentence" habeas grounds in New York.

19. Morrissey v. Brewer, 408 U.S. 471, 485, 92 S. Ct. 2593, 2602, 33 L. Ed. 2d 484, 496–97 (1972). Since this is a Supreme Court case, it applies to all states.

20. Morrissey v. Brewer, 408 U.S. 471, 488, 92 S. Ct. 2593, 2604, 33 L. Ed. 2d 484, 498 (1972).

21. See State v. Sampson, 297 So. 2d 120, 121–22 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 4th 1974) (finding that habeas corpus is the proper method for challenging an order of the Florida Parole and Probation Commission); State ex rel. Wainwright v. Holley, 234 So. 2d 409, 410 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 2d Dist. 1970) (holding that the proper way to challenge error in post-conviction proceedings such as parole revocation is through habeas corpus); see also Jackson v. Mayo, 73 So. 2d 881, 882–83 (Fla. 1954) (granting relief where no evidence was offered authorizing revocation of parole); Beal v. Mayo, 70 So. 2d 367, 369 (Fla. 1954) (affirming that where there is a complete absence of any adjudication at all, the judgment and to challenge the Parole Commission's determinations of presumptive (expected) parole release dates.[22] If you are incarcerated after your presumptive release date, you may petition for a habeas corpus writ.[23]

Petitions for habeas corpus relief can also be brought in connection with parole revocation hearings in New York[24] and Michigan.

(d) Jurisdiction

Another possible ground for habeas relief—but one almost always rejected—is that the court that imprisoned you did not have jurisdiction, or the power to hear and decide a case. In a criminal case, a court must have two types of jurisdiction: (1) personal jurisdiction (the power to judge you, the defendant); and (2) subject matter jurisdiction (the power to judge the offense with which you were charged). If the court that imprisoned you did not have either of these types of jurisdiction, you can petition for habeas corpus.[25]

(i) Personal Jurisdiction

A court has personal jurisdiction when you go to or are taken to court and appear before the judge.[26] Since you almost certainly appeared before a court either at the trial leading to your conviction or at your arraignment (if you have not yet gone to trial), you will rarely be able to petition for habeas corpus on the ground that the court lacked personal jurisdiction.

(ii) Subject Matter Jurisdiction

Subject matter jurisdiction is the court's power to decide cases involving the type of offense with which you were charged. The court only has proper subject matter jurisdiction if the right kind of indictment or information has been issued. Because indictments and informations grant jurisdiction, you may petition the court for habeas relief at any time before or after conviction[27] if the indictment against you is defective.[28] An sentence will be subject to being set aside on habeas corpus); Sellers v. Bridges, 15 So. 2d 293, 295, 153 Fla. 586, 590–91 (1943) (holding that whether prisoner inexcusably violated conditions of pardon or parole was proper for habeas inquiry).

---

22. See Williams v. Florida Parole Comm'n, 625 So. 2d 926, 934, 18 Fla. L. Weekly 2258 (Fla. 1st Dist. Ct. App. 1993) (finding that the proper remedy to challenge presumptive release date is habeas corpus).

23. See Jenrette v. Wainwright, 410 So. 2d 575, 577–78 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1982) (ruling that prisoner whose presumptive parole release date has passed was entitled to immediate release on habeas corpus).

24. Read Part C(2)(c) of this Chapter for more information about bringing a petition for habeas corpus in connection with your parole revocation hearing in New York.

25. See Ex parte Livingston, 156 So. 612, 618, 116 Fla. 640, 654 (1934) ("Want of jurisdiction over person or subject matter is always ground for relief on habeas corpus.").

26. See Frisbie v. Collins, 342 U.S. 519, 522–23, 72 S. Ct. 509, 511–12, 96 L. Ed. 541, 545–46 (1952) (denying petitioner's application for habeas corpus even though he was brought into the court's jurisdiction by forcible abduction).
In New York: see People ex rel. Ortiz v. Warden, 119 A.D.2d 526, 528, 501 N.Y.S.2d 667, 668 (1st Dept. 1986) (dismissing petition for habeas corpus, and, by applying two U.S. Supreme Court cases to New York, ruling that even though New York authorities did not provide the proper papers for extradition, court has personal jurisdiction if petitioner is present in court).

27. In Florida: see Ex parte Livingston, 116 Fla. 640, 654, 156 So. 612, 618 (1934) (holding that a faulty indictment may be grounds to overturn a conviction and may be challenged at any time). In New York, see People ex rel. Morris v. Skinner, 67 Misc. 2d 221, 323 N.Y.S.2d 905, 909 (Sup. Ct. Monroe County 1971) (granting habeas relief where information failed to charge petitioner with a crime); 64 N.Y. Jur. 2d, Habeas Corpus § 44 (2010). In Texas: see Ex parte McClain, 623 S.W.2d 140 (Tex. Crim. App. 1981) (finding that defective indictment can be attacked for the first time on post-conviction petition for writ of habeas corpus).

28. In Florida: see Farrior v. State ex rel. Compton, 13 So. 2d 147, 147, 152 Fla. 754, 756 (1943) (finding that habeas is proper remedy for indictment that fails to allege a crime); see also Locklin v. Pridgeon, 30 So. 2d 102, 103 158 Fla. 737, 739 (1947) (finding that "the sufficiency of the indictment may be challenged in habeas corpus proceedings when it totally fails to charge an offense under any valid law," and granting a writ of habeas corpus where the statute under which he was convicted was too indefinite and uncertain to comply with due process requirements); Ex parte Wilson, 14 So. 2d 846, 846, 153 Fla. 459, 460 (1943) (remanding with instructions where verdict purporting to find petitioner guilty of criminal offense was defective and judgment pronounced by trial court was imperfect); House v. State, 172 So. 734, 735, 127 Fla. 145, 150 (1937) (holding that where a prisoner brought a habeas corpus challenge because his verdict was imperfect in that it did not contain a proper adjudication of the crime as defined in the statute, he should be sent back to the trial court for a proper adjudication); Martin v. State, 166 So. 467, 467, 123 Fla. 143, 144–45 (1936) (holding that petitioner could raise issue of defective information on post-conviction petition for writ of habeas corpus).
In New York: see People ex rel. Gray v. Tekben, 86 A.D.2d 176, 180, 449 N.Y.S.2d 276, 276 (2d Dept. 1982) (granting habeas corpus where the indictment charging assault in second degree only conferred jurisdiction to enter judgment on such crime or lesser included offenses, and petitioner was convicted of another offense, which was neither included in the indictment can be defective in many ways, but to get habeas relief it must be so wrong that it fails to charge you with a crime.[29] What constitutes a defective indictment varies from state to state. For instance, a defective indictment might not list all of the elements of the crime, or it might charge you with something not against the law, or it might have been issued after the statute of limitations for the offense has run. If the court finds the indictment is defective, it will be voided and you will be entitled to immediate release for that charge. But, the prosecutor may try to re-indict you for the same offense, using an indictment that is not defective.

B. Florida

This Part explains some of the basic rules for filing a habeas corpus petition in Florida.

1. Requirements

The Florida writ of habeas corpus rules can be found in Rule 3.850 of the Florida Rules of Criminal Procedure[30] and in Title VI, Section 79.01 of the Florida State Statutes.[31] To challenge your conviction, sentence, or confinement, you must either file a Rule 3.850 motion or file a habeas petition. If you want to challenge your conviction on any of the grounds specified in Rule 3.850 (see the next sub-point entitled "Requirements for a Rule 3.850 motion), then you must file a Rule 3.850 motion. If your grounds for relief do not fall within those listed in sub-point 2 below, then you may file a habeas petition. Although the Rule 3.850 motion asks for relief similar to a habeas petition, you should be sure to follow its own specific pleading requirements. Prisoners facing the death penalty in Florida must follow a different procedure.[32] The rest of this sub-point will explain the requirements for a habeas petition, and the requirements for a Rule 3.850 petition will follow.

(a) Custody

If you are on parole or probation you are eligible for habeas corpus.[33] However, if you have been released on bond[34] or ROR,[35] you may not file a petition for writ of habeas corpus in Florida.

(b) Immediate Release

You must be entitled to immediate release upon the success of your habeas claim.

(c) State Prisoner

In Florida, if you were convicted in another state, but sent to prison in Florida, the state that convicted you (the sending state) must hear your habeas corpus petition.[36]

(d) No Other Options

If you are appealing administrative action taken against you by the Florida State Department of Corrections or complaining about the conditions of your confinement, you must follow Florida's administrative procedures before filing a petition for relief in state court. Rule 33-103 of the Florida indictment nor a lesser included offense of assault), aff'd, 57 N.Y.2d 651, 493 N.E.2d 875, 454 N.Y.S.2d 66 (1982).

---

29. In Florida: see Ex parte Stirrup, 19 So. 2d 712, 713, 155 Fla. 173, 175 (Fla. 1944) (holding habeas will not secure release where the indictment was merely defective in its allegations); see also Peterson v. Mayo, 65 So. 2d 48, 48 (Fla. 1953) ("Defects in an information are not subject to attack in a habeas corpus proceeding unless the defects are of such magnitude that the information utterly fails to charge any crime or offense under the laws of the State of Florida.").

30. Fla. R. Crim. P. 3.850(a) (West 2009).

31. Fla. Stat. Ann. § 79.01 (West 2009).

32. See Fla. R. Crim. P. 3.851 (West 2009) (setting out collateral relief procedures after a death sentence has been imposed and affirmed on direct appeal).

33. See State v. Bolyea, 520 So. 2d 562, 563–64, 13 Fla. L. Weekly 117, 117 (Fla. 1988) (holding that a petitioner on probation is in custody); Sellers v. Bridges, 15 So. 2d 293, 295–96, 153 Fla. 586, 590–91 (1943) (holding that parole is sufficient restraint on freedom to consider parolee in custody).

34. See State ex rel. Curley v. Gatlin, 5 So. 2d 54, 54, 149 Fla. 1, 1 (1941) (holding that prisoner released on an appearance bond is not entitled to habeas relief).

35. See Sandstrom v. Kolski, 305 So. 2d 75, 76 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 3rd Dist. 1974) (refusing to entertain petition for habeas corpus when petitioner promised to appear in court at a future date, since petitioner was not in custody).

36. See Dugger v. Jackson, 598 So. 2d 280, 282, 17 Fla. L. Weekly 1264 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1st Dist. 1992) (vacating lower court's grant of writ of habeas corpus because petitioner had been convicted in South Carolina, and South Carolina had not permitted the Florida court to hear such claim; the relator was ordered to apply for relief from South Carolina).

Administrative Code describes the administrative procedures available to you.[37] Your petition for habeas corpus will not be granted unless you have followed these procedures.[38] For example, you may lose your right to habeas relief on an issue if you file a habeas petition before exhausting administrative procedures.[39] Florida courts will also refuse to consider your habeas petition if you could have raised an issue or error on appeal, but did not.[40] Alleging "ineffective assistance of counsel" will not allow you to raise issues in your habeas petition that could have otherwise been raised on appeal.[41]

2. Requirements of a Rule 3.850 Motion

(a) Grounds for Motion[42]

You may bring a Rule 3.850 motion for relief from judgment or release from custody if:

(1) The judgment entered against you or sentence imposed violates the Constitution, Federal or Florida law.
(2) The court did not have jurisdiction to enter the judgment against you.
(3) The court did not have jurisdiction to impose the sentence.
(4) The sentence exceeded the maximum authorized by law.
(5) Your plea was involuntary.
(6) The judgment against you or sentence imposed is otherwise subject to collateral attack.

(b) Time Limits

If you believe that your sentence exceeds the limits provided by law, you may file your Rule 3.850 motion at any time. All other Rule 3.850 claims must be filed no later than two years after your judgment and sentence become final. In capital cases (when a death sentence is imposed), you have one year to file your Rule 3.850 motion.[43]

These time requirements are inapplicable if you can prove that you did not know the facts critical to your Rule 3.850 motion before the deadline. You must also show that these facts could not have been discovered through the exercise of due diligence. The time limit will also be inapplicable if you are asserting a violation of your constitutional right, which was established after the two-year time period had passed. Finally, you can challenge the Rule 3.850 time period if you retained counsel to file your motion, but your lawyer failed to file the motion on time.[44]

(c) Contents of Motion

Your Rule 3.850 motion must be made under oath and include details about the judgment or sentence under attack. If you have appealed the judgment or sentence, you must include those facts as well as the ruling of the court.[45] You must inform the court whether you have filed a previous post-conviction motion,

---

37. Fla. Admin. Code Ann. R. 33-103 (2010).

38. See Seccia v. Wainwright, 517 So. 2d 80, 81, 12 Fla. L. Weekly 2886 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1st Dist. 1987) (dismissing prisoner's habeas claim for improper administrative confinement where petitioner failed to exhaust administrative remedies); Sutton v. Strickland, 485 So. 2d 25, 25–26, 11 Fla. L. Weekly 675 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1st Dist. 1986) (dismissing prisoner's petition for writ of habeas corpus on the ground that he failed to exhaust prisoner grievance procedures); Griggs v. Wainwright, 473 So. 2d 49, 49–50, 10 Fla. L. Weekly 1844 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1st Dist. 1985) (holding that a prisoner challenging his confinement must exhaust his administrative remedies before seeking habeas relief).

39. See Comer v. Fla. Parole & Prob. Comm'n, 388 So. 2d 1341, 1341 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1st Dist. 1980) (holding that the failure to exhaust all available administrative remedies may procedurally bar relief by writ of habeas corpus).

40. See Hardwick v. Dugger, 648 So. 2d 100, 105, 19 Fla. L. Weekly 433 (Fla. 1994) (finding habeas corpus was not an available remedy where errors of law either were or could have been raised on direct appeal); see also T.L.W. v. Soud, 645 So. 2d 1101, 1105, 19 Fla. L. Weekly 2520, (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1st Dist. 1994) (stating that habeas claim concerning whether the detention of minors is contrary to a Florida statute must first be addressed to trial courts or in a motion for post-conviction relief).

41. See Mills v. Dugger, 574 So. 2d 63, 65, 15 Fla. L. Weekly 589 (Fla. 1990) (finding that alleging ineffective counsel will not allow relator to raise issues that should have been raised on appeal), reh'g denied (Feb. 28, 1991).

42. Fla. R. Crim. P. 3.850 (West 2009).

43. Fla. R. Crim. P. 3.850 (West 2009).

44. Fla. R. Crim. P. 3.850 (West 2009).

45. See Catlett v. State, 367 So. 2d 735 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 4th Dist. 1979) (dismissing a motion to vacate because the plaintiff failed to mention prior appeals or Rule 3.850 motions).

and if so, how many motions you have filed.[46] If you have filed a previous motion or motions, you must also state the reason or reasons you did not raise your current Rule 3.850 claims in those prior filings. Finally, you must inform the court of the type of relief sought, as well as a brief statement of facts relied upon in the motion.[47]

3. Determining Whether to File a Rule 3.850 Motion or a Habeas Petition

(a) Before Trial

(i) Extradition

In Florida, you may be held for a maximum of thirty days before extradition to another state.[48] If you have been held for over thirty days awaiting extradition, you may bring a habeas corpus petition in Florida. Extradition issues may be brought to the court pursuant to a writ of habeas corpus, and not according to the procedures laid out in Rule 3.850.[49]

(ii) Bail

You may ask for habeas relief on the ground that you were denied bail[50] or that your bail is excessive.[51] Some courts require petitioners to prove they have tried to make bail, and will not consider a habeas petition if the evidence indicates that you could not post bail in any amount.[52] If the court finds in your favor, it may grant relief or lower your bail. If you have already been convicted, the court will not review any petition requesting bail because you cannot get bail after you are convicted. To challenge your bail proceedings or pretrial detainment conditions, you need not exhaust Rule 3.850 procedures. Instead, you may directly file a habeas petition.[53]

---

46. See Catlett v. State, 367 So. 2d 735 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 4th Dist. 1979) (dismissing a motion to vacate because the plaintiff failed to mention prior appeals or Rule 3.850 motions).

47. Fla. R. Crim. P. 3.850 (West 2009).

48. See Hill v. Roberts, 359 So. 2d 911, 913 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 2d Dist. 1978) (finding prisoner entitled to discharge on a habeas writ where he was available for extradition for more than 30 days and demanding state took no action to receive him); see also Fla. Stat. Ann. § 941.15 (West Supp. 2006) (setting statutory maximum of 30 days).

49. See State v. Luster, 596 So. 2d 454, 454, 17 Fla. L. Weekly S206 (Fla. 1992) (holding that a court considering release on habeas corpus can do no more than decide whether extradition documents sent by demanding state are in order on their face, whether petitioner has been charged with a crime in the demanding state, whether petitioner has been named in the demand, and whether petitioner is a fugitive); Galloway v. Josey, 507 So. 2d 590, 12 Fla. L. Weekly 182, 182 (Fla. 1987) (finding on habeas review that when extradition warrant is based upon facially valid probable cause hearing in another state, accused may only defeat extradition on issue of whether accused is a fugitive by producing clear and convincing proof that he is not a fugitive from justice).

50. See Bennett v. State, 118 So. 18, 18, 1896 Fla. 237, 238 (1928) (finding that a person seeking release on bail should do so by filing a habeas corpus petition); see also Bradwell v. McClure, 488 So. 2d 566, 567, 11 Fla. L. Weekly 978 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1st Dist. 1986) (granting habeas relief and ordering trial court to set a reasonable bail for petitioner).

51. See Nicholas v. Cochran, 673 So. 2d 882, 883, 21 Fla. L. Weekly 989, 989 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 4th Dist. 1996) (granting writ after finding that trial court's large increase of bail upon discovering that petitioner possessed more assets than the court had been aware of did not comply with the purposes of bail); Rawls v. State, 540 So. 2d 946, 947, 14 Fla. L. Weekly 935, 935 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 5th Dist. 1989) (finding that writ of habeas corpus is available when petitioner can show that the trial court has set bail at an unreasonable amount and that bond schedules do not justify excessive bail). In order to discourage the profits from the sale of drugs being used to post bail, under Fla. Stat. Ann. § 903.046(2)(h) (West 2009), courts may consider the street value of drugs when setting bail on drug-related offenses. See Alvarez v. Crowder, 645 So. 2d 63, 63–64, 19 Fla. L. Weekly 2363, 2363 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 4th Dist. 1994) (citing Fla. Stat. Ann. § 903.046 (1993) (noting that criteria that should be taken into consideration in evaluating the amount of bail include: "nature of the offense and applicable penalty, family ties, length of residence in the community, employment history, financial resources, the defendant's prior criminal record, risk of flight, danger to the community and street value of any drugs involved."). But see Sikes v. McMillian, 564 So. 2d 1206, 1208, 15 Fla. L. Weekly 1949, 1949 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1st Dist. 1990) (finding Fla. Stat. Ann. § 903.046(2)(h) (West 2009) does not support court increasing bail when defendant is charged with purchasing and not selling drugs).

52. See Ex parte Smith, 193 So. 431, 431–32, 141 Fla. 434, 434–35 (1940) (holding that reduction of bail will not be considered on habeas petition where the record indicates that petitioner would not have been able to make bail in any amount, but without prejudice to renew petition if petitioner becomes able to make bail).

53. See Dupree v. Cochran, 698 So. 2d 945, 22 Fla. L. Weekly D2201 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 4th Dist. 1997) (granting petitioner's petition because trial judge failed to state with specificity facts on which she revoked bond); Wilson v. State, 669 So. 2d 312, 21 Fla. L. Weekly D661 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 5th Dist. 1996) (finding, upon habeas review, that trial court abused its discretion in committing petitioner to custody for failure to appear at rescheduled trial); Alvarez v. Crowder, 645 So. 2d 63 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 4th Dist. 1994) (holding that one million dollars bail for petitioner, charged with trafficking in marijuana was clearly excessive).

(iii) Delay

If no formal charges are filed against you within twenty-one days, you may be entitled to release on a Rule 3.850 motion. The Florida courts had previously recognized delay as a cause of action for habeas relief, and you may raise a habeas claim after exhausting Rule 3.850 procedures.[54] If you are released or charged before the court rules on your habeas petition, your petition becomes moot and the court will not consider it.[55] You may also petition the court for a writ of habeas corpus if you request a preliminary hearing and are not granted one in a timely manner.

(iv) Search Warrant and Probable Cause

If you were arrested pursuant to a search warrant, you may file a pretrial motion under Rule 3.850 challenging the validity of the search warrant.[56] You may also challenge your arrest on the ground that there is no probable cause to believe that you committed the crime with which you are charged.[57] Probable cause is a very low threshold and courts are not likely to grant habeas relief on this ground.[58] When deciding your petition, the court will not evaluate conflicting testimony in order to make determinations of fact.[59] The court will leave this determination for trial. After exhausting Rule 3.850 procedures, you may raise these same issues in a habeas petition.

(b) After Your Conviction

(i) Confinement Beyond Sentence

You are also entitled to Rule 3.850 relief if your sentence is void. A court will consider a sentence void if it is completely different than what the law requires (for example, if the judgment fails to state an offense, does not clearly adjudicate the defendant's guilt, or lists a charge not on the indictment).[60] However, courts have not used this argument recently. If you are denied relief under Rule 3.850, you may then raise this claim in a habeas corpus proceeding.

---

54. See Fla. R. Crim. P. 3.133(b) (West 2009); s*ee also* Beicke v. Boone, 527 So. 2d 273, 275, 13 Fla. L. Weekly 1410, 1410 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1st Dist. 1988) (finding that state's failure to file charges within 21 days of arrest entitled defendant to adversary preliminary hearing on any charge pending against him; the state's failure to present evidence at the required hearing entitled defendant to release on his own recognizance on any charges resulting from the crime for which he was arrested).

55. See Bowens v. Tyson, 578 So. 2d 696, 697, 16 Fla. L. Weekly 270, 270 (Fla. 1991) (holding that defendant who was held in custody for 30 days without filing information or indictment was not entitled to automatic pretrial release where state filed information before court heard defendant's motion for release).

56. See State ex rel. Wilson v. Quigg, 17 So. 2d 697, 698–703, 154 Fla. 349–58 (1944) (considering search warrant's validity on appeal from a habeas corpus proceeding, where defendant was held in part based on the warrant).

57. See Jefferson v. Sweat, 76 So. 2d 494, 501 (Fla. 1954) (finding habeas corpus is a proper remedy for testing validity of arrest warrant); State ex rel. Hanks v. Goodman, 253 So. 2d 129, 130 (Fla. 1971) (stating defendant has remedy through habeas corpus if there is no probable cause to hold him).

58. See Alabama v. White, 496 U.S. 325, 330, 110 S. Ct 2412, 2416, 110 L. Ed. 301, 308 (1990) ("[P]robable cause means 'a fair probability that contraband or evidence of a crime will be found.'") (quoting Illinois v. Gates, 462 U.S. 213, 238, 103 S. Ct. 2317, 2332, 76 L. Ed. 2d 527 (1983)). But see Pierce v. Mims, 418 So. 2d 273, 273 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 2d Dist. 1982) (finding no probable cause for arrest warrant when the only evidence presented at preliminary hearing was hearsay).

59. See State ex rel. Price v. Stone, 175 So. 229, 231, 128 Fla. 637, 641 (Fla. 1937) (denying motion to appoint special commissioner to take testimony because "while on habeas corpus the court will examine the legal sufficiency of the alleged facts to make out a crime, it will not determine the probative force of conflicting testimony upon which the charge is based.").

60. See Anglin v. Mayo, 88 So. 2d 918, 921–922 (Fla. 1956) (granting writ of habeas corpus when defendant was sentenced using an outdated statute and the sentence prescribed by the revised statute was shorter); Anderson v. Chapman, 146 So. 675, 677, 109 Fla. 54, 57–58 (1933) ("[I]f the vice of a sentence is not merely that it is defective, but is of an entirely different character from that authorized by law, it is generally held that such sentence is void, and that the prisoner will be discharged on habeas corpus."); see also Dean v. State, 476 So. 2d 318, 319, 10 Fla. L. Weekly 2331 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 2d Dist. 1985) (reversing sentences of youthful offender that exceeded maximums specified in Youthful Offender Act); R. J. K. v. State, 375 So. 2d 871, 871 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1st Dist. 1979) (granting writ to juvenile because a "trial court cannot commit a juvenile for a specific period of time"); State ex rel. Saunders v. Boyer, 166 So. 2d 694, 696–97 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 2d Dist. 1964) (remanding case for resentencing because the sentence of one year hard labor for contempt was void due to statutory limitations). But see Dixon v. Mayo, 168 So. 800, 800–01, 124 Fla. 485, 487 (Fla. Div. B 1936) (denying writ of habeas corpus when court found relator's argument—that the language of the judgment appeared to find him guilty of a charge different than the one on the indictment—to be "not tenable").

(ii) Fundamental Rights

You may attack prior criminal proceedings under Rule 3.850 by asserting a violation of your fundamental constitutional rights. If you are denied relief, you may raise these issues in a petition for habeas relief. Although there is no comprehensive list of rights that Florida courts have declared "fundamental," courts have consistently allowed petitioners to claim certain rights in habeas petitions. These include the right to a trial by jury,[61] the right to due process,[62] the double jeopardy right not to be convicted twice of the same charge,[63] the right to appeal,[64] and the right to a speedy trial.[65] You may also claim the right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment. That is, you may challenge your prison conditions by alleging they are so unbearable as to constitute cruel and unusual punishment.[66]

(iii) New or Void Law

You may also petition the court under Rule 3.850 on the ground that the statute under which you were prosecuted is unconstitutional.[67] It is very rare for courts to find a statute unconstitutional. If the statute you were prosecuted under is declared unconstitutional, you are entitled to immediate release.

(iv) Ineffective Counsel

You have the right to effective assistance of counsel to help you with your appeal. You may petition the court according to the process laid out in Rule 3.850 if you: (1) are indigent (poor), (2) requested counsel on appeal, and (3) were denied that right.[68] If you did not make your need for counsel known, the court is not likely to consider your petition. You may also petition the court for habeas relief because your counsel was 61. See Sneed v. Mayo, 66 So. 2d 865, 869–70, 874 (Fla. 1953) (holding that habeas corpus is proper to review allegation that petitioner was denied right to trial by jury). To raise this issue in a habeas petition, you must have been denied your right to a jury trial. If you were offered a jury trial and turned it down, then you expressly waived your right to a jury trial and may not petition the court for habeas on this issue.

---

62. See Sneed v. Mayo, 69 So. 2d 653, 655 (Fla. 1954) (despite non-compliance with state statute, court denied writ because constitutional requirement of due process was met); Lightfoot v. Wainwright, 369 So. 2d 110, 111 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1st Dist. 1979) (finding that a person who has been denied right to due process is entitled to habeas relief).

63. See Deal v. Mayo, 76 So. 2d 275, 276 (Fla. 1954) (holding that habeas corpus review is proper to test whether petitioner was subject to double jeopardy at trial).

64. See Myrick v. Wainwright, 243 So. 2d 179, 180 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 2d Dist. 1971) (considering and denying habeas petition because the official court record conclusively established petitioner had been advised of his right to appeal his conviction and sentence); Dennis v. Wainwright, 243 So. 2d 181, 182 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 2d Dist. 1971), aff'd sub nom., 247 So. 2d 88 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 2d Dist. 1971) (finding that to raise denial of right to appeal because of untimely filing, petitioner must prove that the frustration of right to appeal was due to state action and not to petitioner's negligence).

65. See Pena v. Schultz, 245 So. 2d 49, 50 (Fla. 1971) (finding habeas is proper to determine whether speedy trial right was denied); Griswold v. State, 82 So. 44, 48, 77 Fla. 505, 515–17 (1919) (holding absent any showing continuance was granted without good cause, the court presumed one continuance did not violate the accused's speedy trial right). This issue should be brought before trial. It is very unlikely the court will grant relief on this issue after conviction.

66. See Graham v. Vann, 394 So.2d 176, 177 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1st Dist. 1981) (affirming writ where petitioners sought relief from prison conditions that "daily imperil their lives and safety" even though a federal case challenging inadequate medical care was pending). Prison conditions may also be challenged using 42 U.S.C. § 1983; see JLM, Chapter 16 for more information.

67. See Sandstrom v. Leader, 370 So. 2d 3, 5 (Fla. 1979) ("[A] writ of habeas corpus may be utilized by an accused to challenge the constitutionality of a statutory provision under which he is charged."); State ex rel. Matthews v. Culver, 114 So. 2d 796, 796 (Fla. 1959) (holding petitioner was being unlawfully detained because he was convicted and sentenced under a statute that was later declared unconstitutional and therefore he must be released); Coleman v. State ex rel. Jackson, 193 So. 84, 85, 140 Fla. 772, 774 (1939) (holding habeas corpus is the proper vehicle where the charge made does not constitute a crime under the laws of Florida because the statute under which the charge is being made is unconstitutional); La Tour v. Stone, 190 So. 704, 710–11, 139 Fla. 681 (1939) (stating the right to attack an information by writ of habeas corpus is limited, and habeas corpus proceeding is proper vehicle when the offense charged does not constitute a crime under the laws of the State because the statute invoked is unconstitutional); Roberts v. Schumacher, 173 So. 827, 827, 127 Fla. 461, 462 (1937) (noting habeas corpus is appropriate relief when the statute under which offense was charged is invalid); State ex rel. Dixon v. Cochran, 114 So. 2d 228, 229 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 2d Dist. 1959) ("[H]abeas corpus proceeding is proper vehicle when statute invoked was held invalid by State Supreme Court.").

68. See Baggett v. Wainwright, 229 So. 2d 239, 241–42 (Fla. 1969) (holding prisoners have a constitutional right to counsel for purposes of direct appeal and the state's failure to grant counsel entitles prisoner to habeas relief to enforce that right, provided prisoner makes his need for counsel known). For more information on ineffective assistance of counsel claims, see Chapter 12 of the JLM, "Appealing Your Conviction Based on Ineffective Assistance of Counsel."

ineffective.[69] Proving ineffective assistance of counsel is very difficult. The court will only consider whether the attorney's mistakes were so great that they were grossly outside the range of acceptable performance and hindered your appeal to the extent that they undermined its result.[70] You must show there is a good chance that if your counsel had not made these mistakes, the outcome on appeal would have been different.[71] You may not use a habeas corpus proceeding to allege ineffective assistance of counsel at trial; that issue may only be raised on appeal.[72] Finally, you do not need to exhaust Rule 3.850 procedures if you are challenging the ineffectiveness of appellate counsel. In those circumstances, you may directly file a habeas petition.[73]

(v) New Evidence

If there is newly discovered evidence in your case, you may attack the judgment against you pursuant to Rule 3.850 procedures.[74] If you later file a habeas petition, be aware that the evidence must be very strong.[75] It must be so strong that, if admitted, it would probably produce an acquittal on retrial.[76] In addition, you must be able to prove that the information was not known by you or your attorney and could not have been discovered by you or your attorney at time of trial.[77] The court will be required to hold an evidentiary hearing on your claim for post-conviction relief, unless the evidence is plainly refuted by the record.[78] You

---

69. See Owen v. Crosby, 854 So. 2d 182, 188, 28 Fla. L. Weekly 615, 615 (Fla. 2003) (holding that petition for post-conviction relief is proper method to raise claims of ineffective assistance of appellate counsel); Brazeail v. State, 821 So. 2d 364, 364, 27 Fla. L. Weekly D1606 (Fla. 2002) (finding that defendant, who claimed his guilty plea was involuntary due to counsel's inaccurate advice successfully pled the performance prong of an ineffective assistance of counsel claim); Groover v. Singletary, 656 So. 2d 424, 425, 20 Fla. L. Weekly 151, 151 (Fla. 1995) (denying habeas petition because all claims had been raised in prior Rule 3.850 proceedings and were found to be procedurally barred or without merit and therefore appellate counsel was not ineffective for failing to raise them); Nerey v. State, 634 So. 2d 206, 206–07, 19 Fla. L. Weekly 661 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 3d Dist. 1994) (denying habeas petition and finding appellate counsel was not ineffective because counsel could reasonably have concluded that involuntary Miranda rights waiver argument would not prevail).

70. See Rogers v. Singletary, 698 So. 2d 1178, 1180–81, 21 Fla. L. Weekly 503, 22 Fla. L. Weekly 561 (Fla. 1996) (applying Pope v. Wainwright, 496 So. 2d 798, 11 Fla. L. Weekly 533 (Fla. 1986), and denying writ of habeas corpus where court found that relator did knowingly and intelligently waive the right to counsel for his appeal); Pope v. Wainwright, 496 So. 2d 798, 800, 11 Fla. L. Weekly 533 (Fla. 1986) (limiting determinations of ineffective appellate counsel to "first, whether the alleged omission are of such magnitude as to constitute a serious error or substantial deficiency falling measurably outside the range of professionally acceptable performance and, second, whether the deficiency in performance compromised the appellate process to such a degree as to undermine confidence in the correctness of the result" (citing Johnson v. Wainwright, 463 So. 2d 207, 209, 10 Fla. L. Weekly 85 (Fla. 1985)); Jackson v. Dugger, 580 So. 2d 161, 162, 16 Fla. L. Weekly 327 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 4th Dist. 1991) (granting petition for habeas corpus where counsel was determined to be defective due to his failure to raise an issue on appeal that counsel for relator's co-defendant raised, causing co-defendant's conviction to be reversed).

71. For more information on ineffective assistance of counsel claims, see Chapter 12 of the JLM, "Appealing Your Conviction Based on Ineffective Assistance of Counsel."

72. See Breedlove v. Singletary, 595 So. 2d 8, 10, 17 Fla. L. Weekly 67 (Fla. 1992) ("Claims of trial counsel's effectiveness are not cognizable in habeas corpus proceedings.").

73. See Groover v. Singletary, 656 So. 2d 424, 425, 20 Fla. L. Weekly S151 (noting that a petition for a writ of habeas corpus is the appropriate vehicle to raise claims of ineffective assistance of appellate counsel).

74. See McLin v. State, 827 So.2d 948, 948, 27 Fla. L. Weekly S743 (Fla. 2002) (analyzing Rule 3.850 motion stating that newly discovered evidence and incorporating an affidavit of an eyewitness to the murder stating that McLin did not commit the crime for which defendant was convicted).

75. DNA evidence may be such an example. See JLM, Chapter 11, "Using Post-Conviction DNA Testing to Attack Your Conviction or Sentence."

76. See Jones v. State, 591 So. 2d 911, 915, 16 Fla. L. Weekly 745 (Fla. 1991) ("[T]he newly discovered evidence must be of such a nature that it would probably produce an acquittal on retrial."); see also Davis v. State, 736 So. 2d 1156, 1159, 24 Fla. L. Weekly 260, 260 (Fla. 1999) (denying post-conviction relief motion because petitioner's allegations regarding expert witness testimony were speculative and thus not newly discovered evidence); Williamson v. Dugger, 651 So. 2d 84, 89, 19 Fla. L. Weekly 582, 582 (Fla. 1994) (denying habeas corpus petition because new affidavits petitioner offered to impeach a witness' credibility were not likely to lead to an acquittal on retrial).

77. See Jones v. State, 591 So. 2d 911, 916, 16 Fla. L. Weekly 745, 745 (Fla. 1991) (holding newly discovered information must have been unknown at time of trial and could not have been discovered through reasonable diligence); see also Steinhorst v. State, 695 So. 2d 1245, 1247–48, 22 Fla. L. Weekly 335, 335 (Fla. 1997) (affirming the denial of defendant's habeas motion because due diligence could have uncovered files relating to the fact that defendant's judge recused himself on a co-defendant's case, which defendant attempted to offer as newly discovered evidence); Correll v. State, 698 So. 2d 522, 523–24, 22 Fla. L. Weekly 188 (Fla. 1997) (denying petitioner's post-conviction relief because the evidence on an expert witness' education offered to impeach the witness could have been discovered at trial).

78. See McLin v. State, 827 So.2d 948, 948, 27 Fla. L. Weekly S743 (Fla. 2002) ("Where no evidentiary hearing is may also file for post-conviction relief if you can show that the prosecutor failed to turn over exculpatory evidence (evidence tending to support your innocence).[79] To establish a claim that the prosecutor failed to turn over such evidence, you must be able to show that:

(1) The state possessed evidence favorable to you;
(2) You did not possess nor could have obtained such evidence with reasonable effort;
(3) The prosecution suppressed (did not turn over) the evidence; and
(4) There is a reasonable probability the case would have come out differently if the evidence had been disclosed.[80]

(c) Probation or Parole

Florida courts have held that a Rule 3.850 motion, followed by a habeas petition if unsuccessful, is the correct procedure by which you can challenge errors in parole revocation proceedings and orders of the Florida Probation and Parole Commission.[81] You may also file a habeas petition to challenge the Parole Commission's determinations of presumptive parole release dates,[82] or if you are incarcerated after your presumptive release date.[83]

(d) Subject Matter Jurisdiction

In Florida, courts will ordinarily find that as long as an indictment or information does not completely fail to charge an offense, it provides the accused with enough information to construct a defense and protects him from future prosecution for the same act. Therefore, courts will not generally find such indictments or informations void or defective.[84] held on a claim for post-conviction relief, an appellate court must accept the defendant's factual allegations to the extent they are not refuted by the record.").

---

79. See Brady v. Maryland, 373 U.S. 83, 87, 83 S. Ct. 1194, 1196–97, 10 L. Ed. 2d 215, 218 (1963) ("[S]uppression by the prosecution of evidence favorable to an accused upon request violates due process where the evidence is material either to guilt or to punishment, irrespective of the good faith or bad faith of the prosecution."); see also Kyles v. Whitley, 514 U.S. 419, 421–22, 115 S. Ct. 1555, 1560, 131 L. Ed. 2d 490, 498 (1995) (applying Brady and reversing the denial of a habeas corpus petition because the state failed to disclose evidence favorable to the petitioner); Brown v. Wainwright, 785 F.2d 1457, 1458 (11th Cir. 1986) (reversing petitioner's conviction because the prosecution knowingly allowed false testimony to be introduced and exploited in its case).

80. Downs v. State, 740 So. 2d 506, 513–17, 24 Fla. L. Weekly 231 (Fla. 1999) (denying motion for post-conviction relief because appellant's contentions that appellee had, among other things, withheld exculpatory evidence and that appellant had received ineffective assistance of counsel were meritless); Mills v. State, 684 So. 2d 801, 806, 21 Fla. L. Weekly 527 (Fla. 1996) (denying motion for successive petition where defendant failed to produce statements or evidence to show that further proceedings would have changed court's conclusion of guilt); Scott v. State, 657 So. 2d 1129, 1132, 20 Fla. L. Weekly 133 (Fla. 1995) (reversing trial court's decision and remanding for evidentiary hearing on issue of possible Brady violations raised by defendant's motion, but denying habeas petition as procedurally barred); Hildwin v. Dugger, 654 So. 2d 107, 110–11, 20 Fla. L. Weekly 39 (Fla. 1995) (denying habeas petition but vacating and remanding for new sentencing before a jury because counsel's errors had deprived petitioner of a reliable penalty phase).

81. See State v. Sampson, 297 So. 2d 120, 121–22 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 4th Dist. 1974) (finding that habeas corpus is the proper method for challenging order of the Florida Parole and Probation Commission); State ex rel. Wainwright v. Holley, 234 So. 2d 409, 410 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 2d Dist. 1970) (holding that the proper way to challenge error in post-conviction proceedings such as parole revocation is through habeas corpus); Bush v. State, 945 So. 2d 1207 (Fla. 2006) (The proper remedy for a prisoner to pursue in challenging a sentence-reducing credit determination by the Department of Corrections, where the prisoner has exhausted administrative remedies and is alleging entitlement to immediate release, is a petition for writ of habeas corpus); see also Jackson v. Mayo, 73 So. 2d 881, 882–83 (Fla. 1954) (granting relief where no evidence was offered authorizing revocation of parole); Beal v. Mayo, 70 So. 2d 367, 369 (Fla. 1954) (affirming that where there is a complete absence of any adjudication at all, the judgment and sentence will be subject to being set aside on habeas corpus); Sellers v. Bridges, 15 So. 2d 293, 295, 153 Fla. 586, 590–91 (1943) (holding whether prisoner inexcusably violated conditions of pardon or parole was proper for habeas inquiry).

82. See Williams v. Florida Parole Comm'n, 625 So. 2d 926, 934, 18 Fla. L. Weekly 2258 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1st Dist. 1993) (finding that the proper remedy to challenge presumptive release date is habeas corpus).

83. See Jenrette v. Wainwright, 410 So. 2d 575, 577–78 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1982) (ruling that prisoner whose presumptive parole release date has passed is entitled to immediate release on habeas corpus).

84. See Sweat v. Pettis, 158 Fla. 104, 106 27 So. 2d 827, 828 (Fla. 1946) (holding where an information could not be said to wholly fail to state a violation of the law, a habeas petition was not the proper way to challenge it; petitioner should have brought a motion to quash); State ex rel. Miller v. Coleman, 130 Fla. 537, 544, 178 So. 157, 160 (Fla. 1938) (holding an information that "informs defendant of the nature of the accusation against him, which does not wholly fail to charge an offense and which enables defendant to prepare his defense and protects him from subsequent prosecution for the same offense, will not on habeas corpus be held so fatally defective as to render conviction and commitment … void."); Taylor v. Chapman, 173 So. 143, 146, 127 Fla. 401, 407–08 (1937) (refusing to grant a writ where the information

4. How to File a Habeas Petition

(a) When to File

First make sure you are not eligible to bring a Rule 3.850 motion. Florida courts will refuse to issue a writ of habeas corpus if you can pursue your claim through another action, like a Rule 3.850 motion.[85]

If you are facing the death penalty, your petition for a writ of habeas corpus must be filed at the same time as the initial brief filed on your behalf in the appeal of the circuit court's order on a motion to vacate, set aside, or correct a sentence.[86]

(b) Where to File

Where you file depends upon the stage of your criminal case. If you have not been convicted yet, or are filing a petition related to a probation violation, you must petition the circuit court judge presiding over your case.[87] But, if the Supreme Court has affirmed your conviction, you must file your petition with the Supreme Court.[88] If you originally file with the circuit court, and the circuit court denies your petition, then you may file another petition with the Supreme Court.[89] In general, you should file the petition in the jurisdiction in which you are incarcerated, but if you are raising an issue that should have been raised on direct appeal (like ineffective counsel), you should file in the court where the original sentence was imposed.[90]

(c) What to Include in Your Petition

Because the writ of habeas corpus is such a unique right, the courts in Florida may grant applications for writs that do not comply with (follow) statutory requirements. For example, an attorney may make a telephone call to a judge to apply for a writ,[91] or a judge may decide informal letters from a prisoner provide sufficient grounds for issuing the writ.[92] But, it is always better to comply with statutory requirements if you can, basing your argument on enough detailed, factual allegations to make a case that on its face shows you are entitled to be released.[93] The statutory requirements for your application for a writ include sufficiently claimed intent and overt acts that would have resulted in commission of the crime).

---

85. Fla. R. Crim. P. 3.850(b) (West 2009).

86. Fla. R. Crim. P. 3.851(d)(3) (West 2009).

87. Fla. Stat. Ann. § 79.01 (West 2009); see also Newkirk v. Jenne, 754 So. 2d 61, 62, 25 Fla. L. Weekly 518 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 2000) (finding that where petitioner was being detained in relation to a probation violation, the circuit court judge presiding over her case had full authority to order her release).

88. See Kinsey v. Davis, 19 So. 2d 323, 325 154 Fla. 889, 892 (1944) (holding that where the petitioner's conviction had been affirmed by the Supreme Court, his habeas petition should have been made to the Supreme Court because the circuit court could not grant a writ).

89. See Deeb v. Gandy, 148 So. 540, 541 110 Fla. 283, 284 (Fla. 1933) (holding that petitioner was entitled to bail after the circuit court held that he should be remanded without bail).

90. Fla. Stat. Ann. § 79.01 (West 2009); see also Collins v. State, 859 So. 2d 1244, 1245, 28 Fla. L. Weekly 2628, 2628 (Fla. 2003) (stating that when petitioner attacks the validity of conviction by raising issues relating to the trial or to the propriety of the plea, jurisdiction lies with the trial court that imposed the sentence); McLeroy v. State, 704 So. 2d 151, 152, 22 Fla. L. Weekly 2718, 2718 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 5th Dist. 1997) (denying a petition for writ of habeas corpus alleging ineffective assistance of counsel because the prisoner improperly filed in the jurisdiction where he was incarcerated rather than where the original sentence was imposed).

91. See Jamason v. State, 455 So. 2d 380, 381, 9 Fla. L. Weekly 330, 330 (Fla. 1983) (upholding an oral writ of habeas corpus which was issued in response to an oral application by the client's attorney over the telephone).

92. See Sneed v. Mayo, 66 So. 2d 865, 868 (Fla. 1953) (finding although the application for a writ was an informal letter not conforming to statutory requirements, the communication was sufficient); McKay v. Jenkins, 405 So. 2d 287, 288 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1981) (construing appellant's informal letter to the court as a petition for a writ).

93. See Sims v. Dugger, 519 So. 2d 1080, 1082, 13 Fla. L. Weekly 292 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1st Dist. 1988) (reversing dismissal of a petition for habeas corpus because the petition contained detailed factual allegations); Brown v. Wainwright, 498 So. 2d 679, 679 11 Fla. L. Weekly 2626 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1st Dist. 1986) (denying a petition for habeas in part because the petition failed to include any arguments in support of the allegations); DeAngelo v. Strickland, 426 So. 2d 1264, 1264 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1st Dist. 1983) (affirming the denial of a prisoner's petition for a writ of habeas corpus because the prisoner was not entitled to the relief he sought and he failed to make a prima facie case since he did not claim that he was illegally imprisoned); Bennington v. Thornton, 370 So. 2d 856, 857 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 4th Dist. 1979) (denying a prisoner's petition for a writ of habeas corpus because he failed to show that the trial court abused its discretion in denying him bail or failing to hold a hearing as soon as was possible); Bagley v. Brierton, 362 So. 2d 1048, 1049 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1st Dist. 1978) (affirming the trial court's denial of a prisoner's habeas petition in which he claimed he was denied adequate medical care because even if the allegations were true, he would not be entitled to relief); Smith v. State, 176 So. 2d 383, 384 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 3d Dist. 1965) (affirming the trial court's denial of a prisoner's habeas petition because the petition did not contain factual allegations to support its conclusions); Sneed

(1) The facts upon which you rely for relief;
(2) A request for a writ of habeas corpus; and
(3) An optional argument in support of the petition with citations of authority.[94]

While you do not need to present all the evidence of your wrongful detention,[95] you should attach to your petition copies of the warrant, process, or proceeding that is causing you to be detained.[96] You should also state that you have exhausted all the administrative remedies available to you.[97]

(d) How to File

After you have created your petition for habeas corpus including all the items outlined in Part (B)(3)(c) above, "What to Include in Your Petition," you should send your petition and any supporting documents to the court specified above in Part (B)(3)(b), "Where to File."

5. Your Right to Counsel for Your Habeas Petition

The U.S. Supreme Court has held you have no federal constitutional right to counsel in state habeas corpus proceedings.[98] In Florida, you have no right to appointed counsel in a habeas proceeding.[99] A public defender may represent you, but there is no requirement that one be appointed to you.[100] But, if you are applying for a writ because you are about to be extradited, you are entitled to be provided with an attorney.[101]

6. What to Expect After You File

In Florida, the court must issue a writ of habeas corpus if your petition states allegations, which, if true, would entitle you to release.[102] When the court issues the writ, it establishes a date for the person who has you in custody to return you to the court.[103] The respondent (whoever has you in custody) may provide a response, also called a "return."[104] The response includes the respondent's arguments for keeping you in v. Mayo, 66 So. 2d 865, 869–70 (Fla. 1953) (stating that a habeas petition must contain at least "some good faith suggestion of illegal detention"); Sullivan v. State ex rel. McCrory, 49 So. 2d 794, 796 (Fla. 1951) (noting that a habeas petition should be dismissed if the petition does not make a case that on its face shows that the petitioner should be released from custody); Herring v. State, 132 Fla. 658, 659, 181 So. 892, 892 (1938) (denying a habeas petition since the prisoner did not claim unlawful detention).

---

94. Fla. R. Civ. P. 1.630.

95. See Johnson v. Lindsey, 89 Fla. 143, 148, 103 So. 419, 421 (1925) (stating that a habeas petition does not need to include all of the evidence necessary to establish that the detention is wrongful).

96. See Cooper v. Lipscomb, 122 So. 5, 5, 97 Fla. 668, 670 (1929) (stating a habeas petition should include a copy of the warrant where the petitioner was arrested and held by the sheriff pursuant to the warrant); Johnson v. Lindsey, 103 So. 419, 421, 89 Fla. 143, 148 (1925) (stating that if a petitioner claims that he is unlawfully detained because the processes or proceedings under which he is being held are invalid, then the habeas petition should include copies of such proceedings or processes); see also Simons v. State, 555 So. 2d 960, 961, 15 Fla. L. Weekly 253, 253 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1st Dist. 1990) (denying a petition for writ of habeas corpus, in which the petitioner claimed he was being deprived of his right to a pretrial release due to his inability to afford bond, because the petition did not include a copy of the order or a transcript of the hearing from the lower court on bond reduction); McNamara v. Cook, 336 So. 2d 677, 679 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 4th Dist. 1976) (finding a habeas petition insufficient because it did not include documentary evidence).

97. Moore v. Dugger, 613 So. 2d 571, 572, 18 Fla. L. Weekly 499, 499 (Fla. 1st Dist. Ct. App. 1993) (finding a petition for writ insufficient because it did not allege petitioner had exhausted administrative remedies).

98. See Pennsylvania v. Finley, 481 U.S. 551, 555, 107 S. Ct. 1990, 1993, 95 L. Ed. 2d 539, 545 (1987) ("[T]he right to appointed counsel extends to the first appeal of right and no further.").

99. See Coffee v. Wainwright, 172 So. 2d 851, 853 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1st Dist. 1965) (finding because post-conviction habeas corpus proceedings are civil, not criminal, "there is no absolute right to assistance of a lawyer").

100. See Fla. Parole & Probation Comm'n v. Alby, 400 So. 2d 864, 864 (Fl. Dist. Ct. App. 4th Dist. 1981) (denying motion to prevent public defender from representing an appellee in habeas corpus proceedings).

101. See Bentzel v. State, 585 So. 2d 1118, 1119–20, 16 Fla. L. Weekly 2410, 2410 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1st Dist. 1991) (finding that a prisoner has a statutory right to counsel at a habeas corpus proceeding challenging extradition).

102. Guess v. Barton, 599 So. 2d 770, 771, 17 Fla. L. Weekly 1427, 1427 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1st Dist. 1992) ("[F]or purposes of appellate review, [the court] must assume that the allegations of appellant's habeas petition are true."); Roy v. Dugger, 592 So. 2d 1235, 1236, 17 Fla. L. Weekly 386, 386 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1st Dist. 1992) (reversing summary denial of the lower court on the ground that if the prisoner's allegations were true, they could establish that the department had failed to comply with due process, a failure that could establish a violation of due process or the protection against cruel and unusual punishment).

103. Fla. Stat. Ann. § 79.04(2) (West 2009).

104. Fla. R. App. P. 9.100(j).

custody. If the respondent does not return you to court by the scheduled date, he must pay you $300.[105] You have a right to provide a reply to a response within twenty days of receiving it.[106] If the return does not address a fact you allege in your petition, you do not need to prove that fact in your reply.[107] In your reply you may, if necessary, put forth other important, material facts not stated in your petition.[108]

The court may decide to hold a hearing to evaluate the facts you allege in your petition. This hearing is usually held after a return is filed, but the court may also decide to hold a hearing before issuing the writ.[109] You have the right to a hearing if your petition is "facially sufficient," which means that if everything on your petition were true, you would be entitled to a writ.[110] In Florida, hearings are informal, and if a witness is unable to attend, he may provide an affidavit instead.[111]

Once the hearing is completed, the court may release you, remand you to custody, or release you on bail.[112] Though there are no fees for applying for a writ, you may be ordered to pay the cost of the proceedings if the writ is not granted.[113]

7. Your Right to Appeal

You may appeal the denial of your application for a writ of habeas corpus to the state supreme court. Filing the petition in the appellate court will be treated as a notice of appeal as long as you raise the same issues you raised in circuit court.[114] However, you also should usually file a notice of appeal.

C. New York

This Part explains some of the basic rules for filing a habeas corpus petition in New York.

1. Requirements

The New York habeas corpus rules can be found in Article 70 of New York Civil Practice Law and Rules, also known as N.Y. C.P.L.R. 7001–7012 (McKinney 1998). The New York State Legislature has restricted the use of the writ of habeas corpus. For most post-conviction relief (challenges to your conviction or sentence), you must file an Article 440 motion, not a petition for a habeas corpus writ.[115]

(a) Custody

If you have been released on parole, on probation, on conditional release, ROR, or you are free on bail, a New York court cannot grant a writ of habeas corpus.[116]

---

105. Fla. Stat. Ann. § 79.05(1) (West 2009).

106. Fla. R. App. P. 9.100(k).

107. See State ex rel. Libtz v. Coleman, 149 Fla. 28, 30, 5 So. 2d 60, 61 (Fla. 1941) (holding that undenied allegations in a petition for writ of habeas corpus are taken as true).

108. See Sneed v. Mayo, 66 So. 2d 865, 870 (Fla. 1953) (stating that, in his reply, petitioner "may allege facts not appearing in the petition"); see also Bard v. Wolson, 687 So. 2d 254, 255, 21 Fla. L. Weekly 2565, 2565 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1st Dist. 1996) (reversing an order denying petition for writ because the appellant was not given opportunity to reply to response); Matera v. Buchanan, 192 So. 2d 18, 20 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 3d Dist. 1966) (finding after respondent has filed a return, petitioner may "allege facts not appearing in the petition or return that may be material in the case").

109. See Turiano v. Butterworth, 416 So. 2d 1261, 1263 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 4th Dist. 1982) (finding that trial court did not err in holding an evidentiary hearing before issuing a writ of habeas corpus).

110. Seibert v. Dugger, 595 So. 2d 1083, 1084 17 Fla. L. Weekly 784, 784 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1st Dist. 1992) (finding that dismissal of a petition for writ of habeas corpus without a hearing is error when the prisoner makes specific allegations which, if true, would establish that the department of corrections has failed to comply with its own rules).

111. Fla. Stat. Ann. § 79.07 (West 2009).

112. Fla. Stat. Ann. § 79.08 (West 2009).

113. See Beasley v. Cahoon, 109 Fla. 106, 126, 147 So. 288, 295 (1933) (finding a petitioner can be required to pay costs in a habeas case).

114. See Garner v. Wainwright, 454 So. 2d 28, 28 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1st Dist. 1984) (treating filing of same habeas petition as a notice of appeal since filed with the appellate court within 30 days, as the appellate rules required).

115. See JLM, Chapter 20, "Using Article 440 of the New York Criminal Procedure Law to Attack Your Unfair Conviction or Illegal Sentence," for more information on filing an Article 440 motion.

116. See People ex rel. Doty v. Kreuger, 26 N.Y.2d 881, 882, 258 N.E.2d 215, 215, 309 N.Y.S.2d 932, 932 (1970) (probation); People ex rel. Nunez v. New York State Bd. of Parole, 182 A.D.2d 998, 998, 585 N.Y.S.2d 716, 716 (3d Dept. 1992) (parole); People ex rel. Birt v. Grenis, 76 A.D.2d 872, 872, 428 N.Y.S.2d 494, 494 (2d Dept. 1980) (conditional release); People ex rel. Doyle v. Fischer, 159 A.D.2d 208, 208, 551 N.Y.S.2d 830, 830 (1st Dept. 1990) (ROR); Bayless v. Wandel, 119 Misc. 2d 82, 84, 462 N.Y.S.2d 396, 398 (Sup. Ct. Fulton County 1983) (free on bail).

(b) Immediate Release

You must be entitled to immediate release if your habeas petition is successful.[117]

(c) State Prisoner

You must be a prisoner in New York.

(d) No Other Options

A New York court will not grant your petition for a writ of habeas corpus if there are other procedures available, unless there are exceptional circumstances of "practicality and necessity."[118] In other words, you must have a very good reason for filing a petition for habeas corpus instead of appealing your conviction, filing an Article 78 petition, or filing an Article 440 motion, whichever would otherwise be appropriate.[119] See Section 2(b)(ii) below for more information about what might constitute exceptional circumstances of practicality and necessity. To find out more about how to challenge your conviction or sentence using Article 440, see JLM, Chapter 20, "Using Article 440 of the New York Criminal Procedural Law to Attack Your Unfair Conviction or Illegal Sentence," and, for a description of how to appeal administrative decisions using Article 78, see JLM, Chapter 22, "How to Challenge Administrative Decisions Using Article 78 of the New York Civil Practice Laws and Rules."

2. What You Can Complain About in Your Habeas Petition

(a) Before Trial

(i) Extradition

You may be held in custody in New York for a maximum of ninety days before you are extradited. After the first thirty days of custody, New York may file an extension for sixty additional days of custody.[120] Therefore, you may be eligible for a writ of habeas corpus if you have been held in custody in New York for over ninety days or if you have been held for more than thirty days and the state of New York has not applied for an extension.

(ii) Bail

If, in denying or setting your bail, the court did not follow New York's statutory guidelines, violated constitutional provisions forbidding excessive bail (for example, bail was set too high), or denied bail arbitrarily (for example, the court did not give a reason for why bail was not set) you have grounds for a habeas petition.[121] New York Criminal Procedure Law § 510.30(2)(a) lists factors that a court must use to

---

117. People ex rel. Goldberg v. Warden, 45 A.D.3d 356, 846 N.Y.S.2d 15 (1st Dept 2007) (finding habeas to be an inappropriate remedy as the prisoner was not entitled to immediate release).

118. People ex rel. Keitt v. McMann, 18 N.Y.2d 257, 262, 220 N.E.2d 653, 655, 273 N.Y.S.2d 897, 900 (1966) (ruling that habeas corpus is not the preferred means of vindicating fundamental constitutional or statutory rights and that departure from traditional orderly proceedings, such as appeal, should be permitted only when dictated by reason of "practicality and necessity").

119. See People ex rel. Wise v. Scully, 163 A.D.2d 444, 444, 570 N.Y.S.2d 1018, 1018 (2d Dept. 1990) (holding that the court cannot review errors already considered on a direct appeal); People ex rel. Sanchez v. Hoke, 132 A.D.2d 861, 862, 518 N.Y.S.2d 69, 70 (3d Dept. 1987) (declining to grant habeas relief where petitioner had direct appeal pending and had raised the same issues in an unsuccessful application for post-conviction relief under Article 440); People ex rel. Proctor v. Henderson, 74 A.D.2d 718, 719, 425 N.Y.S.2d 680, 680 (4th Dept. 1980) (holding that habeas corpus will not lie where the issue had already been decided in an earlier Article 440 motion, but suggesting that the prisoner could bring another Article 440 motion seeking the same relief).

120. See People ex rel. Linaris v. Weizenecker, 89 Misc. 2d 814,816, 392 N.Y.S.2d 813, 815 (Sup. Ct. Putnam County 1977) (granting writ of habeas corpus where petitioner had been held beyond 90-day period without warrant even though other charges were pending against him in New York); see also N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law §§ 570.36, 570.40 (McKinney 1995).

121. See People ex rel. Klein v. Krueger, 25 N.Y.2d 497, 499, 255 N.E.2d 552, 554, 307 N.Y.S.2d 207, 209–10 (1969) (holding that in a habeas corpus proceeding, the court can review a bail decision if the decision appears to be excessive or arbitrary according to constitutional or statutory standards); see, e.g., People ex rel. Gutierrez v. Jacobson, 219 A.D.2d 740, 740, 632 N.Y.S.2d 466, 466 (2d Dept. 1995) (writ denied) (dismissing habeas petition on finding that lower court's determination was not an improvident exercise of discretion and did not violate constitutional or statutory standards); People ex rel. Hunt v. Warden of Rikers Island Corr. Facility, 161 A.D.2d 475, 476, 555 N.Y.S.2d 742, 742 (1st Dept. 1990) (writ denied) (dismissing habeas petition on basis that the lower court did not abuse discretion in denial of bail); see also N.Y. C.P.L.R. 7010(b) (McKinney 2009).

determine the amount, if any, of your bail.[122] If a court bases its bail determination on a factor not included in the statute, or ignores one or more of the factors, you may challenge the court's action by petitioning for habeas corpus.[123] Normally, when deciding a habeas corpus petition, the court can only review the record that was before the court that set bail. In other words, in making its decision about granting the writ of habeas corpus, the court can only look at the facts and evidence that were presented at the bail hearing itself.[124] If you can show that bail was set too high, the court can grant a writ of habeas corpus reducing the amount, but it will not release you.[125] If you have already been tried and convicted, the court will dismiss your habeas petition as moot or irrelevant because bail no longer matters once you have been convicted.[126]

(iii) Delay

If you were arrested without a warrant, have been detained for longer than twenty-four hours, and have not yet been arraigned, you may petition for a writ of habeas corpus.[127] At your arraignment, you should receive a complaint. If you are charged with a misdemeanor, the District Attorney's office has five days (not counting Sunday) to replace the complaint with an information.[128] If you have been arrested for a felony, the District Attorney's office has five or six days (depending on whether you were incarcerated over a weekend or during a holiday)[129] either to file an indictment against you by a grand jury vote or to file an information. However, even if these requirements are not followed, your application for habeas relief may be denied if: (1) the delay is a result of your own actions; (2) the District Attorney already filed a certification that an indictment has been voted; (3) a grand jury filed an indictment or a direction to file an information; or (4) a court finds good cause for the delay.[130]

---

122. These factors are character, reputation, habits, and mental condition; employment and financial resources; ties to family and community and length of residence in community; criminal record; juvenile record; previous failure to show up in court; the likelihood of conviction or the merit of any pending appeal; and the sentence that may be imposed. N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 510.30(2)(a) (McKinney 2009).

123. See People ex rel. Bryce v. Infante, 144 A.D.2d 898, 899, 535 N.Y.S.2d 215, 216 (3d Dept. 1988) (overturning denial of bail on basis of defendant's suicidal tendencies); People ex rel. Ryan v. Infante, 108 A.D.2d 987, 988, 485 N.Y.S.2d 852, 853B54 (3d Dept. 1985) (finding that the absence of a codefendant should not be a factor in setting bail unless a defendant has assisted the codefendent in bail jumping); People ex rel. Bauer v. McGreevy, 147 Misc. 2d 213, 216, 555 N.Y.S.2d 581, 583 (Sup. Ct. Rensselaer County 1990) (overturning denial of bail solely to protect the community from possible future criminal conduct by the defendant); Becher ex rel. Vadakin v. Dunston, 142 Misc. 2d 103, 104, 536 N.Y.S.2d 396, 397 (Sup. Ct. Rensselaer County 1988) (overturning denial of bail without conducting a hearing and on the ground that the defendant disobeyed a subpoena to testify before the grand jury); People ex rel. Glass v. McGreevy, 134 Misc. 2d 1085, 1086, 514 N.Y.S.2d 622, 623 (Sup. Ct. Rensselaer County 1987) (overturning imposition of negative AIDS test as a condition for release on bail).

124. See People ex rel. Rosenthal v. Wolfson, 48 N.Y.2d 230, 232–33, 397 N.E.2d 745, 422 N.Y.S.2d 55 (1979) (holding that, absent extraordinary circumstances, new evidence relevant to bail determination should be submitted to the bail-fixing court, not to a habeas court).

125. N.Y. C.P.L.R. 7010(b) (McKinney 2009) ("If the person detained has been admitted to bail but the amount fixed is so excessive as to constitute an abuse of discretion, and he is not ordered discharged, the court shall direct a final judgment reducing bail to a proper amount."). For example, if you were indicted for selling heroin on two different occasions for amounts totaling $19,000, and you have a wife and son with whom you had been living in the community, the court may find that bail set at $150,000 is excessive. People ex rel. Mordkofsky v. Stancari, 93 A.D.2d 826, 827, 460 N.Y.S.2d 830, 832 (2d Dept. 1983).

126. See Kassebaum v. al-Rahman, 212 A.D.2d 482, 483, 624 N.Y.S.2d 803, 803 (1st Dept. 1995) (denying habeas petition for failure to set reasonable bail, finding the decision moot because petitioner had been tried and convicted).

127. See People ex rel. Maxian v. Brown, 77 N.Y.2d 422, 426–27, 570 N.E.2d 223, 225, 568 N.Y.S.2d 575, 577 (1991) (granting habeas and holding a delay of arraignment of more than 24 hours is presumptively unnecessary and, without reason, violates N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law 140.20(1)); see also N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 140.20(1) (McKinney 2009).

128. See N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 170.70 (McKinney 2009); People ex rel. Alvarez v. Warden, Bronx House of Det., 178 Misc. 2d 254, 256, 680 N.Y.S.2d 153, 154–55 (Sup. Ct. Bronx County 1998) (granting the petition for a writ of habeas corpus and ordering the petitioner released because of the failure to file an information against the petitioner within five days); see also People ex rel. Neufeld v. McMickens, 70 N.Y.2d 763, 764–65, 514 N.E.2d 1368, 1368, 520 N.Y.S.2d 744, 744 (1987) (stating that five-day period includes first day of custody unless first day preceded arraignment or was a Sunday).

129. See People ex rel. Barna v. Malcolm, 85 A.D.2d 313, 316–17, 448 N.Y.S.2d 176, 178–79 (1st Dept. 1982) (finding 72-hour period may be extended if it expires upon a Saturday, Sunday, or public holiday, or if there is "good cause").

130. N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 180.80 (McKinney 2009).

You may also petition for a writ of habeas corpus if you are being denied your right to a speedy trial under subdivision (2) of New York's speedy trial statute.[131] This statute applies to individuals who are incarcerated and have an information or indictment filed against them but whose cases have not yet gone to trial.[132] If the court grants your petition, you will have the right to "be released on bail or on [your] own recognizance upon such conditions as may be just and reasonable."[133] If your trial has started, you can no longer bring a habeas corpus petition on this ground. Instead, you should raise the issue on direct appeal.[134]

(b) After Your Conviction

(i) Confinement Beyond Sentence

You may petition for habeas corpus relief if you have already served your sentence and are still being detained, whether due to clerical error, office delay, or miscalculation of jail or prison time, such that you are entitled to immediate release.[135]

Other than the administrative mistakes listed above, which, if corrected, would result in your release, you may not file for a writ of habeas corpus to contest your sentence. For example, if you are serving time for several convictions, you may not petition for a writ of habeas corpus to challenge only one of these convictions or sentences, since you will remain imprisoned under the other convictions, as explained in Part A(2)(b) of this Chapter. Also, if you were improperly given a consecutive sentence instead of a concurrent sentence or you were incorrectly sentenced as a predicate or persistent felon instead of a first-time offender, you cannot petition for a writ of habeas corpus to fix this mistake because it would not result in your immediate release.[136] Rather, you must raise such issues in a direct appeal or an Article 440 motion.

---

131. N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 30.30 (McKinney 2009).

132. N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law. § 30.30 (McKinney 2009). You may only petition for a writ of habeas corpus to challenge a violation of subdivision (2), not subdivision (1), of § 30.30. Under subdivision (2), a defendant charged with a felony cannot be held in custody before going to trial for longer than 90 days; a defendant charged with a misdemeanor where the punishment for the misdemeanor is longer than three months of incarceration cannot be held in custody before going to trial for longer than 30 days; a defendant charged with a misdemeanor where the punishment for the misdemeanor is less than three months of incarceration cannot be held before going to trial for longer than 15 days; and a defendant charged with only a violation cannot be held in custody before going to trial for longer than five days. See People ex rel. Chakwin v. Warden, 63 N.Y.2d 120, 126, 470 N.E.2d 146, 149, 480 N.Y.S.2d 719, 722 (1984) (finding that delay of 91 days, after excluding delay due to defendant's motions, exceeds statutory limit of 90 days, and requires release of defendant). Note that you must file a motion for release in order to have a habeas claim to challenge the violation of your right to a speedy trial. People ex rel. Bullock v. Barry, 2002 N.Y. Slip. Op. 50463U, *3–4, 2002 N.Y. Misc. LEXIS 1525, 4–5 (Sup. Ct. N.Y. County 2002) (unpublished).

133. N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 30.30(2) (McKinney 2009).

134. See Kassebaum v. Al-Rahman, 212 A.D.2d 482, 483, 624 N.Y.S.2d 573, 573 (1st Dept. 1995) (affirming denial of habeas petition on speedy trial grounds because petition was brought after trial had commenced); see also People ex rel. McDonald v. Warden, 34 N.Y.2d 554, 554, 310 N.E.2d 537, 537, 354 N.Y.S.2d 939, 939 (1974) (finding that once criminal action is brought to trial, habeas petition based on denial of right to speedy trial should be denied); People ex rel. Meurer v. Bentley, 202 A.D.2d 1042, 1043, 609 N.Y.S.2d 466, 467 (4th Dept. 1994) (finding that appeal from denial of habeas petition was rendered moot by commencement of trial).

135. See People ex rel. Henderson v. Casscles, 66 Misc. 2d 492, 495, 320 N.Y.S.2d 99, 104 (Sup. Ct. Westchester County 1971) (noting that although habeas petition would be appropriate where petitioner was entitled to immediate release, petitioner should use Article 78 motion if he seeks only to re-compute jail time).

136. See People ex rel. Sims v. Senkowski, 226 A.D.2d 800, 801, 640 N.Y.S.2d 820, 820–21 (3d Dept. 1996) (denying habeas petition and ruling that petitioner claiming that he should not have been sentenced as a persistent felon should raise this argument on direct appeal or file an Article 440 motion); People ex rel. McGourty v. Senkowski, 213 A.D.2d 954, 954, 624 N.Y.S.2d 308, 308 (3d Dept. 1995) (dismissing habeas petition where petitioner claimed that he was improperly sentenced as a persistent felon because, if successful, petitioner would be entitled to resentencing, not immediate release); People ex rel. Hampton v. Scully, 166 A.D.2d 734, 734–35, 561 N.Y.S.2d 482, 483 (2d Dept. 1990) (denial of habeas petitions because re-calculation of sentence would not result in immediate release; an Article 78 proceeding would be more appropriate to force a re-calculation of the sentence); People ex rel. World v. Jones, 88 A.D.2d 1096, 1096, 453 N.Y.S.2d 60, 61 (3d Dept. 1982) (ruling that appeal or Article 440 motion is appropriate proceeding where habeas relief would not affect an immediate release of petitioner from custody). But see People ex rel. Colan v. La Vallee, 14 N.Y.2d 83, 86–87, 198 N.E.2d 240, 241, 248 N.Y.S.2d 853, 855 (1964) (holding in a habeas corpus proceeding violating section 335-b of the Code of Criminal Procedure, as it read in 1960, which required the court to inform the defendant upon his arraignment and before acceptance of his plea that his previous conviction of a crime would enhance his punishment, renders his conviction invalid, and ordering the defendant's re-arraignment and re-pleading).

(ii) Fundamental Rights

Some cases suggest that New York courts will not require you to use other available procedures if you are claiming a violation of a fundamental constitutional or statutory right.[137] However, courts have been reluctant to hold that a violation of a fundamental right alone can serve as a basis for a writ of habeas corpus; generally, courts will only bypass traditional proceedings, such as appeal, where "practicality and necessity" require it.[138] Some cases go so far as to state that habeas corpus may not be used to collaterally attack a judgment on constitutional grounds.[139]

(iii) New or Void Law

You may also petition the court on the ground that the statute under which you were prosecuted is unconstitutional.[140] It is very rare for courts to declare a statute unconstitutional. If the statute you were prosecuted under is declared unconstitutional, you are entitled to immediate release on a petition for a writ of habeas corpus. New York may also grant writs of habeas corpus when the law has changed, and the law used to convict you has been declared void. Finally, a court may grant a writ of habeas corpus if your claim involves the "violation of a fundamental constitutional right, which was not clearly recognized nor fully articulated" by the Court of Appeals until after all appeals of your conviction have been completed.[141]

---

137. See Roberts v. County Court of Wyoming County, 39 A.D.2d 246, 253, 333 N.Y.S.2d 882, 890 (4th Dept. 1972) ("[W]hile some form of alternative relief, such as coram nobis [codified in Article 440 of the C.P.L.R.], might also have been available to the relator in the present case, this should not foreclose the relator from proceeding by way of habeas corpus."); People ex rel. Rohrlich v. Follette, 20 N.Y.2d 297, 299–300, 229 N.E.2d 419, 420, 282 N.Y.S.2d 729, 730–731 (1967) (finding that habeas corpus is an appropriate proceeding to test the claim that the relator has been deprived of a fundamental constitutional or statutory right in a criminal prosecution, in this case, right to a trial by jury). Note that these are old cases and courts have become increasingly reluctant to review habeas corpus petitions if other procedures are available. For a list of constitutional and statutory rights in criminal cases, see JLM, Chapter 9, "Appealing Your Conviction or Sentence." For more information on other forms of alternative relief, such as Article 440 motions and coram nobis, see JLM, Chapter 20, "Using Article 440 of the New York Criminal Procedure Law to Attack Your Unfair Conviction or Illegal Sentence."

138. People ex rel. Keitt v. McMann, 18 N.Y.2d 257, 262, 220 N.E.2d 653, 655, 273 N.Y.S.2d 897, 900 (1966) (ruling that habeas corpus is not the preferred means of vindicating fundamental constitutional or statutory rights and that departure from traditional orderly proceedings, such as appeal, should be permitted only when dictated by reason of "practicality and necessity."); see also People ex rel. Murphy v. Leonardo, 179 A.D.2d 848, 848–49, 578 N.Y.S.2d 426, 427 (3d Dept. 1992) (holding that constitutional double jeopardy claim is not enough to support writ of habeas corpus when same claim is also pending on appeal); People ex rel. Hall v. LeFevre, 92 A.D.2d 956, 957, 460 N.Y.S.2d 640, 641 (3d Dept. 1983) (holding that the "facts of this case do not demonstrate a violation of petitioner's fundamental constitutional rights so egregious as to compel a departure from traditional orderly procedure."); People ex rel. Sales v. LeFevre, 93 A.D.2d 945, 946, 463 N.Y.S.2d 58, 59 (3d Dept. 1983) (habeas corpus may not be utilized to collaterally attack the judgment on constitutional grounds—in this case, the right of confrontation—and facts of case do not compel departure from traditional orderly procedure); People ex rel. Russell v. LeFevre, 59 A.D.2d 588, 588, 397 N.Y.S.2d 27, 28 (3d Dept. 1977) (dismissing habeas corpus petition alleging violation of constitutional right because habeas is not proper remedy for attacking the judgment of conviction and noting the petitioner should have filed an Article 440 motion).

139. See People ex rel. Sales v. LeFevre, 93 A.D.2d 945, 946, 463 N.Y.S.2d 58, 59 (3d Dept. 1983) (holding that habeas corpus may not be utilized to collaterally attack the judgment on constitutional grounds—in this case, the right of confrontation—and facts of case do not compel departure from traditional orderly procedure); People ex rel. Russell v. LeFevre, 59 A.D.2d 588, 588, 397 N.Y.S.2d 27, 28 (3d Dept. 1977) (dismissing habeas corpus petition alleging violation of constitutional right because habeas is not proper remedy for attacking the judgment of conviction and noting the petitioner should have filed an Article 440 motion).

140. See People ex rel. Haines v. Hunt, 242 N.Y.S. 105, 107–08, 229 A.D. 419, 420–22 (3d Dept. 1930) (holding that habeas corpus is proper remedy for relator convicted under unconstitutional statute).

141. See People ex rel. Rodriguez v. Harris, 84 A.D.2d 769, 770, 443 N.Y.S.2d 784, 785 (2d Dept. 1981). In Rodriguez, the petitioner filed for a writ of habeas corpus alleging a violation of the petitioner's right to counsel based on a Court of Appeals decision, People v. Rogers, 48 N.Y.2d 167, 422 N.Y.S.2d 18, 397 N.E.2d 709 (1979). The Rodriguez court upheld the lower court's dismissal of the writ, ruling that the Rogers decision (prohibiting police interrogation of defendant, in absence of counsel, on matters related or unrelated to pending charges for which defendant is already represented by counsel) could not be given retroactive application to petitioner's criminal case. People ex rel. Rodriguez v. Harris, 84 A.D.2d 769, 770, 443 N.Y.S.2d 784, 785 (2d Dept. 1981). Note that the court denied the petition in Rodriguez on narrow grounds. The Court of Appeals had previously held in People v. Pepper, 53 N.Y.2d 213, 221, 423 N.E.2d 366, 369, 440 N.Y.S.2d 889, 892 (1981), that in cases involving a defendant's right to counsel in pretrial encounters, retroactive application of a change in decisional law is limited to those cases still on direct review at the time the change in law occurred. See also People ex rel. Gallo v. Warden, 32 A.D.2d 1051, 1052, 303 N.Y.S.2d 752, 753 (2d Dept. 1969) (holding that habeas corpus proceeding was proper for reviewing propriety of imposition of consecutive sentence where the petition was based upon decisions rendered after petitioner's appeal).

(iv) Ineffective Counsel

In New York, you cannot use habeas corpus proceedings to claim ineffective assistance of counsel.[142] This is because the remedy would be a new trial and not release from custody and habeas petitions are for getting released from custody. Filing an Article 440.10 motion would be the appropriate cause of action.[143]

(v) New Evidence

In New York, if you wish to raise the issue of new evidence, you must file an Article 440 motion.[144] See JLM, Chapter 20, "Using Article 440 of the New York Criminal Procedure Law to Attack Your Unfair Conviction or Illegal Sentence" for more information on how to do this.

(vi) Unreasonable Delay

A court may grant a writ of habeas corpus if there has been an "unreasonable delay" in the disposition (settlement) of an Article 440 motion[145] or if your appeal has been pending for an unusually long time.[146]

In addition, you may petition for habeas corpus if waiting for the appeal of your conviction will cause you to face a longer prison term.[147] In one case, a prisoner petitioned for habeas corpus on the grounds that he was wrongfully imprisoned in New York. The prisoner's commitment order indicated that he should be imprisoned in Alabama, where he had earlier escaped from prison. The court granted the writ of habeas corpus even though an appeal that raised the issue of wrongful imprisonment was pending, because the appeal was not due to be heard by the court until later in the year, and none of the time that the prisoner served in New York would count against his Alabama sentence.[148]

(vii) Violations of the Conditions of Your Sentence (New York Only)

You may also petition for a writ of habeas corpus if the conditions of your imprisonment are worse than the conditions authorized by your judgment of conviction or by the New York and U.S. Constitutions.[149] For example, you may petition for habeas corpus on the grounds that:

(1) You are being denied the rehabilitation, care, or treatment required by your sentence;[150]

(2) You were arbitrarily and illegally transferred to an institution for the criminally insane;[151]

---

142. For more information about ineffective assistance of counsel claims, see JLM, Chapter 12, "Appealing Your Conviction Based on Ineffective Assistance of Counsel." See also Application of Jones, 34 Misc. 2d 564, 565, 227 N.Y.S.2d 1002, 1004 (Sup. Ct. Special Term New York County 1962) (denying habeas petition because relator was represented by counsel and further adding habeas is "not the proper remedy for testing the requirements of due process or whether relator was properly represented by assigned counsel").

143. See People v. Martin, 52 A.D.2d 988, 989, 383 N.Y.S.2d 425, 428 (3d Dept. 1976) (holding that "in the absence of a record concerning adequacy of representation" an Article 440 proceeding is the correct place to bring a motion regarding ineffectiveness of counsel); People ex rel. Hall v. LeFevre, 460 N.Y.S. 2d 640, 641, 92 A.D.2d 956, 957 (3d Dept. 1983) (holding that issues of inadequacy of counsel must proceed using a 440 motion). For more information on filing Article 440.10 motions, see JLM, Chapter 20, "Using Article 440 of the New York Criminal Procedure Law to Attack Your Unfair Conviction or Illegal Sentence."

144. See People v. Taylor, 246 A.D.2d 410, 411, 668 N.Y.S.2d 583, 584 (1st Dept. 1998) (holding that the power to set aside a verdict on the grounds of new evidence is derived from N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 440.10(1)(g) and listing the six criteria that new evidence must meet).

145. See People ex rel. Anderson v. Warden, New York City Corr. Inst. for Men, 68 Misc. 2d 463, 468, 325 N.Y.S.2d 829, 835 (Sup. Ct. Bronx County 1971) ("[I]f there is an unreasonable delay in the disposition of an article 440 motion, the defendant can, perhaps, properly bring a writ of habeas corpus.").

146. See People ex rel. Lee v. Smith, 58 A.D.2d 987, 987, 397 N.Y.S.2d 266, 267 (4th Dept. 1977) (granting a hearing on the merits of petitioner's habeas corpus petition, even though an appeal was pending, because the petitioner's appeal had been pending for more than four years).

147. See State ex rel. Harbin v. Wilmot, 104 Misc. 2d 272, 275, 428 N.Y.S.2d 152, 154–55 (Sup. Ct. Chemung County 1980) (finding the prisoner's current place of incarceration resulted in a longer term of imprisonment).

148. See State ex rel. Harbin v. Wilmot, 104 Misc. 2d 272, 275, 428 N.Y.S.2d 152, 154–55 (Sup. Ct. Chemung County 1980) (finding the prisoner's current place of incarceration resulted in a longer term of imprisonment).

149. See People ex rel. Brown v. Johnston, 9 N.Y.2d 482, 485, 174 N.E.2d 725, 726, 215 N.Y.S.2d 44, 45 (1961) ("[I]t seems quite obvious that any further restraint in excess of that permitted by the judgment or constitutional guarantees should be subject to inquiry.").

150. See People ex rel. Smith v. La Vallee, 29 A.D.2d 248, 250, 287 N.Y.S.2d 601, 604 (4th Dept. 1968) (petitioner with an indeterminate sentence is entitled to psychiatric treatment and examination).

151. See People ex rel. Brown v. Johnston, 9 N.Y.2d 482, 485, 174 N.E.2d 725, 726, 215 N.Y.S.2d 44, 45 (1961) (holding that lower court wrongly refused to consider petition for habeas corpus that challenged the transfer of a convicted rapist from a prison to a mental hospital).

(3) You have been found not guilty because of mental illness[152] and are being held at an institution for the criminally insane, but you have not received a hearing or proceeding to evaluate your mental health as required by New York Criminal Procedure Law § 330.20;[153]
(4) You have been found not guilty because of mental illness and are being held at an institution for the criminally insane, but are no longer suffering from mental illness and are thus entitled to release, or are no longer dangerous and are thus entitled to transfer to a non-secure facility as required by New York Criminal Procedure Law § 330.20;[154]
(5) You are held in a different prison than the one on the sentencing court's commitment order;[155] or
(6) You were transferred to solitary confinement as a result of unconstitutional discrimination.[156]

Wardens and the Department of Correctional Services have wide discretion in determining the conditions of your incarceration, and few forms of punishment inside the prison violate your constitutional rights or the conditions of your sentence.[157]

(c) Probation or Parole

(i) Preliminary Revocation Hearings

When the Department of Correctional Services tries to revoke your parole, you are entitled to a hearing. You may petition for habeas corpus if your preliminary parole revocation hearing was not conducted in accordance with the law. You are entitled to the following:

(1) Notice in writing of the charges against you within three days of the execution of the warrant for your retaking and temporary detention, or within five days of the execution of the warrant if you are detained in another state and were not there through an out-of-state parolee supervision agreement;[158]

---

152. This is also known as "not guilty by reason of insanity."

153. See People ex rel. Thorpe v. Von Holden, 63 N.Y.2d 546, 555, 473 N.E.2d 14, 18, 483 N.Y.S.2d 662, 666 (1984) (finding that a habeas petition is proper to test whether petitioner may remain in custody when Department of Mental Health Commissioner has failed to comply with time, notice, and hearing requirements for statutory retention order). If your petition is granted for this reason, the court will order your release or your transfer to a non-secure facility, unless there is evidence of a dangerous mental disorder. If the court has ordered your release, the State Commissioner of Mental Health or the Mental Retardation and Developmental Disabilities may, however, apply to the court to have you remain at the institution. This application may be granted if it is immediately filed and processed. See State ex rel. Henry L. v. Hawes, 174 Misc. 2d 929, 933, 667 N.Y.S.2d 212, 216 (N.Y. Cty. Ct. 1997) (granting petitioner's habeas writ and ordering petitioner immediately transferred to non-secure facility because order of confinement had expired and no application for order's extension had been made in violation of N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 330.20).

154. See McGraw v. Wack, 220 A.D.2d 291, 292, 632 N.Y.S.2d 135, 136 (1st Dept. 1995) (finding that writ of habeas corpus is proper proceeding for petitioner to seek transfer to non-secure facility or release); People ex rel. Schreiner v. Tekben, 160 Misc. 2d 724, 727, 611 N.Y.S.2d 734, 736 (Sup. Ct. Orange County 1994) (holding that the habeas corpus proceeding was an appropriate mechanism for transfer from a secure psychiatric facility to a non-secure facility), aff'd sub nom. People ex rel. Richard S. v. Tekben, 219 A.D.2d 609, 610, 631 N.Y.S.2d 524, 524 (2d Dept. 1995) (finding that habeas petition is proper mechanism to seek transfer from a secure to a non-secure facility).

155. See State ex rel. Harbin v. Wilmot, 104 Misc. 2d 272, 274, 428 N.Y.S.2d 152, 154 (N.Y. Sup. Ct. 1980) (holding that a prisoner was illegally imprisoned within New York State when he was held in a prison in New York rather than the Alabama prison that was specified on his commitment order by the sentencing court).

156. See People ex rel. Rockey v. Krueger, 62 Misc. 2d 135, 136, 306 N.Y.S.2d 359, 360 (Sup. Ct. Nassau County 1969) (finding placement of Muslim prisoner in solitary confinement because he would not shave his beard for religious reasons was unconstitutional discrimination, and ordered release of prisoner from solitary confinement); see also JLM, Chapter 16, "Using 42 U.S.C. § 1983 and 28 U.S.C. § 1331 to Obtain Relief from Violations of Federal Law," JLM, Chapter 18, "Your Rights at Prison Disciplinary Proceedings," and JLM, Chapter 27, "Religious Freedom in Prison."

157. See, e.g., People ex rel. France v. Coughlin, 99 A.D.2d 599, 471 N.Y.S.2d 695 (3d Dept. 1984) (denying habeas petition because administrative segregation of prisoner was well within terms of confinement ordinarily contemplated by prison sentence, petitioner made no showing that confinement violated his constitutional rights, and petitioner failed to comply with statutory requirements); People ex rel. Jacobson v. Warden of Brooklyn House of Det., 77 A.D.2d 937, 431 N.Y.S.2d 114 (2d Dept. 1980) (upholding warden's denial of contact visits with person who allegedly helped in an earlier escape on grounds that such restriction is outside the scope of habeas corpus relief).

158. N.Y. Exec. Law § 259-i(3)(c)(iii) (McKinney 2009). Even if you are not given notice of your parole violation within three days of your hearing, that is not reason enough to grant a petition for habeas corpus. You must also show that the lack of notice somehow hurt your ability to prepare for the hearing. See People ex rel. Williams v. Walsh, 241 A.D.2d 979, 661 N.Y.S.2d 371 (4th Dept. 1997) (finding defendant not entitled to restoration of parole or dismissal of parole violation warrant based on one day delay in serving statutory notice and failure to comply with three day notice rule where the preliminary hearing was held in a timely manner, defendant did not request adjournment to prepare for the hearing or contend that he lacked adequate notice of basis for parole violation, and did not contend that he was

(2) A hearing conducted within fifteen days after the warrant has been executed, as required by New York Executive Law Section 259-i(3)(c)(i);[159]
(3) Evidence introduced at your preliminary parole revocation hearing sufficient to provide probable cause[160] to believe that you had violated a condition of your parole;[161] and
(4) To appear and speak on your own behalf, present witnesses, or cross-examine witnesses (question the witnesses against you).[162]

Any denial of the above requirements may be grounds for a habeas petition in New York. Note that you are not entitled to a preliminary parole revocation hearing if you were convicted of a new crime.[163]

(ii) Final Parole Revocation Hearings

You may petition for habeas corpus if your final parole revocation hearing was not conducted in accordance with the law. You are entitled to the following:

(1) A hearing that was conducted within ninety days of the probable cause hearing; [164] prejudiced by the one day delay); see also People ex rel. Walker v. New York State Bd. of Parole, 98 A.D.2d 33, 33–34, 469 N.Y.S.2d 780, 781 (2d Dept. 1983) (finding judicial intervention not appropriate until final revocation hearing conducted, where final hearing has been scheduled within 90 day period).

---

159. N.Y. Exec. Law § 259-i(3)(c)(i) (McKinney 2009); see also People ex rel. Richman v. Warden, Bronx House of Det., 122 Misc. 2d 957, 958, 472 N.Y.S.2d 291, 292 (Sup. Ct. Bronx County 1984) (ruling that the only appropriate remedy for violation of parolee's due process rights by failing to afford him proper preliminary parole revocation hearing within 15 days of service of notice of parole violation is vacating the warrant and reinstatement to parole).

The court may, however, find that the delay is not the state's fault and dismiss the habeas corpus petition. See People ex rel. Hampton v. Warden, Rikers Island Corr. Facility, 211 A.D.2d 566, 621 N.Y.S.2d 580 (1st Dept. 1995) (dismissing habeas petition where timely hearing was postponed a few days due to closure of courthouse during snowstorm and then rescheduled to allow probationer to attend). In addition, the law does not require that the hearing be completed within 15 days.

Finally, a court may find that you have waived your right to a timely hearing. See People ex rel. Miller v. Walters, 60 N.Y.2d 899, 901, 458 N.E.2d 1251, 1252, 470 N.Y.S.2d 574, 575 (1983) (denying petition because petitioner waived preliminary hearing and thereby waived right to challenge board's failure to afford him a timely preliminary hearing). However, the waiver must be clearly made or else it will be invalid and parolee will be entitled to a timely hearing. See People ex rel. Melendez v. Warden of Rikers Island Corr. Facility, 214 A.D.2d 301, 302, 624 N.Y.S.2d 580, 581 (1st Dept. 1995) (ruling that the parolee does not waive his right to a timely hearing where the state does not prove that the waiver was clearly made, and ordering that petitioner be reinstated to parole).

160. "Probable cause" in this case means reasonable cause, or reasonable grounds for believing, based on existing facts, that you have violated your parole.

161. N.Y. Exec. Law § 259-i(3)(c)(vi) (McKinney 2009); see also People ex rel. Davis v. New York State Div. of Parole, 149 Misc. 2d 741, 744, 566 N.Y.S.2d 469, 471 (Sup. Ct. Westchester County 1991) (ruling that there was not probable cause to believe that the parolee violated a condition of his parole in an important respect where the parolee failed, during 50 minute lunch break, to notify parole officer of arrest that occurred 95 hours earlier despite requirement that officer be notified immediately); People ex rel. Glenn v. Bantum, 132 Misc. 2d 676, 678, 505 N.Y.S.2d 359, 361 (Sup. Ct. Bronx County 1986) (holding that there was no legal evidence presented at preliminary hearing to support probable cause that relator was in possession of drugs where sole evidence was hearsay testimony of parole officer's conversations with arresting officer, and parole officer was unable to testify that substances in question were recovered from relator).

162. See People ex rel. Deyver by Weinstein v. Travis, 172 Misc. 2d 83, 85, 657 N.Y.S.2d 306 (Sup. Ct. Erie County 1997) (granting petitioner's habeas petition and finding that, to preserve petitioner's statutory right to effective cross-examination, petitioner was entitled to production of parole officer's notes, upon which parole officer had relied in testifying at hearing,).

163. See N.Y. Exec. Law § 259-i(3)(c)(i) (McKinney 2009); People ex rel. Felder v. Warden of Queens House of Det. for Men, 173 Misc. 2d 1029, 1030, 662 N.Y.S.2d 729, 731 (Sup. Ct. Queens County 1997) (ruling that parolee was not entitled to preliminary parole hearing on his violation where he had been convicted of a felony while released on parole).

164. N.Y. Exec. Law § 259-i(3)(f)(i) (McKinney 2009); see People ex rel. Ford v. LaPaglia, 176 Misc. 2d 912, 914, 674 N.Y.S.2d 565, 566 (County Ct. Ulster County 1998) (ruling that statutory "90-day time limit must be adhered to strictly, absent any of the statutory exceptions"); People ex rel. Brown v. New York State Div. of Parole, 70 N.Y.2d 391, 402, 516 N.E.2d 194, 200, 521 N.Y.S.2d 657, 663 (1987) (vacating parole violation warrant and dismissing parole violation proceeding where revocation hearing was not held within 90 days).

However, the court may find that the hearing was timely if the delay was due to the parolee. See People ex rel. McAllister v. Leonardo, 182 A.D.2d 1031, 1033, 583 N.Y.S.2d 540, 542 (3d Dept. 1992) (ruling final parole revocation hearing was timely, even though held more than 90 days after probable cause determination, since delay resulted when no attorney was present for petitioner at timely scheduled date and petitioner requested representation, and additional delay was at request of petitioner's counsel). If you were incarcerated out of state, the court may also find that your hearing was timely even if it was held after 90 days from the probable cause determination. See N.Y. Exec. Law § 259-i(3)(a)(iv) (McKinney 2005) ("Where the alleged violator is detained in another state … the warrant will not be deemed to be executed until the alleged violator is detained exclusively on the … [parole] warrant."); People ex rel. Johnson v.

(2) Representation by a lawyer at the hearing;[165]
(3) Written notice of the date, place, and time of the hearing given to you and your attorney at least fourteen days prior to the scheduled hearing date;[166]
(4) An opportunity to confront and cross-examine witnesses against you, unless there was good cause for witnesses not to attend the hearing (as determined by the hearing officer);[167] and
(5) Proof of your parole violation by a preponderance of the evidence.[168]

Any denial of the above requirements may be grounds for a habeas petition. You may also petition if: (1) you were denied your fundamental constitutional right to be present at the hearing;[169] or (2) you requested a local parole revocation hearing, and your request was denied.[170]

Warden, Manhattan House of Det., 178 A.D.2d 331, 579 N.Y.S.2d 1 (1st Dept. 1991) (ruling defendant's final revocation hearing was not untimely, particularly as he was never detained "exclusively" on basis of parole revocation warrant).

165. N.Y. Exec. Law, § 259-i(3)(f)(v) (McKinney 2009); see also People ex rel. Brown v. Smith, 115 A.D.2d. 255, 496 N.Y.S.2d 123 (4th Dept. 1985) (holding that a parolee has the right to counsel upon a final parole revocation hearing). You can waive (give up) this right if you state that you do not want or need counsel. See People ex rel. Martinez v. Walters, 99 A.D.2d 476, 470 N.Y.S.2d 56 (2d Dept. 1984) (finding that prisoner had waived his right to counsel at his revocation hearing because the decision was knowing, intelligent, and voluntary; finding that the right to counsel may be waived in the absence of counsel); People ex rel. Perez v. Warden, 139 A.D.2d 477, 478, 527 N.Y.S.2d 233, 234 (1st Dept. 1988) (holding parolee's waiver of counsel ineffective as the hearing officer failed to conduct sufficient inquiry to reasonably assure that parolee appreciated dangers and disadvantages of waiving right to counsel).

166. N.Y. Exec. Law, § 259-i(3)(f)(iii) (McKinney 2009); see also People ex rel. Rivera v. New York State Div. of Parole, 83 A.D.2d 918, 919, 442 N.Y.S.2d 511 (3d Dept. 1981) (granting petitioner new final parole revocation hearing because notice of time and date of hearing was mailed five days before the hearing in violation of state law, which requires 14 days' notice). Note that an adjournment [postponement] of the final parole revocation hearing does not require a new 14-day notice to parolee. See People ex rel. Crooks v. New York State Bd. of Parole, 194 A.D.2d 376, 598 N.Y.S.2d 263 (1st Dept. 1993).

167. N.Y. Exec. Law § 259-i(3)(f)(iv)B(v) (McKinney 2009); s*ee also* People ex rel. McGee v. Walters, 62 N.Y.2d 317, 319, 465 N.E.2d 342, 343, 476 N.Y.S.2d 803, 804 (1984) (ruling that a parolee's right to confront adverse witnesses at parole revocation hearings should not be "underestimated or ignored," but that "a hearing examiner may, nevertheless, upon a specific finding of good cause, permit the introduction of adverse hearsay statements without affording the parolee an opportunity to confront the declarant"); see also People ex rel. Martin v. Warden, Ossining Corr. Facility, 133 A.D.2d 134, 135, 518 N.Y.S.2d 669, 670 (2d Dept. 1987) (ruling that good cause existed for dispensing with production of New Jersey parole officer who was supervising petitioner's parole and not allowing confrontation at parole hearing where state of New Jersey had an established and firm policy of refusing to allow its supervising parole officers to travel to other states for parole revocation hearings, and petitioner refused to submit interrogatories to New Jersey officer).

168. N.Y. Exec. Law § 259-i(3)(f)(viii) (McKinney 2009); see also People ex rel. Saafir v. Mantello, 163 A.D.2d 824, 825, 558 N.Y.S.2d 356, 357 (4th Dept. 1990) (ruling that uncertified report of parolee's drug tests was insufficient to demonstrate violation of parole by a preponderance of the evidence). You will waive this ground if you do not raise it in your habeas petition. In other words, if you do not state in your habeas petition that your parole violation was unproven, you cannot complain about it at a later time. People ex rel. McWhinney v. Smith, 219 A.D.2d 879, 632 N.Y.S.2d 40 (4th Dept. 1995). Also remember that even if you do not think that there is enough evidence for your parole to be revoked, you must wait until after the final revocation hearing before you file your habeas petition. See People ex rel. Wallace v. New York State Bd. of Parole, 111 A.D.2d 940, 941, 491 N.Y.S.2d 50, 51 (2d Dept. 1985) (dismissing the petition because it was filed before the final revocation hearing).

169. See People ex rel. Johnson v. New York State Bd. of Parole, 98 A.D.2d 949, 470 N.Y.S.2d 62 (4th Dept. 1983) (reinstating petition for habeas alleging that final parole revocation hearing was held without petitioner present); In re Schwartz v. Warden, New York State Corr. Facility at Ossining, 82 A.D.2d 870, 871, 440 N.Y.S.2d 270, 272 (2d Dept. 1981) (finding that parolee, who invoked his right to counsel and who refused to attend revocation hearing due to inability of his attorney to attend the hearing, did not waive his right to appear; thus, it was error for hearing officer to conduct the hearing without parolee). Note, however, that a court may find that you have waived this right. If you are called to a hearing you must appear even if you have applied for an adjournment, otherwise you have waived your appearance. See, e.g., People ex rel. Rodriguez v. Warden, 163 A.D.2d 206, 207, 558 N.Y.S.2d 59 (1st Dept. 1990) (holding that prisoner knowingly and intelligently waived his right to be present at final parole revocation hearing by persistently refusing to appear despite repeated efforts by Division of Parole to produce him); People ex rel. McFadden v. New York State Div. of Parole, 79 A.D.2d 952, 955, 435 N.Y.S.2d 589, 592 (1st Dept. 1981) (petitioner who failed to appear on three occasions at a parole revocation hearing waived the right to be present).

170. N.Y. Exec. Law § 259-i(3)(e)(i) (McKinney 2009) ("If the alleged violator requests a local revocation hearing, he shall be given a revocation hearing reasonably near the place of the alleged violation or arrest if he has not been convicted of a crime committed while under supervision."); s*ee* People ex rel. Campolito v. Portuondo, 248 A.D.2d 768, 769, 669 N.Y.S.2d 726, 727 (3d Dept. 1998) (finding that where a prisoner had not requested a local parole revocation hearing, he was not entitled to one); People ex rel. Madison v. Sullivan, 142 A.D.2d 621, 530 N.Y.S.2d 43 (2d Dept. 1988) (finding that where neither prisoner nor his counsel had requested a local parole revocation hearing, the New York State Board of Parole was not required to arrange one for him).

Note that you are not entitled to a final parole revocation hearing if your parole was revoked because of a new felony conviction.[171] You may not petition for a writ of habeas corpus for the above reasons if you would remain imprisoned for other convictions.[172]

(d) Subject Matter Jurisdiction

In New York, supreme and county courts have jurisdiction to try felonies.[173] District, city, town, and village courts have jurisdiction over misdemeanors.[174] If you are convicted by a court that does not have authority to try your offense, you may petition for habeas corpus.[175] As stated above, a court may also lack subject matter jurisdiction if the allegations made in your indictment are in some way insufficient.

This issue should normally be raised on appeal or in an Article 440 motion; but, provided that you give a compelling reason why the court should depart from regular procedure, you may petition for habeas corpus if:

(1) An indictment or information was not filed against you;[176]
(2) Your indictment failed to state facts that made up every necessary element, or part, of your crime, and the court was entirely stripped of jurisdiction as a result;[177] or

---

171. See N.Y. Exec. Law § 259-i(3)(d)(iii) (McKinney 2009); s*ee also* People ex rel. Ward v. Russi, 219 A.D.2d 862, 632 N.Y.S.2d 45 (4th Dept. 1995) (holding that the relator is not entitled to parole revocation hearing where violation was due to a new felony conviction); O'Quinn v. New York State Bd. of Parole, 132 Misc. 2d 92, 94, 503 N.Y.S.2d 483, 485 (Sup. Ct. N.Y. County 1986) (noting statute barring right to final revocation hearing where parolee has been convicted of felony while on parole does not violate due process).

172. See People ex rel. Cook v. Mantello, 136 A.D.2d 891, 525 N.Y.S.2d 79 (4th Dept. 1988) (dismissing habeas petition challenging the timeliness of petitioner's parole revocation hearing because the petitioner was incarcerated as the result of an unrelated conviction and would not be eligible for immediate release from custody should he have succeeded on merits of habeas proceeding); People ex rel. Linares v. Dalsheim, 107 A.D.2d 728, 728, 484 N.Y.S.2d 89, 90 (2d Dept. 1985) (noting that habeas corpus was not available since petitioner was incarcerated due to a subsequent felony conviction and would not have been entitled to immediate release).
You may, however, bring an Article 78 proceeding to challenge Parole Board decisions even if you will remain incarcerated for other convictions. See People ex rel. Mack v. Reid, 113 A.D.2d 962, 963, 494 N.Y.S.2d 25, 26–27 (2d Dept. 1985) (stating that petitioner who had raised the issue of untimeliness before Parole Board should bring Article 78 proceeding after Board decides against him). Be aware that a four-month statute of limitations applies to Article 78 petitions. See, e.g., Soto v. N.Y. State Bd. of Parole, 107 A.D.2d 693, 694, 484 N.Y.S.2d 49, 50 (2d Dept. 1985) (dismissing Article 78 petition filed three years after the parole revocation hearing because it violated four-month statute of limitations for Article 78 proceedings). See Chapter 22 of the JLM for a discussion of Article 78 proceedings.

173. Felonies are offenses that are punishable by a prison term of more than one year. N.Y. Penal Law § 10.00(5) (McKinney 2009).

174. Misdemeanors are offenses punishable by fine and/or a brief jail sentence of more than 15 days, but less than a year. N.Y. Penal Law § 10.00(4) (McKinney 2009).

175. See Clifford v. Krueger, 59 Misc. 2d 87, 93, 297 N.Y.S.2d 990, 997 (Sup. Ct. Nassau County 1969) (granting petitioner's writ of habeas corpus, finding the conviction illegal because the crime of which he was convicted was an offense over which Family Court had exclusive original jurisdiction, and transferring the matter to Family Court).

176. See People ex rel. Battista v. Christian, 249 N.Y. 314, 321, 164 N.E. 111, 113 (1928) (granting habeas corpus petition because there was no presentment or indictment of a grand jury). Note that an indictment no longer has to be filed for every crime; the prosecutor may file an information instead. In November 1973, the New York Constitution was amended to provide an exception to the indictment requirement where the accused is charged with an offense that is not punishable by death or life imprisonment. N.Y. Const. art. I, § 6. This amendment is explained in People v. Trueluck, 88 N.Y.2d 546, 548, 670 N.E.2d 977, 978, 647 N.Y.S.2d 476, 477 (1996) (noting that a defendant may waive an indictment and consent to be prosecuted by a superior court information where: (1) the local criminal court has held the defendant for the action of a Grand Jury; (2) the defendant is not charged with a class A felony, and (3) the District Attorney consents to the waiver of indictment) (quoting N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 195.10(1) (McKinney 2007).

177. For example, if your indictment for 1st degree murder fails to describe acts that showed that you intended to kill another person, the court does not have jurisdiction to convict you of 1st degree murder, because intent to kill is a necessary element of 1st degree murder. However, the court does have jurisdiction to convict you of 2nd degree murder, since intent is not a necessary element of 2nd degree murder. Therefore, in this case, you can challenge your conviction of 1st degree murder, but you cannot challenge your conviction of 2nd degree murder in a petition for habeas corpus. See People ex rel. Williams v. La Vallee, 30 A.D.2d 1034, 294 N.Y.S.2d 824 (4th Dept. 1968) (noting that indictment did not allege the 1st degree murder elements of premeditation or depraved mind, but this did not strip the court of jurisdiction because the allegations were sufficient to support a charge of 2nd degree murder); People ex rel. Wysokowski v. Conboy, 19 A.D.2d 663, 664, 241 N.Y.S.2d 245, 236 (3d Dept. 1963) (denying habeas corpus petition because simplified form of indictment that omitted certain facts did not deprive court of jurisdiction).

(3) The court convicted you of a crime not included in the indictment (this does not include lesser included offenses of the offenses[178] charged in your indictment). You may waive this claim, however, if you fail to object to the submission of the offense at your trial.[179]

In New York, you may also petition for a writ of habeas corpus to challenge the court's subject matter jurisdiction with respect to the validity of your conviction. A court will review your petition regardless of whether you raised it on appeal only if the issue is very important and will invalidate your conviction if the habeas petition is decided in your favor.[180] In one case, for example, a prisoner petitioned for habeas corpus on the ground that attempted escape could not serve as the basis for a felony murder conviction because attempted escape was only classified as a misdemeanor, not a felony.[181] Though the prisoner had not raised this issue in a second appeal from his conviction (he did raise it in his first appeal), the court granted a writ of habeas corpus because of the importance of the issue and its impact upon the validity of the conviction and sentence for murder. The court believed that the issue needed to be resolved and noted that it would have to reverse the prisoner's murder conviction if the court resolved the issue in the prisoner's favor.[182]

3. How to File Your Petition

(a) When to File

In New York, before you file your petition, make sure you cannot bring any of these proceedings:

(1) Appeal (refer to JLM, Chapter 9, "Appealing Your Conviction or Sentence");
(2) Article 440 (refer to JLM, Chapter 20, "Using Article 440 of the New York Criminal Procedure Law to Attack Your Unfair Conviction or Illegal Sentence"); or
(3) Article 78 (refer to JLM, Chapter 22, "How to Challenge Administrative Decisions Using Article 78 of the New York Civil Practice Law and Rules").

(b) Where to File

In New York, you may petition any of the following courts or judges for a writ of habeas corpus:

(1) The supreme court in the judicial district in which you are imprisoned;
(2) The appellate division of the department in which you are imprisoned;
(3) Any justice of the supreme court; or
(4) A county judge within the county in which you are imprisoned, or a county judge from an adjoining county, if no judge within the county can or will issue a writ.[183]

(c) What to Include in Your Petition

The habeas corpus petition you submit should include the following information:

---

178. See JLM, Chapter 9, "Appealing Your Conviction or Sentence," for an explanation of lesser included offense.

179. For example, if your indictment charged you with murder, but the judge announced that he or she also would consider whether you were guilty of robbery (which is not a lesser included offense within the crime of murder), and you were subsequently convicted of robbery, you may challenge your conviction only if you objected at your trial to the judge's intention to consider robbery. See People ex rel. Tanner v. Vincent, 44 A.D.2d 170, 173–74, 354 N.Y.S.2d 145, 148 (2d Dept. 1974) (denying habeas petition where petitioner failed to raise objection on appeal to robbery conviction where petitioner had been indicted for common law murder, felony murder, and possession of a weapon, but convicted of robbery, which is not a lesser included offense within the crime of felony murder).

180. See People ex rel. Culhane v. Sullivan, 139 A.D.2d 315, 317–18, 531 N.Y.S.2d 287, 288 (2d Dept. 1988) (refusing to grant a writ of habeas corpus where the information included sufficient showings of intent and overt acts which would have resulted in the commission of the crime under state law).

181. Felony murder is a rule of criminal law which holds a defendant responsible for any killing that occurred during the commission of a felony.

182. See People ex rel. Culhane v. Sullivan, 139 A.D.2d 315, 317, 531 N.Y.S.2d 287, 288 (2d Dept. 1988) (refusing to grant a writ of habeas corpus where the information included sufficient showings of intent and overt acts which would have resulted in the commission of the crime under state law); People ex rel. Bartlam v. Murphy, 9 N.Y.2d 550, 553–54, 175 N.E.2d 336, 337–38, 215 N.Y.S.2d 753, 755B56 (1961) (ruling in favor of relator in habeas corpus petition and ordering hearing on whether relator was denied right to be present when jury received further instructions, which is an issue essential to the court's jurisdiction to proceed with trial). But see People ex rel. Lupo v. Fay, 13 N.Y.2d 253, 257, 196 N.E.2d 56, 58–59, 246 N.Y.S.2d 399, 402 (1963) (denying writ of habeas corpus and holding that the defendant's absence when counsel made a motion to discharge jury did not affect any substantial rights).

183. N.Y. C.P.L.R. 7002(b)(1)B(5) (McKinney 2009). Note that if you are being held in a New York City detention center, you may also file with any justice of the supreme court of the county in which your charge is pending, in addition to the above-listed options. For example, an inmate being held on Rikers Island in the Bronx may file a writ of habeas corpus with a justice of the Supreme Court in New York County (Manhattan) if he has a charge pending there.

(1) The name of your prison and of the warden or official imprisoning you, if you know their names;
(2) A copy of the mandate by which you are detained or an explanation of why you could not obtain a copy of the mandate;[184]
(3) The reason you are imprisoned, to the best of your knowledge;
(4) An explanation of why your imprisonment is illegal;[185]
(5) The result of any appeal from the trial court's judgment, or a statement that you did not take an appeal, if that is the case;
(6) The date, result, and name of the court or judge to whom you previously petitioned for a writ, plus a statement of any new facts in your current petition that you did not raise in earlier petitions. If you have not petitioned for a writ of habeas corpus before, state this fact in your petition;[186] and
(7) The facts that authorize the judge to act, if the petition is made to a county judge outside of the county where you are detained.

This is not a complete list. You should consult New York Civil Practice Law and Rules 7002(c) for other information that you must include in your habeas corpus petition. If you do not include the required information, a court will dismiss your petition, unless you can show some convincing reason why you could not include the required information.[187] One reason, for example, might be that you were deprived of legal material and writing instruments.[188]

You do not have to enclose a copy of a writ of habeas corpus with your petition. However, you may want to include a copy of the writ, because this may allow the court to issue the writ sooner. If you do enclose a writ, fill in whatever information you can provide.

(d) How to File

Write out and then type a petition and a writ. Sign the petition in the presence of a notary public, who will put his seal on the papers. By "notarizing" the petition, you are swearing that all statements in the document are true.[189] Send the documents to the court specified above in Section 2, "Where to File." Appendix II of the JLM provides the addresses for New York courts.

4. Your Right to Counsel for Your Petition

The U.S. Supreme Court has held you have no federal constitutional right to counsel in state habeas corpus proceedings.[190] But, New York state law may provide you the right to counsel. If you are indigent and incapable of obtaining your own lawyer, you often have a right to a court-appointed lawyer for a hearing on your habeas petition, provided you request that the court appoint a lawyer.[191] To do so, you must complete

---

184. A mandate is a written order of the court directing the warden to enforce the sentence against you. N.Y. Gen. Constr. Law § 28-a (McKinney 2009). Under N.Y. Pub. Off. Law § 89 (McKinney 2009), the superintendent or warden of your prison should make the mandate available to you upon your written request.

185. You should support your claim that your imprisonment is illegal with as many facts as possible. If you merely state that your imprisonment is illegal without detailing why, a court will probably dismiss your petition. See People ex rel. Boyd v. LeFevre, 92 A.D.2d 1042, 1042, 461 N.Y.S.2d 667, 667 (3d Dept. 1983) (upholding dismissal of habeas corpus petition where the petition contained only bare, conclusory assertions that defendant's rights were violated without any facts alleged to support such claims.)

186. If you fail to detail prior applications for a writ of habeas corpus, the court may dismiss your petition. See People ex rel. Christianson v. Berry, 165 A.D.2d 961, 962, 561 N.Y.S.2d 848, 849 (3d Dept. 1990) (denying petitioner's application for writ of habeas corpus because it was fatally defective where, among other things, it failed to indicate petitioner's previous applications for habeas corpus relief). If you have already petitioned for habeas corpus unsuccessfully and your current petition does not contain any new grounds for relief, a court will only issue a writ in the extremely rare circumstances when the "ends of justice" require it. N.Y. C.P.L.R. 7003(b) (McKinney 1998); s*ee* People ex rel. Taylor v. Jones, 171 A.D.2d 906, 906, 566 N.Y.S.2d 779, 780 (3d Dept. 1991) (denying petitioner's application for writ of habeas corpus because it failed to indicate his previous applications for such relief).

187. See Matter of Tullis v. Kelly, 154 A.D.2d 926, 926, 547 N.Y.S.2d 259, 259 (4th Dept. 1989) (dismissing habeas petition because it failed to comply with procedural requirements of N.Y. C.P.L.R. 7002(c)); People ex rel. Kagan v. La Vallee, 49 A.D.2d 986, 986, 374 N.Y.S.2d 408, 408 (3d Dept. 1975) (affirming dismissal of habeas petition where application did not comply with provisions of N.Y. C.P.L.R. 7002(c) and was therefore insufficient on its face).

188. See People ex rel. La Rocca v. Conboy, 40 A.D.2d 736, 736, 336 N.Y.S.2d 724, 725 (3d Dept. 1972) (noting that "deficiencies in the petition might be overlooked where compelling reasons appeared from the papers," such as deprivation of legal material and writing material).

189. Notarizing your petition satisfies the "verification" requirement. N.Y. C.P.L.R. 7002(c) (McKinney 2009).

190. See Pennsylvania v. Finley, 481 U.S. 551, 555, 107 S. Ct. 1990, 1993, 95 L. Ed. 2d 539, 545 (1987) ("[T]he right to appointed counsel extends to the first appeal of right and no further.").

191. See People ex rel. Brock v. La Vallee, 42 A.D.2d 629, 629–30, 344 N.Y.S.2d 513, 515 (3d Dept. 1973) (holding

"poor person's papers" (known as proceeding in forma pauperis). JLM, Chapter 22, "How to Challenge Administrative Decisions Using Article 78 of the New York Civil Practice Law and Rules," contains sample poor person's papers in its Appendix A for use in obtaining a lawyer for an Article 78 proceeding. You may use the same forms to obtain a lawyer for a habeas corpus proceeding if you: (1) substitute "Article 70" wherever the forms say "Article 78;" (2) delete any references to the Attorney General; and (3) substitute "writ of habeas corpus" wherever the papers read "order to show cause" or "verified petition."

You may also use poor person's papers to request a reduction or waiver of the filing fees. You should read Part D of JLM, Chapter 22, on Article 78 for a detailed description of filing fees. It explains that sentenced prisoners likely must pay at least a portion of the filing fees to proceed with their claims.[192]

If you have not been sentenced (for example, are filing a habeas petition to challenge excessive bail), you should still be able to receive a full filing fee waiver if you are indigent under New York law.[193] To request a waiver of filing fees, you should replace all references to N.Y. C.P.L.R. 1101(f) in the poor person's papers with N.Y. C.P.L.R. 1101(d) and make sure the papers request a waiver, not a reduction, of the filing fees.

5. What to Expect After You File

A court will not issue a writ of habeas corpus if (1) it appears from your petition that your claim is plainly without merit[194] or (2) your petition does not contain any claim that was not already decided against you in a previous petition.[195] However, if the court believes that your claim may have some merit, the court will issue you a writ.[196]

After the court issues the writ, you must serve (deliver) the writ and a copy of your petition upon the warden.[197] Upon being served with the writ and your petition, the warden must respond to the claims made in your petition within twenty-four hours.[198] The warden's response is known as the "return of the writ."[199] The warden must provide you with a copy of the return.[200] You have the right to make a reply to the return in order to deny any statements in the return or to state additional facts that support your claim.[201]

The writ may specify a time and place for a hearing to which the warden must take you to determine whether you are being imprisoned illegally. If the writ orders a hearing, you must inform the District Attorney of both the county in which you are imprisoned and the county in which you were convicted of the date and time of the hearing, in writing, at least eight days prior to the hearing.[202] Appendix III of the JLM provides the addresses of all of the District Attorneys in New York. At the hearing, the court will consider your petition, the return, and your reply to the return. You will be allowed to produce evidence to support your claim and to cross-examine any witnesses against you.[203] that at any hearing in connection with a habeas petition filed by an indigent prisoner seeking to be released from custody, the prisoner shall be entitled, upon request, to the assignment of counsel to represent him at such hearing); see also People ex rel. Ferguson v. Campbell, 186 A.D.2d 319, 587 N.Y.S.2d 798, 799 (3d Dept. 1992) (noting court did not abuse discretion by not appointing counsel because petitioner indicated that he did not want legal representation).

---

192. N.Y. C.P.L.R. 1101(f) (McKinney 2009).

193. N.Y. C.P.L.R. 1101(d) (McKinney 2009).

194. Your petition must state one of the valid grounds for relief supported by factual allegations. If your petition does not contain both the grounds for relief and supporting facts, then it will be dismissed.

195. N.Y. C.P.L.R. 7003(a)B(b) (McKinney 2009). See also People ex rel. Sanchez v. Hoke, 132 A.D.2d 861, 518 N.Y.S.2d 69 (3d Dept. 1987) (dismissing habeas petition without a hearing where the petition raised no new matter that had not already been raised and resolved against the petitioner).

196. N.Y. C P.L.R. 7003(a) (McKinney 2009).

197. N.Y. C.P.L.R. 7005 (McKinney 2009).

198. N.Y. C.P.L.R. 7006(a); N.Y. C.P.L.R. 7008(a) (McKinney 2009).

199. N.Y. C.P.L.R. 7008(a) (McKinney 2009).

200. See Vincent C. Alexander, Practice Commentaries, N.Y. C.P.L.R. 7008 (McKinney 2009).

201. N.Y. C.P.L.R. 7009(b) (McKinney 2009).

202. N.Y. C.P.L.R. 7009(a)(3) (McKinney 2009). If you file a poor person's papers, which is also known as proceeding in forma pauperis, a court officer will inform the District Attorney for you.

203. See People ex rel. Cole v. Johnston, 22 A.D.2d 893, 255 N.Y.S.2d 388 (2d Dept. 1964) (finding reversible error where petitioner was not allowed to produce evidence on his behalf or to cross-examine the only witness against him).

6. Your Right to Appeal

If the judge hands down a judgment refusing to issue a writ of habeas corpus or denying your claim after a hearing or return of the writ, you may appeal the judgment to an intermediate appellate court.[204] In New York, this court is called the Appellate Division and is divided into four different Departments.[205]

D. Michigan

This part explains some of the basic rules for filing a habeas corpus petition in Michigan.

1. Requirements

The Michigan writ of habeas corpus rules can be found in Chapter 43 of the Revised Judicature Act[206] and in state law 600.4301–4379.[207]

(a) Custody

If you have been released from prison, a Michigan court cannot grant a writ of habeas corpus.[208] However, if you are in prison because of an alleged parole violation, you are eligible for habeas corpus.[209] You are also eligible for habeas corpus if you are being civilly confined in a mental institution.[210]

(b) Immediate Release

You are entitled to immediate release if your habeas petition is successful. However, Michigan courts may grant you a conditional writ of habeas corpus that will require your release from prison only if new proceedings are not commenced by the state within the prescribed time period.[211] If this time period passes, Michigan is still allowed to arrest you again for the same crime.[212]

(c) State Prisoner

You must be a prisoner in Michigan.

(d) No Other Options

A Michigan court will not grant your petition for a writ of habeas corpus if there are other procedures available.[213] A writ of habeas corpus cannot be used when a writ of error or a writ of certiorari would be more appropriate.[214] The writ of habeas corpus is only used to raise defects so radical that will they render the conviction absolutely void and allow you to be released from prison.

---

204. N.Y. C.P.L.R. 7011 (McKinney 2009). The rules that govern civil appeals, rather than criminal appeals, govern habeas corpus proceedings because habeas corpus is considered a civil remedy.

205. See JLM, Chapter 2, "An Introduction to Legal Research," for a description of New York courts.

206. Revised Judicature Act of 1961.

207. Mich. Comp. Laws Ann. § 600.4301–4379 (West 2010).

208. Mich. Comp. Laws § 600.4322 (West 2010).

209. See Triplett v. Deputy Warden, Jackson Prison, 371 N.W.2d 862, 865, 142 Mich. App. 774, 779 (Mich. Ct. App. 1985) ("[R]eview of a parole revocation decision is permissible upon a complaint for habeas corpus.").

210. See Mich. Comp. Laws § 600.4322 (West 2010); see also Silvers v. People, 176 N.W.2d 702, 703, 22 Mich. App. 1, 3 (Mich. Ct. App. 1970) (holding that the Michigan circuit court is an appropriate venue to adjudicate the question of whether not receiving adequate treatment at a mental health facility is a violation of habeas corpus).

211. See People v. Scott, 739 N.W.2d 702, 704, 275 Mich. App. 521, 523 (Mich. Ct. App. 2007) (finding that the conditional writ of habeas corpus granted to the defendant, stating that he be retried in 90 days or released, was legitimate, but that the state does not lose its right to reprosecute if it does not retry within the allotted time).

212. See People v. Scott, 739 N.W.2d 702, 704, 275 Mich. App. 521, 523 (Mich. Ct. App. 2007) (stating that in a "typical case in which a prisoner is released because a state fails to retry the prisoner by the deadline set in a conditional writ, 'the state is not precluded from rearresting [the] petitioner and retrying him under the same indictment" unless the state's delay "prejudices the petitioner's ability to defend himself").

213. See In re Abbott, 255 N.W. 603, 603, 267 Mich. 703, 704 (Mich. 1934) (finding that the court could not hear the petitioner's writ for habeas corpus since he could have filed a writ of error or certiorari instead) .

214. See In re Abbott, 255 N.W. 603, 603, 267 Mich. 703, 704 (Mich. 1934) ("[H]abeas corpus may not be employed to serve in any instance where review could and should have been had by writ of error or certiorari.").

2. What You Can Complain About in Your Habeas Petition

(a) Before Trial

(i) Extradition

In Michigan, you have the right to challenge your extradition through the writ of habeas corpus.[215] The court will only engage in a very limited review in these cases.[216] The court will take the Governor's warrant and supporting papers as prima facie evidence supporting your extradition.[217] The court will therefore only look at whether the papers are in order, whether you have been charged with a crime in the demanding state, whether you are the person named in the request for extradition, and whether you are a fugitive.[218] Once you are outside of Michigan, you have no right to habeas review in a Michigan court.[219]

(ii) Bail

You may ask for habeas relief on the ground that you were denied bail or that the bail you were granted is excessive.[220] The court will be reluctant to second guess the judge that denied bail, and the petition will only be granted if the judge acted in an arbitrary, unjust, or oppressive manner, or if the judge was clearly wrong.[221]

(b) After Your Conviction

(i) Confinement Beyond Sentence

You may petition for habeas corpus relief if you have already served your sentence and are still being detained.[222] As explained in Part A(2)(b) of this Chapter, you must be eligible for immediate release if your petition is granted. If you believe that the sentence imposed on you was incorrect or excessive, you are not entitled to habeas review, but you may challenge the sentence on appeal or in a writ of error.[223]

(ii) Fundamental Rights

Michigan courts do not use the language of fundamental rights. Instead, the courts refer to "radical defects rendering a judgment or proceeding absolutely void."[224] If the court finds that your fundamental rights have been violated in your trial or sentencing, they may find that the judgment or proceeding is void and grant your habeas petition. For example, when a defendant was not given an opportunity to present his case, the court found that habeas corpus was the proper remedy to inquire into the reason of the detention.[225]

---

215. Mich. Comp. Laws. Ann. § 780.9 (West 1998 & Supp. 2009).

216. People v. Wend 309 N.W.2d 230, 233, 107 Mich. App. 269, 274 (Mich. Ct. App. 1981) (holding that petitions for habeas corpus are to be "liberally construed" when they deal with extradition).

217. People v. Wend 309 N.W.2d 230, 233, 107 Mich. App. 269, 274 (Mich. Ct. App. 1981).

218. People v. Wend 309 N.W.2d 230, 233, 107 Mich. App. 269, 274 (Mich. Ct. App. 1981) (quoting Michigan v. Doran, 439 U.S. 282, 289, 99 S. Ct. 530, 535, 58 L. Ed. 2d 521 (1978)).

219. See Trayer v. Kent County Sheriff, 304 N.W.2d 11, 12, 104 Mich. App. 32, 35 (Mich. Ct. App. 1981) (finding that even though petitioner had been granted a writ of habeas corpus, the writ was rendered moot as the petitioner had been moved out of Michigan and into Pennsylvania and was therefore subject to Pennsylvania's jurisdiction).

220. See In re Peoples, 14 N.W. 112, 47 Mich. 626 (Mich. 1882) (finding that a defendant denied bail warranted, under these circumstances, granting the writ of habeas corpus).

221. In re Tubbs, 102 N.W. 626, 627, 139 Mich. 102, 103 (Mich 1905).

222. See Cross v. Dept. of Corr., 303 N.W.2d 218, 220–21, 103 Mich. App. 409 415 (finding that a plaintiff whose state sentence was to run concurrently with his federal sentence, upon being released from federal prison, should not have been re-incarcerated in Michigan prison).

223. See In re Franks, 297 N.W. 521, 522, 297 Mich. 353, 355 (Mich. 1941) (holding that a petitioner challenging the length of his sentence and the method of sentencing should have appealed instead of having filed a writ of habeas corpus). See also Ex parte Wall, 47 N.W.2d 682, 330 Mich. 430 (Mich. 1951) (finding that a petitioner who wanted to challenge his sentence could successfully do so on appeal and not through filing a writ of habeas corpus).

224. Triplett v. Deputy Warden, Jackson Prison, 371 N.W.2d 862, 866, 142 Mich. App. 774, 780 (Mich. Ct. App. 1985).

225. Ex parte Bobowski, 21 N.W.2d 838, 839, 313 Mich. 521, 522 (Mich. 1946).

(iii) Ineffective Counsel

You may petition the court for habeas relief on the ground that your lawyer was ineffective.[226] Proving a claim of ineffective assistance of counsel is very difficult. The court will only grant relief when "the trial was a farce, or a mockery of justice, or was shocking to the conscience of the reviewing court, or the purported representation was only perfunctory, in bad faith, a sham, a pretence, or without adequate opportunity for conference and preparation."[227]

(iv) New Evidence

In Michigan, if you wish to raise the issue of new evidence, you must file a motion for a new trial. Habeas relief will not be granted because of new evidence.

(c) Probation or Parole

Michigan courts have held that habeas corpus is the correct procedure by which you can challenge errors in parole revocation proceedings.[228] However, if you are accused of a parole violation and a fact-finding hearing (a process similar to a trial) on the charge is not held within forty-five days as required by law, habeas corpus is not available to you.[229] Instead, you should apply for a writ of mandamus to force the government to give you your hearing.[230]

(d) Subject Matter Jurisdiction

Habeas corpus is available when "the convicting court was without jurisdiction to try the defendant for the crime in question."[231] This defect must be "radical" such that it would render a conviction void.[232] However, if you have been convicted of a crime by a court which has acquired jurisdiction and has not abused its power, habeas corpus is not available to you.[233]

3. How to File Your Petition

(a) When to File

In Michigan, before you file your petition, be sure that you cannot appeal your conviction or apply for administrative relief. If there are other options for redress, the court will not consider your habeas corpus petition.[234]

(b) Where to File

In Michigan, you may petition any of the following courts or judges for a writ of habeas corpus:

(1) The supreme court, or a justice thereof;
(2) The courts of appeals, or a judge thereof;
(3) The circuit courts, or a judge thereof;
(4) The municipal courts of record, including but not limited to the recorder's court of the city of Detroit, common pleas court, or a judge thereof; or

---

226. See People v. Wynn, 165 N.W.2d 493, 495, 14 Mich. App. 268, 269 (Mich. Ct. App. 1968).

227. See People v. Wynn, 165 N.W.2d 493, 495, 14 Mich. App. 268, 269 (Mich. Ct. App. 1968).

228. Triplett v. Deputy Warden, Jackson Prison, 371 N.W.2d 862, 866, 142 Mich.App. 774, 779 (Mich. Ct. App. 1985) (holding that "review of a parole revocation decision is permissible upon a complaint for habeas corpus").

229. Jones v. Dept. of Corr., 664 N.W.2d 717, 720, 468 Mich. 646, 651 (Mich. 2003) (holding that the appropriate procedure is to file a writ of mandamus in a situation where a fact-finding hearing failed to occur within the allotted 45 days).

230. Jones v. Dept. of Corr., 664 N.W.2d 717, 724, 468 Mich. 646, 658 (Mich. 2003).

231. People v. Price, 179 N.W.2d 177, 180, 23 Mich. App. 663, 670 (Mich. Ct. App. 1970).

232. People v. Price, 179 N.W.2d 177, 181, 23 Mich. App. 663, 671 (Mich. Ct. App. 1970) (defining a "radical defect in jurisdiction" as "an act or omission by state authorities that clearly contravenes an express legal requirement in existence at the time of the act or omission").

233. See Krause v. Weideman, 80 N.W.2d 481, 483, 347 Mich. 567, 572 (Mich. 1957) ("[Habeas] is not available to one convicted of a crime and committed by a court which has acquired jurisdiction and has not abused its power.").

234. See In re Abbott, 255 N.W. 603, 603, 267 Mich. 703, 704 (Mich. 1934) (finding that the court could not hear the petitioner's writ for habeas corpus since he could have filed a writ of error or certiorari instead); see also Walls v. Dir. of Institutional Services Maxie Boy's Training School, 269 N.W.2d 599, 601, 84 Mich. App. 355, 357 (Mich. Ct. App. 1978) (finding that though there were other avenues the juvenile could have taken to seek redress, there was a "radical defect" and so filing a habeas petition was warranted).

(5) The district courts, or a judge thereof.[235]

You should file with the judge or court in the county where you are detained.[236] However, if there is no judge in that county capable of issuing the writ, or if the judge has refused to issue the writ, you can apply for habeas corpus at the court of appeals.[237] You may file with either the judge or the court, but if you file with a judge you must later file the petition with the court.[238]

(c) What to Include in Your Petition

The petition for habeas corpus, also known as the complaint, must state:
(1) that you (the prisoner) are restrained of your liberty;
(2) your name, or if the petition is being written on the behalf of someone else and his name is not known, you can provide a description of the prisoner;
(3) the name, if known, or the description of the officer or person by whom the prisoner is restrained;
(4) the place of restraint, if known;
(5) that the action for habeas corpus by you or on your behalf is not prohibited;
(6) the cause or pretense of the restraint, according to your best knowledge and belief; and
(7) why the restraint is illegal.[239]

(d) How to File

After you have created your petition for habeas corpus including all the items in Part (B)(3)(c) of this Chapter, "What to Include in Your Petition," you should send your petition and any supporting documents to the court specified above in Part (B)(3)(b) of this Chapter, "Where to File." You can file the petition yourself, or someone may file the petition on your behalf.[240]

4. Your Right to Counsel for Your Petition

The U.S. Supreme Court has held that you have no federal constitutional right to be provided counsel in state habeas corpus proceedings.[241] However, in Michigan you are entitled to counsel at your habeas corpus hearing.[242] Also, if you are applying for relief because you are about to be extradited, you do have a limited right to counsel.[243]

5. What to Expect After You File

In Michigan, the court may issue a writ of habeas corpus (or an order to show cause) if your petition states allegations, which, if true, would entitle you to release.[244]

After the court issues the writ, you must serve (deliver) the writ and a copy of your petition upon the person who has you in custody.[245] Upon being served the writ and the petition, the person who has you in custody must follow the writ unless you are too sick to be moved.[246] If you are too sick to be moved, the person who has you in custody should state that in the answer to your complaint.[247] The judge will then rule on your petition based on the record.[248]

The person who has you in custody may file an answer to the writ, in which he will tell the judge why he thinks you should be in custody.[249] You may respond to the answer, either in a reply brief or in the hearing on your petition.[250]

---

235. Mich. Comp. Laws Ann. § 600.4304 (West 2010).
236. Mich. Court Rules of 1985, Rule 3.303(A)(2).
237. Mich. Court Rules of 1985, Rule 3.303(A)(2).
238. Mich. Court Rules of 1985, Rule 3.303(F)(3).
239. Mich. Ct. Rules of 1985, Rule 3.303(C).
240. Mich. Ct. Rules of 1985, Rule 3.303(B).
241. See Pennsylvania v. Finley, 481 U.S. 551, 555, 107 S. Ct. 1990, 1993, 95 L. Ed. 2d 539 (1987) ("[T]he right to appointed counsel extends to the first appeal of right and no further.").
242. Mich. Ct. Rules of 1985, Rule 3.303(Q)(3).
243. See People v. Donaldson, 302 N.W.2d 592, 595, 103 Mich. App. 42, 48–49 (Mich Ct. App. 1981) (holding that the defendant had a right to counsel for the limited purpose of challenging his arrest through habeas corpus).
244. Mich. Comp. Laws § 600.4316 (West 2010).
245. Mich. Ct. Rules of 1985, Rule 3.303(I)(1).
246. Mich. Comp. Laws § 600.4325 (West 2010).
247. Mich. Comp. Laws § 600.4328 (West 2010).
248. Mich. Comp. Laws § 600.4328 (West 2010).
249. Mich. Ct. Rules of 1985, Rule 3.303(K).

When the court issues the preliminary writ (or an order to show cause), it may establish a date and place where the person who has you in custody must take you to determine whether you are being imprisoned illegally. At the hearing the court will consider your petition, the return, and your reply to the return. You will be allowed to produce evidence to support your claim.[251]

6. Your Right to Appeal

In Michigan you may appeal the denial of your writ of habeas corpus.[252] If you do so, you must make sure that the writ has been properly filed with the court where you originally brought the petition. You may also bring a new petition for habeas corpus to an appellate court or the Supreme Court of Michigan.

E. Conclusion

You must meet certain elements in your petition for a writ of habeas corpus to be granted. These include custody (confinement by the state), entitlement to immediate release, imprisonment by the state, and lack of other available procedures, including administrative and grievance procedures. Your petition can complain about a variety of issues post-conviction, parole or probation revocation, or jurisdiction. Remember that the details of this process vary from state to state. You should research the rules in the state where you are imprisoned before petitioning for a writ of state habeas corpus.

250. Mich. Ct. Rules of 1985, Rule 3.303(O).

251. Michigan Ct. Rules of 1985, Rule 3.303(Q)(2)(b).

252. See People v. Wendt, 309 N.W.2d 230, 233, 107 Mich. App. 269, 274 (Mich. Ct. App. 1981) (finding that the denial of the writ of habeas corpus is reviewable though the scope of review is limited).

A JAILHOUSE LAWYER'S MANUAL

Chapter 22:
How To Challenge Administrative Decisions Using Article 78 of the New York Civil Practice Law and Rules

Columbia Human Rights Law Review

Ninth Edition 2011

Legal Disclaimer

A Jailhouse Lawyer's Manual is written and updated by members of the Columbia Human Rights Law Review. The law prohibits us from providing any legal advice to prisoners. This information is not intended as legal advice or representation nor should you consider or rely upon it as such. Neither the JLM nor any information contained herein is intended to or shall constitute a contract between the JLM and any reader, and the JLM does not guarantee the accuracy of the information contained herein. Additionally, your use of the JLM should not be construed as creating an attorney-client relationship with the JLM staff or anyone at Columbia Law School. Finally, while we have attempted to provide information that is up-to-date and useful, because the law changes frequently, we cannot guarantee that all information is current.

CHAPTER 22

HOW TO CHALLENGE ADMINISTRATIVE DECISIONS USING ARTICLE 78 OF THE NEW YORK CIVIL PRACTICE LAW AND RULES*

A. Introduction

This Chapter is about a New York State law that provides a procedure for you to challenge decisions that were made by a New York State official or administrative body. It is called Article 78 because it can be found starting at Section 7801 of the New York Civil Practice Law and Rules.[1] This Chapter explains when and how to bring an Article 78 proceeding. There are very strict rules and time limits when bringing an Article 78 proceeding, so read the requirements carefully.

Part B of this Chapter explains what you can complain about in an Article 78 petition. Part C describes when you can obtain relief under Article 78. Part D explains the procedure for filing an Article 78 petition. Part E describes how to bring an Article 78 proceeding, and the Appendix has a sample Article 78 petition and supporting papers.

Article 78 is New York State law, and does not apply in other states. Some other states have similar laws to review decisions of officials and administrative agencies. But, if you are in another state, you will have to research what your state's law is and how it differs from New York's Article 78.

1. What is an Article 78 Proceeding?

In an Article 78 proceeding, you ask a state court to review a decision or action of a New York State official or administrative agency, such as a prison official or the Board of Parole, which you believe was unlawful. You can use Article 78, for example, to attack the state's calculation of your good time, a decision to place you in solitary confinement, or a decision to deny you parole. In addition to claiming a violation of a law or regulation in an Article 78 petition, you must also explain in what way the action or inaction you are challenging caused you injury. For example, if you have been denied parole, your injury would be that you were suffering a longer incarceration. If you were not given a fair disciplinary hearing, your injury would be the punishment you received and the record of your alleged violation. If you were wrongfully denied medication, your injury would be pain or sickness.

But, you cannot challenge your conviction and sentence in an Article 78 proceeding because those are judicial decisions (made by a judge or court), as opposed to administrative decisions.[2] For information on challenging convictions and sentences, see JLM, Chapter 9 ("Appealing Your Conviction or Sentence"); JLM, Chapter 20 ("Using Article 440 of the New York Criminal Procedure to Attack Your Unfair Conviction or Illegal Sentence"); JLM, Chapter 13 ("Federal Habeas Corpus"); and JLM, Chapter 21 ("State Habeas Corpus").

You start an Article 78 proceeding by filing a petition. Therefore, throughout the proceeding you are referred to as the petitioner. Your petition will name the agency or official whose decision you are

---

* This Chapter was revised by Kristin Jamberdino and written by Sami Farhad, based in part on previous versions by Nicholas Corson, Robert Linn, Joseph Noga, and Erik Schryve. Special thanks to Laura Johnson of The Legal Aid Society, Criminal Defense Division and Ken Stephens of The Legal Aid Society, Prisoners' Rights Project for their valuable comments. The most recent version of this Chapter was revised in 2004 and is based largely on a publication by The Legal Aid Society, Prisoners' Rights Project, entitled, "How to Litigate an Article 78 Proceeding." You may obtain this document by contacting The Legal Aid Society, Prisoners' Rights Project, at 199 Water Street, 6th Floor, New York, NY 10038 (tel. (212) 577-3530). The Section on appealing an Article 78 petition is based largely on a publication by Prisoners' Legal Services of New York, entitled "Appealing an Article 78 Proceeding."

1. N.Y. C.P.L.R. 7801 (McKinney 1994 & Supp. 2006). The standard way of citing this statute, which you may use when you are writing a legal paper and do not want to write "New York Civil Practice Law and Rules," is: N.Y. C.P.L.R. 7801 (the number indicates the section or Rule to which you are referring). Article 78 can be found in 7801 to 7806 of the N.Y. C.P.L.R. You should also look at 401–11 of the N.Y. C.P.L.R., which describe some of the rules for "special proceedings," because Article 78 is a type of special proceeding.

2. N.Y. C.P.L.R. 7801(2) (McKinney 1994 & Supp. 2007). Article 78 may also be used to prevent a judge from hearing a case if he or she has no authority to hear it. See Schumer v. Holtzman, 60 N.Y.2d 46, 51, 454 N.E.2d 522, 524, 467 N.Y.S.2d 182, 184 (1983) (holding that a request for prohibition under Article 78 is only appropriate if you are asking the court to prevent an official to act beyond their authority).

challenging as the respondent (you can name more than one respondent), and will state why you are complaining about the decision and what you would like the court to do about it. After the agency or official files its answer responding to the claims you make in your petition, you can file another document called the reply.[3]

2. Who Hears Article 78 Proceedings?

Article 78 petitions are heard by New York Supreme Courts,[4] which are the trial courts in New York.[5] Some Article 78 cases that begin in a supreme court will eventually be transferred by that court to the appellate division (the next highest court) if they involve a question of "substantial evidence."[6] Generally, a question of substantial evidence means that the original decision you are asking the court to review was not supported by enough evidence. This will be explained in greater detail in Part B(3).

After the judge reads the papers that you and the administrative agency have submitted, he will make a decision.[7] Although Article 78 permits the judge to hold a hearing, this is extremely rare. As a result, prisoners who file Article 78 actions almost never actually appear in court. It is very likely that the judge will make his decision based upon the papers that you and the respondent (government agency or official) file.

You should note that the law gives agencies a great deal of discretion (freedom to use their own judgment). This means a judge needs a very good reason to overturn an administrative decision, and that you (as the person challenging the administrative action) will lose when it is a close call.

3. What Can You Ask the Court to Do in an Article 78 Proceeding?

When you prepare your Article 78 petition, you may ask the court to grant the following kinds of relief (relief is what the court does for you or what it gives to you):

(1) Order the state official or agency to perform a duty that is required by law;
(2) Order the state official or agency not to act beyond its authority or violate the law; or
(3) Overrule a decision made by the officer or agency, or order it to reconsider the decision because (a) the decision was obviously incorrect or unreasonable; (b) it was based upon an error of law; or (c) it was based upon insufficient evidence.[8]

You should be aware that in Article 78 proceedings, money damages generally will not be awarded. The law states that money damages will only be awarded in Article 78 proceedings if they are incidental (related) to the main claim.[9] Courts will only grant a stay (delay of the proceeding) in unusual circumstances.[10]

There are some kinds of relief you can ask the court to give you even before it hears your Article 78 petition. You may ask the court to stay the official or agency from taking further action until your Article 78 petition has been heard and decided by the court.[11] For example, if you are challenging a decision that would result in you being placed in maximum security or being transferred to another institution, the court might order the official or agency to leave you where you are until the court has made its decision.

---

3. N.Y. C.P.L.R. 7804(c) (McKinney 1994 & Supp. 2007).
4. N.Y. C.P.L.R. 7804(b) (McKinney 1994 & Supp. 2007).
5. For a list of the addresses of the supreme courts in each county, see Appendix II at the end of the JLM.
6. N.Y. C.P.L.R. 7804(g) (McKinney 1994 & Supp. 2007).
7. N.Y. C.P.L.R. 7806 (McKinney 1994 & Supp. 2007).
8. N.Y. C.P.L.R. 7803 (McKinney 1994 & Supp. 2007).
9. N.Y. C.P.L.R. 7806 (McKinney 1994 & Supp. 2007). This states that "any restitution or damages granted to the petitioner must be incidental to the primary relief sought by the petitioner." N.Y. C.P.L.R. 7806 (McKinney 1994 & Supp. 2003). See Gross v. Perales, 72 N.Y.2d 231, 236, 527 N.E.2d 1205, 1207, 532 N.Y.S.2d 68, 70–71 (1988) (holding claim for damages was incidental where damages are required under a statute once petitioner won his or her Article 78 claim; "[w]hether the essential nature of the claim is to recover money, or whether the monetary relief is incidental to the primary claim, is dependent upon the facts and issues presented in the particular case"); David D. Siegel, New York Practice 984–85 (4th ed. West 2005); N.Y. C.P.L.R. 7806, Practice Commentaries (McKinney 1994 & Supp. 2007).
10. You have to show that you will suffer immediate and serious harm if the stay is not granted. The court will only grant a stay if it decides that the harm you face is greater than the cost of granting the stay. See N.Y. C.P.L.R. 7805, Practice Commentaries (McKinney 1994 & Supp. 2007).
11. N.Y. C.P.L.R. 7805 (McKinney 1994 & Supp. 2007).

B. What You Can Complain About Under Article 78

In an Article 78 proceeding, you can raise only certain specific complaints about the state agency or official's action or failure to act. They can include the following:

(1) Whether the agency or official failed to do something the law requires;[12]
(2) Whether the agency or official has done something, is doing something, or is about to do something that is beyond its lawful authority (jurisdiction);[13]
(3) Whether the agency or official made a decision that was unreasonable and irrational or violated lawful procedure;[14] or
(4) Whether the agency or official made a decision at a hearing not based on substantial evidence.[15]

The examples provided above are only meant to give you an idea of what an Article 78 action can be used to challenge; other possibilities exist. Remember, Article 78 may be used to complain about any administrative decision, as long as the requirements for Article 78 review are met. You can also make more than one claim. If you make more than one claim in the same Article 78 proceeding, you may want to distinguish procedural claims from other types of claims. If you can show an agency has failed to follow its own procedures, you may be successful in your Article 78 proceeding. You might challenge a parole decision or sentence calculation, or the action of a Work Assignment Committee or Time Allowance Committee. It may also be helpful to read N.Y. Civil Practice Law and Rules 7803 (to see what the law says you can use Article 78 to challenge), and the annotated version of New York Civil Practice Law and Rules 7803 in McKinney's,[16] which lists the decisions of Article 78 cases, including prisoners' cases.[17]

In the documents you file with the court, you do not need to identify which type of claim or claims (also called "action" or "actions") you are filing. You simply need to state that it is an Article 78 action.[18] Of course, the more detailed your petition is, the easier it will be for the court to understand the reasons you seek legal relief. The following Sections address the different types of claims that are allowed in Article 78 proceedings.

1. Compel Required Action (Mandamus to Compel)

The first type of action you can bring occurs when an official has failed to do something that is required by law. This action is called a "mandamus to compel." When you bring this type of action, you are basically asking the court to make the official perform an act that is his duty to perform.[19] In this type of action, the duty to be performed must be required by the law and must not be discretionary (left to the judgment or decision of the official).[20] This type of Article 78 proceeding is very important because it can force officials to follow the regulations that protect your rights in prison. For example, you can bring an Article 78 proceeding to challenge improper restrictions on your mail,[21] to correct inaccurate disciplinary records,[22] or to make the

12. N.Y. C.P.L.R. 7803(1) (McKinney 1994 & Supp. 2007).
13. N.Y. C.P.L.R. 7803(2) (McKinney 1994 & Supp. 2007).
14. N.Y. C.P.L.R. 7803(3) (McKinney 1994 & Supp. 2007).
15. N.Y. C.P.L.R. 7803(4) (McKinney 1994 & Supp. 2007).
16. See JLM, Chapter 2, "Introduction to Legal Research," Part (C)(2)(c)(4), for an explanation of McKinney's.
17. N.Y. C.P.L.R. 7803 (McKinney 1994 & Supp. 2007).
18. David D. Siegel, New York Practice 956 (4th ed. West 2005).
19. See Gore v. Corwin, 185 Misc. 2d 825, 826, 714 N.Y.S.2d 427, 428 (Sup. Ct. Ulster County 2000) ("Mandamus is a proceeding to compel a public body or officer to act in accordance with the law.").
20. See Citywide Factors, Inc. v. N.Y. City Sch. Const. Auth., 228 A.D.2d. 499, 500, 644 N.Y.S.2d 62, 63 (2d Dept. 1996) ("Mandamus relief is appropriate only where the right to relief is clear, and the duty sought to be compelled is the performance of an act which is required by law and involves no exercise of discretion.").
21. See Hicks v. Russi, 219 A.D.2d 851, 851, 632 N.Y.S.2d 341, 342–43 (4th Dept. 1995) (reversing lower court's dismissal of prisoner's Article 78 petition and holding that prison officials could not prevent prisoner from advertising or selling his book to other prisoners by mail and replying to mail orders). But see Raqiyb v. Goord, 28 A.D.3d 892, 893, 813 N.Y.S.2d 251, 253 (3d Dept. 2006) (refusing prisoner's claim that regulation of his correspondence with his incarcerated nephew and opening of prisoner's outbound mail with insufficient postage was improper).
22. See Hilton v. Dalsheim, 81 A.D.2d 887, 887–88, 439 N.Y.S.2d 157, 157–59 (2d Dept. 1981) (granting prisoner's Article 78 motion to compel the removal from his disciplinary record an alleged disciplinary infraction where he was not provided assistance in investigating the claim made against him and the hearing officer did not interview witnesses, both required by regulations, and because he was not given a written statement from the hearing officer outlining the evidence she relied upon and the reason for the actions she took, which violated the prisoner's due process rights). For an example mixed petition for mandamus to review and to compel, see McDermott v. Coughlin, 135 Misc. 2d 659, 661, 664, 516 N.Y.S.2d 834, 836, 838 (Sup. Ct. Chenung County 1987) (granting Article 78 to void decision that a prisoner had

State Board of Parole act on your application for parole when the Board has ignored it and is required to act on it.[23] You also can bring an Article 78 proceeding to make the Board of Parole give you the reasons why your parole was denied.[24] Note that in this last type of proceeding, the remedy provided by the court would be to order the Board of Parole to decide your parole application,[25] or to make the Board give you the reasons for denying your parole.[26] The court would not order a certain result or decision, since this would be up to the discretion of the Board.[27] (To challenge a discretionary decision, see the second and third types of proceedings described below.) Another example of this type of proceeding would be claiming that you are entitled to credit against the length of your sentence for time you spent in custody.[28] In such a case you would be asking the court to order the agency (if you are in a New York State prison, this would be the Department of Correctional Services) to recalculate your sentence.[29]

When you bring this type of proceeding, if possible, you should state in your petition the law, regulation, or case you believe states the official's duty. If you seek relief because the agency did not follow proper procedures, you should try to connect the mistakes to the agency's decision(s). If you do not show this connection, the court might rule the failure to follow appropriate procedures was only harmless error (meaning the agency decision would have been the same even if it had followed proper procedures).

2. Review of Discretionary Administrative Decision—"Arbitrary and Capricious" Standard (Mandamus to Review)

A second type of action under Article 78 is a claim that asks the court to review a discretionary administrative decision or action (as opposed to the failure of an official to do something required by law, explained above in Part B(1)) because you claim it was unlawfully made without a reason. The law calls such decisions and actions "arbitrary and capricious."[30] An arbitrary and capricious decision or action is one taken "without sound basis in reason and ... without regard to the facts."[31] violated disciplinary rules when those rules were not yet filed at the time of the underlying incident, restoring petitioner's privileges and good behavior allowances, and expunging references to the disciplinary action from his record).

---

23. See Hines v. State Bd. of Parole, 267 A.D. 99, 101, 44 N.Y.S.2d 655, 656–57 (3d Dept. 1943) (noting that an application for a mandamus to compel was the proper remedy to force the State Board of Parole to take action on prisoner's application for parole); see also Utica Cheese v. Barber, 49 N.Y.2d 1028, 1030, 406 N.E.2d 1342, 1343, 429 N.Y.S.2d 405, 406 (1980) (granting an Article 78 claim to force an agency to hold a hearing, as required by law, to decide petitioner's application for a license); see also Vulpis v. Dept. of Corr., 154 Misc. 2d 625, 625–29, 585 N.Y.S.2d 954, 954–56 (Sup. Ct. Kings County 1992) (granting prisoner's mandamus to compel Department of Corrections to process his application for parole and ensure his release where Department did not follow applicable New York Correction Law).

24. See Van Luven v. Henderson, 52 A.D.2d 1042, 1042, 384 N.Y.S.2d 898, 899 (4th Dept. 1976) (noting that an Article 78 proceeding is the proper remedy when the Board of Parole fails to comply with its duty to give prisoners notice of reasons for denial of parole); see also People ex rel. Cender v. Henderson, 51 A.D.2d 683, 683, 378 N.Y.S.2d 205, 206 (4th Dept. 1976) (holding that an Article 78 proceeding is the proper remedy to force the Board of Parole to provide a prisoner with the reasons why his parole was denied).

25. See Vulpis v. Dept. of Corr., 154 Misc. 2d 625, 629, 585 N.Y.S.2d 954, 956 (Sup. Ct. Kings County 1992) (ordering Department of Correction to release prisoner who had been denied parole after approving his temporary release or to process his application with "all due speed" if additional approvals were needed for his release).

26. See Van Luven v. Henderson, 52 A.D.2d 1042, 1042, 384 N.Y.S.2d 898, 898–99 (4th Dept. 1976) (ordering Board to notify prisoner of reasons for denying him parole).

27. Hines v. State Bd. of Parole, 181 Misc. 280, 282, 46 N.Y.S.2d 569, 570–71 (Sup. Ct. Westchester County 1943) aff'd, 267 A.D. 881, 46 N.Y.S.2d 572 (2d Dept. 1944) ("[T]he authority to release on parole has been confined to the Board of Parole and not to the courts. Parole cannot be compelled by a mandatory order.").

28. See People v. Pugh, 51 A.D.2d 1047, 1048, 381 N.Y.S.2d 417, 419 (2d Dept. 1976) (noting that an Article 78 proceeding is the proper course by which a defendant can obtain credit against his sentence for time spent in custody prior to sentencing); see also People v. Searor, 163 A.D.2d 824, 824, 559 N.Y.S.2d 840, 840–41 (4th Dept. 1990) (noting that an Article 78 proceeding is the proper way to challenge the prison authorities' calculation of jail time credit); People v. Blake, 39 A.D.2d 587, 587, 331 N.Y.S.2d 851, 852 (2d Dept. 1972) (noting that if the Department of Correctional Services miscalculated defendant's jail term, his proper remedy would be an Article 78 proceeding); People v. Person, 256 A.D.2d 1232, 1233, 685 N.Y.S.2d 367, 368 (4th Dept. 1998) (noting that an Article 78 proceeding to review the prison authorities' calculation of defendant's jail time credit is the appropriate procedural vehicle for raising that contention).

29. See, e.g., Maccio v. Goord, 194 Misc. 2d 805, 808, 756 N.Y.S.2d 412, 414–15 (Sup. Ct. Albany County 2003) (granting in part prisoner's Article 78 petition and directing the Department of Correctional Services to credit him with jail time served); Grier v. Flood, 84 Misc. 2d 4, 8, 375 N.Y.S.2d 506, 509 (Sup. Ct. Nassau County 1975) (granting prisoner's Article 78 petition and directing the Department of Correctional Services to credit him with jail time served).

30. Pell v. Bd. of Educ., 34 N.Y.2d 222, 231, 313 N.E.2d 321, 325, 356 N.Y.S.2d 833, 839 (1974) (discussing

The arbitrary and capricious standard can be used to challenge decisions made by agency officials. It can be used, for example, to challenge a disciplinary decision that was made without following the procedures required by law.[32] If an agency harmed you by violating its own legally-required procedures in making an administrative decision, you can argue that such an action is arbitrary and capricious.[33]

Keep in mind that generally courts believe that administrative officials are in the best position to make decisions regarding prisoners. Thus, it is very difficult to prove that an agency or official acted arbitrarily or capriciously in making a decision that is left up to their judgment. The court will not substitute its own judgment for that of the official,[34] unless you can show that the decision was so irrational as to require that it be overturned.

Examples of decisions that could be challenged as arbitrary under this type of Article 78 proceeding would include most day-to-day prison decisions, such as decisions regarding furlough and temporary release,[35] appearances at disciplinary proceedings,[36] access to evidence,[37] visitation rights, mail access, and transfers. As to this last example, the opportunity to review transfers is very limited, because the Commissioner of Corrections is given "almost unbridled authority to transfer inmates from one facility to another."[38] Challenges to transfers, however, have been upheld where: (1) a prisoner's request for an appropriate transfer for medical reasons is unreasonably denied;[39] (2) a prisoner requires rehabilitative standards of judicial review of administrative agencies).

---

31. Pell v. Bd. of Educ., 34 N.Y.2d 222, 231, 313 N.E.2d 321, 325, 356 N.Y.S.2d 833, 839 (1974).

32. See Proctor v. Goord, 10 Misc. 3d 229, 232–33, 801 N.Y.S.2d 517, 519–20 (Sup. Ct. Albany County 2005) (holding that the Department of Corrections' failure to eliminate from a prisoner's inmate record an "unusual incident report" for an alleged violation that the prisoner was later found not to have committed was "arbitrary and capricious").

33. See People ex rel. Furde v. N.Y. City Dept. of Corr., 9 Misc. 3d 268, 274, 796 N.Y.S.2d 891, 896 (Sup. Ct. Bronx County 2005) ("Where an agency promulgates rules and extends greater due process rights than may be required by the Federal Constitution, it is without question that state law mandates that the agency follow its own rules … To do otherwise is to act arbitrarily and capriciously."); see, e.g., Liner v. Miles, 133 A.D.2d 962, 520 N.Y.S.2d 470 (3d Dept. 1987) (granting Article 78 petition to review Commissioner of Correctional Services determination that prisoner violated disciplinary rule and finding that determination was not supported by substantial evidence); Nesbitt v. Goord, 12 Misc. 3d 702, 705–06, 813 N.Y.S.2d 897, 900 (Sup. Ct. Albany County 2006) (requiring the Department of Correctional Services to follow its own rules in reviewing requests to award Temporary Work Release after prisoner filed Article 78 petition); People ex rel. Furde v. N.Y. City Dept. of Corr., 9 Misc.3d 268, 273–74, 796 N.Y.S.2d 891, 895 (Sup. Ct. Bronx County 2005) (holding that the Department of Corrections acted arbitrarily and capriciously in confining a pretrial detainee to his cell for 23 hours a day, and ordering that detainee be released into general prison population); Martinez v. Baker, 180 Misc. 2d 334, 336, 688 N.Y.S.2d 877, 987 (Sup. Ct. Albany County 1999) (finding that the Department of Correctional Services acted arbitrarily and capriciously in denying Spanish-speaking prisoner participation in a family reunion program where he failed to participate in an alcohol and substance abuse program because he did not have access to a bilingual program or a translator for the existing program).

34. See Bd. of Visitors-Marcy Psychiatric Ctr. v. Coughlin, 60 N.Y.2d 14, 20, 453 N.E.2d 1085, 1088, 466 N.Y.S.2d 668, 671 (1983) (noting that the standard of judicial review of a determination by Commissioner of Department of Correctional Services is not whether the court would come to the same determination itself but instead whether the determination was irrational, arbitrary, or capricious).

35. See Lopez v. Coughlin, 139 Misc. 2d 851, 853, 529 N.Y.S.2d 247, 249 (Sup. Ct. Albany County 1988) (holding that the Department of Correctional Services' decision to disapprove an application of prisoner with AIDS for participation in a temporary release program was not rationally related to Department's interest in prisoner's health).

36. See Boodro v. Coughlin, 142 A.D.2d 820, 822, 530 N.Y.S.2d 337, 340 (3d Dept. 1988) (holding that the Hearing Officer acted arbitrarily and capriciously in excluding prisoner from his disciplinary hearing). But see Grant v. Senkowski, 146 A.D.2d 948, 950, 537 N.Y.S.2d 323, 325 (3d Dept. 1989) (holding that the Article 78 petition was properly dismissed, as ejecting the prisoner from a disciplinary hearing was not arbitrary or capricious since the ejection was due to prisoner's misbehavior and occurred only after warnings).

37. See Coleman v. Coombe, 65 N.Y.2d 777, 780, 482 N.E.2d 562, 562, 492 N.Y.S.2d 944, 944 (1985) (holding that where prison regulations allowed prisoner to call witnesses on his behalf in disciplinary proceedings, and calling witness did not jeopardize safety or correction goals, prisoner was entitled to call his brother as a witness to give testimony in mitigation of penalty to be imposed); see also Wilson v. Coughlin, 186 A.D.2d 1090, 1090–91, 590 N.Y.S.2d 798, 798 (4th Dept. 1992) (granting a prisoner's request to annul an official's determination in a disciplinary hearing because the prisoner had not been allowed to offer evidence of mitigating circumstances, which is a relevant factor in prison disciplinary hearings).

38. Johnson v. Ward, 64 A.D.2d 186, 188, 409 N.Y.S.2d 670, 672 (3d Dept. 1978); see also N.Y. Correct. Law § 23 (McKinney 2003). But see Salahuddin v. Coughlin, 202 A.D.2d 835, 836, 609 N.Y.S.2d 105, 106 (3d Dept. 1994) (noting that the broad authority to transfer does not permit transfers that are made for the purpose of denying a prisoner a constitutional right or in retaliation for the exercise of such a right).

39. See Barnett v. Metz, 55 A.D.2d 997, 997–98, 390 N.Y.S.2d 701, 701–02 (3d Dept. 1977) (holding that while treatment that has been completely withheld;[40] and (3) a member of an inmate grievance committee, who represents other prisoners and abides by the rules of the institution, is transferred without a hearing or compelling emergency.[41]

Challenges based on a claim that the administrative agency abused its discretion by giving a punishment that is too severe can also be made by filing an Article 78 petition because such punishments are usually the result of administrative hearings. These petitions, which claim an "abuse of discretion ... as to the measure or mode of penalty or discipline imposed," must meet a very high legal standard.[42] Thus, such actions are very rarely successful. The court will only set aside an administrative agency's punishment or disciplinary measures if they are "so disproportionate to the offense, in the light of all the circumstances, as to be shocking to one's sense of fairness."[43]

You should also remember the "arbitrary and capricious" standard applies to the reasons that the agency or official gave at the time it made its decision. If the agency's original reasons are arbitrary and capricious, the court may reject other new justifications later offered by the agency in the Article 78 proceeding.[44]

3. Review of Hearing Board Decision—"Substantial Evidence Test" (Certiorari to Review)

A third type of Article 78 proceeding is a claim stating that the court should review a decision made by a hearing board because the determination made at the hearing was not supported by substantial evidence. In these cases, you challenge decisions that were made in hearings or in other formal, court-like settings. If you believe the evidence produced at the hearing was inadequate to support the decision, you can use an Article 78 proceeding to ask a court to review the decision. A court can review the record (an official written report) from the hearing to see whether it supports the decision. Any sort of disciplinary hearing or parole board decision that is based on submission of evidence and a record can be challenged in this type of action if the evidence produced was inadequate to support the decision.[45] By bringing this type of claim, you are asking the court to review the record on which the agency or official based the decision.

The standard used by the court in reviewing Article 78 challenges to administrative decisions made after administrative hearings is the "substantial evidence test." This means that the court will look to see if there was enough evidence in the record for the administrative official to decide as he did. It does not mean that the court will ask whether the official made the right decision.

Once again, the court will not substitute its judgment for that of the agency, but if there were mistakes or errors in the evidence against you, the court may overturn the decision. "Substantial" means there must be enough evidence so that a reasonable person could make the same decision the agency made. It does not mean most of the evidence supports the decision made by the administrative agency.

For example, some prisoners have successfully challenged disciplinary decisions where the correctional officer's misbehavior reports relied on at the hearing were based on hearsay, which means that they did not decisions about transfers between institutions are generally left to the administration, where a prisoner could show that the prison arbitrarily abused this discretion by failing to consider medical evidence, the decision could be challenged through Article 78).

---

40. See People ex rel. Ceschini v. Warden, 30 A.D.2d 649, 649, 291 N.Y.S.2d 200, 201–02 (1st Dept. 1968) (holding that where a person sentenced to an institution for rehabilitation claims that he is being deprived of any rehabilitative treatment, the court should inquire into that allegation).

41. See Johnson v. Ward, 64 A.D.2d 186, 189–90, 409 N.Y.S.2d 670, 673 (3d Dept. 1978) (holding that an prisoner-member of the Inmate Grievance Resolution Committee may not be transferred to another facility without a prior hearing unless the member's presence or conduct creates an emergency and transfer is immediately necessary to protect the facility or its personnel, in which event, the hearing on his transfer shall be held as soon as practicable at the receiving facility).

42. See, e.g., Regan v. Coughlin, 86 A.D.2d 913, 913, 448 N.Y.S.2d 258, 259 (3d Dept. 1982) (concluding that punishment of 60 days of keeplock, loss of commissary privileges and 30 days of good time, and 80 days of restricted visits was not disproportionate for prisoner who threw a handkerchief to a visitor in the visiting room, because the penalty was not so disproportionate as to be "shocking to [the court's] sense of fairness").

43. Pell v. Bd. of Educ., 34 N.Y.2d 222, 233, 313 N.E.2d 321, 326, 356 N.Y.S.2d 833, 841 (1974) (quoting Stoltz v. Bd. of Regents, 4 A.D.2d 361, 364, 165 N.Y.S.2d 179, 182 (3d Dept. 1957)).

44. See Scherbyn v. Wayne-Finger Lakes Bd. of Coop. Educ. Serv., 77 N.Y.2d 753, 759, 573 N.E.2d 562, 565, 570 N.Y.S.2d 474, 479 (1991) (holding that the reasons the agency later offered for dismissal of employee could not be used because its original dismissal was arbitrary and capricious).

45. See JLM, Chapter 18 for an explanation of disciplinary proceedings, and JLM, Chapter 36 for an explanation of parole.

contain first-hand knowledge.[46] If the only evidence against you is based on reports of people who were not present or did not actually see you, the court may find this hearsay evidence insufficient to support a finding of misconduct.

Many prisoners also try to challenge disciplinary decisions that are based on reports by informants. Courts recognize the importance of protecting the confidentiality of informants, and will uphold determinations even where the prisoner has not been allowed to see or to cross-examine the informants. In a decision by the highest court of New York, a prisoner tried to challenge a disciplinary hearing decision by arguing that the hearing officer should be required to interview the informants personally in order to determine their credibility.[47] The court held that although a hearing officer must determine the informants' credibility, a face-to-face interview is not necessary to make this determination.[48] Recently, prisoners have successfully challenged hearing decisions by arguing that the reports written by corrections officers of informants' statements were not detailed enough for the hearing officer to determine the credibility of the informants.[49]

Another example of prisoners' challenges of hearing decisions is in the area of drug violations.[50] Article 78 proceedings challenging the reliability or accuracy of evidence relied on in drug tests have occasionally been successful.[51]

Also, in at least one case, a prisoner successfully challenged a determination that he had been in possession of a weapon by pointing out that the evidence on the record was insufficient to support the decision.[52] In that case, the court ruled that there was not enough evidence to show that a weapon found in a cell belonged to a prisoner who had just been transferred to that cell.[53]

---

46. See Rodriguez v. Coughlin, 176 A.D.2d 1234, 1234, 577 N.Y.S.2d 190, 191 (4th Dept. 1991) (finding that misbehavior reports did not provide substantial evidence to support findings that prisoner was guilty because they did not show that correctional officers who signed them had personal knowledge of facts recited therein); see also Deresky v. Scully, 156 A.D.2d 362, 363, 548 N.Y.S.2d 318, 319 (2d Dept. 1989) (finding that the prison's conclusion that the prisoner started the fire in the cell of another prisoner was not sufficiently supported by evidence where the only evidence of guilt was hearsay testimony of officer who was not present, and the prisoner offered credible testimony that contradicted such hearsay).

47. Abdur-Raheem v. Mann, 85 N.Y.2d 113, 118, 647 N.E.2d 1266, 1269, 623 N.Y.S.2d 758, 761 (1995).

48. Abdur-Raheem v. Mann, 85 N.Y.2d 113, 121, 647 N.E.2d 1266, 1271, 623 N.Y.S.2d 758, 763 (1995).

49. Milland v. Goord, 264 A.D.2d 846, 846–47, 698 N.Y.S.2d 245, 246 (2d Dept. 1999) ("[T]estimony of the correction officer who interviewed the confidential informants was not sufficiently detailed and specific to enable the Hearing Officer to independently assess the credibility and reliability of the informants."). See also Agosto v. Goord, 264 A.D.2d 840, 698 N.Y.S.2d 244 (2d Dept. 1999) (holding that a determination must be annulled because "testimony of the correction officer who interviewed the confidential informants was not sufficiently detailed and specific to enable the Hearing Officer to independently assess the credibility and the reliability of the informants"). But see Medina v. Goord, 253 A.D.2d 973, 973, 678 N.Y.S.2d 919, 919 (3d Dept. 1998) (upholding the hearing officer's determination as supported "by sufficiently detailed information from which [the hearing officer] could independently assess [the informants'] reliability"); Valentin v. Goord, 259 A.D.2d 911, 912, 687 N.Y.S.2d 208 (3d Dept. 1999) (same holding as Medina).

50. See Venegas v. Irvin, 249 A.D.2d 982, 982, 672 N.Y.S.2d 200, 201 (4th Dept. 1998) (holding that misbehavior report that stated that the correction officer saw the prisoner throw a marijuana cigarette on the floor, and the fact that the cigarette later tested positive for marijuana, were substantial evidence of drug possession by the prisoner despite there being an issue as to when the cigarette was tested); see also Rollison v. Scully, 181 A.D.2d 734, 735, 580 N.Y.S.2d 480, 480 (2d Dept. 1992) (holding that the Department of Corrections failed to produce substantial evidence that prisoner's wife had brought cocaine to the correctional facility because the Department had not introduced documents into evidence as required by regulations).

51. See Wisniewski v. Smith, 133 A.D.2d 541, 541, 519 N.Y.S.2d 908, 909 (4th Dept. 1987) (holding that correctional facility superintendent's determination that individual violated institutional rule by using marijuana was not supported by substantial evidence where reliability of tests upon which the finding was based was not established on the record); see also Kalish v. Keane, 256 A.D.2d 343, 344, 681 N.Y.S.2d 336, 337 (2d Dept. 1998) (finding that there was no substantial evidence for drug violation by prisoner where prisoner produced evidence that he was on prescription medication that could produce false positive drug tests, hearing officer consulted with a representative of manufacturer of a different urine test than the one used by the prison, and representative did not know whether the medication at issue could cause a false positive test result); Kincaide v. Coughlin, 86 A.D.2d 893, 893, 447 N.Y.S.2d 521, 522 (2d Dept. 1982) (finding that the decision in superintendent's proceeding regarding prisoner's possession of marijuana was not supported by substantial evidence where test evidence was received without laying a foundation to show the nature of the test and the procedures utilized). But see Holmes v. Coughlin, 182 A.D.2d 1121, 1121–22, 583 N.Y.S.2d 703, 704 (4th Dept. 1992) (upholding superintendent's determination that the prisoner used illegal drugs as sufficiently supported by two positive Syva EMIT Drug Detection System Tests, and commenting on the tests' scientific reliability and validity).

52. Varela v. Coughlin, 203 A.D.2d 630, 631–32, 610 N.Y.S.2d 103, 104 (3d Dept. 1994). But see Patterson v.

If you bring a substantial evidence claim, the state supreme court will first try to see if the case can be resolved on any other grounds, such as failure to comply with the statute of limitations (the time limit after the event occurred in which you must bring your claim; see discussion below in Part C(3)). If the case cannot be resolved on these other grounds, then the court will refer it to the appellate court (called the appellate division).[54] One result of this is that it will take longer before your case is decided.

4. Challenge Legal Authority for State Action (Prohibition)

The fourth type of Article 78 proceeding arises when you challenge the state's action as having gone beyond its lawful authority. In this type of proceeding you are asking the court to stop an official from acting beyond his authority or jurisdiction. This type of case is difficult to prove, and rarely successful in court. Nevertheless, if you feel that an official is going to act in a way that will injure you, and the official is not allowed by law to act in that way, this type of Article 78 proceeding is the way to prevent the action.[55]

C. When You Can Obtain Relief Under Article 78

There are three important limitations on the use of Article 78 with which you must be familiar, or your case may be dismissed. They are described below.

1. You May Only Challenge Administrative Decisions

Article 78 may only be used to challenge administrative determinations of a New York state officer or agency. It generally cannot be used to challenge the decisions of a judge or court, such as criminal convictions or criminal sentences. However, it can be used to challenge several types of other actions by judges. Article 78 may be used to challenge a punishment a court gives for contempt of court.[56] It can also be used where the judge has made a decision that exceeded his authority (this is called prohibition—see Part B(4)), or to challenge a judge's failure to act (called mandamus—see Part B(1)).

2. You Must Exhaust All Administrative Remedies

The administrative determination you challenge must be final.[57] This means that a decision-maker must have come to a definitive decision that has caused you an actual injury of some sort. There have been many cases dealing with the question of what decisions are considered final. If possible, you should read the Practice Commentary and Notes of Decisions of Section 217 of N.Y. C.P.L.R. to see how courts have decided the issue.

In addition to being final, there must be no way for you to appeal the decision any further within the administrative agency.[58] If it is possible for you to appeal the decision to a higher state officer, you must do

---

Senkowski, 204 A.D.2d 831, 832–33, 612 N.Y.S.2d 84, 85 (3d Dept. 1994) (finding that written misbehavior report by officer who searched prisoner's clothes was sufficient evidence to support finding by superintendent that the prisoner possessed weapon, and that the prisoner's claim that the jacket was not his merely created issue of credibility for the hearing officer); Swindell v. Coughlin, 215 A.D.2d 855, 855, 626 N.Y.S.2d 329, 329 (3d Dept. 1995) (concluding that evidence of six ball bearings discovered in prisoner's cell hidden in a dental floss container substantially supported determination that prisoner was guilty of possessing contraband classified as a weapon; prisoner's claim that he found the ball bearings during his work detail and was waiting to turn them over to his supervisor was not supported by the supervisor, and was not enough to raise a doubt as to the sufficiency of the evidence supporting the decision).

53. Varela v. Coughlin, 203 A.D.2d 630, 631, 610 N.Y.S.2d 103, 103–04 (3d Dept. 1994). But see Torres v. Coughlin, 213 A.D.2d 861, 861, 624 N.Y.S.2d 67, 68 (3d Dept. 1995) (distinguishing Varela and holding that there was sufficient evidence that a prisoner possessed a weapon when the prisoner had been in the facility for 20 days and had been in the living area where the weapon was found for eight days).

54. N.Y. C.P.L.R. 7804(g) (McKinney 1994).

55. See Schumer v. Holtzman, 60 N.Y.2d 46, 51, 454 N.E.2d 522, 524, 467 N.Y.S.2d 182, 184 (1983) (holding that a request for prohibition under Article 78 is only appropriate if you are asking the court to prevent an official from acting beyond his or her authority).

56. See Loeber v. Teresi, 256 A.D.2d 747, 748–49, 681 N.Y.S.2d 416, 418 (3d Dept. 1998) (holding that an Article 78 petition can be used to challenge a judge's summary contempt order). A summary contempt order is one in which there is "no right to an evidentiary hearing, the right to counsel, or the opportunity for adjournment to prepare a defense," and may only be given when the actions giving rise to the contempt order take place in the "immediate view and presence" of the judge and the action disrupts the court proceeding. Williams v. Cornelius, 76 N.Y.2d 542, 546, 563, N.E.2d 15, 17, 561 N.Y.S.2d 701, 703 (1990).

57. N.Y. C.P.L.R. 7801(1) (McKinney 1994).

58. See Essex County v. Zagata, 91 N.Y.2d 447, 453, 695 N.E.2d 232, 235, 672 N.Y.S.2d 281, 284 (1998) (holding so before seeking Article 78 relief. In other words, you must go through every normally available step in the administrative process. This is called "exhaustion of remedies." If you have failed to follow the normal administrative procedure to the fullest extent possible, the court may refuse to hear your Article 78 petition.[59] This means that it is important to be aware of the ways in which you can challenge or appeal the decisions of prison officials within the prison or corrections system.[60] You should be aware that many administrative appeals require you to act quickly. A Superintendent's Hearing decision, for example, must be appealed to the Commissioner within thirty days.[61] If you fail to meet this deadline, you may be prevented from bringing an Article 78 petition on the same claim. There are time limits at each level of administrative appeal. If you do not receive a response by the time limit, you can proceed to the next level of appeal.[62] For more information on Inmate Grievance Procedures, see JLM, Chapter 15.

There are a few exceptions to the general rule requiring exhaustion of administrative remedies, but keep in mind that these exceptions are rarely invoked by the court and normally should not be relied upon. The first exception is in cases where an appeal would have no chance of success. In Martin v. Ambach,[63] the court observed that the finality requirement of N.Y. C.P.L.R. 7801(1) may be disregarded if the pursuit of an administrative remedy "reasonably appears to be futile."[64] Note that courts will almost never find that an appeal "reasonably appears to be futile."[65]

A second exception to the exhaustion requirement, also pointed out by the court in Martin v. Ambach, may arise when a non-final order will result in irreparable harm in the absence of judicial intervention.[66] Thus, if a decision will take effect before you can appeal it, you can file a motion under Article 78 to ask the court to intervene to prevent the harm. This could include a transfer out of your facility or a decision of a disciplinary hearing board, which might take effect before you have a chance to appeal. Additionally, in a case that was not brought by a prisoner, a court has ruled that exhaustion is not required if someone is seeking medical benefits to which he is entitled under state and federal law because it "creates an unnecessary hardship" on "poor, needy individuals."[67]

The third exception is in cases where the agency's action is challenged as beyond its powers. In Dineen v. Borghard,[68] the court held that the exhaustion rule "need not be followed when an agency's action is alleged to be unconstitutional or wholly beyond its powers."[69] This means that if your Article 78 petition claims that under New York Civil Practice Law and Rules 7801 that an agency determination is final when: (1) the agency's position is definitive; (2) the position inflicts actual injury; and (3) no further agency action can remove or lessen the injury).

---

59. See Alamin v. N.Y. State Dept. of Corr. Services, 241 A.D.2d 586, 587, 660 N.Y.S.2d 746, 747 (3d Dept. 1997) (requiring petitioner to exhaust administrative remedies before initiating an Article 78 petition); McCloud v. Coughlin, 102 A.D.2d 854, 854, 476 N.Y.S.2d 630, 631 (2d Dept. 1984) (dismissing Article 78 petition because petitioner had not appealed superintendent's disciplinary ruling to the Commissioner of the Department of Correctional Services).

60. See Farinaro v. Leonardo, 143 A.D.2d 492, 492–93, 532 N.Y.S.2d 601, 602 (3d Dept. 1988) (holding that a prisoner who was informed of the proper administrative procedure to challenge decision of prison officials to withhold martial arts catalog from him and did not follow them had failed to exhaust administrative remedies, and could not obtain judicial relief).

61. N.Y. Comp. Codes R & Regs. tit. 7, § 254.8 (2007).

62. See, e.g., State of New York, Department of Correctional Services, Directive No. 4040 § VI(G) (Aug. 22, 2003); N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 9, § 8006.4(c) (2003) (if you appeal a parole decision and the appeal unit does not issue its findings within four months of receiving your appeal, you are considered to have exhausted your administrative remedies and may bring your appeal to the courts).

63. Martin v. Ambach, 85 A.D.2d 869, 446 N.Y.S.2d 468 (3d Dept. 1981), aff'd, 57 N.Y.2d 1001, 443, N.E.2d 953, 457 N.Y.S.2d 478 (1982).

64. Martin v. Ambach, 85 A.D.2d 869, 870, 446 N.Y.S.2d 468, 470 (3d Dept. 1981) (noting that the lower court had relied upon such reasoning) (noting that the lower court had relied upon such reasoning).

65. See Martin v. Ambach, 85 A.D.2d 869, 871, 446 N.Y.S.2d 468, 470 (3d Dept. 1981) (stating that this should be the exception rather than the rule, occurring only when necessary to avoid irreparable harm. See also Practice Commentary to N.Y. C.P.L.R. 7801(7) (McKinney 1994) (stating that the three exceptions lie in the court's discretion and "are rarely invoked in the context of Article 78 review").

66. Martin v. Ambach, 85 A.D.2d 869, 871, 446 N.Y.S.2d 468, 470 (3d Dept. 1981).

67. See Lutsky v. Shuart, 74 Misc. 2d 436, 438, 342 N.Y.S.2d 709, 712 (Sup. Ct. Nassau County 1973), aff'd, 43 A.D.2d 1016, 351 N.Y.S.2d 946 (2d Dept. 1974) (holding that welfare recipient seeking medical benefits does not have to exhaust administrative remedies before bringing an Article 78 petition); see also Valdes v. Kirby, 92 Misc. 2d 367, 371, 399 N.Y.S.2d 972, 974–75 (Sup. Ct. Suffolk County 1977) (holding exhaustion not required for petitioner seeking housing shelter allowance and facing possible eviction).

68. Dineen v. Borghard, 100 A.D.2d 547, 473 N.Y.S.2d 247 (2d Dept. 1984).

69. Dineen v. Borghard, 100 A.D.2d 547, 548–49, 473 N.Y.S.2d 247, 248–49 (2d Dept. 1984) (holding plaintiff was a prison official acted unconstitutionally in depriving you of some protected right, it is possible that a court may find that you do not need to have first exhausted all of your administrative appeals. This exception is a limited one and, as one court has pointed out, "[t]he mere assertion that a constitutional right is involved will not excuse the failure to pursue established administrative remedies that can provide the requested relief."[70] For example, in Levine v. Board of Education, a court rejected a teacher's claim that the exhaustion requirement did not apply due to constitutional violations. The court held that the exception to the exhaustion requirement did not apply when the claims were based on factual issues that the agency could review because the necessary factual record first had to be established.[71]

Thus, it is possible that a court will allow an Article 78 motion to proceed without exhaustion of all the administrative remedies when petitioner can demonstrate: (1) futility of the administrative remedy, (2) irreparable harm in absence of prompt judicial intervention, or (3) unconstitutional action. Remember that these exceptions are rarely recognized, and it is safest to pursue all possible appeals within the agency or prison system before filing an Article 78 proceeding in court.

3. Your Article 78 Petition Must Be Filed Within Four Months After the Administrative Decision Becomes Final

Your Article 78 petition must be filed with the court within four months of the date that the administrative determination that you want to challenge becomes final.[72] This four-month period is called the statute of limitations. As soon as you have exhausted your administrative appeals, you should get to work on writing and filing your petition. Remember, you must file the petition before the four-month time limit is up. If you wait longer than four months from the time when the decision you are challenging became final and binding upon you, the court will dismiss your petition. Part D(8) explains how you can file and serve your petition.

To find out the deadline for filing your papers, you must first determine when the decision you are complaining about became final. A decision becomes final when it has an actual impact upon you. Thus, the statute of limitations will usually run from the date when you receive notice of the determination that you are challenging. Keep in mind that you must exhaust your administrative remedies (as discussed above in Part C(2)). This means that if you receive notice of a determination, which you then appeal to the next administrative level, the statute of limitations will not begin to run until you receive final notice from the highest possible administrative authority. Sometimes the authority may not notify you; if the designated time has passed, you can assume your appeal has been denied.[73]

If you apply for a rehearing (rather than another appeal) by the highest agency or prison board, the courts will not extend the statute of limitations period to cover this rehearing application period unless the law entitles you to a rehearing.[74] Thus, unless a rehearing is required by law, you should treat the notice of the final appeal decision as the time when the four-month statute of limitations period begins. The law on statutes of limitations is complicated. If you are confused about when you need to file your papers, it is a not required to pursue an administrative remedy since he was alleging violations of his statutory and constitutional rights).

---

70. Levine v. Bd. of Educ. of N.Y., 186 A.D.2d 743, 744, 589 N.Y.S.2d 181, 183 (2d Dept. 1992).

71. Levine v. Bd. of Educ. of N.Y., 186 A.D.2d 743, 744, 589 N.Y.S.2d 181, 183 (2d Dept. 1992); see also Timber Ridge Homes v. State, 223 A.D.2d. 635, 636, 637 N.Y.S.2d 179, 180 (2d Dept. 1996) (holding that constitutional challenge that depends on the facts cannot be brought until the factual record is developed by the agency).

72. N.Y. C.P.L.R. 217(1) (McKinney 2003).

73. See, e.g., N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 9, § 8006.4(c) (2006) (holding that an appeal of a parole decision that does not result in the appeal unit issuing its findings within four months of receiving the appeal, leads to the exhaustion of administrative remedies and an appeal may be brought to the courts).

74. See De Milio v. Borghard, 55 N.Y.2d 216, 220, 433 N.E.2d 506, 507–08, 448 N.Y.S.2d 441, 442–43 (1982) (holding that the four-month statute of limitations in an Article 78 action brought by a government employee to challenge his discharge (firing) from work begins to run on the termination date of his employment and not on the later date when his request for reconsideration of discharge was denied); see also Loughlin v. Ross, 208 A.D.2d 631, 631, 618 N.Y.S.2d 231, 232 (2d Dept. 1994) (finding that in an Article 78 proceeding to review Commissioner's determination following disciplinary hearing, the statute of limitations began to run when the determination sustaining the disciplinary charges against the prisoner was affirmed on administrative appeal; the attempt by the petitioner to secure a reconsideration of the determination did not extend the statute of limitations).

good idea to plan on filing them within four months of the date you receive the order or decision about which you are complaining.[75]

Following service, be sure to send proof of service to the court clerk. Proof of service should include an affidavit of service, which states that the papers were served on the Attorney General, the Attorney General's Office, and the respondents.

D. Procedures for Filing an Article 78 Petition

In the past few years, New York State has changed its civil procedure law (the law that tells you when, where, and how to file claims). Even though the new rules are similar to the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, there are significant differences. Even if you are familiar with the Federal Rules, you should still review New York's rules carefully.[76]

The Appendix of this Chapter contains examples of the legal papers that you must file with the court in order to use Article 78. This Chapter provides the essential information that you will need to use these examples. Do not tear the papers out of the book. Copy the printed language on your own paper, fill in the blanks, and replace any italicized words with the facts that apply to your case. The court might reject your papers if you tear them out of this book.

Under the current law, you need to send an original and one copy of each of the following (explained below) to the county supreme court clerk, the respondents, and the Attorney General:

(1) A Notice of Petition or an Order to Show Cause;
(2) A Verified Petition;
(3) All exhibits and supporting affidavits attached to the petition;
(4) Either the full filing fee or a reduced fee with an affidavit that supports your claim that you are too poor to pay the full filing fee.[77] The full filing fee is $190.[78] Caution: If you fail to enclose either the fee, or the poor person's motion and affidavit, you will not get an index number. Without the index number, you cannot proceed with your claim;
(5) A "Request for Judicial Intervention" ("RJI");[79] and
(6) A "Request for an Index Number."

If possible, you should try to keep a copy of all papers that you file during the Article 78 proceeding.

1. Starting the Proceeding

You begin an Article 78 proceeding by filing either a Notice of Petition or an Order to Show Cause, supporting affidavit(s), a Verified Petition, the filing fee, the Request for Judicial Intervention, and the Request for an Index Number.[80] The following sections will explain how to do each of these things.

"Filing" in an Article 78 proceeding means delivery of the Verified Petition to the court clerk with the required fee.[81]

You should file your Article 78 petition in the supreme court for the county in which the administrative decision you are challenging was made, the county where the administrative appeal was decided, or the county in which the respondent has his main office (usually Albany County).[82] This rule applies even if you have been transferred or released. See Appendix II at the end of the JLM for a list of the addresses of the supreme courts for the various counties.

By filing, you begin the proceeding and interpose the claim for statute of limitations purposes. This means that if you filed within the statute of limitations, the respondent cannot later get the action dismissed

---

75. N.Y. C.P.L.R. 7801: 7 Practice Commentary (McKinney 1994).

76. If you are going to look through the procedure code yourself, remember the rules for actions are made applicable to special proceedings such as Article 78 proceedings through the definitional section of N.Y. C.P.L.R. 105(b), unless another section provides otherwise.

77. N.Y. C.P.L.R. 1101 (McKinney 1997 & Supp. 2007); N.Y. C.P.L.R. 8018 (McKinney Supp. 2007).

78. N.Y. C.P.L.R. 8018 (McKinney 2003 & Supp. 2007).

79. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 22, § 202.6 (2006). See Appendix A of this Chapter for a sample of a Request for Judicial Intervention.

80. N.Y. C.P.L.R. 203(c) (McKinney 2003), 304 (McKinney 2001 and Supp. 2004), 8018 (McKinney 1981 and Supp. 2007).

81. N.Y. C.P.L.R. 304 (McKinney 2001 and Supp. 2007).

82. N.Y. C.P.L.R. 506(b) (McKinney 2006).

on the grounds that it took too long for you to file successfully. You must file within four months of the time the decision that you are challenging becomes final.

However, the real benefits of this initial filing are not great. Your case can still be dismissed unless service is completed and proof of service is filed within four months and fifteen days after you receive the challenged decision. Do not be lulled into a false sense of security because you have filed within the statute of limitations. There are still strict time limits that require you to complete the entire process very quickly. However, filing your petition will get you an index number.

2. Order to Show Cause or Notice of Petition

Since you are in prison, unless you can get someone else (like a friend, relative, or a private service) to assist you with service, you should commence the proceedings with an Order to Show Cause. An Order to Show Cause is an order signed by the judge directing that a petition be heard immediately or sooner than the twenty days that is normally the minimum time. It is used in situations where there is a need for an immediate hearing instead of a Notice of Petition. Often an Order to Show Cause not only requires an expedited hearing but stays (pauses) the threatened official action until the claim is heard.

In the Order to Show Cause, you should ask the court to allow you to serve the respondents and the Attorney General by mail. Be sure to specifically include a request to the judge to allow service by mail. In the affidavit attached to your Order to Show Cause, you should explain why you need an Order to Show Cause. The reasons can be because you are in prison and cannot carry out personal service, meaning that you cannot physically deliver your petition directly to the respondent. Another reason you could have for needing an Order to Show Cause is that the situation that your Article 78 petition is trying to prevent is likely to happen in the next twenty days. For example, if you are scheduled to be removed from a work release program in less than twenty days, you may want to use an Order to Show Cause to try to prevent this from happening. See the example of an "Order to Show Cause" in Appendix A of this Chapter.

Alternatively, you can file a Notice of Petition. The Notice of Petition includes the name of the respondents, the nature of your claim, and the date and place of the hearing where you want your petition heard. A Notice of Petition must be personally served on the respondents, and the Attorney General's Office or the case may be dismissed. Unlike an Order to Show Cause, if you file a Notice of Petition, you must serve it at least twenty days before the date you name as the date of the hearing.[83] Note that if you must serve by mail, you must file an Order to Show Cause, not a Notice of Petition.

You should attach a copy of your petition to the Order to Show Cause or Notice of Petition. The petition should contain a written statement explaining the facts and your reasons for requesting the relief you seek. See the example of a "Notice of Petition" in Appendix A to this Chapter.

(a) The Return Date

If you file an Order to Show Cause, the court will set the return date. This is the date on which the case will be heard by the court. The return date will be on the signed order, which the court will mail to you.

An Order to Show Cause can speed up the hearing date so that it may occur in a few days, rather than the usual twenty days for a Notice of Petition. You can pick a date for the hearing in the order that you send to the court. You should pick a date that will be a week or two from the date on which you think the court will receive your papers. If the court cannot schedule a hearing on that day, the court clerk will cross out the date that you selected and write another one on the order. The clerk will let you know if this has occurred.

In your Order to Show Cause, you must indicate the date by which you will mail or deliver ("serve") copies of the papers to the respondent, and the appropriate Attorney General's office. You should give the respondent two to three weeks between the date on which he receives the papers and the date that you set for the court appearance. You should take into account the time that it will take for the papers to go through the mail after you send them out.

If you file a Notice of Petition, you must specify the return date. Under the N.Y. Civil Practice Law and Rules, the return date must be at least twenty days after the date on which the respondent has been served.[84] Thus, you should choose a date that is more than twenty days from the date by which you will have

---

83. N.Y. C.P.L.R. 7804(c) (McKinney 1994). You should send your papers to the Attorney General by sending it to the address of the assistant attorney general in the county in which the court sits. Your prison library should have the address; otherwise, you should write to the Court Clerk.

84. N.Y. C.P.L.R. 7804(c) (McKinney 1994).

served the respondents. If the court wants to hear your Article 78 action on another day, it can change the date. The court should notify you if it changes the return date. Your Notice of Petition can be dismissed if you do not provide a return date.[85]

(b) The Respondents

You should name as the respondent the official or agency whose action or inaction you are challenging. In addition to the official's name, you should also include his or her official title. By including the title, you can prevent your case from being dismissed if the official who committed the violation changes jobs. Otherwise, you would need to substitute the name of the new official.[86] If your case involves prison records, you may want to name the Commissioner of the Department of Correctional Services ("DOCS") as a respondent.

The more people whom you list as respondents, the more people there are who you have to serve with the documents. Thus, it is generally wise only to list the officials immediately involved and the Commissioner of the Department of Correctional Services. For example, in disciplinary cases, it is usually enough to name the Commissioner of the Department of Correctional Services, the superintendent of the facility where the hearing was held, or the state director of disciplinary programs (the person responsible for reviewing administrative appeals).

(c) Stay

If you request and the judge grants a stay against the respondent, the official or agency's decision does not take effect until after your petition has been heard.[87] For example, if you are challenging a decision to place you in solitary confinement, you might ask the judge for an order that you not be placed there while you are waiting for a decision on your petition. Without a stay, your time in solitary might be up before the judge decides your petition, and the only thing you could then accomplish would be to have the decision expunged (removed) from your records. If you want a stay, you must ask for it in the Order to Show Cause that you send to the court, like the sample order at the end of this Chapter.

3. Article 78 Petition

The heart of your Article 78 papers is the petition. The petition identifies the parties, explains the basis for venue in a particular county, and states the facts of your case, your legal claims, and the relief you are asking the court to give you. Relief simply means what you are asking the judge to do. You should submit an affidavit (a sworn statement by you or another person) to support the facts in the petition. You can also attach copies of documents relating to your case.

Be sure that you think carefully in advance and make the strongest arguments possible when you draft your petition. For example, if the Board of Parole has done something illegal or irregular in your case, emphasize that the action is illegal, or that it is unfair for the Board to treat you differently from the other prisoners. Also, if there are standard procedures or regulations that you know were not followed in your case, you should point this out. If you claim that the agency did not follow its procedures, you should also claim that the decision it reached may be wrong because of this.

4. Verification of Petition

Your petition must also include a verification—a short statement in which you swear to the truth of the statements in your petition. It must include the statement that what is alleged in your petition "is true … except as to those matters alleged on information and belief and that as to those matters [insert your name] believes them to be true."[88] You should use this exact language and sign your petition in front of a notary. You can find a sample verification in the Appendix at the end of this Chapter.

---

85. See Vetrone v. Mackin, 216 A.D.2d 839, 840–41, 628 N.Y.S.2d 866, 867 (3d Dept. 1995) (holding that the Notice of Petition is null and void if it does not specify a return date at the time of filing and at the time of service on the respondent); Grover v. Wing, 246 A.D.2d 813, 814, 667 N.Y.S.2d 785, 786 (3d Dept. 1998) (determining that a petition was an Article 78 claim, and that failure to serve defendants with a notice of petition or order to show cause without a proper return date merited dismissal).

86. N.Y. C.P.L.R. 1019 (McKinney 1997).

87. N.Y. C.P.L.R. 7805 (McKinney 1994). Section 7805 states: "On the motion of any party or on its own initiative, the court may stay further proceedings, or the enforcement of any determination under review …."

88. N.Y. C.P.L.R. 3020(a) (McKinney 1991).

5. Discovery—Use of the "Notice to Admit"

An Article 78 proceeding usually does not involve discovery. Formal discovery tools, such as depositions (interviews of people) and interrogatories (written questions submitted to people who may have relevant information), can only be used if the court gives you permission. If the court finds there are issues of fact to be resolved, it may grant you permission to carry out discovery. An example of an issue of fact is a dispute over whether someone was present at the administrative hearing. See JLM, Chapter 8, "Obtaining Information to Prepare Your Case: The Process of Discovery," for more information on discovery.

The one form of discovery that you can use without first seeking permission from the court is the "Notice to Admit." This can be used only if the respondent is an individual, not the state. You can use a Notice to Admit to ask the respondent to admit:

(1) The genuineness of any paper or document;
(2) The correctness or accuracy of a photograph; or
(3) The truth of any matters of fact about which you believe there can be no dispute and which are within the knowledge of the respondent or can easily be found by him on reasonable inquiry.[89]

The Notice to Admit is particularly useful in cases where you are making factual allegations, or where no transcript of the administrative proceedings exists. The Notice to Admit should be a separate document. This document should be a list of questions. Each question should be divided into short parts answerable with yes or no. Do not write long questions with many parts because then the respondent could say no, even though most or part of the question was true. Also, be sure to list and number your questions. You should send these questions to the respondent, the Attorney General's Office, and the court with your petition.

6. Fees

Before December 1999, prisoners could file for poor person status (in forma pauperis) in New York State courts and, if eligible, did not have to pay filing fees for claims made in state court. In 1999 the State Legislature made changes to the New York Civil Practice Law and Rules requiring that prisoners pay filing fees whenever they bring claims in state courts.[90] The only exception is for prisoners bringing Article 78 petitions in relation to jail time credit. If you are filing this kind of Article 78 petition, you do not have to pay a filing fee.[91] Thus, even if you or someone you know has previously filed an Article 78 proceeding without paying a filing fee, or if you have looked at a prior edition of the JLM that reflects the old law, you now will most likely be required to pay a filing fee in order to begin your Article 78 proceeding and receive your index number.[92]

Prisoners are eligible for a reduced filing fee, which may be between fifteen and fifty dollars[93] (the full filing fee is $190).[94] In order to get the reduced filing fee, you must submit an affidavit to the court stating why you cannot afford the full filing fee and ask for a reduced filing fee.[95] Since this is a new law, it is not yet clear how the courts will decide when a prisoner qualifies for a lower fee. Thus, if you are unable to pay the full filing fee, you should include in your affidavit for the reduced filing fee as much detailed information as possible about your financial situation. For example, you should tell the court in your affidavit if you cannot work because you are medically or mentally ill, because you are in protective custody due to danger, or because no jobs are offered. Also, explain any outstanding obligations you have, especially court-ordered obligations such as child support or restitution. See Appendix A for a sample affidavit to request a reduced

---

89. N.Y. C.P.L.R. 3123 (a) (McKinney 2005) (the notice to admit may be served at any time after service of the answer, but not later than 20 days before trial).

90. The new fee requirements can be found in N.Y. C.P.L.R. 1101(d) (McKinney 1997 & Supp. 2006).

91. N.Y. C.P.L.R. § 1101(f)(5) (McKinney 1997 & Supp. 2006).

92. Gomez v. Evangelista, 290 A.D.2d 351, 352, 736 N.Y.S.2d 365, 366 (1st Dept. 2002) (holding that the requirement that prisoners pay a non-waivable fee of at least $15, while other non-prisoners can get their fees completely waived, does not violate the Equal Protection Clause of the 14th Amendment, and is therefore constitutional). See also Berrian v. Selsky, 306 A.D.2d 771, 772, 763 N.Y.S.2d 111, 114 (3d Dept. 2003) (holding that the fee requirement for an Article 78 challenge "is rationally related to the legitimate governmental interest of deterring frivolous prisoner litigation"); Bonez v. McGinnis, 305 A.D.2d 814, 815, 758 N.Y.S.2d 543, 544 (3d Dept. 2003) (holding the same).

93. N.Y. C.P.L.R. 1101(f)(2) (McKinney 1997 & Supp. 2006).

94. N.Y. C.P.L.R. 8018(a) (McKinney 1981 & Supp. 2006). In addition, $125 may be charged if a trial or inquest (hearing) is scheduled. This is called a "Request for Judicial Intervention" fee. N.Y. C.P.L.R. 8020 (a) (McKinney 1981 & Supp. 2006).

95. N.Y. C.P.L.R. 1101(d) (McKinney 1997 & Supp. 2006), 1999 N.Y. Laws 412 Pt. D. § 1 (McKinney 2000).

filing fee. If the court denies your request for the reduced filing fee, it will notify you. You will then have 120 days to pay the full fee ($190), or else your case will be dismissed.[96] Please note that if you win your case, the court will refund any filing fee that you have paid.

In the affidavit, you must provide the name and mailing address of the facility where you are currently confined as well as all other facilities in which you have been confined during the last six months.[97] The court will then get a copy of your inmate trust fund account statement for the six months before you filed the affidavit.[98] If the court decides that you cannot afford to pay the full filing fee, it may allow you to pay a reduced filing fee that is no less than fifteen and no more than fifty dollars.[99] The court will then require you to pay an initial part of the reduced filing fee that you can reasonably afford.[100] Only in exceptional circumstances may the court decide that you do not have to pay this initial filing fee.[101] The rest of the reduced filing fee (the difference between the total amount of the reduced filing fee and the amount paid as the initial part of the filing fee) will be collected by your facility.[102] This means that if you are a state prisoner, DOCS will collect a portion of your weekly wages and outside receipts until the reduced filing fee is fully paid.

7. The Index Number and Filing Date

The court will tell you your index number after you file the documents listed in Part E(2) below. Once the court tells you the index number, you must write it on the top of all documents that you serve to the respondent or submit to the court.[103] If you serve your Notice of Petition or Order to Show Cause and Verified Petition without an index number or filing date (for example, because filing has not occurred), the paper has no legal weight. The court will act as if you never did anything. However, the court might allow you to amend your petition if you purchased the index number but forgot to put it on your other documents.[104] On the other hand, the court might dismiss the entire proceeding. You could still refile, but only after obtaining a new index number by either filing a new poor person's motion or paying the fee again. If you must refile, you should be aware of statute of limitations concerns. See Part C(3) above for a discussion of statute of limitations.

8. Serving the Respondents and the Attorney General

"Serving" means giving the respondents and the Attorney General's Office a copy of every document and exhibit that you sent to the court clerk. Remember that for Article 78 proceedings, you must serve both the official (person or people) or agency you have named AND the correct office of the New York State Attorney General. Unless the court directs otherwise, the Attorney General must be served by personal service and the official or agency by personal service or certified mail, return receipt requested, with "URGENT LEGAL MAIL" written on the front of the envelope in capital letters.

You may not serve the respondents until you receive an index number from the court. You must write the index number and the court's designated date of filing (which you can find in the information that the clerk sends you) on the first page of every item that you send to the respondents. You must also tell the Attorney General the name of the judge and the date of the hearing if available. You should include the date

---

96. N.Y. C.P.L.R. 1101(d) (McKinney 1997 & Supp. 2006).

97. N.Y. C.P.L.R. 1101(f)(1) (McKinney 1997 & Supp. 2006).

98. If you have been incarcerated in the same facility for six months before you filed the affidavit, the court will get a copy of your inmate trust fund account from the prison superintendent of your facility. If you have been confined for less than six months at that facility at the time your file your affidavit, the court will either (1) get an inmate trust fund account statement for the last six months from the Central Office of DOCS in Albany if you are a state prisoner who was transferred from another state correctional facility; or (2) get an inmate trust fund statement from a federal or local correctional facility if you were transferred from such a facility. N.Y. C.P.L.R. 1101(f)(1) (McKinney 1997 & Supp. 2006).

99. N.Y. C.P.L.R. 1101(f)(2) (McKinney 1997 & Supp. 2006).

100. N.Y. C.P.L.R. 1101(f)(2) (McKinney 1997 & Supp. 2006).

101. However, please note that the statute states that "in no event shall an inmate be prohibited from proceeding for the reason that the inmate has no assets and no means by which to pay the initial partial filing fee." N.Y. C.P.L.R. 1101(f)(2)(ii) (McKinney 1997 & Supp. 2006).

102. N.Y. C.P.L.R. 1101(f)(2) (McKinney 1997 & Supp. 2006).

103. N.Y. C.P.L.R. 2101(c) (McKinney 1997 & Supp. 2006).

104. N.Y. C.P.L.R. 305(c) (McKinney 2001).

of the hearing and the name of the judge on every paper that you send to the respondent if the court clerk sends you this information.

You must be careful to serve your petition to the official or agency you have named as respondent and to the New York State Attorney General.[105] (The Attorney General will represent the state in the proceeding.)

If you are using an Order to Show Cause, the respondents must receive these items before the time specified by the court in the Order to Show Cause. If you are using a Notice of Petition, the respondents must receive these items at least twenty days before the court date.[106] A Verified Petition, supporting affidavits, and either an Order to Show Cause or a Notice of Petition must be served within four months and fifteen days after you receive the decision.[107] It is important to serve papers far enough ahead so that there is time to complete the proof of service requirement, which also must be completed in four months and fifteen days.[108] You must serve the Attorney General by personal service unless you get special permission to do otherwise.[109] You can get this special permission by making a request for it in your Order to Show Cause. If you are serving a state agency, you can serve either the chief executive officer or a person assigned by him to receive service, by personal service or by sending the documents by certified mail, return receipt requested, with "URGENT LEGAL MAIL" written on the front in capital letters.[110] Service is not complete until the certified mail is received by the agency to which it is sent.

As a prisoner, you may have a great deal of trouble accomplishing service. The two most common means of service are personal service and mail.[111] Each poses problems for prisoners.

(a) Personal Service

Personal service means someone (the "server") actually approaches, identifies, and personally hands a person the paperwork. The server then describes and swears in an affidavit to exactly what she did, and this affidavit is turned over to the court to demonstrate proof of service. A prisoner could serve the agency personally either by asking someone on the outside to hand over the paperwork, or by employing a professional service agency (which can be expensive).

(b) Service by Mail

Service by mail is permitted in many situations, but not when dealing with the government. One such case is serving the Attorney General, and if you are not able to personally serve the Attorney General, you should include an Order to Show Cause requesting authorization to serve by mail in the material that you originally send the court.[112] If you cannot serve the state agency by registered mail, return receipt requested, you should also include an Order to Show Cause asking to serve the state agency in an alternative manner. In the Order to Show Cause, you should specifically explain the process you must go through at your institution to mail the documents so that the court will authorize that particular process. If there are any other difficulties in serving process that make it very difficult or impossible to accomplish in the prescribed time, tell the court now and ask for additional time.[113] In the past, courts have allowed prisoners to use the

---

105. N.Y. C.P.L.R. 7804(c) (McKinney 1994).

106. N.Y. C.P.L.R. 7804(c) (McKinney 1994).

107. N.Y. C.P.L.R. 306-b (McKinney 2001 & Supp. 2006) (effectively sets time limit for service); N.Y. C.P.L.R. 7804(c) (McKinney 1994) (stating that Notice of Petition, petition, and supporting affidavits all need to be served); see Long Island Citizens Campaign, Inc. v. County of Nassau, 165 A.D.2d 52, 55, 565 N.Y.S.2d 852, 855 (2d Dept. 1991) (holding that the petition must be served along with the Notice of Petition or Order to Show Cause).

108. N.Y. C.P.L.R. 306-b (McKinney 2001 & Supp. 2004 & Supp. 2006).

109. N.Y. C.P.L.R. 307(1) (McKinney 2001); see Lowrance v. Coughlin, 190 A.D.2d 915, 915, 593 N.Y.S.2d 597, 598 (3d Dept. 1993) (holding that without a court order, personal jurisdiction may not be obtained over an Attorney General by serving him or her via mail).

110. N.Y. C.P.L.R. 307(2) (McKinney 2001 & Supp. 2006).

111. Electronic means and overnight delivery service have also become possibilities in some circumstances. See N.Y. C.P.L.R. 2103(b) (McKinney 1997 & Supp. 2006).

112. Onorato v. Scully, 170 A.D.2d 803, 803, 566 N.Y.S.2d 408, 409 (3d Dept. 1991) (noting that "service by mail, absent issuance of an order to show cause authorizing service by mail in lieu of personal service, is jurisdictionally defective" (quoting In re Dello v. Selsky, 135 A.D.2d 994, 995, 522 N.Y.S.2d 716, 717 (3d Dept. 1987))). See Appendix A at the end of this Chapter for a general example of an Order to Show Cause. Model your request on the example.

113. The main problem is that "mailing" has a specific legal definition under New York's Civil Practice Law and Rules:

"Mailing" means the deposit of a paper enclosed in a first class postpaid wrapper, addressed to the address mail services available to them. In fact, they sometimes give prisoners special permission to use the mail to serve the Attorney General, who normally must be served by personal service.[114] It is absolutely imperative that you ask the court clerk about serving process, and describe the process for mailing at your institution. Write a note that asks the clerk to provide specific instructions on exactly what you have to do to serve.

(c) Service by Filing

A final possibility is to ask if you can serve by filing pursuant to N.Y. Civil Practice Law and Rules 2103(d).[115] This rule is basically a catchall provision that says if no other means are available, service can be fulfilled by filing the documents you need to serve as if the service documents were papers that needed to be filed. This means that you would mail them to the court clerk. Just being in prison is not enough to trigger this provision. You would have to state a compelling reason why you could not serve in any other manner.

9. Proof of Service

Proof of Service is evidence for the court that you have notified respondents that you are suing them. It is a form that you send the court stating that you served process. If someone else has served personally for you, that person must provide you with an "affidavit of service," which is an affidavit explaining the time, date and circumstances surrounding the event. Some professionals may have a certificate that they send to you. If you serve by mail, you may have to sign an affidavit saying that you mailed it, or you may have to include a copy of the receipt from certified mail. Another possibility, if you are allowed to use regular mail, is to send the court a receipt signed by the respondent, indicating that respondent received the package. This is called an acknowledgment. Whatever proof of service you have, you should submit it to the court.

10. The "Answer" by the Government and Your "Reply"

The document that the administrative official or agency files with the court in opposition to your petition is called the answer. The answer is a document that replies to each point in your petition by admitting, denying, or claiming lack of knowledge about it. With the answer, the respondent can also submit any affidavits or other documents to the court. The respondent is required to serve you with a copy of his answer as well as all attached documentary evidence no later than five days before the hearing date.[116]

When you receive the answer, you should read it carefully to see what arguments the government is making in response to your claim. Usually, the Attorney General's Office, rather than the respondent(s), writes the answer. If the respondent fails to file an answer within the allowed time, you can ask the court to rule in your favor. If the respondent has added allegations that were not included in your petition, if you want to challenge the accuracy of the transcript or other documents submitted by the respondent, or if the respondent has made a claim against you (a counterclaim), then you can submit an additional document to the court. Your response to the answer is called a reply. If you do not submit a reply to new facts alleged by the respondent in his answer, the court can view those facts as if you have admitted they are true.[117] You must serve the respondent with your reply at least one day before the hearing.

If you are seeking review of a discretionary decision made by an official or agency after a hearing, the respondent is required to submit a copy of the transcript of the hearing to the court with its answer. While the respondent is not required to serve you with a copy of the transcript, several courts have ruled against respondents who failed to provide the courts with administrative hearings transcripts.[118] > designated by a person for that purpose or, if none is designated, at that person's last known address, in a post office or official depository under the exclusive care and custody of the United States Postal Service within the state ....

N.Y. C.P.L.R. 2103(f)(1) (McKinney 1997 & Supp. 2007) (emphasis added). A prisoner generally does not have access to a depository under the exclusive care of the United States Postal Service and, therefore, cannot "mail" within the meaning of the statute. However, as noted above, courts commonly allow prisoners to serve by mail.

114. See Onorato v. Scully, 170 A.D.2d 803, 805, 566 N.Y.S.2d 408, 409 (3d Dept. 1991) (finding, in certain circumstances, a court may treat a prisoner's letter as an application to permit alternative service even where there is no order to show cause authorizing service by mail); In re Hanson, 103 A.D.2d 949, 949, 479 N.Y.S.2d 767, 768 (3d Dept. 1984) (interpreting prisoner's attempt to mail petition as an application for an order permitting alternative service, and remitting the case to the trial court such that the prisoner could submit an order to show cause).

115. N.Y. C.P.L.R. 2103(d) (McKinney 1997 & Supp. 2007).

116. N.Y. C.P.L.R. 7804(c), (e) (McKinney 1994 & Supp. 2007).

117. N.Y. C.P.L.R. 3018(a) (McKinney 1991 & Supp. 2007).

118. See Gittens v. Sullivan, 151 A.D.2d 481, 481, 542 N.Y.S.2d 272, 273 (2d Dept. 1989) (ordering respondent to

E. How to Bring an Article 78 Proceeding

To bring an Article 78 proceeding, you must complete the following steps before the deadlines:

(1) File the items listed below with the clerk of the court in which you are bringing the proceeding;
(2) Serve the respondent and the Attorney General's Office; and
(3) File proof of service with the court during the appropriate time period.

1. Deadlines

Four-month deadline for filing in court (step 1 above): You must file with the court within the statute of limitations period. If you do not, you will automatically lose your case. Remember, you cannot serve the respondent (step 2) until you receive an index number, which the court sends you after you have completed step 1. Plan your time accordingly.

Deadline for service and filing proof of service (steps 2 and 3 above): You must serve both the respondent(s) and the Attorney General and file "proof of service" with the appropriate court within four months and fifteen days after you receive the decision you are challenging. It will take some time to file proof of service, so remember to leave enough time after service to get this accomplished.

Example: If you receive a decision on December 1, 2011, you must file your appeal with the appropriate court before April 1, 2012. You must serve the respondents and the Attorney General's Office and file proof of service with the court before April 15, 2012.

2. Procedure

(a) Filing with the Court

As mentioned above, you need to send to the county supreme court clerk one original and one copy of each of the following:

(1) A Notice of Petition or an Order to Show Cause;
(2) A Verified Petition;
(3) All exhibits and supporting affidavits attached to the petition;
(4) Either the full filing fee or an affidavit that supports your claim that you cannot afford to pay the full filing fee. See discussion in Part D(6) above. If the court approves your request, it will charge you between fifteen and fifty dollars;
(5) Caution: If you fail to enclose either the full fee, or the reduced fee and the poor person's motion and affidavit, you will not get an index number. Without the index number, you cannot proceed with your claim.
(6) A "Request for Judicial Intervention" ("RJI"). Different courts apply different rules on these, so check with your court clerk to make sure you have complied with the RJI rules for your court;[119] and
(7) A "Request for an Index Number."

Mail these items to the correct court clerk and wait for an index number. After you receive the number, serve the respondents and Attorney General with the proper paperwork. You can make the copies by hand.

(b) Serving the Respondents and the Attorney General's Office

If you are using an Order to Show Cause, the respondents must receive these items before the time specified in the Order. If you are using a Notice of Petition, the respondents must receive the items at least twenty days before the court date. NOTE: if you are permitted to serve papers by mail, you must add five days to the deadline. So, you would mail your papers at least twenty-five days before the court date.[120]

(c) Proof of Service

It is important that proof of service on each respondent and the Attorney General be filed on time. Without a timely filing, the court will dismiss your case.

---

produce transcript of disciplinary hearing; if no transcript existed, agency's determination had to be voided and a new administrative hearing conducted); Arnot-Ogden Memorial Hosp. v. Axelrod, 95 A.D.2d 947, 949, 463 N.Y.S.2d 927, 930 (3d Dept. 1983) (holding that default judgment was proper, as respondent had repeatedly failed to produce transcript as ordered by the court).

119. N.Y. Comp. Codes. R. & Regs. tit. 22, § 202.6 (2000).

120. See N.Y. C.P.L.R. 2103 (b)(2) (McKinney 1997 & Supp. 2006).

(d) Refiling Your Petition

If your case is dismissed because you did not file proof of service on time, you have fifteen days from the date of dismissal to refile your petition and serve the respondents and the Attorney General. Be aware that not only will you have to pay the filing fee again, but you will also have to repeat the entire process.

3. How To Get Help From a Lawyer

Courts have the power, under Section 1102(a) of the N.Y. Civil Practice Law and Rules, to appoint a lawyer for you, but they do not have to.[121] Include a request for a court-appointed attorney in your request for a fee reduction or waiver. You can also contact the agencies in JLM, Appendix IV to see if they know a lawyer who will represent you for free. You should also read JLM, Chapter 4, "How to Find a Lawyer."

4. The Judgment

The court's decision about your Article 78 petition is called a judgment. The court has the power to render any judgment that it feels is appropriate. It can modify the decision of the administrative body, cancel it, make an entirely different decision, or send the case back to the administrative agency for a new hearing or decision (this is called a remand to the administrative agency).[122]

F. How to Appeal Your Article 78 Decision

If you lose your Article 78 proceeding and wish to appeal to the Appellate Division of the New York Supreme Court, professional legal help is important.[123] You can request that the appellate division assign you an attorney. Appealing an Article 78 decision is much more complicated than filing a petition in supreme court.[124] If you are thinking of appealing, you must serve a "Notice of Appeal" upon the New York State Attorney General and file the Notice with the court within thirty days of the entry of judgment denying your Article 78 petition.[125] Note that you must file the Notice of Appeal with the supreme court that decided your case, not with the appellate division. You should serve the Notice of Appeal first, and then file the Notice with proof of service. If you do not serve and file the notice of appeal within thirty days of the denial of your petition, the denial will be final and you will not be allowed to appeal it with or without a lawyer.

If you win in supreme court on your own, and the respondent files an appeal to the appellate division, you should petition the appellate division as soon as possible to appoint a lawyer for you on appeal. See the sample requests at the end of this Chapter. The respondent can get an automatic stay of the decision pending the outcome of the appeal.[126] This means the supreme court decision in your favor will not go into effect until the appeal has been decided. You can then move to have the court vacate (dismiss) the stay.

1. Where to Appeal

The Appellate Division of the New York Supreme Court has four departments. Each of these departments covers a different portion of New York State. Your appeal will take place in the department of the Appellate Division that contains the county where your Article 78 petition was decided against you.[127] Each of the four departments can have specific rules about the time limits and process of filing and

---

121. See N.Y. C.P.L.R. 1102(a) (McKinney 1997 & Supp. 2007).

122. N.Y. C.P.L.R. 7806 (McKinney 1994 & Supp. 2007).

123. See JLM, Chapter 4 and Appendix IV of the JLM for information on finding help from a lawyer.

124. See, e.g., N.Y. C.P.L.R. 5513, 5515, 5516, 5519, 5525, 5528 and 5701(b)(c) (McKinney 1995 & Supp. 2007).

125. N.Y. C.P.L.R. 5513, 5515 (McKinney 1995 & Supp. 2006). The notice of appeal is a simple form that is easy to prepare yourself. You can adapt the sample criminal notice of appeal found in JLM, Chapter 9; simply include your own case caption, your name and the respondent's name, the proper party titles (for example, "petitioner" and "respondent"), and state that the notice of appeal is filed pursuant to N.Y. C.P.L.R. 5513 (McKinney 1995 & Supp. 2007).

126. N.Y. C.P.L.R. 5519(a)(1) (McKinney 1995 & Supp. 2007).

127. The four departments are as follows: 1st Department—Bronx, New York (Manhattan); 2nd Department—Brooklyn, Dutchess, Kings (Brooklyn), Nassau, Orange, Putnam, Queens, Richmond, Rockland, Suffolk, Westchester; 3rd Department—Albany, Broome, Chemung, Chenango, Clinton, Columbia, Cortland, Delaware, Essex, Franklin, Fulton, Greene, Hamilton, Madison, Montgomery, Otsego, Rensselaer, St. Lawrence, Saratoga, Schenectady, Schoharie, Schuyler, Sullivan, Tioga, Tompkins, Ulster, Warren, Washington; 4th Department—Allegany, Cattaraugus, Cayuga, Chautauqua, Erie, Genesee, Herkimer, Jefferson, Lewis, Livingston, Monroe, Niagara, Oneida, Onondaga, Ontario, Orleans, Oswego, Seneca, Steuben, Wayne, Wyoming, Yates.

proceeding on an Article 78 appeal, so you must be sure to find out what, if any, specific documents or actions are required by your department for each step of your appeals process.[128]

2. Filing a Notice of Appeal ("Taking the Appeal")

Your first step in appealing an Article 78 decision is serving a Notice of Appeal on the Attorney General and filing the Notice of Appeal with the Clerk of the county where your judgment was decided, with proof of service upon the Attorney General.

In your notice, you must explain five important things:

(1) The decision that you are appealing;
(2) Which judge made the decision;
(3) The date on which the decision was made;
(4) What date the judgment was filed with the County Clerk; and
(5) What parts of the decision you want to appeal (you can appeal part of or the whole decision).

A filing fee of $315 may be required to file your notice, but you can request a reduced fee if you are unable to pay in full.[129] (You may serve your Notice of Appeal to the court and the Attorney General by mail; see Part D(8) above for information on serving documents.) Remember, you must serve and file the notice of appeal within thirty days of your petition's denial, or the decision will be final and you cannot appeal.[130]

3. Putting Together Your Record

In order for your appeal to go forward, you will need a record of your case so far. The record will include all of the information that has been filed in your case, except for any briefs that were filed. A record will likely have your original Article 78 petition, the answer from the Attorney General, your reply, if any, the exhibits for both parties, and all decisions and judgments made by the court that heard your case. It may also contain the transcript of the proceedings. You will also need to add a statement including the following information: (1) the index number of your case; (2) the full names of the original parties and any change in parties; (3) the court and county in which the proceeding began; (4) the date the proceeding started and the dates when you served your pleadings; (5) a brief description of what you are trying to do (appeal the decision in your case) and why; (6) whether the appeal is from a judgment, an order, or both, the dates of whatever judgments or orders you are appealing from, and the name of the judge who made the decision; and (7) a statement about which method of appeal you are using, either a full-record appeal or an original record appeal (which means you will not have to put together the record for your case yourself).[131]

Each of the four departments has different rules about what needs to be in the record for an appeal.[132] Generally, you should follow these two steps. First, assemble all documents listed above. Then, request the Appellate Court to subpoena your record from the lower court. (Though not all appellate courts are willing simply to obtain original records from the lower court, a court will usually do this for a pro se prisoner with poor person status.) Otherwise, you can read and follow the court rules for the department you are in.

4. Writing Your Brief

To proceed with your appeal you will also have to write a brief, a document including all the legal reasons the court should not have decided against you in your Article 78 petition. You must be as specific as possible about your reasons, and should cite the statutes, regulations and cases supporting your decision. You must also be specific about why the judge made the wrong decision in your case. Your brief will likely

---

128. You can find this information by looking up your court and department rules in McKinney's New York Rules of Court (2007). The relevant parts of the rules are as follows: N.Y. Ct. Rules Part 600 (1st Department); Part 670 (2nd Department); Part 800 (3rd Department); Part 1000 (4th Department).

129. N.Y. C.P.L.R. 8022(b) (McKinney 1981 & Supp. 2007). See N.Y. C.P.L.R. 1101(f) (McKinney 1997 & Supp. 2007) and Part D(6) of this chapter (above) for more information about requesting a reduced filing fee. The rules are different for each department. For example, the 4th Department has an entire section on Poor Persons. N.Y. Ct. Rules § 1000.14 (McKinney 2007).

130. N.Y. C.P.L.R. 5513, 5515 (McKinney 1995 & Supp. 2007).

131. N.Y. C.P.L.R. 5531 (McKinney 1995 & Supp. 2007).

132. See McKinney's New York Rules of Court for each department's particular rules: N.Y. Ct. Rules § 600.10 (McKinney 2007) (1st Department rules on the required form and content of your record), N.Y. Ct. Rules §§ 670.9, 670.10.1 (McKinney 2007) (2nd Department rules on records), N.Y. Ct. Rules § 800.5 (McKinney 2006) (3rd Department rules on records), and N.Y. Ct. Rules § 1000.4 (McKinney 2006) (4th Department rules on records).

need to contain a cover page with information about your case (such as the case name, docket number, lower court, and appellate court) as well as your name and address.[133] You will need to send the same number of copies of this brief to the court and the Attorney General as you are required to send of the record.

5. "Perfecting the Appeal": Submitting All Necessary Documents

To proceed in your appeal, you must do what is called "perfecting the appeal," which means submitting every document required by the court in which you are appealing, including record and brief, and any other document your department requires. Each department has a time limit within which to complete this.[134]

6. The Reply to Your Appeal

Once your brief is filed, the court will tell you when your case will be heard. When the court requires the Attorney General to file a brief on your case, you may file a reply brief, usually within a few days of receiving the Attorney General's brief.[135] You only need to file a reply brief if there are any issues raised by the Attorney General's brief that your first brief did not cover, or to show why the arguments and cases used by the Attorney General are weaker than your own. You do not need to restate the points you raised in your original brief. Some weeks after you have filed your reply brief, the court will inform you of its decision.

G. Conclusion

Article 78 is available to appeal decisions by state officials or agencies, but not courts, and only when you have exhausted other remedies. Since Article 78 petitions are your last chance to challenge administrative decisions, pay attention to Part A's requirements and Part D's procedures for filing or appealing a petition. Remember, you can only challenge decisions or actions you think are illegal, not just unfair. If you are unsure what type of petition is available, read Part B's possible complaints and actions, and Part C's limits on what you can challenge. Appendix A's sample forms and instructions will help you prepare a petition.

---

133. For information and requirements for your brief, see McKinney's New York Rules of Court for each department: N.Y. Ct. Rules § 600.10 (McKinney 2007) (1st Dept.); N.Y. Ct. Rules §§ 670.10, 670.10.3 (McKinney 2007) (2d Dept.); N.Y. Ct. Rules § 800.8 (McKinney 2006) (3d Dept.); N.Y. Ct. Rules § 1000.4 (McKinney 2007) (4th Dept.).

134. For example, in the 1st Department, you must have all documents filed within nine months of the date of your notice of appeal. N.Y. Ct. Rules § 600.11(a)(3) McKinney 2007). In the 2nd Department, the time limit is six months. N.Y. Ct. Rules § 670.8(e) (McKinney 2007). Both the 3rd and 4th Departments have a 60-day time limit. N.Y. Ct. Rules § 800.14(b) (McKinney 2006) and N.Y. Ct. Rules § 1000.12(a) (McKinney 2006).

135. In the 1st Department, you have nine days to reply from the day you are served with the Attorney General's brief. N.Y. Ct. Rules § 600.11(c) (McKinney 2006). In the 2nd, 3rd, and 4th Departments, you have 10 days from when the Attorney General serves the brief to reply. N.Y. Ct. Rules §§ 670.8(c)(3), 800.9 (c), 1000.2(e) (McKinney 2006).

APPENDIX A

SAMPLE ARTICLE 78 PETITIONS AND SUPPORTING PAPERS

This appendix contains the following materials:

A-1. Order to Show Cause
A-2. Affidavit in Support of Order to Show Cause
A-3. Notice of Petition
A-4. Article 78 Petition
A-5. Verification of Petition
A-6. Request for Judicial Intervention ("RJI")
A-7. Application for an Index Number
A-8. Affidavit in Support of Request for Reduction/Waiver of Fees

Part D of this Chapter explains what each of these papers is and how to use them, and you should read them carefully before proceeding. DO NOT TEAR THESE FORMS OUT OF THE JLM. You must copy them on your own paper, inserting the facts and language that apply to your case. You should type your papers if possible, or neatly handwrite them. You should use 8½ by 11 inch paper. Do not include the bracketed or italicized material in your papers. This material is included simply as an example of the type of information that you should include from your own case. The endnotes following the sample documents tell you how to fill in the necessary information.

If you need to know the name or address of the court to which you should send these papers, read this Chapter and then look in Appendix II at the end of the JLM. Appendix II lists the addresses of the New York state courts. For an introduction to the court system and the legal process, see JLM, Chapter 5, "Choosing a Court and a Lawsuit."

A-1. ORDER TO SHOW CAUSE

At a Term of the Supreme Court of the State of New York, held in and for the County of _____ on the __th day of _____, 20____.[1]

Present: Hon. _____, Justice[2]

SUPREME COURT OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK
COUNTY OF _____[3]

In the Matter of the Application of _____,[4] Petitioner, - against - _____,[6] Respondent, For a Judgment Pursuant to Article 78 of the Civil Practice Law and Rules	ORDER TO SHOW CAUSE Index No. _____[5]

Upon the annexed affidavit in support of an Order to Show Cause of _____,[7] verified on the ____th day of _____, 20____,[8] the Verified Petition,[9] and _____[10] sworn to on the _____th day of _____, 20___,[11] it is ORDERED that respondent _____[12] show cause at a Term of this Court, to be held in the County of _____ [13] on the _____th day of _____, 20____,[14] or as soon thereafter as counsel may be heard, why a judgment should not be made and entered in this matter pursuant to Article 78 of the Civil Practice Law and Rules:

VACATING and setting aside Respondent's determination of [June 15, 2000] [assigning petitioner to 120 days confinement in the Special Housing Unit (solitary confinement, "SHU")] because [the underlying Superintendent's Hearing is null and void];[15]

DIRECTING Respondent to [expunge all entries of said Superintendent's Hearing and the resulting disposition thereof from all of petitioner's records and restore petitioner in all respects to the status he enjoyed prior to the commencement of said Superintendent's Hearing];[16]

GRANTING such other and further relief as the Court may deem just and proper. It is further ORDERED that pending the hearing of this special proceeding and pursuant to section 7805 of the N.Y. Civil Practice Law and Rules, Respondent and all other officers, employees, agents, attorneys and persons working in active concert or participation with Respondent are stayed and prohibited from taking action related to or enforcing Respondent's determination of _____, 20____.[17] It is further ORDERED that service of a copy of this order, together with the papers upon which it is granted, upon both the Respondent _____[18] and the Attorney General, by mail, on or before _____ _____, 20____,[19] shall be deemed sufficient.

ENTER:

_____[20]
JUSTICE OF THE SUPREME COURT

A-2. AFFIDAVIT IN SUPPORT OF ORDER TO SHOW CAUSE

SUPREME COURT OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK
COUNTY OF _____[21]

In the Matter of the Application of	:
	:
_____,[22]	:	AFFIDAVIT IN
Petitioner,	:	SUPPORT OF ORDER
	:	TO SHOW CAUSE
- against -	:
	:	Index No. ____[23]
_____,[24]	:
Respondent,	:
	:
For a Judgment Pursuant to Article 78	:
of the Civil Practice Law and Rules	:

STATE OF NEW YORK)
COUNTY OF _____[25] ss:)

I, _____,[26] being duly sworn, depose and say:

1. I am the petitioner in the above-entitled proceeding.

2. I make this affidavit in support of my annexed application for an Order to Show Cause to prosecute the attached petition pursuant to Article 78 of the Civil Practice Law and Rules which challenges _____ _____.[27]

3. _____
[28]

4. Petitioner seeks to proceed by Order to Show Cause rather than by Notice of Petition because _____.[29]

5. Petitioner, being incarcerated, also cannot effect personal service of the within papers and respectfully requests that timely service by mail be deemed sufficient.

6. Petitioner designates _____[30] County as the place of venue.

7. No previous application for the relief requested herein has been made.[31]

8. I have moved by the annexed affidavit for a reduction/waiver of the filing fees.[32]

WHEREFORE, petitioner respectfully requests that this Court enter an order directing Respondent to show cause why a judgment should not be made and entered pursuant to Article 78 of the Civil Practice Law and Rules ____[33] and granting such other and further relief as the Court may deem just and proper.

_____[34]
_____[35]
Sworn to before me this
__th day of _____, 20__
_____[36]
NOTARY PUBLIC

A-3. NOTICE OF PETITION

SUPREME COURT OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK
COUNTY OF _____[37]

In the Matter of the Application of _____,[38]
Petitioner,
- against -	NOTICE OF PETITION
	Index No. _____[39]
_____,[40]
Respondent,
For a Judgment Pursuant to Article 78 of the Civil Practice Law and Rules

To _____:[41]

PLEASE TAKE NOTICE that upon the annexed petition of _____,[42] verified the [18th day of July, 2000],[43] and the annexed affidavit of [Roberta A. Smith],[44] sworn to on the [18th day of July, 2000],[45] petitioner will apply to this Court on the [18th day of August, 2000],[46] or as soon thereafter as counsel may be heard, for a judgment granting the relief requested in the annexed Petition.

PLEASE TAKE FURTHER NOTICE that you must serve a verified answer, any supporting affidavits and documents, and a certified transcript of the record of the proceeding at least five days before this application is made.[47]

Petitioner designates _____County as the place of trial. The basis of venue is _____ _____[48]

[49]

[Sign your name]

[Print your name]
Dated:_____, 20____

A-4. ARTICLE 78 PETITION

SUPREME COURT OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK
COUNTY OF _____[50]

In the Matter of the Application of
_____,[51] Petitioner,
- against -	PETITION
_____,[53] Respondent,	Index No. ____[52]
For a Judgment Pursuant to Article 78 of the Civil Practice Law and Rules

To THE SUPREME COURT OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK FOR _____ COUNTY:

The petition of _____,[54] complaining of the Respondent _____,[55] respectfully alleges:

1. Petitioner _____[56] is an inmate at _____,[57] _____,[58] New York.

2. Respondent [Ronald R. Roe, Superintendent of Ossining Correctional Facility, is petitioner's legal custodian and is charged with the overall supervision and administration of Ossining].[59]

3. This petition challenges [disciplinary action taken on June 15, 2000], when respondent, [pursuant to a Superintendent's Hearing,] had determined to [place him in the Special Housing Unit ("SHU," solitary confinement) for a period of 120 days].[60]

4. The within proceeding is brought pursuant to C.P.L.R. Article 78 to challenge the final determination of _____, dated _____.[61]

5. [On June 9, 2000, while confined to a private room/cell in the infirmary at Ossining Correctional Facility, petitioner began to feel claustrophobic and believed he was suffering from an asthmatic episode.][62]

6. [Corrections Officers Smith and Brown were called to the infirmary to restrain petitioner so that he could be given an injection to subdue him.]

7. [Petitioner was in an agitated state because he believed that he was going to be given a dose of anti-psychotic medication.]

8. [Once the officers arrived, they ordered petitioner to stand to the side of the room. He did not comply with this order.]

9. [Once the officers were in petitioner's room, he raised his hands and spoke to the officers to indicate that he did not want to receive medication. The officers reported, however, that when petitioner raised his hands, his fists were clenched.]

10. [The officers then grabbed petitioner and held him while the nurse administered an injection. Then they escorted petitioner to the Mental Health Unit where he was placed in a special observation cell ("dry cell").]

11. [On June 10, 2000, while in the observation cell, petitioner was served with a misbehavior report, charging him with violation of the following inmate rules: 100.11 (attempted assault) and 106.10 (refusing a direct order). A copy of the misbehavior report is attached as Exhibit 1.]

12. [The Superintendent's Hearing was commenced on June 15, 2000, while petitioner was still confined in the Mental Health Unit. Petitioner pleaded not guilty to the charges.]

13. [The hearing officer read into the record reports written by Correction Officers Smith and Brown. Neither report alleged that petitioner had attempted to assault either of the officers. (Copies of these reports are attached as Exhibits 2 and 3.)]

14. [The hearing officer then found petitioner guilty of both charges and imposed a penalty of 120 days confinement in the SHU, finding that the mere raising of hands with fists clenched constituted an attempt to assault.]

15. [Petitioner did not attempt to strike either officer, however. Neither officer's report indicated otherwise. The reports stated in a conclusory fashion that petitioner "raised his fists in an attempt to strike" the officers. Without further clarification, this statement is insufficient to conclude that petitioner attempted to assault either officer. Petitioner was not given an opportunity to present witnesses on his behalf.]

16. [Furthermore, the hearing officer made no inquiry into petitioner's mental state at the time of the incident or at the time of the hearing, even though the incident arose because the staff had decided petitioner was out of control and would have to be medicated by force, and even though petitioner was housed in the Mental Health Unit at the time of the hearing. Petitioner's mental state affected his responsibility for his actions and his ability to proceed at the hearing.]

17. Respondent's determination was [arbitrary, capricious, and an abuse of discretion] because [the hearing was held at a time when petitioner was incompetent to proceed on his own behalf, petitioner had no opportunity to present witnesses on his behalf, and respondent failed to determine petitioner's mental state. Because petitioner had suffered a claustrophobic attack and sudden involuntary medication, he cannot be held responsible for refusing the direct order.][63]

18. [No previous application has been made for the requested relief.][64]

WHEREFORE, petitioner respectfully requests that judgment be entered pursuant to Article 78 of the Civil Practice Law and Rules:

[1. VACATING and setting aside Respondent's determination of June 15, 2000, assigning petitioner to 120 days confinement in the Special Housing Unit (solitary confinement, "SHU") because the underlying Superintendent's Hearing is null and void;

2. DIRECTING Respondent to expunge all entries of said Superintendent's Hearing and the resulting disposition thereof from all of petitioner's records and restore petitioner in all respects to the status he enjoyed prior to the commencement of said Superintendent's Hearing;

3. GRANTING such other and further relief as the Court may deem just and proper.][65]

_____[66]

[your name]

Petitioner, pro se.[67]

Dated:____

[68]

A-5. VERIFICATION OF PETITION

VERIFICATION[69]
STATE OF NEW YORK)
COUNTY OF _____[70] ss.:)

_____,[71] being duly sworn, deposes and says that deponent is the petitioner in the above-encaptioned proceeding, that [he/she] has read the foregoing petition and knows the contents thereof, that the same is true to deponent's own knowledge, except as to matters therein stated upon information and belief, which matters deponent believes to be true.

_____[72]

Sworn to before me this

__th day of _____, 20__

_____
NOTARY PUBLIC [73]

A-6. REQUEST FOR JUDICIAL INTERVENTION

REQUEST FOR JUDICIAL INTERVENTION
Index No.__[74]
Supreme Court ___[75] County
Date Purchased___

___
PLAINTIFF(S):[76]
IAS entry date:____
Judge Assigned:___

___
DEFENDANTS(S):[77]
RJI Date:__
_____-

NATURE OF JUDICIAL INTERVENTION:
[][78] Order to Show Cause
(Clerk enter return date_____)[79]
[][80] Notice of Petition (return _____)[81]
NATURE OF ACTION OR PROCEEDING
SPECIAL PROCEEDINGS
[] Art. 78
Is this proceeding against a:
[Yes/No] Municipality: _____[82][Yes/No] Public Authority: _____[83]
[Yes/No] Does this proceeding seek equitable relief?[84]
[Yes/No] Does this proceeding seek recovery for personal injury?[85]
[Yes/No] Does this proceeding seek recovery for property damage?[86]
Estimated time period for case to be ready for trial: 0-12 months
Attorney for Plaintiff(s):
Name[87] Address Phone
Attorney for Defendant(s):
Name[88] Address Phone
RELATED CASES:
Title[89] Index Number Court Nature of Relationship

I affirm under penalty of perjury that, to my knowledge, other than as noted above, there are and have been no related actions or proceedings, nor has a request for judicial intervention previously been filed in this proceeding.

Dated: ____[90]

___

(Signature)

___

(Print Name)

A-7. APPLICATION FOR AN INDEX NUMBER

INDEX NUMBER[91]

Application for INDEX NUMBER pursuant to section 8018, New York Civil Practice Law & Rules
Title of Action: ARTICLE 78[92]
[David Smith
v.
William Jones, Commissioner of the Department of Correctional Services]
Name and address of Attorney for Plaintiff or Petitioner Telephone No.[93] (PRO SE)
Name and address of Attorney for Defendant or Respondent Telephone No.[94]
A. Nature of Special Proceeding Article 78 Proceeding
B. Application for Index Number filed by: ü Plaintiff ü Defendant
C. Was a previous Third Party Action filed? ü Yesü No

COMPLETE Do Not Detach THIS STUB

Supreme Court,[95] _____ County

_____ [96]

v.

_____ [97] INDEX NUMBER:[98]

A-8. AFFIDAVIT IN SUPPORT OF REQUEST FOR REDUCTION/WAIVER OF FEES

SUPREME COURT OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK
COUNTY OF _____[99]

In the Matter of the Application of
_____,[100]	Affidavit in Support of Application for Fee Reduction/Waiver Pursuant to N.Y.C.P.L.R. 1101(f)
Petitioner,
- against -
	Index No. _____[101]
_____,[102]
Respondent,
For a Judgment Pursuant to Article 78 of the Civil Practice Law and Rules

I, _____,[103] being duly sworn, hereby declare as follows:

1. I am the petitioner in the above-entitled proceeding, I am an inmate in a state correctional facility [place of incarceration: _____][104], and I submit this affidavit in support of my application for a reduction of the filing fees pursuant to N.Y. C.P.L.R. 1101(f) (and that an attorney be assigned to represent me).[105]

2. I currently receive income from the following sources, exclusive of correctional facility wages:_____ _____.

3. I own the following valuable property (other than miscellaneous personal property):

[List property:]	[Value:]
_____	_____
_____	_____

4. I have no savings, property, assets, or income other than as set forth herein.

5. I am unable to pay the filing fee necessary to prosecute this proceeding.

6. No other person who is able to pay the filing fee has a beneficial interest in the result of this proceeding.

7. The facts of my case are described in my claim and other papers filed with the court.

8. I have made no prior request for this relief in this case.

_____
(signature)
Sworn to before me this ____ day of _____, 20____.

_____[106]
NOTARY PUBLIC AUTHORIZATION

I, _____,[107] inmate number _____, [108] request and authorize the agency holding me in custody to send to the Clerk of the Court certified copies of the correctional facility trust fund account statement (or the institutional equivalent) for the past six months.

I further request and authorize the agency holding me in custody to deduct the filing fee from my correctional facility trust fund account (or the institutional equivalent) and to disburse those amounts as instructed by the Court. This authorization is furnished in connection with the above entitled case and shall apply to any agency into whose custody I may be transferred.

I UNDERSTAND THAT I MAY HAVE TO PAY THE ENTIRE FEE IF THE COURT DENIES MY REQUEST FOR A FEE REDUCTION. MOREOVER, I UNDERSTAND THAT THE FEE DETERMINED BY THE COURT WILL BE PAID IN INSTALLMENTS BY AUTOMATIC DEDUCTIONS FROM MY CORRECTIONAL FACILITY TRUST FUND ACCOUNT EVEN IF MY CASE IS DISMISSED.

_____[109]

(signature)

Fill in the forms shown in Appendix A as follows.

---

1. Name of the county in which the case will be filed, in all capital letters. When filling in county names, note that each borough of New York City is a county of New York State, but some of them have different names: Manhattan is New York County; Brooklyn is Kings County; and Staten Island is Richmond County. See N.Y. C.P.L.R. 506(b) (McKinney 1994 & Supp. 1999). The court clerk will fill in the date.

2. The clerk or judge will fill this in. You should leave this blank.

3. Name of the county the court is in, in capital letters.

4. Your name in capital letters.

5. Leave blank.

6. Name, in all capital letters, of the officer or agency whose determination you are attacking (the respondent). In most cases, prisoners will name the superintendent of the prison. You may name more than one respondent; if you do, do not forget to change the wording in your papers to refer consistently to all the respondents.

7. Your name.

8. Here, you should give the date the petition was approved/verified. See Appendix A-4 for a sample petition and Appendix A-5 for a sample verification.

9. A sample petition is contained in Appendix A-4.

10. Insert any other papers you are submitting with this Order.

11. The date you signed and notarized your documents.

12. Print or type in all capital letters the name of the respondent.

13. County in which you are filing the petition.

14. Leave this blank. The judge will fill in the information about the date.

15. Do not copy the bracketed material. You should briefly explain in your own words exactly what the respondent did to you and why you think it was incorrect.

16. Again, do not copy the bracketed language. Explain in your own words what you want the court to do for you.

17. This paragraph is the "stay" described in Part D. The "stay" will be in effect until the hearing date. The date you insert here is the date of the administrative decision you disagree with and want the court to reverse. Until the court decides your case, this order will prevent the respondent from enforcing the administrative decision you are challenging.

18. Respondent's name.

19. Leave this blank. The judge will fill in the date.

20. Leave this blank. The judge will sign on the line.

21. Name of the county the court is in, in capital letters.

22. Your name in capital letters.

23. Leave blank.

24. Name, in all capital letters, of the officer or agency whose determination you are attacking (the respondent). In most cases, prisoners will name the superintendent of the prison. You may name more than one respondent; if you do, do not forget to change the wording in your papers to refer consistently to all the respondents.

25. Name of the county in which you are making this affidavit.

26. Your name.

27. Write in the decision you are complaining about and the date of the decision.

28. This paragraph should state the relevant facts and why the decision you disagree with is wrong. It should explain the statement of the claims you made in the Order to Show Cause. If there are many issues, organize your statements and arguments into several paragraphs, each dealing with a separate issue. Remember: this is a sworn statement, and it is a crime to include anything you know is a lie. If you want to include a statement you think is true, but you are not completely sure about it, you can say that you are making the statement "upon information and belief."

29. This paragraph should state why you are using an Order to Show Cause instead of a Notice of Petition. (See Part D(2) on the difference between an Order to Show Cause and Notice of Petition and the requirements for proceeding by Order to Show Cause.) You should be sure to explain: (1) why a hearing is needed as soon as possible, but within 20 days (for example, you may be worried about being placed in solitary confinement before 20 days are up); and (2) why a stay is needed (for example, you do not want to wrongfully be placed in solitary confinement before you have a chance for the court review your case).

The reasons for these requests may be similar (as they are in the examples above), but you should explain them both. It is a good practice to argue that you will be "irreparably injured" if the court does not grant a stay and a speedy hearing—this means that you will be hurt in a way that the court will not be able to fix later if the officer's or agency's decision takes effect before you have had a chance to contest it in the hearing.

30. Name of the county in which you are filing.

31. Make sure you include this statement only if this is the first time you have asked for a review of the decision. If you have applied for similar relief, explain why it was inadequate or why changed circumstances have caused you to bring this action.

32. Include this statement if you are attaching an application to request for a reduction or waiver of fees. See Appendix A-8, Affidavit in Support of Request for Reduction/Waiver of Fees.

33. This paragraph basically states what you would like the court to do for you. You should copy the language of the paragraphs numbered 1 and 2 of the Order to Show Cause. See Appendix A-1. You can write them out as part of this sentence without separating them into paragraphs.

34. Sign your name here in the presence of a notary public.

35. Print or type your name and address.

36. This is where the notary public notarizes the affidavit by signing it and fixing his or her official seal to it. If you have difficulty obtaining the services of a notary public, you should have another prisoner witness your signature. (Use this technique only as a last resort.) If another prisoner is your witness, you should add at the bottom of the affidavit:

> I declare that I have not been able to have this [affidavit] notarized according to law because [explain here your efforts to get the affidavit notarized]. I therefore declare under penalty of perjury that all of the statements made in this [affidavit] are true to my own knowledge, and I pray leave of the Court to allow this [affidavit] to be filed without notarization.
>
> [Your signature]

37. Name of the county the court is in, in capital letters.

38. Your name in capital letters.

39. Leave blank.

40. Name, in all capital letters, of the officer or agency whose determination you are attacking (the respondent). In most cases, prisoners will name the superintendent of the prison. You may name more than one respondent; if you do, do not forget to change the wording in your papers to refer consistently to all the respondents.

41. Respondent's name in capital letters.

42. Your name.

43. Give the date you sign your petition.

44. List each affidavit (sworn statement) included in your papers. You can, for example, ask witnesses to the facts of your case to make affidavits to strengthen your petition.

45. This is the date on which the witness signed the affidavit.

46. Set a court date far enough ahead so that the respondent will have 20 days notice by the time he or she receives the Notice of Petition and petition.

47. The respondent is required to submit a certified transcript (written record) of any administrative hearing that was held. If you are seeking review of an official's or agency's failure to act or perform an administrative duty, then there will be no transcript, so do not include the demand for one.

48. Here you should write in the name of the county that the court is in. You should also briefly explain why you chose this court. Generally all you need to say is you are filing in this county because the decision you are challenging was made in this county. "Venue" simply refers to the location of the court. See N.Y. C.P.L.R. 506(b) (McKinney 2003).

49. Sign here and print your name clearly underneath.

50. Name of the county the court is in, in capital letters.

51. Your name in capital letters.

52. Leave blank.

53. Name, in all capital letters, of the officer or agency whose determination you are attacking (the respondent). In most cases, prisoners will name the superintendent of the prison. You may name more than one respondent; if you do, do not forget to change the wording in your papers to refer consistently to all the respondents.

54. Your name in capital letters.

55. Respondent's name(s) in capital letters.

56. Your name.

57. Name of prison in which you are incarcerated.

58. Address of prison.

59. Do not copy the bracketed words. Write the respondent's name and state his or her, or its duties that resulted in the decision or action you are challenging. If the respondent is the Board of Parole, for example, you could state that the New York State Board of Parole is responsible for deciding whether or not to parole a prisoner.

60. Again, do not copy the bracketed words. You should give the date when you were told about the decision that you are complaining of and briefly describe the decision. If you are requesting that the court order the respondent to do something required by law, you should explain that the respondent has not performed its duty.

61. In this paragraph, you should state how your administrative remedies have been exhausted.

62. Again, do not copy the bracketed words. State what happened in your own words, and be sure to include all of the facts the court might think are important. Then state why you think the decision was incorrectly made. If you know of a specific law that applies, you should include it in your statement. This section will usually run for several paragraphs; separate each issue or argument into different paragraphs to make your petition more understandable.

The sample facts and argument in this and following paragraphs have been shortened for reasons of space and clarity. You will want to go into more detail than is given here.

63. Here you should state the particular legal mistake that the respondent made in making the determination that you are challenging. Refer to Part B of this Chapter for a description of the basic legal reasons why decisions may be challenged in an Article 78 proceeding. They are

That the respondent failed or refused to perform a duty required by law (this would include constitutional violations and violations of Department of Correctional Services regulations);

That the respondent exceeded his or her legal authority;

That the respondent's determination was arbitrary, capricious, or an abuse of discretion; or

That the respondent's determination was not supported by substantial evidence.

You can change these words to fit your case's facts, as long as your complaint falls within one of the Part B categories.

64. In this line, you should state whether you have or you have not filed a previous challenge to the administrative determination that you want the court to review.

65. Here you should state what you want the court to do to correct the respondent's mistake. Be sure to request the court to declare the determination that you are challenging void (without legal force). You should also specifically request what needs to be done to set the situation right and undo the mistake, or prevent it from taking effect. For example, you could request that the court issue an order "DIRECTING respondent to restore petitioner's good-time credit," "ENJOINING (prohibiting) Respondent from transferring petitioner to any other facility" (if your transfer has not yet taken place), etc.

66. Sign your name here and print your name underneath.

67. "Pro se" means that you are appearing by yourself, without a lawyer.

68. Write the date when you are signing the papers, followed by your complete mailing address. You must also include a verification, a sample of which follows.

69. A verification is a brief affidavit in which you swear to the truth of the statements you make in a legal paper, such as an Article 78 petition. Your petition will not be accepted without a verification.

70. Name of the county in which the affidavit is signed, in capital letters.

71. Your name.

72. Sign your name here in the presence of a notary public.

73. This is where the notary public notarizes the affidavit by signing it and fixing his or her official seal to it. If you have difficulty obtaining the services of a notary public, you should have another prisoner witness your signature. (Use this technique only as a last resort.) If another prisoner is your witness, you should add at the bottom of the affidavit:

> I declare that I have not been able to have this [verification] notarized according to law because [explain here your efforts to get the verification notarized]. I therefore declare under penalty of perjury that all of the statements made in this [verification] are true to my own knowledge, and I pray leave of the Court to allow this [verification] to be filed without notarization.
>
> [Your signature]

74. The court will fill in this blank.

75. Write the name of the county where you are bringing the action.

76. Write your name.

77. Write the name of the respondents.

78. If you are filing an Order to Show Cause, check this box.

79. If you are filing an Order to Show Cause, write the date you suggest the case be heard.

80. If you are filing a Notice of Petition, check this box.

81. If you are filing a Notice of Petition, write the date you suggest the case be heard.

82. Write "no" unless you are suing a city.

83. Write "yes" if you are suing any public officials or government agencies.

84. Write "yes" if you are seeking to prevent an agency or official from acting in a way which is harmful to you.

85. Write "yes" if you want to recover for injuries suffered by you.

86. Write "yes" if you want to recover for property damage. If not, write "no."

87. Write your name and address.

88. Write the name and address of the respondents.

89. If you have previously brought an Article 78 proceeding that is related to the Article 78 proceeding you are currently bringing, write the title, index number, court and nature of relationship of that proceeding.

90. Write the date.

91. Leave this box empty. Do not write in a number.

92. Write the name of your action.

93. Write your name and address.

94. Write the name and address of the respondent.

95. Write the name of the county in which you are bringing the action.

96. Write your name as the petitioner.

97. Write the name and official title of the respondent or respondents.

98. Leave this blank. Do not write a number.

99. Name of the county the court is in, in capital letters.

100. Your name in capital letters.

101. Leave blank.

102. Name, in all capital letters, of the officer or agency whose determination you are attacking (the respondent). In most cases, prisoners will name the superintendent of the prison. You may name more than one respondent; if you do, do not forget to change the wording in your papers to refer consistently to all the respondents.

103. Your name.

104. Name and address of your correctional facility.

105. Include this part of the sentence if you would like to request that a lawyer represent you.

106. This is where the notary public notarizes the affidavit by signing it and fixing his or her official seal to it. If you have difficulty obtaining the services of a notary public, you should have another prisoner witness your signature. (Use this technique only as a last resort.) If another prisoner is your witness, you should add at the bottom of the affidavit:

> I declare that I have not been able to have this [affidavit] notarized according to law because [explain here your efforts to get the affidavit notarized]. I therefore declare under penalty of perjury that all of the statements made in this [affidavit] are true to my own knowledge, and I pray leave of the Court to allow this [affidavit] to be filed without notarization.
>
> [Your signature].

107. Your name.

108. Your inmate number.

109. Your signature. By signing this section, you give permission for your facility to send the Court copies of your trust fund account statement. You also authorize the facility to withdraw the filing fee from your account and to send it to the Court. The entire filing fee will be withdrawn automatically from your account even if your case is dismissed.

A JAILHOUSE LAWYER'S MANUAL

Chapter 23: Your Right to Adequate Medical Care

Columbia Human Rights Law Review

Ninth Edition 2011

Legal Disclaimer

A Jailhouse Lawyer's Manual is written and updated by members of the Columbia Human Rights Law Review. The law prohibits us from providing any legal advice to prisoners. This information is not intended as legal advice or representation nor should you consider or rely upon it as such. Neither the JLM nor any information contained herein is intended to or shall constitute a contract between the JLM and any reader, and the JLM does not guarantee the accuracy of the information contained herein. Additionally, your use of the JLM should not be construed as creating an attorney-client relationship with the JLM staff or anyone at Columbia Law School. Finally, while we have attempted to provide information that is up-to-date and useful, because the law changes frequently, we cannot guarantee that all information is current.

CHAPTER 23

YOUR RIGHT TO ADEQUATE MEDICAL CARE*

A. Introduction

The U.S. Constitution requires prison officials to provide all state and federal prisoners and pretrial detainees (people in jail waiting for trial) with adequate medical care.[1] If you think your right to medical care might have been violated, this Chapter will help you determine whether you have a legal claim for which you can get relief.

Part B of this Chapter explains your right to medical care under the federal Constitution and state law. Part C gives specific examples of health care categories for which you might have rights to medical care (diagnosed conditions, elective procedures, psychiatric care, exposure to second-hand smoke, and dental care). Part D is about special medical issues for women prisoners, including the right to basic medical and gynecological care, abortions, and accommodations for pregnant women. Part E talks about your right to receive information about your medical treatment before being treated and your right to keep your medical information confidential in prison. Part F explains the possible ways to seek relief in state and federal courts if your rights have been violated.

This Chapter will focus on federal law and some New York State laws. If you are a state prisoner, your right to adequate medical care might also be protected by your state's statutes, regulations, and tort law.[2] The New York Correction Law[3] and the Official Compilation of Codes, Rules, and Regulations of the State of New York explain the right to adequate medical care for New York State prisoners. If you are in prison in another state, be sure to research the law in that state.

The rights of prisoners with mental illnesses, infectious diseases, or disabilities present special issues not included in this Chapter. For more information about the rights of prisoners with mental health concerns, see Chapter 29 of the JLM, "Special Issues for Prisoners with Mental Illness." For more information about the rights of prisoners with infectious diseases (and the rights of prisoners to avoid exposure to infectious diseases), see Chapter 26 of the JLM, "Infectious Diseases: AIDS, Hepatitis, and Tuberculosis in Prisons." For more information on the rights of prisoners with disabilities, see Chapter 28 of the JLM, "Rights of Prisoners with Disabilities."

It is important that you speak up about any medical issue that you might have. If you end up going to court to pursue your right to adequate medical care, a judge will ask for evidence that you tried to obtain medical care in a variety of ways within the prison first. To prove a claim of exhaustion (meaning that you tried administrative remedies before going to court) you must show that you properly pursued the grievance procedure of the prison system. Additionally, if you bring a claim of "deliberate indifference" (discussed in Part B(1)), recording any requests for care or complaints made to guards and medical care professionals can help lay the groundwork for this claim. Keeping a record will also allow you to show that the defendants (prisons or prison guards) were aware of your medical problems (the "subjective component," discussed in Part B(1)(b)). The requirements for proving a defendant's personal involvement are more complicated. Be sure to make the prison officials around you aware of your health concerns as soon as they arise, and document any attempts you made through the proper channels to receive your desired medical care.

---

* This Chapter was revised by Priya Cariappa, based in part on previous versions by Erin LaFarge, Leah Threatte, Helen Respass, Pamela Addison, Susan Kraham, Gail Huggins, Erik Moulding-Johnson, Emmanuella Souffrant, and Richard F. Storrow. This Chapter was generally informed by John Boston's very helpful "Overview of Prisoners' Rights" (Updated for Second Circuit, Staff Attorneys Orientation, September 26, 2006). Special thanks to Milton Zelermyer of the Prisoners' Rights Project of the Legal Aid Society for his helpful comments.

1. See Spicer v. Williamson, 191 N.C. 487, 490, 132 S.E. 291, 293 (1926) ("It is but just that the public be required to care for the prisoner, who cannot by reason of the deprivation of his liberty, care for himself.").

2. As a state prisoner, you may bring a suit under either state law or federal law. See Part F(1) of this Chapter for a discussion of your options.

3. N.Y. Correct. Law § 45(3) (McKinney 2003 & Supp. 2009) (detailing the responsibilities of the Commission of Corrections, including the duty to "visit, inspect and appraise the management of correctional facilities with specific attention to matters such as safety, security, health of inmates, sanitary conditions" and other things that affect a prisoner's well-being).

If, after reading this chapter, you think you are not receiving adequate medical care, you should first try to protect your rights through the "administrative grievance procedures" that your prison has set up for grievances (complaints). Courts are likely to dismiss your case if you do not exhaust (use) all of the options available through your institution first.[4] To learn more about the inmate grievance procedure and exhaustion requirement, see Chapter 15 of the JLM, "Inmate Grievance Procedures." If you are unsuccessful or do not receive a favorable result through the inmate grievance procedure, you can then either bring a case under Section 1983 of Title 42 of the United States Code (42 U.S.C. § 1983), file a tort action in state court (or in the New York Court of Claims if you are in New York), or file an Article 78 petition in state court if you are in New York. More information on all of these types of cases can be found in Chapter 5 of the JLM, "Choosing a Court & a Lawsuit," Chapter 14 of the JLM, "The Prison Litigation Reform Act," Chapter 16 of the JLM, "Using 42 U.S.C. § 1983 and 28 U.S.C. § 1331 to Obtain Relief From Violations of Federal Law," Chapter 17 of the JLM, "The State's Duty to Protect You and Your Property: Tort Actions," and Chapter 22 of the JLM, "How to Challenge Administrative Decisions Using Article 78 of the New York Civil Practice Law and Rules."

If you decide to pursue any claim in federal court, you MUST read Chapter 14 of the JLM on the Prison Litigation Reform Act ("PLRA"). You should also be aware of the negative consequences of filing lawsuits that are deemed frivolous or malicious (lawsuits which are based on lies or filed for the sole purpose of harassing someone) under Section 1932 of Title 28 of the United States Code (28 U.S.C. § 1932).[5]

B. Source of the Right to Adequate Medical Care

1. Constitutional Law

The Eighth Amendment of the Constitution protects prisoners from "cruel and unusual punishment."[6] The U.S. Supreme Court has decided that failing to provide medical care to prisoners violates this amendment.[7] In 1976, the Court explained in Estelle v. Gamble that "deliberate indifference"—purposely ignoring the "serious medical needs" of prisoners—amounts to "cruel and unusual punishment" forbidden by the Eighth Amendment.[8]

In addition, the Supreme Court ruled that claims for a violation of the right to medical care have an objective component and a subjective component. A prisoner must first prove that the harm was "sufficiently serious" (the objective component).[9] A prisoner must also show that the prison official responsible for the

---

4. Porter v. Nussle, 534 U.S. 516, 519–20, 122 S. Ct. 983, 985–86, 152 L. Ed. 2d 12, 19 (2002) (finding all complaints about conditions and incidents in a correctional facility must first be taken through the administrative remedy procedure available at the facility before being brought to court); see also Booth v. Churner, 532 U.S. 731, 738–39, 121 S. Ct. 1819, 1823–24, 149 L. Ed. 2d 958, 965 (2001) (finding that it is mandatory to bring civil rights claims through the correctional institution's administrative procedures before bringing the claim to the court); Anderson v. XYZ Corr. Health Serv., 407 F.3d 674, 681 (4th Cir. 2005) (finding that prison officials can use as an affirmative defense the fact that a prisoner failed to exhaust his administrative remedies). Regardless of whether your complaint is about one incident, many incidents, or an ongoing condition, the court will not hear your complaint if your prison's grievance procedure provides a remedy for your problem and you have not used it.

5. 28 U.S.C. § 1932 (2006) states, in part, that for any civil action brought by a prisoner, the court may revoke earned good-time credit if the court finds that "the claim was filed for a malicious purpose."

6. U.S. Const. amend. VIII ("Excessive bail shall not be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted.").

7. Estelle v. Gamble, 429 U.S. 97, 104–05, 97 S. Ct. 285, 291, 50 L. Ed. 2d 251, 260 (1976) ("We therefore conclude that deliberate indifference to serious medical needs of prisoners constitutes the 'unnecessary and wanton infliction of pain' proscribed by the Eighth Amendment. This is true whether the indifference is manifested by prison doctors in their response to the prisoner's needs or by prison guards in intentionally denying or delaying access to medical care or intentionally interfering with the treatment once prescribed.").

8. Estelle v. Gamble, 429 U.S. 97, 104, 97 S. Ct. 285, 291, 50 L. Ed. 2d 251, 260 (1976) (citing Gregg v. Georgia, 428 U.S. 153, 173, 96 S. Ct. 2909, 2925, 49 L. Ed. 2d 859, 874 (1976)). In Estelle, a prisoner injured his back during his prison work assignment. Although the medical treatments the prisoner received showed that in his particular case the officials were not purposefully ignoring his medical needs, evidence of "deliberate indifference" may represent "cruel and unusual punishment" in other cases.

9. Wilson v. Seiter, 501 U.S. 294, 303–04, 111 S. Ct. 2321, 2326–27, 115 L. Ed. 2d 271, 282–83 (1991) (holding that a prisoner can bring an 8th Amendment claim by applying the deliberate indifference standard to a condition of confinement that denies an obvious human need, such as "food, warmth or exercise," and proving that a prison official was deliberately indifferent to that "identifiable human need").

harm knew and ignored "an excessive risk to [the] inmate['s] health or safety" (the subjective component).[10] Since deciding Estelle, the courts have tried to clarify the meaning of "serious medical need" and "deliberate indifference."[11] This Chapter explains each standard separately below.

Note that the Constitution does not guarantee comfortable prisons; prison conditions may be "restrictive and even harsh."[12] However, the medical care you receive should meet an acceptable standard of treatment and care in terms of modern medicine and technology and current beliefs about human decency.[13]

(a) The Objective Component: "Sufficiently Serious"

To meet the objective component, you must show that you suffered a "sufficiently serious" injury as a result of failing to receive medical treatment and that prison officials were deliberately indifferent to your "serious medical need." Courts define "serious medical need" as "one that has been diagnosed by a physician as mandating treatment or one that is so obvious that even a lay person would easily recognize the necessity of a doctor's attention."[14] To decide if a medical need is "serious," the Second Circuit (which governs New York, Connecticut, and Vermont) considers several factors including, but not limited to, the following:

(1) whether a reasonable doctor or patient would perceive the medical need in question as "important and worthy of comment or treatment";
(2) whether the medical condition significantly affects daily activities; and
(3) whether "chronic and substantial pain" exists.[15]

The Prison Litigation Reform Act ("PLRA") only considers harm to be sufficiently serious if it is in the form of a physical injury.[16] For example, in one case a patient with HIV was denied his medication for 10. Farmer v. Brennan, 511 U.S. 825, 837, 114 S. Ct. 1970, 1979, 128 L. Ed. 2d 811, 825 (1994) (adopting the subjective test for deliberate indifference).

---

11. The Second Circuit defined a serious medical need as "a condition of urgency, one that may produce death, degeneration, or extreme pain." Hathaway v. Coughlin, 37 F.3d 63, 66 (2d Cir. 1994) (quoting Nance v. Kelly, 912 F.2d 605, 607 (2d Cir. 1990) (Pratt, J., dissenting)). However, in Brock it specifically rejected the notion that "only 'extreme pain' or a degenerative condition" meets the legal standard since "the Eighth Amendment forbids not only deprivations of medical care that produce physical torture and lingering death, but also less serious denials which cause or perpetuate pain." Brock v. Wright, 315 F.3d 158, 162 (2d Cir. 2003) (quoting Todaro v. Ward, 565 F.2d 48, 52 (2d Cir. 1977)). More recently, the court in dictum repeated the "death, degeneration, or extreme pain" formula. Johnson v. Wright, 412 F.3d 398, 403 (2d Cir. 2005). However, the Brock holding would still seem to be the law of the Circuit. See also Berry v. City of Muskogee, 900 F.2d 1489, 1495–96 (10th Cir. 1990) (holding that deliberate indifference requires more than negligence, but less than intentional and malicious infliction of injury); Anderson v. City of Atlanta, 778 F.2d 678, 686 (11th Cir. 1985) (finding that a policy of inadequate staffing of medical personnel may raise a question of deliberate indifference); Hoptowit v. Ray, 682 F.2d 1237, 1253 (9th Cir. 1982) (stating that serious deficiencies in a prison's medical care, including failure to provide the opportunity to make a sick call or to voice medical concerns, meet the standard of deliberate indifference); Woodall v. Foti, 648 F.2d 268, 272 (5th Cir. 1981) (determining deliberate indifference by weighing the seriousness of a prisoner's mental illness and the length of incarceration against availability and expense of psychiatric care).

12. Rhodes v. Chapman, 452 U.S. 337, 347–49, 101 S. Ct. 2392, 2399–400, 69 L. Ed. 2d 59, 69–70 (1981) (stating that placing two prisoners in a cell does not deprive prisoners of essential human needs or inflict needless pain such that the 8th Amendment would be violated).

13. Estelle v. Gamble, 429 U.S. 97, 102, 97 S. Ct. 285, 290, 50 L. Ed. 2d 251, 259 (1976) ("Thus, we have held repugnant to the Eighth Amendment punishments which are incompatible with 'the evolving standards of decency that mark the progress of a maturing society.'" (citing Trop v. Dulles, 356 U.S. 86, 101, 78 S. Ct. 590, 598, 2 L. Ed. 2d 630, 642 (1958))).

14. Brown v. Johnson, 387 F.3d 1344, 1350–52 (11th Cir. 2004) (holding HIV and hepatitis were serious needs); see also Carnell v. Grimm, 872 F. Supp. 746, 755 (D. Haw. 1994) ("A 'serious' medical need exists if the failure to treat the need could result in further significant injury or 'unnecessary and wanton infliction of pain.'" (quoting Estelle v. Gamble 429 U.S. 97, 104, 97 S. Ct. 285, 291, 50 L. Ed. 2d 251, 260 (1976))), appeal dismissed in part, aff'd in part, 74 F.3d 977 (9th Cir. 1996).

15. Brock v. Wright, 315 F.3d 158, 162 (2d Cir. 2003). The Second Circuit defined a serious medical need as "a condition of urgency, one that may produce death, degeneration, or extreme pain." Hathaway v. Coughlin, 37 F.3d 63, 66 (2d Cir. 1994) (quoting Nance v. Kelly, 912 F.2d 605, 607 (2d Cir. 1990) (Pratt, J., dissenting)). However, in Brock, the court specifically rejected the notion that "only 'extreme pain' or a degenerative condition" meets the legal standard, since "the Eighth Amendment forbids not only deprivations of medical care that produce physical torture and lingering death, but also less serious denials which cause or perpetuate pain." Brock v. Wright, 315 F.3d 158, 163 (2d Cir. 2003). More recently, the court in dictum repeated the "death, degeneration, or extreme pain" formula. Johnson v. Wright, 412 F.3d 398, 403 (2d Cir. 2005). However, the Brock holding would still seem to be the law of the Circuit.

16. See Chapter 14 of the JLM for more information on the limits the PLRA imposes on your ability to bring a several days.[17] His illness was clearly serious, but it was determined that missing a few days of medication caused him no additional harm. However, if the medical condition you suffer from is extremely painful, simply being left to endure the pain without medical attention or care could be considered "sufficiently serious" harm. For example, in Hemmings v. Gorczyk, a prisoner suffered a ruptured tendon during a basketball game, but prison medical staff diagnosed it as a sprain and refused for two months to send him to a specially trained doctor.[18] The Second Circuit found that his condition was painful enough to satisfy the objective portion of the "deliberate indifference" standard. The general trend seems to be that the courts will consider injuries to be serious only if they significantly change a prisoner's quality of life. The Second Circuit has held that the denial of care has to be objectively serious enough to create "a condition of urgency," that is, a situation where death, permanent injury, or extreme pain appears likely or has occurred.[19] Other circuits have similarly high requirements for what counts as a serious injury or denial of care.[20]

Recent medical care decisions have emphasized pain[21] and disability when evaluating medical need.[22] Drug or alcohol withdrawal is a serious medical need.[23] Transsexualism or gender identity disorder ("GID") has been recognized as a serious medical need in some cases.[24] There might also be a "serious cumulative lawsuit while in prison.

---

17. Smith v. Carpenter, 316 F.3d 178, 181 (2d Cir. 2003) (holding that a jury may consider the lack of adverse medical effects to the prisoner in determining whether a denial of medical care meets the objective serious medical need requirement).

18. Hemmings v. Gorczyk, 134 F.3d 104, 109 (2d Cir. 1998).

19. See Brock v. Wright, 315 F.3d 158, 163–64 (2d Cir. 2003) (finding that failing to adequately examine painful swollen tissue from a knife cut could constitute deliberate indifference); Williams v. Vincent, 508 F.2d 541, 544 (2d Cir. 1974) (finding that deliberate indifference was exhibited when a portion of a prisoner's ear had been cut off during a fight and prison officials merely stitched a stump of the prisoner's ear instead of attempting to suture the severed portion back on); see also Salahuddin v. Goord, 467 F.3d 263, 280 (2d Cir. 2006) (defining sufficiently serious as "whether 'a reasonable doctor or patient would find it important and worthy of comment,' whether the condition 'significantly affects an individual's daily activities,' and whether it causes 'chronic and substantial pain'" (quoting Chance v. Armstrong, 143 F.3d 698, 702 (2d Cir. 1998))).

20. The Ninth Circuit held in Hunt v. Dental Dept., 865 F.2d 198, 200–01 (9th Cir. 1989) that failure to put an inmate who lost his dentures on a soft food diet could be sufficient to state a claim of deliberate medical indifference. In Weeks v. Chaboudy, 984 F.2d 185, 187 (6th Cir. 1993), the Sixth Circuit held that refusal to admit a paraplegic prisoner into an infirmary where he could use his wheelchair constituted deliberate indifference.

21. Numerous courts have cited pain as an appropriate reason for finding that a prisoner's medical needs are serious. See, e.g., Blackmore v. Kalamazoo County, 390 F.3d 890, 899–900 (6th Cir. 2004) (holding that a two-day delay in treatment of appendicitis caused pain sufficient to pose serious risk of harm, even though the appendix did not in fact rupture); Spruill v. Gillis, 372 F.3d 218, 236 (3d Cir. 2004) (holding that a claim alleging a back condition that resulted in pain so serious it caused the prisoner to fall down sufficiently pleaded a serious need); Farrow v. West, 320 F.3d 1235, 1244–45 (11th Cir. 2003) (holding that pain, bleeding, and swollen gums of a prisoner who needed dentures helped show serious medical need); Boretti v. Wiscomb, 930 F.2d 1150, 1154–55 (6th Cir. 1991) (holding needless pain that does not lead to permanent injury is still actionable); Moreland v. Wharton, 899 F.2d 1168, 1170 (11th Cir. 1989) (finding that an allegation of a "significant and uncomfortable health problem" was a serious need); Johnson-El v. Schoemehl, 878 F.2d 1043, 1055 (8th Cir. 1989) (holding that delay in medical care for a condition that is "painful in nature" is actionable).

22. Miller v. King, 384 F.3d 1248, 1261 (11th Cir. 2004) (holding that paraplegia with inability to control passing urine is a serious medical need), vacated and superseded on other grounds, 449 F.3d 1149 (11th Cir. 2006); Koehl v. Dalsheim, 85 F.3d 86, 88 (2d Cir. 1996) (finding that loss of vision may not be "pain" but it is "suffering"); Johnson v. Bowers, 884 F.2d 1053, 1056 (8th Cir. 1989) (determining that prison must provide treatment when a "substantial disability" exists); Monmouth County Corr. Inst. Inmates v. Lanzaro, 834 F.2d 326, 347 (3d Cir. 1987) (finding that medical need is serious if it imposes a "life-long handicap or permanent loss").

23. See Morrison v. Washington County, 700 F.2d 678, 685 (11th Cir. 1983) (referring to patient who died after experiencing alcohol withdrawal as "seriously ill"); Kelley v. County of Wayne, 325 F. Supp. 2d 788, 791–92 (E.D. Mich. 2004) (finding that heroin withdrawal is a "serious medical condition").

24. See, e.g., Praylor v. Tex. Dept. of Crim. Justice, 430 F.3d 1208, 1209 (5th Cir. 2005) (per curiam) (assuming that transsexualism constitutes a serious medical need but deciding the case on other grounds); Cuoco v. Moritsugu, 222 F.3d 99, 106 (2d Cir. 2000) (assuming that transsexualism constitutes a serious medical need but deciding the case on other grounds). Note, however, that courts differ over the extent of prison officials' obligations to provide hormone therapy and surgery. See Praylor v. Tex. Dept. of Crim. Justice, 430 F.3d 1208, 1209 (5th Cir. 2005) (per curiam) (determining that denial of hormone therapy was not deliberate indifference under the circumstances); De'Lonta v. Angelone, 330 F.3d 630, 635–36 (4th Cir. 2003) (finding that prisoner with GID was entitled to treatment for compulsion to self-mutilate after her hormone treatment was stopped); Maggert v. Hanks, 131 F.3d 670, 671–72 (7th Cir. 1997) (denying hormonal treatment and surgical procedures for prisoner with "gender dysphoria" because the condition is not "generally considered a severe enough condition" to warrant costly treatment); Kosilek v. Maloney, 221 F. Supp. 2d 156, effect from the repeated denial of care" for minor problems.[25] Where medical treatment is delayed, courts look at whether the effects of the delay or interruption—not the underlying medical condition—are objectively serious enough to present an Eighth Amendment question.[26] Whether a medical need is "serious" should be determined on a case-by-case basis and not only by a prison's "serious need list."[27] Prisons are not allowed to have a rigid list of serious medical needs without allowing some flexibility in individual prisoner evaluations.[28] In addition, a treatment considered "elective" by a hospital or prison may still be a "serious medical need."[29]

(b) The Subjective Component ("Knew of and Disregarded a Risk")

In addition to proving that an injury is sufficiently serious, a prisoner bringing an Eighth Amendment medical claim must also prove that prison officials purposely allowed him to go without necessary help. While an x-ray can prove objectively that your leg was broken, what happened in the official's head when deciding what to do about your leg (in other words, his subjective state of mind) is more difficult to prove. The following Subsections try to explain the subjective standard and give examples that may help you form an idea of the types of situations that have and have not been found to meet this standard.

As the Court held in Farmer v. Brennan, an official cannot be found liable for an Eighth Amendment violation unless two things happen. First, the official has to know the facts that could have shown or proven that a prisoner's health was in danger. Second, after the official is aware of the threat to a prisoner's health, the official must actually believe that the prisoner's health is in danger.[30] Since Farmer v. Brennan, courts have struggled to determine exactly how much knowledge a prison official must have in order to meet the standard. In general, the standard is very high, as you will see from the cases discussed below.

2. Courts Defer to Prison Health Officials' Medical Judgment

It can be difficult to win a deliberate indifference medical care claim when the prisoner and the prison officials have different opinions over what medical treatment is best for the prisoner. For example, a prison doctor might give a prisoner X medication for his medical condition, but the prisoner believes Y medication is better. As long as both X and Y medications are approved for treating the prisoner's disease, the prisoner will probably not win in court because the court will defer to the doctor's professional medical judgment that X was best for the prisoner.

A difference in opinion over medical treatment, or even an error in medical judgment, is not likely actionable.[31] But that does not mean that you can never challenge a prison doctor's decisions; "a medical professional's erroneous treatment decision can lead to deliberate indifference liability if the decision was 193 (D. Mass. 2002) (finding that the 8th Amendment requires that treatment decisions for a prisoner with GID be based on individualized medical evaluation rather than a general treatment policy).

---

25. Jones v. Evans, 544 F. Supp. 769, 775 n.4 (N.D. Ga. 1982) (finding that confiscating a prisoner's medically prescribed back brace might have serious enough effects to constitute an 8th Amendment violation).

26. Kikumura v. Osagie, 461 F.3d 1269, 1292, 1295–96 (10th Cir. 2006) (holding delay must be shown to have caused "substantial harm" and that pain caused by delay can amount to substantial harm); Spann v. Roper, 453 F.3d 1007, 1008–09 (8th Cir. 2006) (holding that no medical evidence was needed for a jury to find that a three-hour delay in treating an overdose was objectively serious).

27. Martin v. DeBruyn, 880 F. Supp. 610, 614 (N.D. Ind. 1995) (holding that "[c]ourts determine what constitutes a serious medical need on a case-by-case basis" and that prisoner's ulcers were "serious" even though prison directive did not include ulcers in a list of serious medical needs).

28. Martin v. DeBruyn, 880 F.Supp. 610, 616 (N.D. Ind. 1995) (refusing to accept "an inelastic list of conditions which [a prison] considers 'serious medical needs'" because "the definition of such a need is necessarily elastic").

29. Johnson v. Bowers, 884 F.2d 1053, 1056 (8th Cir. 1989) (holding that a hospital's "gratuitous classification" of a surgery as "elective" does not remove prison's duty "to promptly provide necessary medical treatment").

30. Farmer v. Brennan, 511 U.S. 825, 837, 114 S. Ct. 1970, 1979, 128 L. Ed. 2d 811, 825 (1994) ("[T]he official must both be aware of facts from which the inference could be drawn that a substantial risk of serious harm exists, and he must also draw the inference.").

31. See Stewart v. Murphy, 174 F.3d 530, 535 (5th Cir. 1999) (holding that physician's failure to discover ulcer earlier, to read nurses' notes, and to follow up to ensure that his orders were carried out was at most negligence and not deliberate indifference); Perkins v. Kansas Dept. of Corr., 165 F.3d 803, 811 (10th Cir. 1999) (upholding denial of particular drug for HIV-positive prisoner since other drugs were provided and prisoner "simply disagrees" about appropriate treatment).

made in the absence of professional judgment."[32] Therefore, the prison health official must actually use legitimate medical judgment.

Under the deliberate indifference standard, courts defer to the prison health official's medical judgment regarding treatment for the particular patient. Prison officials may rely upon their own medical authorities instead of the prisoner's civilian physician.[33] While a general prison medical policy might be fine for most prisoners, forcing some prisoners to follow that medical policy might constitute deliberate indifference to those particular prisoners' medical conditions. For example, the Second Circuit recently held that a statewide prison medical policy that denied Hepatitis C treatment to prisoners with any substance abuse problems within the past two years might lead to deliberate indifference if applied to a particular prisoner. The prison followed the policy despite "the unanimous, express, and repeated recommendations of plaintiff's treating physicians, including prison physicians," to depart from the policy in the plaintiff's case.[34]

3. Common Types of Deliberate Indifference

Listed below are some common situations in which courts have found prison medical staff to be deliberately indifferent, and not just exercising differences of professional opinion. They include

(1) Ignoring obvious conditions;
(2) Failing to provide treatment for diagnosed conditions;
(3) Failing to investigate enough to make an informed judgment;
(4) Delaying treatment;
(5) Interfering with access to treatment;
(6) Making medical decisions based on non-medical factors; and
(7) Making a "medical" judgment so bad it's not medical.

(a) Ignoring Obvious Conditions

A prisoner can meet the subjective standard if he proves that a prison official should have been aware of a serious and substantial risk to his health because the problem was so obvious. Even if the guard did not notice the risk (injury, disease, physical condition, etc.), the officer can be held liable if the risk to the prisoner was very obvious. Thus, in Brice v. Virginia Beach Correction Center, the court found a prison guard may have ignored a serious and substantial risk (and thus may have been deliberately indifferent) when a prisoner received no medical care after a fight, even though the prisoner's mouth was bleeding and he complained of horrible pain.[35] In Phelps v. Kapnolas, the court said that a prison official disregarded an obvious risk by putting a prisoner in solitary confinement with inadequate food when the official should have known such a small amount would cause pain and distress.[36]

In Phillips v. Roane County, Tenn., the Sixth Circuit ruled that correctional officers at the Roane County Jail, as well as a doctor and paramedic who worked at the facility, were liable for the death of a female prisoner. Medical examiners testified that the prisoner died from untreated diabetes. According to the court, prison authorities were aware of her deteriorating condition during the two weeks before her death, as she complained of vomiting, chest pain, fatigue, nausea, and constipation. Their failure to take her to a hospital was considered "deliberate indifference" to her medical needs.[37]

---

32. Johnson v. Doughty, 433 F.3d 1001, 1013 (7th Cir. 2006); see also Greeno v. Daley, 414 F.3d 645, 654 (7th Cir. 2005) (finding that medical staff's "obdurate refusal" to change prisoner's treatment, despite his reports that his medication was not working and his condition was worsening, could constitute deliberate indifference); McElligott v. Foley, 182 F.3d 1248, 1256–57 (11th Cir. 1999) (finding that failure to inquire further into and treat severe pain, along with repeated delays in seeing the patient, could permit a jury to find deliberate indifference); Hunt v. Uphoff, 199 F.3d 1220, 1223–24 (10th Cir. 1999) (finding that a doctor's denial of insulin and other treatments recommended by another doctor could constitute more than a mere difference of medical opinion, and that the prisoner could potentially prove deliberate indifference).

33. Vaughan v. Lacey, 49 F.3d 1344, 1346 (8th Cir. 1995) (holding that prison authorities can rely on prison doctors even where a prisoner's private physician holds a different medical opinion about appropriate treatment).

34. Johnson v. Wright, 412 F.3d 398, 404 (2d Cir. 2005) (holding that "a deliberate indifference claim can lie where prison officials deliberately ignore the medical recommendations of a prisoner's treating physicians" (citing Gill v. Mooney, 824 F.2d 192, 196 (2d Cir. 1987))).

35. Brice v. Va. Beach Corr. Ctr., 58 F.3d 101, 103–05 (4th Cir. 1995).

36. Phelps v. Kapnolas, 308 F.3d 180, 186–87 (2d Cir. 2002).

37. Phillips v. Roane County, Tenn., 534 F.3d 531, 539–40, 546 (6th Cir. 2008).

The risk to the prisoner must be very obvious because courts frequently find that the prison official is not liable when he did not have sufficient knowledge of a prisoner's condition. In Reeves v. Collins, prison guards were not liable when they forced a prisoner to work, even after he warned them he had a previous back injury, was doubled over, and complained of excessive pain.[38] He was later taken to the infirmary and diagnosed with a double hernia. The court decided that the guards had not disregarded a substantial risk because even if the guards had checked the prisoner's medical records (which they did not), they would not have learned of the prisoner's history of hernias due to a mistake in the records.

In Sanderfer v. Nichols, a prison doctor was not liable for her failure to treat a patient's hypertension, causing him to have a fatal heart attack.[39] Although the plaintiff's medical records included a history of hypertension, the doctor was not liable because the plaintiff complained only of bronchitis when he met with the doctor. The prisoner never told the doctor that hypertension was a problem for him, and his blood pressure later was checked on three occasions and was normal. This means that it is very important that you speak up and tell prison officials about your health problems.

(b) Failure to Provide Treatment for Diagnosed Conditions

The easiest way to meet the subjective standard is to offer proof that a prison doctor diagnosed you with a serious medical condition and prescribed treatment for you, but you never received that treatment. In Hudson v. McHugh, the prisoner was transferred from a halfway house to a county jail but was not given his medicine.[40] After eleven days without it, despite repeated requests to the jail's medical personnel, he had a seizure. The Seventh Circuit held that this was the most obvious kind of case in which a prisoner could raise a claim: "[T]his is the prototypical case of deliberate indifference, an inmate with a potentially serious problem repeatedly requesting medical aid, receiving none, and then suffering a serious injury."[41] It is important to note that not only was the prisoner denied his medicine, but he also requested it several times before he became dangerously ill. If you are making an inadequate medical care claim, you should tell the court about your requests for medical treatment to show that officials knew of your needs.

(c) Failing to Investigate Enough to Make an Informed Judgment

Courts are more likely to respect the opinions of prison medical staff who have made "informed" medical judgments or decisions. But, the court may find an informed judgment was not made, allowing for an Eighth Amendment claim.[42] A judgment may not be informed if, in response to a prisoner complaining of a medical problem, prison officials do not properly treat the prisoner,[43] investigate the cause of the prisoner's medical condition,[44] order diagnostic tests,[45] send the prisoner to a specialist,[46] or consult the prisoner's medical records before stopping medication.[47] An "uninformed" decision may be found to be "deliberately indifferent."

---

38. Reeves v. Collins, 27 F.3d 174, 176–77 (5th Cir. 1994).

39. Sanderfer v. Nichols, 62 F.3d 151, 155 (6th Cir. 1995) (finding that even though the doctor probably should have checked the prisoner's medical records, her failure to do so was at most negligence, not deliberate indifference).

40. Hudson v. McHugh, 148 F.3d 859, 861 (7th Cir. 1998).

41. Hudson v. McHugh, 148 F.3d 859, 864 (7th Cir. 1998); see also Erickson v. Pardus, 551 U.S. 89, 92–95, 127 S. Ct. 2197, 2199–2200, 167 L. Ed. 2d 1081, 1085–86 (2007) (holding that refusal to continue prescribed treatment because of alleged theft of syringe used for the treatment could amount to deliberate indifference).

42. Tillery v. Owens, 719 F. Supp. 1256, 1308 (W.D. Pa. 1989) aff'd, 907 F.2d 418 (3d Cir. 1990) (holding that if an informed judgment has not been made, the court may find an 8th Amendment claim). The 8th Amendment protects you from cruel and unusual punishment. U.S. Const. amend. VIII ("[N]or [shall] cruel and unusual punishments [be] inflicted.").

43. McElligott v. Foley, 182 F.3d 1248, 1252, 1256–57 (11th Cir. 1999) (finding that failure to inquire about and treat plaintiff's severe pain, and repeated delays in doctor's seeing the patient, could constitute deliberate indifference).

44. Liscio v. Warren, 901 F.2d 274, 276–77 (2d Cir. 1990) (finding that failure to investigate the cause of a detainee's delirium, and consequent failure to diagnose alcohol withdrawal, could constitute deliberate indifference).

45. See Greeno v. Daley, 414 F.3d 645, 655–57 (7th Cir. 2005) (finding that a doctor could be deliberately indifferent for refusing to send a prisoner to a specialist or order an endoscopy despite the prisoner's complaints of severe pain, and that doctor could not rely on lack of "objective evidence" since often there is no objective evidence of pain); Miltier v. Beorn, 896 F.2d 848, 853 (4th Cir. 1990) (finding that deliberate indifference could exist where doctor failed to perform tests for cardiac disease in prisoner with symptoms that called for such tests).

46. See Greeno v. Daley, 414 F.3d 645, 655 (7th Cir. 2005) (finding that a doctor could be deliberately indifferent for refusing to send a prisoner to a specialist or to order an endoscopy despite the prisoner's complaints of severe pain, and noting that the doctor could not rely on lack of "objective evidence" since often there is no objective evidence of pain).

47. See Steele v. Shah, decision reported at 87 F.3d 1266, 1270 (11th Cir. 1996), decision reported in full at No.

(d) Delay in Treatment

The subjective standard can be met by proving that a delay of treatment caused serious consequences. Delay in treatment is sometimes an issue of professional opinion—your medical problem is not so serious that you need to see a doctor immediately—but some delays are very serious and may prove deliberate indifference. If you are suffering from an injury that prison officials know about, but you have to wait a very long time before getting medical treatment, you may be able to bring a claim. You will have to allege that the prison officials knew of, and ignored, a serious risk to your health. In particular, denial of or delay in access to medical personnel,[48] or in their providing treatment,[49] can be deliberate indifference. In determining whether or not a delay constitutes deliberate indifference, two factors are taken into account:

(1) the seriousness of the prisoner's medical need;[50] and
(2) whether the delay was objectively serious enough to present an Eighth Amendment question.[51]

Remember that a valid reason for having to wait for non-emergency medical treatment might exist. For example, if no prison official who can properly take care of your non-emergency medical needs is on duty, waiting until a properly trained person can come to examine and treat you is probably best.

Security concerns may also justify denying your request for a particular medical treatment. For instance, in Schmidt v. Odell, the court rejected the plaintiff's claim that failure to provide him with a wheelchair was a constitutional violation. The court found that having a wheelchair among the jail's population could pose a legitimate security risk. The court concluded that this was sufficient to show that the refusal to provide a wheelchair did not alone violate the Eighth Amendment. However, the court noted that the prison's delay in providing a shower chair "appears to have resulted not only in the unnecessary infliction of pain, but also in needless indignity that a jury could find was inconsistent with the Eighth Amendment."[52]

Even when there is no apparent reason for delay in treatment, a court might not find that officials acted with deliberate indifference if the delay does not cause a great deal of harm. In Smith v. Carpenter, the court said that it was proper for a jury to consider the fact that a prisoner did not suffer any bad effects after officials refused to give him treatment for his HIV-related illness for periods of five and seven days; the jury

---

9303396 U.S. App. LEXIS 23301 at *18–19 (11th Cir. July 17, 1996) (denying summary judgment to prison doctor who discontinued psychiatric medication for a prisoner the doctor knew was at risk for suicide based on a cursory interview, without reviewing medical records).

48. See Estate of Carter v. City of Detroit, 408 F.3d 305, 310, 312–13 (6th Cir. 2005) (finding that an official who knew prisoner was exhibiting "the classic symptoms of a heart attack" and did not arrange transportation to a hospital could be found deliberately indifferent because of the immediate threat of the symptoms); Johnson v. Karnes, 398 F.3d 868, 875–76 (6th Cir. 2005) (finding that prison doctor's failure to schedule surgery for severed tendons despite emergency room instruction to return prisoner in three to seven days could constitute deliberate indifference); McElligott v. Foley, 182 F.3d 1248, 1256–57 (11th Cir. 1999) (finding that repeated delays in doctor's seeing a patient with constant severe pain, continuing of ineffective medications, and failure to order diagnostic tests, could constitute deliberate indifference); Murphy v. Walker, 51 F.3d 714, 719 (7th Cir. 1995) (holding that a two-month failure to get prisoner with head injury to a doctor stated a claim); Smith v. Carpenter, 316 F.3d 178, 186 (2d Cir. 2003) (holding that delay of provision of HIV medicine to an HIV-positive prisoner could state an 8th Amendment claim when the temporary interruption of medication causes significant harm).

49. Spann v. Roper, 453 F.3d 1007, 1008–09 (8th Cir. 2006) (finding that a nurse could be deliberately indifferent for leaving a prisoner in his cell for three hours although she knew he had taken an overdose of mental health medications intended for another); McKenna v. Wright, 386 F.3d 432, 437 (2d Cir. 2004) (holding an extended delay in starting hepatitis C treatment constituted a valid claim).

50. See Kikumura v. Osagie, 461 F.3d 1269, 1292 (10th Cir. 2006) (explaining delay must be shown to have caused "substantial harm," including pain suffered while awaiting treatment); Weyant v. State, 101 F.3d 845, 856–57 (2d Cir. 1996) (finding delay of hours in getting medical attention for a diabetic in insulin shock could be deliberate indifference, shown by evidence that official acted with reckless disregard for detainee's serious medical condition).

51. Spann v. Roper, 453 F.3d 1007, 1008–09 (8th Cir. 2006) (holding that a jury could find a three-hour delay in addressing a medication overdose to be objectively sufficiently serious). But see Smith v. Carpenter, 316 F.3d 178, 186–89 (2d Cir. 2003) (determining that brief interruptions of HIV medications, with no discernible adverse effects, did not present serious medical needs).

52. Schmidt v. Odell, 64 F. Supp. 2d 1014, 1029–1031 (D. Kan. 1999); see also Vines v. Buchler, decision reported at 101 F.3d 110, 110 (7th Cir. 1996), opinion reported in full at No. 96-1677, 1996 U.S. App. LEXIS 28693, at *3–5 (7th Cir. Oct. 31, 1996) (explaining that a prisoner who was denied his back brace for seven weeks and required to perform work on a sod-laying crew failed to show that prison officials were deliberately indifferent to his medical condition, since the back brace was prohibited for security reasons and the prisoner received ongoing medical treatment for his back condition).

found no deliberate indifference.[53] In Jolly v. Badgett, the prisoner had epilepsy, a condition that causes seizures and high blood pressure. He took medication to prevent the life-threatening consequences of this disease, but officials refused to allow the prisoner to leave his cell to get water to take his medication until two hours after his prescribed time. The court found that officials did not act with deliberate indifference without evidence that the officials knew the delay would have a dangerous effect.[54]

In general, if there is a legitimate reason for a delay in your treatment, or if you cannot prove officials knew that treatment needed to be given to you immediately, you will have a hard time meeting the subjective standard that a prison official knew of and ignored a substantial risk to your health.

(e) Interference with Access to Treatment

You can also meet the subjective standard of deliberate indifference by showing that prison officials interfered with your ability to obtain treatment. Prison guards and/or prison medical staff can prevent prisoners from accessing treatment in many different ways, including:

(1) Denying you access to medical specialists who are qualified to address your health problem;[55]
(2) Allowing you to see a specialist but then refusing to carry out the specialist's recommendations (or those of a specialist who directed treatment before you were incarcerated);[56] or
(3) Refusing to carry out or simply ignoring medical orders.[57]

For example, in Brown v. Coleman, the court found deliberate indifference because, although the prison medical staff repeatedly recommended surgery for a prisoner, officials with no medical training ignored the recommendations.[58] In Martinez v. Mancusi, the court found that the prisoner could bring a claim against prison officials who had used force to remove him from a hospital where he was recovering from leg surgery.[59] Prison officials ignored the doctor's instructions that the prisoner could not walk and removed the prisoner, who was partially paralyzed, without the doctor's permission. This caused the surgery to be unsuccessful. The prisoner was also denied the pain medication his surgeon prescribed him and thus was left in constant pain. In Woodall v. Foti, a prisoner with suicidal tendencies had received treatment for manic depression before being incarcerated.[60] The prisoner's diagnosis was confirmed by the prison doctor. The prisoner claimed his condition worsened when he was denied treatment by the sheriff, who placed him 53. Smith v. Carpenter, 316 F.3d 178, 185–89 (2d Cir. 2003).

54. Jolly v. Badgett, 144 F.3d 573, 573 (8th Cir. 1998).

55. See Mata v. Saiz, 427 F.3d 745, 756–59 (10th Cir. 2005) (finding nurse's failure to perform "gatekeeper" role by referring patient to a practitioner for symptoms of cardiac emergency could be deliberate indifference); Greeno v. Daley, 414 F.3d 645, 655 (7th Cir. 2005) (finding refusal to refer prisoner to a specialist or order an endoscopy for two years despite intense abdominal pain could be deliberate indifference); Hartsfield v. Colburn, 371 F.3d 454, 457–58 (8th Cir. 2004) (holding that six weeks' delay in sending prisoner to a dentist that resulted in infection and loss of teeth raised an 8th Amendment claim); LeMarbe v. Wisneski, 266 F.3d 429, 440 (6th Cir. 2001) (determining that failure to make timely referral to a specialist or tell the patient to seek one out was deliberate indifference); Mandel v. Doe, 888 F.2d 783, 789–95 (11th Cir. 1989) (affirming an award of damages where physician's assistant failed to diagnose a broken hip, refused to order an x-ray, and prevented the prisoner from seeing a doctor).

56. See Gil v. Reed, 525 F.3d 551, 55–53 (7th Cir. 2008) (finding that prisoner stated a claim where prison staff prescribed the same medication that the prison specialist warned against taking); Miller v. Schoenen, 75 F.3d 1305, 1311 (8th Cir. 1996) (finding that not providing medical care that an outside doctor and outside hospitals said was needed supported a deliberate indifference claim); Starbeck v. Linn County Jail, 871 F. Supp. 1129, 1145–47 (N.D. Iowa 1994) (explaining that when outside doctors had recommended surgery, prison officials who failed to provide the surgery must present evidence why they did not follow the outside doctors' recommendations).

57. Estelle v. Gamble, 429 U.S. 97, 104–05, 97 S. Ct. 285, 291, 50 L. Ed. 2d 251, 260–61 (1976) (holding that "intentionally interfering with the treatment once prescribed" can constitute an 8th Amendment claim); see Lawson v. Dallas County, 286 F.3d 257, 263 (5th Cir. 2002) (affirming disregard for follow-up care instructions for paraplegic could be deliberate indifference); Koehl v. Dalsheim, 85 F.3d 86, 88 (2d Cir. 1996) (holding denial of prescription eyeglasses enough to allege deliberate indifference); Erickson v. Holloway, 77 F.3d 1078, 1080–81 (8th Cir. 1996) (finding officer's refusal of emergency room doctor's request to admit the prisoner and take x-rays could show deliberate indifference); Boretti v. Wiscomb, 930 F.2d 1150, 1156 (6th Cir. 1991) (finding nurse's failure to perform prescribed dressing change raises "a genuine issue" for trial); McCorkle v. Walker, 871 F. Supp. 555, 558 (N.D.N.Y. 1995) (finding the allegation that prison officials failed to obey a medical order to house asthmatic prisoner on a lower tier was sufficient to state a claim).

58. Brown v. Coleman, decision reported at 60 F.3d 837, 837 (10th Cir. 1995), opinion reported in full at No. 94-7183, 1995 U.S. App. LEXIS 16928, at *4–5 (10th Cir. Jul. 12, 1995) (unpublished).

59. Martinez v. Mancusi, 443 F.2d 921, 924 (2d Cir. 1970).

60. Woodall v. Foti, 648 F.2d 268, 271 (5th Cir. 1981).

in solitary confinement. On appeal, the court found that if these facts were true, the sheriff's actions could meet the subjective standard because of an interference with access to treatment.

Refusing to treat a prisoner unless the prisoner complies with an official's order can be considered deliberate indifference. In Harrison v. Barkley, a prison dentist refused to fix the prisoner's cavity unless the prisoner allowed the dentist to pull another one of the prisoner's teeth because the policy of the prison was to pull teeth that were in such poor condition. Although the tooth was rotten, the prisoner did not want it removed because it was not painful and he only had a few teeth left.[61] The court said that in a situation like this one, the dentist's actions constituted deliberate indifference. Similarly, in Benter v. Peck, a district court in Iowa found that doctors treating prisoners have a responsibility to provide the medical care that they need.[62] In that case, the doctor allowed the prison to withhold eyeglasses from a prisoner who could not function without them in order to force him to pay for the glasses. The court held that withholding the prescription glasses from the prisoner rose to the standard of deliberate indifference.

(f) Making Medical Decisions Based on Non-Medical Factors

If the prison health staff is making medical decisions about you based on non-medical factors, you may be able to claim deliberate indifference.[63] Prisons should not decide what medical treatment you get based on factors like their own lack of staff[64] or interpreters,[65] the prison's budgetary restrictions,[66] because you are about to be released,[67] or because they want to punish you.[68] In particular, "systemic deficiencies in staffing, facilities, or procedures [which] make unnecessary suffering inevitable" may support a finding of deliberate indifference.[69] In other words, problems that are universal and part of the prison system (its staffing, facilities, or policies that cause suffering) can still be causes of actions even though you are not the only one hurt. Interestingly, a San Francisco judge refused to send a convicted robber to jail, citing the poor medical care the man would receive and equating a prison sentence to a death sentence.[70] While this was an extremely unusual situation, the case law may still help you develop a claim about systemic deficiencies.

(g) "Medical" Judgment So Bad It's Not Medical

You also can claim deliberate indifference if you believe your prison's health staff is making medical decisions that are so incompetent or inadequate that no trained health professional would ever make that

---

61. Harrison v. Barkley, 219 F.3d 132, 138 (2d Cir. 2000).

62. Benter v. Peck, 825 F. Supp. 1411, 1417 (S.D. Iowa 1993). But see Martin v. DeBruyn, 880 F. Supp 610, 614 (N.D. Ind. 1995) (determining that the 8th Amendment does not require the State to provide an inmate with a necessary commodity that would not be free outside of the prison and which the prisoner has the sufficient funds to purchase).

63. See Hartsfield v. Colburn, 371 F.3d 454, 457 (8th Cir. 2004) (withholding a dental referral for prisoner's behavioral problems could be deliberate indifference); Ancata v. Prison Health Servs., Inc., 769 F.2d 700, 704 (11th Cir. 1985) (finding prison's refusal to provide specialty consultations without a court order was deliberate indifference).

64. Casey v. Lewis, 834 F. Supp. 1477, 1547–48 (D. Ariz. 1993) (finding that withholding treatment for lack of staff might be deliberate indifference if it results in substantial harm).

65. Anderson v. County of Kern, 45 F.3d 1310, 1316 (9th Cir. 1995) (explaining that failure to provide a translator for medical encounters can constitute deliberate indifference).

66. Jones v. Johnson, 781 F.2d 769, 771 (9th Cir. 1986) (holding that budgetary restrictions could not justify deliberate indifference to a prisoner's serious medical needs); Starbeck v. Linn County Jail, 871 F. Supp. 1129, 1146 (N.D. Iowa 1994) ("[An allegation that a prisoner's surgery was denied because the State of Iowa did not want to pay the costs of guards during the prisoner's recuperation] could rise to deliberate indifference to the [prisoner's] serious medical need.").

67. McKenna v. Wright, 386 F.3d 432, 437 (2d Cir. 2004) (holding that an allegation that a prisoner was "denied urgently needed treatment for a serious disease because he might be released within twelve months of starting the treatment" was enough for a claim of deliberate indifference).

68. Hartsfield v. Colburn, 371 F.3d 454, 457 (8th Cir. 2004) (finding that withholding a necessary dental referral because of a prisoner's behavioral problems could give rise to a finding of deliberate indifference).

69. Todaro v. Ward, 565 F.2d 48, 52 (2d Cir. 1977) (citing Bishop v. Stoneman, 508 F.2d 1224, 1226 (2d Cir. 1974)); see also Harris v. Thigpen, 941 F.2d 1495, 1505 (11th Cir. 1991) ("In institutional level challenges to prison health care … systemic deficiencies can provide the basis for a finding of deliberate indifference."); DeGidio v. Pung, 920 F.2d 525, 529 (8th Cir. 1990) (holding that lack of "adequate organization and control in the administration of health services" could constitute an 8th Amendment violation); see also Marcotte v. Monroe Corr. Complex, 394 F. Supp. 2d 1289, 1298 (W.D. Wash. 2005) (explaining that failure to remedy known deficient infirmary nursing procedures and other health department citations was deliberate indifference).

70. Andy Furillo, Ill. Man's Prison Term Blocked, S.F. Judge Cites Findings of Poor Medical Care, Says Move from Local Jail Could Equal a Death Sentence, Sacramento Bee, Mar. 20, 2007, at A3.

decision. For example, in 2004, a California court granted a preliminary injunction ordering a prison to provide immediate medical treatment to a prisoner and to arrange for a medical evaluation of the prisoner's eligibility for a liver transplant. Prison officials had refused to allow the evaluation, but the prisoner would die without a transplant. The court held the prisoner might win his deliberate indifference claim because the prison offered no alternative treatment that would save the prisoner's life.[71] The court noted that:

> In order to prevail on a claim involving choices between alternative courses of treatment, a prisoner must show that the course of treatment the doctors chose was medically unacceptable in light of the circumstances and that they chose this course in conscious disregard of an excessive risk to plaintiff's health.[72]

A "medically unacceptable" treatment may be "an easier and less efficacious treatment"[73] or simply no treatment at all. Showing that prison health staff failed to follow professional medical standards or prison medical care procedures can help you make this deliberate indifference claim. These standards or protocols can serve as evidence that the prison official knew of the risk posed by particular symptoms or conditions and deliberately ignored that risk.[74]

4. Medical Negligence

(a) Medical Negligence Is Not Unconstitutional

You cannot win a federal constitutional claim of deliberate indifference by alleging only that prison medical staff acted negligently, no matter how often or repeatedly they were negligent. (However, you still may be able to make a state tort claim of negligence, which is described in the next Subsection.) Negligence is when you fail to exercise care to protect someone at risk in a situation in which a reasonable person would exercise care.[75] Medical negligence is often called medical malpractice. Again, "the Eighth Amendment does not protect prisoners from medical malpractice."[76]

At one time, negligence was grounds for liability.[77] After Farmer v. Brennan, however, mere negligence—even repeated negligence—cannot by itself constitute deliberate indifference.[78] Therefore, in a class action suit brought by prisoners in Ohio, the court held if the prisoners could only prove the prison

---

71. Rosado v. Alameida, 349 F. Supp. 2d 1340, 1346 (S.D. Cal. 2004).

72. Rosado v. Alameida, 349 F. Supp. 2d 1340, 1344–45 (S.D. Cal. 2004) (emphasis added).

73. Williams v. Vincent, 508 F.2d 541, 544 (2d Cir. 1974) (refusing prisoner's request to reattach his ear and instead only sewing up the stump constitutes indifference); see also McElligott v. Foley, 182 F.3d 1248, 1256–57 (11th Cir. 1999) (determining that medical staff's failure to examine and treat patient's severe pain, and repeated delays in doctor's seeing the patient, could support a finding of deliberate indifference).

74. Mata v. Saiz, 427 F.3d 745, 757–58 (10th Cir. 2005) (explaining that violation of prison medical protocols was circumstantial evidence that the nurse "knew of a substantial risk of serious harm").

75. See Black's Law Dictionary 1061 (8th ed. 2004) (defining negligence as the "[t]he failure to exercise the standard of care that a reasonably prudent person would have exercised in a similar situation").

76. Rosado v. Alameida, 349 F. Supp. 2d 1340, 1344–45 (S.D. Cal. 2004) (emphasis added). This proposition was suggested earlier by Estelle v. Gamble, 429 U.S. 97, 105–06, 97 S. Ct. 285, 290–91, 50 L. Ed. 2d 251, 260–61 (1976). But note that a finding of medical malpractice does not prevent a finding of deliberate indifference. Hathaway v. Coughlin, 99 F.3d 550, 553 (2d Cir. 1996).

77. For example, in Todaro v. Ward, 565 F.2d 48, 52 (2d Cir. 1977), the court held that "while a single instance of medical care denied or delayed, viewed in isolation, may appear to be the product of mere negligence, repeated examples of such treatment [indicate] a deliberate indifference by prison authorities." There are also three post-Farmer cases finding that systemic negligence can indicate deliberate indifference: Harris v. Thigpen, 941 F.2d 1495, 1505 (11th Cir. 1991) (noting that although mere "incidents of negligence or malpractice do not rise to the level of constitutional violations … systemic deficiencies can provide the basis for a finding of deliberate indifference"); DeGidio v. Pung, 920 F.2d 525, 533 (8th Cir. 1990) (holding that a "consistent pattern of reckless or negligent conduct" establishes deliberate indifference); Ramos v. Lamm, 639 F.2d 559, 575 (10th Cir. 1980) (observing that in class action suits, "deliberate indifference to inmates' health needs may be shown [either] by proving repeated examples of negligent acts which disclose a pattern of conduct by the prison medical staff … or by proving there are such systemic and gross deficiencies in staffing, facilities, equipment, or procedures that the inmate population is effectively denied access to adequate medical care"), cert. denied, 450 U.S. 1041, 101 S. Ct. 1759, 68 L Ed. 2d 239 (1981). For more information, see Part B(3)(f) of this Chapter, "Making Medical Decisions Based on Non-Medical Factors."

78. Farmer v. Brennan, 511 U.S. 825, 835–37, 114 S. Ct. 1970, 1977–79, 128 L. Ed. 2d 811, 824–25 (1994) (holding deliberate indifference does not include negligence, even repeated acts of negligence and to prove deliberate indifference, a prisoner must show the prison official actually knew about a "substantial risk of serious harm"). This proposition was suggested earlier by Estelle v. Gamble, 429 U.S. 97, 105–106, 97 S. Ct. 285, 290–291, 50 L. Ed. 2d 251, 260–261 (1976).

doctor was repeatedly negligent in his treatment, but not that he was "subjectively aware of a substantial risk of serious harm," then the prisoners had not stated an Eighth Amendment claim.[79] Even if it is possible that an official's action led to the death of a prisoner, negligence alone is not enough to bring a federal constitutional claim.[80] Repeated acts of negligence can be evidence that a prison official is ignoring a substantial risk, but acts of negligence by themselves, without any other claim, cannot count as deliberate indifference.[81]

(b) State Law Negligence Claims Are Possible

If you believe that you were injured because prison medical staff acted negligently, you cannot make an Eighth Amendment deliberate indifference claim, but you can still make a negligence claim under state law. To prove negligence under state law, it is first necessary to prove that (1) the defendant (your prison) owed a duty of care to you; and (2) that this duty was "breached," meaning that the prison was responsible for some aspect of your well-being, and did not honor its responsibility.[82] Therefore, you must ask whether the medical practitioner did what a reasonable health professional would do in the same circumstances.

You can find many of the duties a prison owes its prisoners listed in state statutes. Thus, a New York plaintiff could use the state corrections law to prove that New York prisons have a duty to "provide reasonable and adequate medical care to the prisoners."[83] State case law also provides clear definitions of what duties a prison owes its prisoners. In New York, in order to prove a medical malpractice claim, the prisoner must prove a departure from accepted practice and that this departure was the proximate cause of the injury. To prove proximate cause, you must show that the injury would not have occurred without the departure from accepted practice. The court of claims also recognizes medical negligence as a cause of action. A state may be liable for "ministerial neglect" if employees fail to comply with the prison's own administrative procedures for providing medical care to inmates.[84] If you want to make a state tort claim of medical negligence or medical malpractice, see Chapter 17 of the JLM, "The State's Duty to Protect You and Your Property: Tort Actions," to learn how to do so. You should note there is a difference between medical negligence and medical malpractice claims. A medical malpractice claim means a person believes it was a medical practitioner's fault for their injury. Medical negligence claims means a person had a prior injury or medical problem that was not treated or was not treated with proper care.

---

79. Brooks v. Celeste, 39 F.3d 125, 129 (6th Cir. 1994) (making a clear distinction between the doctor being "merely repeatedly negligent" and acting with "deliberate indifference"); see also Hathaway v. Coughlin, 37 F.3d 63, 66 (2d Cir. 1994) ("Deliberate indifference requires more than negligence … [A] prison official does not act in a deliberately indifferent manner unless that official 'knows of and disregards an excessive risk to inmate health or safety.'").

80. Howard v. Calhoun County, 148 F. Supp. 2d 883, 889–90 (W.D. Mich. 2001) (concluding that although it was possible that the official was negligent in the way she handled the collapse of a prisoner who then died of a heart attack, negligence alone did not meet the standard of deliberate indifference).

81. Judge Posner offers an extensive discussion of the difference in Sellers v. Henman, explaining, "It is vital to keep negligence and deliberate indifference apart. It may be ... that repeated acts of negligence are some evidence of deliberate indifference." Thus, "the more negligent acts [prison officials] commit in a circumscribed interval, the likelier it is that they know they are creating some risk, and if the negligence is sufficiently widespread relative to the prison population[,] the cumulative risk to an individual prisoner may be excessive." Despite this, "the presence of multiple acts of negligence is merely evidentiary [and offers some evidence to support a claim]; it is not an alternative theory of liability." Sellers v. Henman, 41 F.3d 1100, 1102–03 (7th Cir. 1994); see also Brooks v. Celeste, 39 F.3d 125, 128 (6th Cir. 1994) ("[O]ne way to prove that an official acted with deliberate indifference is to show that he repeatedly acted in a certain manner. In such cases, the repeated acts, viewed singly and in isolation, would appear to be mere negligence; however, viewed together and as a pattern, the acts show … that each act was committed with deliberate indifference.").

82. See Part B(2) of Chapter 17 of the JLM, "The State's Duty to Protect You and Your Property: Tort Actions," to learn more about negligence and negligence-based torts.

83. N.Y. Correct. Law § 70(2)(c) (McKinney 2003 & Supp. 2009) (stating that correctional facilities will be used with due regard to the "health and safety of every person in the custody of the department"); N.Y. Correct. Law § 23(2) (McKinney 2003 & Supp. 2009) (permitting transfer of prisoners to outside hospital facilities for medical care); see also Rivers v. State, 159 A.D.2d 788, 789, 552 N.Y.S.2d 189, 189 (3d Dept. 1990) (noting that state has a duty to provide reasonable and adequate medical care to prisoners); La Rocca v. Dalsheim, 120 Misc. 2d 697, 708, 467 N.Y.S.2d 302, 310 (Sup. Ct. Dutchess County 1983) (clarifying that the state has a duty to "provide a safe and humane place of confinement for its inmates").

84. Kagan v. State, 221 A.D.2d 7, 10, 646 N.Y.S.2d 336, 338 (2d Dept. 1996) (finding that the prison's breach of protocols governing medical standards caused plaintiff to lose her hearing and constituted ministerial neglect).

C. Specific Health Care Rights

This Part covers some areas for which you may have rights to medical care or treatment and includes examples of cases that might be useful to you. If you have specific questions about the rights of prisoners with mental illnesses or infectious diseases, make sure you also look at Chapter 29 of the JLM, "Special Issues for Prisoners with Mental Illness," and Chapter 26 of the JLM, "Infectious Diseases: AIDS, Hepatitis, and Tuberculosis in Prisons." If you need to learn more about disability discrimination, see Chapter 28 of the JLM, "Rights of Prisoners with Disabilities."

1. Treatment for Diagnosed Conditions

To decide whether or not you have a claim for lack of treatment for diagnosed medical illnesses and conditions, there are several things you must consider. As discussed above, your claim must meet both the objective and subjective tests of "deliberate indifference." First, you must prove that the medical condition was "sufficiently serious," that is, serious enough to be a danger to your health or well-being. Second, you must prove that the prison official knew of and ignored the risk to you.

In the following examples, courts found that diagnosed medical conditions were sufficiently serious. In Montalvo v. Koehler, the court found that a failure to provide shower and sleeping facilities to a paraplegic prisoner confined to a wheelchair met the standard because it posed the risk of serious bodily injury to the prisoner.[85] Also, in Koehl v. Dalsheim, the court found that prison officials were deliberately indifferent when they confiscated a prisoner's eyeglasses.[86] The double vision, headaches, and severe pain that the prisoner experienced without his eyeglasses were sufficiently serious. Failure to treat a serious hip condition requiring surgery,[87] an infected and impacted wisdom tooth,[88] and a hernia[89] have all been found to meet the sufficiently serious standard.

The following are examples of harm that the courts did not consider to be sufficiently serious. In Holmes v. Fell, the court held that a prisoner's allergic reaction to a tuberculosis test, which caused swelling and a scar on the prisoner's arm, did not meet the sufficiently serious standard.[90] In fact, simple exposure to tuberculosis does not meet the standard when there is no reason to believe that the prisoner will actually catch the disease.[91] In McGann v. Coombe, the court held that prison officials were not deliberately indifferent when they refused to provide orthopedic footwear for the arthritis and gout in a prisoner's feet, but instead prescribed medication for the condition that was causing the foot problems.[92] In addition, the Eighth Amendment is not violated when prison officials refuse to treat penile warts[93] or an old injury that has healed but still causes pain.[94]

2. Elective Procedures

Generally, you will not be able to win on a claim that prison officials violated your Eighth Amendment rights based on their refusal to perform an elective procedure on you.[95] An elective procedure is an optional

---

85. Montalvo v. Koehler, No. 90 Civ.5218, 1993 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 11785, at *4 (S.D.N.Y. Aug. 24, 1993) (unpublished). Note, however, that the prisoner lost his case because he failed to meet the subjective standard for deliberate indifference.

86. Koehl v. Dalsheim, 85 F.3d 86, 88 (2d Cir. 1996).

87. Hathaway v. Coughlin, 37 F.3d 63, 67 (2d Cir. 1994).

88. Boyd v. Knox, 47 F.3d 966, 968–69 (8th Cir. 1995) (explaining that not all dental work meets the sufficiently serious standard, but in this case, prisoner's mouth was so infected that "he could barely open it" and "pus regularly oozed from the infection").

89. Brown v. Coleman, decision reported at 60 F.3d 837, 837 (10th Cir. 1995), opinion reported in full at No. 94-7183, 1995 U.S. App. LEXIS 16928, at *4–5 (10th Cir. Jul. 12, 1995) (unpublished).

90. Holmes v. Fell, 856 F. Supp. 181, 183 (S.D.N.Y. 1994).

91. McCorkle v. Walker, 871 F. Supp. 555, 558 (N.D.N.Y. 1995) (noting that prisoner "has not suffered" and was "unlikely … to suffer, an active case of TB" because he had received preventive medication after exposure).

92. McGann v. Coombe, decision reported at 131 F.3d 131, 131 (2d Cir. 1997), opinion reported in full at No. 97-2139, 1997 WL 738569, at *2 (2d Cir. Nov. 21, 1997) (unpublished).

93. Stubbs v. Wilkinson, decision reported at 52 F.3d 326, 326 (6th Cir. 1995), opinion reported in full at No. 94-3620, 1995 U.S. App. LEXIS 9471, at *6 (6th Cir. Apr. 20, 1995) (unpublished).

94. Banuelos v. McFarland, 41 F.3d 232, 235 (5th Cir. 1995) (finding that although prisoner's work boots hurt his ankle, his medical report identified an "Old Ankle Injury" that doctors did not expect to produce very much pain, and x-rays proved that the bone was not broken or deformed and therefore the injury was not sufficiently serious).

95. See Victoria W. v. Larpenter, 205 F. Supp. 2d 580, 601 (E.D. La. 2002) (holding that a "non-therapeutic procedure that you would benefit from but that is not immediately necessary for your survival or relative well-being. Remember that the Supreme Court has held the Constitution does not promise comfortable prisons and that conditions may be "restrictive and even harsh."[96]

However, prison officials may not call a necessary procedure "elective" just to avoid having to provide it.[97] Furthermore, if your condition gives you continual pain or discomfort for a long period of time, you may be able to bring a claim that your condition is sufficiently serious to warrant an elective procedure, even though the condition may not require immediate attention. Lengthy delays in providing prisoners with elective surgery for certain medical conditions can be unacceptable.[98] Courts seem to recognize that there are some situations that, while not serious enough to be considered emergencies, are too serious to be considered elective; but, you may have to get a court order before you are allowed to be treated in such a situation.[99]

3. Exposure to Second-Hand Smoke

Prisoners have the right to be free from exposure to excessive second-hand smoke.[100] Courts used to reject prisoners' claims of cruel and unusual punishment through exposure to environmental tobacco smoke ("ETS") because plaintiffs had not yet suffered serious injuries.[101] However, in Helling v. McKinney, the Supreme Court rejected the argument that "only deliberate indifference to current serious health problems of inmates is actionable under the Eighth Amendment" by comparing forced exposure to ETS to live electrical wires or communicable diseases.[102] The Court concluded that prison officials may violate the Eighth Amendment prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment if they, with deliberate indifference, expose prisoners to high levels of ETS.

To satisfy the objective component of the Eighth Amendment under Helling, you will have to show you are exposed to ETS levels that "pose an unreasonable risk of serious damage to [your] future health" in a way that violates contemporary standards of decency.[103] To obtain an injunction against further ETS exposure, you do not need an actual physical injury to show an Eighth Amendment violation.[104] abortion sought due to financial and emotional reasons" rather than medical necessity is not a "serious medical need" for 8th Amendment purposes); Grundy v. Norris, No. 01-1855, 2001 U.S. App. LEXIS 23716, at *2–3 (8th Cir. Nov. 2, 2001) (per curiam) (unpublished) (holding prison officials were not deliberately indifferent in delaying surgery for prisoner's injured shoulder in part because medical evidence showed the surgery was elective).

---

96. Rhodes v. Chapman, 452 U.S. 337, 347, 101 S. Ct. 2392, 2399, 69 L. Ed. 2d 59, 69 (1981).

97. Johnson v. Bowers, 884 F.2d 1053, 1056 (8th Cir. 1989) ("The hospital's gratuitous classification of [the prisoner's] surgery as 'elective' … does not abrogate the prison's duty, or power, to promptly provide necessary medical treatment for prisoners."); Baker v. Blanchette, 186 F. Supp. 2d 100, 105 n.4 (D. Conn. 2001) (stating that although prisoner could wait to have surgery, merely classifying the surgery as elective does not abolish the prison's duty to provide treatment for a serious medical need); Delker v. Maass, 843 F. Supp. 1390, 1399 (D. Or. 1994) (holding that prison officials may not simply characterize a surgery as elective in order to avoid performing the procedure).

98. See Johnson v. Bowers, 884 F.2d 1053, 1056 (8th Cir. 1989) (holding that a prisoner who had to wait nine years for elective arm surgery had suffered a constitutional violation); West v. Keve, 541 F. Supp. 534, 539–40 (D. Del. 1982) (finding that a 17-month delay between recommendation and performance of elective surgery was unacceptable, but that defendants were not ultimately liable since their actions were in good faith).

99. Victoria W. v. Larpenter, 369 F.3d 475, 485 (5th Cir. 2004) (upholding policy of requiring prisoners to obtain a court order to receive an elective medical procedure because the policy was "reasonably related to a legitimate penological interest"). Note this case involved seeking an abortion, which has its own case law—see Section D(2) below.

100. Helling v. McKinney, 509 U.S. 25, 34–35, 113 S. Ct. 2475, 2481–2482, 125 L. Ed. 2d 22, 32–33 (1993) (holding that a prisoner may prove that his involuntary exposure to ETS is such that his future health is unreasonably endangered).

101. See Grant v. Coughlin, No. 91 Civ. 3433 (RWS), 1992 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 8003, at *9 (S.D.N.Y. June 9, 1992) (unpublished) (explaining that throat and lung irritation and a risk of serious medical harm do not meet the serious medical requirement necessary for an 8th Amendment violation).

102. Helling v. McKinney, 509 U.S. 25, 33–34, 113 S. Ct. 2475, 2480–81, 125 L. Ed. 2d 22, 31–32 (1993) (emphasis added).

103. Helling v. McKinney, 509 U.S. 25, 35–36, 113 S. Ct. 2475, 2481–82, 125 L. Ed. 2d 22, 32–33 (1993) (finding that a prisoner, whose cellmate smoked five packs of cigarettes a day, stated an 8th Amendment deliberate indifference cause of action against prison officials by alleging they "exposed him to levels of ETS that pose an unreasonable risk of serious damage to his future health"). Note that Helling provides for injunctive relief, not monetary damages. See also Fontroy v. Owens, 150 F.3d 239, 244 (3d Cir. 1998) (holding that no damages are available "for emotional distress allegedly caused by exposure to asbestos without proof of physical injury").

104. Shepherd v. Hogan, No. 04-4047-pr, 2006 U.S. App. LEXIS 12477, at *4 (2d Cir. May 18, 2006) (unpublished) (finding that future risk can be enough to constitute a substantial risk of serious harm, even if no symptoms are

Note that claiming prison officials are deliberately indifferent to the risk of future harm is different from claiming deliberate indifference to current harm.[105] You can claim that ETS exposure affects your current health, but you have to prove you have a serious medical need made worse by the exposure.[106] In Talal v. White, the Sixth Circuit found the Eighth Amendment's objective component was violated when a prison forced a non-smoking prisoner with a serious medical need to share a cell with a prisoner who smoked, but only after the plaintiff had documented that he suffered from ETS allergy, sinus problems, and dizziness and that the prison medical staff had recommended that he have a non-smoking cell partner.[107] Note that whether your prison has adopted a smoking policy and how that policy is administered is relevant to the subjective standard of deliberate indifference.[108]

4. Other Environmental Health and Safety Cases

Other environmental and safety conditions have been found to violate the Eighth Amendment. Inadequate ventilation and deprivation of outdoor exercise has been found to be a violation of the Eighth Amendment.[109] In addition, excessive heat,[110] excessive cold,[111] polluted water,[112] toxic or noxious fumes,[113] exposure to sewage,[114] lack of fire safety,[115] inadequate food or unsanitary food service,[116] inadequate currently present); Smith v. Carpenter, 316 F.3d 178, 188 (2d Cir. 2003) ("[A]n Eighth Amendment claim may be based on … exposing an inmate to an unreasonable risk of future harm and ... actual physical injury is not necessary in order to demonstrate an Eighth Amendment violation.").

---

105. Lehn v. Holmes, No. 99-919-GPM, 2005 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 22653, at *11–13 (S.D. Ill. Sept. 28, 2005) (noting that prisoner's current symptoms, headaches, and burning eyes would be insufficient to meet the objective standard in a claim for current injury but are sufficient in a claim for future harm).

106. Goffman v. Gross, 59 F.3d 668, 671–72 (7th Cir. 1995) (finding that prison officials were not deliberately indifferent when they refused to give a prisoner a non-smoking cellmate because the prisoner had not shown a serious medical condition made worse by exposure to second-hand smoke—even though he only had one lung because of lung cancer); Grant v. Coughlin, No. 91 Civ. 3433 (RWS), 1992 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 8003, at *9 (S.D.N.Y. June 9, 1992) (unpublished) (holding that irritation of the throat and lungs caused by ETS was not a serious medical condition).

107. Talal v. White, 403 F.3d 423, 427–28 (6th Cir. 2005). But see Henderson v. Sheahan, 196 F.3d 839, 846 (7th Cir. 1999) (finding that plaintiff did not show a serious medical need when he alleged the "relatively minor" injuries of "breathing problems, chest pains, dizziness, sinus problems, headaches and a loss of energy").

108. Helling v. McKinney, 509 U.S. 25, 33–37, 113 S. Ct. 2475, 2480–82, 125 L. Ed. 2d 22, 32–33 (1993) (holding that a prisoner whose cellmate smoked five packs of cigarettes per day could have a cognizable claim under the 8th Amendment and that the subjective element of the claim (deliberate indifference) should be evaluated in light of prison policies on smoking); see Shepherd v. Hogan, No. 04-4047-pr, 2006 U.S. App. LEXIS 12477, at *4 (2d Cir. 2006) (unpublished) (holding that a prisoner sharing a room with a chain smoker for a month, a situation that was inappropriate under prison procedures and which the prison grievance committee condemned, was sufficient grounds for a reasonable jury to find a constitutional violation).

109. Keenan v. Hall, 83 F.3d 1083, 1090 (9th Cir. 1996) (finding it to be cruel and unusual punishment to deprive a prisoner of outdoor exercise for six months).

110. Gates v. Cook, 376 F.3d 323, 334 (5th Cir. 2004) (determining that the probability of heat-related illness is high enough to state an 8th Amendment claim).

111. Gaston v. Coughlin, 249 F.3d 156, 164–65 (2d Cir. 2001) (finding exposure to freezing and sub-zero temperatures due to a broken window sufficient to claim an 8th Amendment violation); Palmer v. Johnson, 193 F.3d 346, 352–53 (5th Cir. 1999) (finding confinement outdoors overnight sufficient for a constitutional violation); Dixon v. Godinez, 114 F.3d 640, 643–45 (7th Cir. 1997) (holding that prison officials' deliberate indifference to cold temperatures in prisoner's cell and prisoner's extended exposure to cold temperatures raise an 8th Amendment claim).

112. Jackson v. Arizona, 885 F.2d 639, 641 (9th Cir. 1989) (holding that an allegation of polluted drinking water was not a frivolous claim); Jackson v. Duckworth, 955 F.2d 21, 22 (7th Cir. 1992) (finding that black worms in drinking water could constitute a claim).

113. Johnson-El v. Schoemehl, 878 F.2d 1043, 1054–55 (8th Cir. 1989) (finding that pesticides sprayed into housing units states an 8th Amendment claim); Cody v. Hillard, 599 F. Supp. 1025, 1032 (D.S.D. 1984) (finding that inadequate ventilation of toxic fumes in inmate workplaces raises an 8th Amendment claim), aff'd in part and rev'd in part on other grounds, 830 F.2d 912 (8th Cir. 1987) (en banc). But see Givens v. Jones, 900 F.2d 1229, 1234 (8th Cir. 1990) (finding no 8th Amendment violation where prisoner suffered migraine headaches as a result of noise and fumes during three week long housing unit renovation).

114. DeSpain v. Uphoff, 264 F.3d 965, 977 (10th Cir. 2001) (finding that exposure to flooding and human waste states an 8th Amendment claim); McCord v. Maggio, 927 F.2d 844, 847 (5th Cir. 1991) (finding that backup of sewage states an 8th Amendment claim).

115. Hoptowit v. Spellman, 753 F.2d 779, 784 (9th Cir. 1985) (holding that substandard fire prevention and safety hazards violate the 8th Amendment).

116. Phelps v. Kanoplas, 308 F.3d 180, 185–87 (2d Cir. 2002) (finding nutritionally inadequate diet, when prison lighting or constant lighting,[117] exposure to insects, rodents and other vermin,[118] exposure to asbestos,[119] and exposure to the extreme behavior of severely mentally ill prisoners[120] have all been found to violate a prisoner's Eighth Amendment rights.

5. A Prisoner's Right to Psychiatric Care

This Section gives you a short summary of your right to psychiatric (mental health) care, including your right to refuse treatment. For more information, you should read Chapter 29 of the JLM, "Special Issues for Prisoners with Mental Illness."

You have the same right to mental health care as physical health care. Most courts recognize that there is no difference between a prisoner's right to physical treatment and a prisoner's right to mental health treatment.[121] Your right to mental health care may, however, only include treatment that is necessary and will not cost an unreasonable amount of money or take an unreasonable amount of time.[122] However, some courts have held that an increased level of care is necessary for mental health patients, requiring, for example, a minimum number of acute-care and intermediate-care beds and specialized physicians and clinicians on staff at all times. In 2007, a California court issued a remedial order to ensure adequate resources were provided to inmates with mental disorders.[123] In response, the state plans to build a new 44,000-square-foot, 50-bed mental health crisis facility at the California Men's Colony.

If you believe your right to mental health care has been violated, you can make an Eighth Amendment claim of deliberate indifference against prison officials. For example, the relatives of a Georgia prisoner who had committed suicide sued the state for deliberate indifference.[124] The prisoner had a history of mental illness and took anti-depressants, but the prison psychiatrist stopped his medications. When a prison official learned the prisoner was thinking about suicide, the official did not do anything. The court found that these events could be considered deliberate indifference to the prisoner's health in violation of the Eighth Amendment.

(a) Right to Refuse Psychiatric Treatment

You also have a limited right to refuse mental health treatment. In Washington v. Harper, the Supreme Court used a rational-basis test[125] to decide if a prison could require a convicted prisoner to undergo psychiatric treatment. The Court held that if a government's action is mainly about prison administration officials should have known such a diet would cause pain, could constitute an 8th Amendment violation).

---

117. Gates v. Cook, 376 F.3d 323, 334–35 (5th Cir. 2004) (finding that inadequate lighting raises an 8th Amendment claim); Keenan v. Hall, 83 F.3d 1083, 1090–91, (9th Cir. 1996) (finding that constant illumination raises an 8th Amendment claim).

118. Gates v. Cook, 376 F.3d 323, 334–35 (5th Cir. 2004) (finding that mosquito infestation in combination with filthy cells and too much heat raises an 8th Amendment claim); Gaston v. Coughlin, 249 F.3d 156, 166 (2d Cir. 2001) (finding that mice constantly entering cell, combined with freezing temperatures and intermittent exposure to sewage water, raised an 8th Amendment claim).

119. Powell v. Lennon, 914 F.2d 1459, 1463 (11th Cir. 1990) (finding exposure to asbestos actionable). But see McNeil v. Lane, 16 F.3d 123, 125 (7th Cir. 1994) (holding that exposure to "moderate levels of asbestos" did not violate the 8th Amendment).

120. Gates v. Cook, 376 F.3d 323, 343 (5th Cir. 2004) (noting that exposure to the constant screaming and feces-smearing of mentally ill prisoners "contributes to the problems of uncleanliness and sleep deprivation, and by extension mental health problems, for the other inmates").

121. See Bowring v. Godwin, 551 F.2d 44, 47 (4th Cir. 1977) (denying the existence of an underlying distinction between the right to treatment for mental and physical ills); see also Inmates of the Allegheny County Jail v. Pierce, 612 F.2d 754, 763 (3d Cir. 1979) (holding that seriously mentally ill prisoners have a right to adequate treatment and that psychiatric/psychological treatment should be held to the same standard as medical treatment for physical ills).

122. Bowring v. Godwin, 551 F.2d 44, 47–48 (4th Cir. 1977) (creating a three-part test for the provision of mental health services: (1) the prisoner's symptoms must evidence a serious disease or injury; (2) such a disease or injury must be curable or able to be substantially alleviated; and (3) there is potential for substantial harm to the prisoner by reason of delay or denial of care).

123. Coleman v. Schwartzenegger, No. CIV S-90-0520, 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 40586, at *11–13 (E.D. Cal. May 23, 2007) (unpublished).

124. Greason v. Kemp, 891 F.2d 829, 834 (11th Cir. 1990) (holding that grossly indifferent psychiatric care could be a violation of the 8th Amendment where prisoner subsequently committed suicide).

125. The "rational-basis test" means that the prison's action must be reasonably related to a legitimate government goal. Black's Law Dictionary 592 (3d pocket ed. 2006).

issues and is reasonably related to legitimate prison interests, then the action is proper. "[G]iven the requirements of the prison environment, the Due Process Clause permits the State to treat a prison inmate who has a serious mental illness with antipsychotic drugs against his will, if the inmate is dangerous to himself or others and the treatment is in the inmate's medical interest."[126]

If you refuse to take the prescription drugs that the prison doctor gives you for mental illness, the prison must go through certain procedures before forcing you to take the medication. Specifically, the Constitution's Due Process Clause demands are met by:

> [A] medical finding, that a mental disorder exists which is likely to cause harm if not treated ... [and] that the medication must first be prescribed by a psychiatrist, and then approved by a reviewing psychiatrist, [which] ensures that the treatment in question will be ordered only if it is in the prisoner's medical interest.[127]

In other words, before an institution can give you medication against your will, a psychiatrist must prescribe medication, and a second psychiatrist should approve the decision that (1) you need the medication and (2) your mental disorder is likely to be dangerous if untreated.

In Washington v. Harper, the Court held the state's policy of medicating unwilling patients was constitutional because it met these requirements.[128] In Washington, the decision to administer drugs against the patient's will had to be made by a committee including a neutral psychiatrist and a neutral psychologist, neither of whom were currently treating the prisoner. The prison superintendent could accept or reject the committee's decision, and the prisoner had the option to ask a court to review the committee's decision.[129]

You are also entitled to certain due process protections, including a hearing, before prison authorities can transfer you to a psychiatric hospital.[130] In Vitek v. Jones, the Supreme Court held it unconstitutional to require transfer to behavior modification treatment without a legitimate reason.[131]

In addition, you should be aware that different psychiatric programs are used to treat prisoners convicted of sex offenses. Courts remain divided over whether a hearing is required when prison officials seek to classify a prisoner who has not been convicted of a sex offense as a sex offender when there is the possibility of then withholding parole because the prisoner did not complete a therapeutic program.[132] See Chapter 32 of the JLM for more information on mandatory sex offender programs.

6. Right to Dental Care

The right to adequate medical care has been extended to include dental care in some cases.[133] The Second Circuit has held that "[a] cognizable claim regarding inadequate dental care, like one involving medical care, can be based on various factors, such as the pain suffered by the plaintiff, ... the deterioration

---

126. Washington v. Harper, 494 U.S. 210, 227, 110 S. Ct. 1028, 1039–40, 108 L. Ed. 2d 178, 201–02 (1990) (emphasis added).

127. Washington v. Harper, 494 U.S. 210, 222, 110 S. Ct. 1028, 1037, 108 L. Ed. 2d 178, 198 (1990). Note that the Due Process Clause does not require these exact steps, although these steps are adequate to satisfy due process.

128. Washington v. Harper, 494 U.S. 210, 228, 110 S. Ct. 1028, 1040, 108 L. Ed. 2d 178, 202 (1990).

129. Washington v. Harper, 494 U.S. 210, 229, 110 S. Ct. 1028, 1040, 108 L. Ed. 2d 178, 203 (1990).

130. Vitek v. Jones, 445 U.S. 480, 494, 100 S. Ct. 1254, 1264, 63 L. Ed. 2d 552, 566 (1980) (determining that before a prisoner is transferred to a mental facility, he should receive written notice, legal counsel, a hearing before an independent decisionmaker with the opportunity to present and confront witnesses, and a written decision).

131. Vitek v. Jones, 445 U.S. 480, 493–94, 100 S. Ct. 1254, 1264, 63 L. Ed. 2d 552, 565 (1980); see also Clonce v. Richardson, 379 F. Supp. 338, 348–50 (W.D. Mo. 1974) (finding that defendant is entitled to a pre-transfer hearing before being moved to a behavior modification treatment program).

132. See Neal v. Shimoda, 131 F.3d 818, 831 (9th Cir. 1997) (requiring a hearing when classifying a prisoner as a sex offender if that prisoner has not been convicted of a sex offense); but see Grennier v. Frank, 453 F.3d 442, 445–46 (7th Cir. 2006) (finding that the "sex offender" label alone does not require a hearing).

133. See, e.g., Board v. Farnham, 394 F.3d 469, 480–82 (7th Cir. 2005) (finding that breaking off teeth rather than extracting them and denial of toothpaste for protracted periods support an 8th Amendment claim); Hartsfield v. Colburn, 371 F.3d 454, 457–458 (8th Cir. 2004) (finding that six weeks' delay in seeing a dentist, resulting in infection and loss of teeth, raised an 8th Amendment claim); Farrow v. West, 320 F.3d 1235, 1244–47 (11th Cir. 2003) (holding that prisoner with only two lower teeth who suffered pain, continual bleeding, swollen gums, and weight loss had a serious medical need, and that a delay of 18 months before prisoner received dentures raised a factual issue concerning deliberate indifference); Boyd v. Knox, 47 F.3d 966, 969 (8th Cir. 1995) (finding that a three-week delay in dental care, coupled with knowledge of the prisoner's suffering, can support a finding of "deliberate indifference").

of the teeth due to a lack of treatment, ... or the inability to engage in normal activities."[134] Recently, as a result of a federal class action lawsuit, the California Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation ("CDCR") agreed to provide dental care for all prisoners as set forth in a new Dental Policies and Procedures manual and an Implementation Plan.[135]

Like inadequate medical care, dental care is also governed by the deliberate indifference/serious needs analysis.[136] To prove an Eighth Amendment claim of inadequate dental care, you have to show both deliberate indifference, like in other inadequate medical care claims,[137] and that the denial caused you "substantial harm."[138]

In practice, courts often note that there is a difference between preventive dental care, such as cleanings or fluoride treatments, and dental emergencies, such as cavities. In Dean v. Coughlin, the court held that prison officials had violated the Eighth Amendment when they refused to provide serious dental treatments such as fillings and crowns.[139] However, the court also found that prisoners had no right to preventive care.[140] If you are interested in preventive care, it is constitutional for prisons to require that you pay for such care yourself.[141]

But, note that in some circumstances, limiting care to pulling teeth that could be saved may be unconstitutional.[142] In Chance v. Armstrong, the court held that when the institution decided to pull the prisoner's teeth instead of repair them only because this option was cheaper, the action violated the Eight Amendment because afterwards the prisoner was in great pain for six months, could not chew properly, and lost his teeth.[143]

D. Medical Care for Female Prisoners

1. Accessing Medical Care

Like male prisoners, female prisoners have a constitutional right under the Eighth Amendment to adequate medical care.[144] Female prisoners should read this entire Chapter, not only this Part, to 134. Chance v. Armstrong, 143 F.3d 698, 703 (2d Cir. 1998).

---

135. Perez v. Tilton, 2006 No. C 05-05241 JSW, 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 63318, at *2 (N.D. Cal. Aug. 21, 2006) (unpublished).

136. See, e.g., Board v. Farnham, 394 F.3d 469, 481–82 (7th Cir. 2005) (finding that there could be deliberate indifference when a prisoner asked for dental supplies fifteen times and was repeatedly ignored); Hartsfield v. Colburn, 371 F.3d 454, 457 (8th Cir. 2004) (holding that extreme pain and swelling caused by infected teeth would have been obvious to a layperson and thus submission of verifying medical evidence was unnecessary); Farrow v. West, 320 F.3d 1235, 1244–47 (11th Cir. 2003) (finding that some medical conditions are so grave, that even a few hours' delay in treatment could constitute deliberate indifference); Harrison v. Barkley, 219 F.3d 132, 137–39 (2d Cir. 2000) (finding that refusal to treat prisoner's tooth cavity led to a sufficiently serious need as it was a degenerative condition that could cause acute infections and pain).

137. See Clifton v. Robinson, 500 F. Supp. 30, 35 (E.D. Pa. 1980) (holding that since prisoner claiming denial of dental care did not allege "substantial harm," claim failed to show "deliberate indifference").

138. See Hunt v. Dental Dept., 865 F.2d 198, 200 (9th Cir. 1989) (holding that a three-month delay in replacing dentures caused gum disease and possibly weight loss, constituting substantial harm).

139. Dean v. Coughlin, 623 F. Supp. 392, 404 (S.D.N.Y. 1985), vacated in part and remanded on other grounds, 804 F.2d 207, 216 (2nd Cir. 1986).

140. Dean v. Coughlin, 623 F. Supp. 392, 404 (S.D.N.Y. 1985). Specifically the court held: "[A] prisoner is entitled to treatment only for conditions that cause pain, discomfort, or threat to good health, not treatment to ward off such conditions." With regard to preventative dentistry, the court noted that "[a]lthough [it] would probably save the clinic time in the long run, the Constitution does not require wise dentistry, only dentistry which responds to inmates' pain and discomfort." Dean v. Coughlin, 623 F. Supp. 392, 404 (S.D.N.Y. 1985); see also Grubbs v. Bradley, 552 F. Supp. 1052, 1129 (M.D. Tenn. 1982) (holding that delaying a prisoner's access to routine and preventive dental care is not "deliberate indifference").

141. See Hogan v. Russ, 890 F. Supp. 146, 149 (N.D.N.Y. 1995) ("Defendants did not deny plaintiff the ability to obtain specialized medical attention [with a periodontist]. They merely stated that it was not prison policy to pay for such specialized care and that such care would be made available to plaintiff at his own expense."); Taylor v. Garbutt, 185 F.3d 869, 869 (9th Cir. 1999) (finding that prison regulation requiring a co-payment for dental services that the prisoner requested does not violate the 8th Amendment).

142. Chance v. Armstrong, 143 F.3d 698, 703–04 (2d Cir. 1998) (finding that pulling teeth because it was cheaper than saving them violated the 8th Amendment).

143. Chance v. Armstrong, 143 F.3d 698, 703–04 (2d Cir. 1998).

144. Estelle v. Gamble, 429 U.S. 97, 104, 97 S. Ct. 285, 291, 50 L. Ed. 2d 251, 260 (1976) (holding that deliberate indifference to the serious medical needs of prisoners is "unnecessary and wanton infliction of pain" and therefore understand prison health care rights. This Part of the Chapter only explains special medical issues and procedures for women, like gynecological examinations, abortion, and pregnancy.

Though state and federal laws guarantee you a right to the medical services described in this Part,[145] prisons do not always provide these services, so it is important to know your rights. You should consult your institution's regulations regarding medical care as well as federal and state law. For New York, the regulations about prison health care are found in Part 7651 of Title 9 (Executive) of the Codes, Rules and Regulations.[146] If your institution or the corrections department in your state does not have such regulations, you should find out if your institution has a health care manual or your state's corrections department has an operations manual. In Texas, each correctional facility must have a written Health Services Plan describing procedures for regularly scheduled sick calls, emergency services, long-term care, and other medical services.[147] In California, health care provisions are found in Chapter Nine of the Department Operations Manual of the California Department of Corrections.[148]

Many female prisoners have an increased risk of chronic health problems, such as HIV, hepatitis, asthma, gynecological diseases, nutrition problems, and convulsive seizure disorders.[149] Federal law requires all federal prisoners to receive a medical examination within twenty-four hours after arriving in prison.[150] You should be tested for sexually transmitted diseases ("STDs") and tuberculosis ("TB") during this exam. Some courts have ruled that certain state prisons must also perform these tests.[151] Many states have TB screening plans, which require screening of prisoners in facilities of certain sizes or after a prisoner has been held for a certain period of time.[152] Read Chapter 26 of the JLM, "Infectious Diseases: AIDS, Hepatitis, and Tuberculosis in Prison," for more information. While prisons have a duty to perform these exams, many female prisoners do not receive a medical exam after being admitted.[153] After this first examination, you should be able to receive check-ups and diagnostic tests, but, again, some prisons do not follow the law.[154]

2. Abortion

According to Roe v. Wade, every woman has the right, as part of her right to privacy, to decide whether to have an abortion or to go forward with a pregnancy.[155] However, states are allowed to place restrictions or limitations on a woman's right to an abortion, like requiring parental consent for minors, as long as they do not place an "undue burden" on a woman's right to choose.[156] Courts decide what kind of obstacles might count as an undue burden.

---

banned by the 8th Amendment).

145. See 28 C.F.R. § 522.20 (2009) (requiring federal prisons to conduct health screenings on new prisoners); 28 C.F.R. § 549.10 (2009) (requiring federal prisons to manage and treat infectious disease); N.Y. Correct. Law § 137(6)(c) (McKinney 2003 & Supp. 2009) (directing that prisoners in solitary confinement must have a daily health check).

146. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 9, §§ 7651.1–7651.33 (1998).

147. 37 Tex. Admin. Code § 273.2 (West 2009).

148. Cal. Dept. of Corr., Department Operations Manual, ch. 9, available at http://www.cdcr.ca.gov/Regulations/Adult_Operations/DOM_TOC.html (last visited Sep. 24, 2009).

149. See Amnesty Int'l, Not Part of My Sentence: Violations of the Human Rights of Women in Custody (1999), available at http://www.amnesty.org/en/library/info/AMR51/019/1999/en; see also Amnesty Int'l USA, Abuse of Women in Custody: Sexual Misconduct and the Shackling of Pregnant Women available at http://www.amnestyusa.org/Womens_Human_Rights/Abuse_of_Women_in_Custody/page.do?id=1108288&n1=3&n2=39&n3=720 (last visited Sep. 24, 2009).

150. See 28 C.F.R. § 522.20 (2009) (requiring federal prisons to conduct health screenings on new prisoners).

151. See, e.g., Lareau v. Manson, 651 F.2d 96, 109 (2d Cir. 1981) (noting that lack of screening for infectious diseases resulted in serious threat to prisoners' well-being); Feliciano v. Gonzalez, 13 F. Supp. 2d 151, 208 (D.P.R. 1998) (holding that failure to screen incoming prisoners for infectious diseases including TB is unconstitutional); Inmates of Occoquan v. Barry, 717 F. Supp. 854, 867 (D.D.C. 1989) (holding lack of syphilis and TB testing to be one of the systemic failures showing deliberate indifference).

152. See, e.g., 37 Tex. Admin. Code § 273.7 (West 2009).

153. See Amnesty Int'l, Not Part of My Sentence: Violations of the Human Rights of Women in Custody (1999), available at http://www.amnesty.org/en/library/info/AMR51/019/1999/en.

154. See Women Prisoners v. District of Columbia, 968 F. Supp. 744, 747 (D.D.C. 1997) (holding that female prisoners had a right to diagnostic evaluations similar to those provided for men).

155. Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113, 153–54, 93 S. Ct. 705, 727, 35 L. Ed. 2d 147, 177–78 (1973).

156. See Planned Parenthood of Southeastern Pennsylvania v. Casey, 505 U.S. 833, 876–77, 112 S. Ct. 2791, 2820–21, 120 L. Ed. 2d. 674, 714–15 (1992) (explaining the sort of restrictions that could constitute an "undue burden").

If you are a pregnant federal prisoner, federal regulations require that prison officials offer you medical, religious, and social counseling before you have an abortion.[157] You may accept or decline this counseling, and officials should allow you to make the final decision on whether or not to have an abortion.[158] Once you have received the offer of counseling, and have notified the prison in writing that you chose to have an abortion, the prison must arrange for the abortion.[159]

If you are a state prisoner, your rights will mostly depend on the abortion laws in your state. In the State of New York, abortions are allowed if a doctor has a "reasonable belief that [the abortion] is necessary to preserve [your] life" or the abortion occurs in the first "twenty-four weeks ... of [the] pregnancy."[160]

Some states, like California and New York, have codes that say that female prisoners have the same right to an abortion as any other woman in the state.[161] In other states, there may be additional restrictions on prisoners seeking abortions. You should first look at your state code or prison regulations. Few courts have ruled on the issue of whether prisons may treat female prisoners differently than other women in the state when it comes to the right to get an abortion. In Monmouth County Correctional Institutional Inmates v. Lanzaro, the Third Circuit held that female prisoners have the same right to an abortion as non-prisoner women in the same state.[162] The court found that requiring a woman to get a court-ordered release for an elective abortion was an undue burden on her constitutionally-protected right to have an abortion, as well as a violation of her Eighth Amendment right to medical treatment. The court classified an elective abortion as a "serious medical need" where denial or undue delay in providing the procedure could render the prisoner's condition "irreparable."[163] The court also found that a prison is not required to pay for a prisoner's abortion, but if you request an abortion and are entitled to one under state law, then a prison official is required to transport you to a clinic.[164]

Some courts have deemed restrictions on elective abortions unconstitutional in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment, but not in violation of the Eighth Amendment.[165] In Roe v. Crawford, the Eighth Circuit considered the constitutionality of a Missouri Department of Corrections ("MDC") policy prohibiting transportation of pregnant prisoners off-site for elective, non-therapeutic abortions. The Court found that the MDC policy was unconstitutional under the Fourteenth Amendment, and that women prisoners do not lose their right to abortion care once incarcerated.[166] However, in a different case, the Fifth Circuit upheld a prison policy requiring prisoners to get a court order for abortions because the policy was implemented reasonably and was "rationally connected to the legitimate penological objectives [prison security] served."[167]

Note that if you ask for an abortion but never get one because of prison officials' negligence, you probably do not have a constitutional claim. In Bryant v. Maffucci, for example, a pretrial detainee requested an abortion, but because of administrative inefficiency and unreasonable delays by prison officials the abortion was scheduled too late to be performed.[168] The court found that the prison officials were not deliberately

---

157. 28 C.F.R. § 551.23(a)–(c) (2009).

158. 28 C.F.R. § 551.23(a) (2009).

159. 28 C.F.R. § 551.23(c) (2009).

160. N.Y. Penal Law § 125.05(3) (McKinney 2009).

161. Cal. Penal Code § 4028 (West 2000); N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 14, § 27.6(c) (2009).

162. Monmouth County Corr. Inst. Inmates v. Lanzaro, 834 F.2d 326, 343–45 (3d Cir. 1987) (holding abortion restrictions were not justified by state's interest in childbirth because this interest does not further rehabilitation, security, or deterrence).

163. Monmouth County Corr. Inst. Inmates v. Lanzaro, 834 F.2d 326, 349 (3d Cir. 1987).

164. Monmouth County Corr. Inst. Inmates v. Lanzaro, 834 F.2d 326, 341 (3d Cir. 1987). But see Victoria W. v. Larpenter, 369 F.3d 475, 487 (5th Cir. 2004) (deeming a prison policy that required prisoners to obtain court orders before they could leave the prison for elective medical procedures "rationally connected to the legitimate penological objectives served").

165. Roe v. Crawford, 514 F.3d 789, 796–7, 801 (8th Cir. 2008) (holding that refusal to provide a prisoner access to an elective, non-therapeutic abortion does not constitute and 8th amendment violation, but that "an elective abortion… is a liberty interest protected under the Fourteenth Amendment").

166. Roe v. Crawford, 514 F.3d 789, 801 (8th Cir. 2008).

167. Victoria W. v. Larpenter, 369 F.3d 475, 487 (5th Cir. 2004). Note that, because the right to have an abortion is a constitutional right, any prison policy that restricts that right must be "reasonably related to legitimate penological interests."

168. Bryant v. Maffucci, 923 F.2d 979, 980–81 (2d Cir. 1991) (citing N.Y. Penal Law § 125.05(3) (McKinney 1990) (amended 2004)).

indifferent, only negligent, so their conduct was not in violation of the Eighth Amendment.[169] Similarly, in Gibson v. Matthews, the Sixth Circuit found that prison officials were merely negligent when they incorrectly estimated the due date of a pregnant prisoner and thus denied her access to abortion facilities.[170]

3. Pregnancy

A woman prisoner's treatment during pregnancy is important.[171] Prisons should (but might not) have policies and procedures regarding risk assessment and treatment of pregnant prisoners, diet and nutrition, prenatal care, and counseling.[172]

In New York State, a pregnant prisoner has a right to "comprehensive prenatal care ... which shall include, but is not limited to, regular medical examinations, advice on appropriate levels of activity and safety precautions, nutritional guidance, and HIV education."[173] Shortly before the prisoner is about to give birth, she should be moved from the jail or prison to some other location "a reasonable time before the anticipated birth of [her] child," and provided with "comfortable accommodations, maintenance and medical care."[174] She will be returned to the prison or jail "as soon after the birth of her child as the state of her health will permit."[175] In California, a pregnant prisoner in a local detention facility has a right to receive necessary medical services from the physician of her choice, but she must pay for any private doctors.[176] California has recently amended its state regulations concerning pregnant prisoners. These rules provide for routine physical examinations as well as mandatory nutritional guidelines to be followed by prison facilities when caring for pregnant inmates.[177] In particular, the use of leg and waist restraints is subject to stringent requirements.

In a federal case in Wisconsin, a woman prisoner charged prison nurses with violating her Eighth Amendment rights by failing to bring her to the hospital when she was in labor. The prisoner gave birth in her prison cell while changing her clothes.[178] The court denied summary judgment and held that a reasonable jury could conclude that the nurses had shown "deliberate indifference" toward the pregnant prisoner because the nurses ignored the prisoner's request to go to the hospital and they "only examined [her] through the small tray slot in the cell door, rather than conducting a more comprehensive exam."[179]

Pregnant prisoners have also had some success in lawsuits alleging negligence against prisons. One court found a prison liable for the wrongful death of a premature baby born to a prisoner because the prison was negligent. Prison officials did not follow the prison's procedures, failed to diagnose the labor despite complaints of bleeding and abdominal pain, and did not bring the prisoner to a hospital until it may have been too late to prevent the birth.[180]

Shackling pregnant prisoners in labor is unfortunately still common, and many departments of corrections and the Federal Bureau of Prisons allow the use of restraints during labor.[181] This may be changing, however. California has banned shackling prisoners by the wrists or ankles during labor, delivery,

---

169. Bryant v. Maffucci, 923 F.2d 979, 986 (2d Cir. 1991) (holding that negligent failure to provide an abortion did not violate detainee's rights).

170. Gibson v. Matthews, 926 F.2d 532, 536–37 (6th Cir. 1991).

171. Books can help you learn to care for yourself while pregnant. One good resource is What To Expect When You're Expecting by Heidi E. Murkoff and Sharon Mazel (Workman Publishing Company 2008) (1984). If you do not have access to any books like this one, consult a medical professional at your institution regarding questions you might have about your pregnancy. You can also find information online at websites like "What to Expect," available at http://www.whattoexpect.com (last visited Sep. 24, 2009).

172. Nat'l Comm'n on Corr. Health Care, Women's Health Care in Correctional Settings (2005), available at http://www.ncchc.org/resources/statements/womenshealth2005.html.

173. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 9, § 7651.17(a) (1997).

174. N.Y. Correct. Law § 611(1) (McKinney 2003 & Supp. 2009).

175. N.Y. Correct. Law § 611(1) (McKinney 2003 & Supp. 2009).

176. Cal. Penal Code § 4023.6 (West 2000).

177. Cal. Penal Code §§ 3403, 3406, 3424 (West 2000).

178. Doe v. Gustavus, 294 F. Supp. 2d 1003, 1007 (E.D. Wis. 2003).

179. Doe v. Gustavus, 294 F. Supp. 2d 1003, 1009 (E.D. Wis. 2003).

180. Calloway v. City of New Orleans, 524 So. 2d 182, 187 (La. Ct. App. 1988).

181. Adam Liptak, Prisons Often Shackle Pregnant Inmates in Labor, N.Y. Times, Mar. 2, 2006, available at http://www.nytimes.com/2006/03/02/national/02shackles.html?ex=1298955600&en=afd1d2d6614d34d6&ei=5088 (last visited Sept. 26, 2009).

and recovery.[182] Similarly, New York does not use restraints on prisoners during delivery.[183] One court has struck down a practice of shackling women in their third trimester with leg shackles, handcuffs, a belly chain, and a "black box." The court held these practices violated the Eighth Amendment; leg shackles alone provide sufficient security during the third trimester and even these must be removed during labor and for a short period thereafter.[184] The Eighth Circuit also recently ruled that that a reasonable jury could find that a prison corrections officer violated the Eighth Amendment by shackling a prisoner after she went into labor.[185] According to the court, a jury could infer that the officer "recognized that the shackles interfered with [the prisoner's] medical care, could be an obstacle in the event of a medical emergency, and caused unnecessary suffering at a time when [the prisoner] would have likely been physically unable to flee."[186] The court also wrote in a footnote that a jury could determine the officer was aware of the risks involved in labor because they are obvious.[187] The prisoner was not shackled as she gave birth but was again placed in restraints after delivery.

E. Your Right to Informed Consent and Medical Privacy

1. Informed Consent

Before you are treated, you should ask your doctor or other prison health staff what to expect from a medical procedure and its risks and alternatives. Depending on your state, you may have both a statutory and constitutional right to this information. Informed consent means that before you agreed to your particular medical treatment, your doctor told you the purpose of the procedure, its possible side effects, and other possible treatments.[188]

In New York, if you did not agree to the medical procedure or were never fully told of the treatment's risks and alternatives, you can bring a state law claim against your doctor or other prison officials for lack of informed consent.[189] To prove that you did not give your informed consent (and that, therefore, your doctor or prison officials have violated state law), you will have to show (1) that your doctor did not tell you about the risks of the treatment and the alternative treatments available; (2) that a reasonable patient in your position would not have agreed to the treatment if he had been fully informed; and (3) that the lack of consent caused your injury.[190] You must have been injured as a result of lack of informed consent in order to have such a claim succeed.

You may also be able to bring a similar constitutional claim. In Pabon v. Wright, the Second Circuit held that prisoners' constitutionally protected liberty interest in refusing medical treatment under the Fourteenth Amendment includes the related "right to such information as a reasonable patient would deem necessary to make an informed decision regarding medical treatment."[191] In order to succeed on this claim, you must meet a different test. Specifically, you will have to show (1) that government officials failed to

---

182. Adam Liptak, Prisons Often Shackle Pregnant Inmates in Labor, N.Y. Times, Mar. 2, 2006, available at http://www.nytimes.com/2006/03/02/national/02shackles.html?ex=1298955600&en=afd1d2d6614d34d6&ei=5088 (last visited Sept. 26, 2009).

183. "No restraints of any kind shall be used when [an incarcerated] woman is in labor, admitted to a hospital, institution or clinic for delivery, or recovering after giving birth." N.Y. Correct. Law § 611(1) (McKinney 2003 & Supp. 2009) (amended by 2009 N.Y.S.B. 1290).

184. Women Prisoners v. District of Columbia, 877 F.Supp. 634, 668–69 (D.D.C 1994), vacated in part and remanded on other grounds, 93 F.3d 910, 920–23 (D.C. Cir. 1996); see also Women Prisoners v. District of Columbia, 968 F. Supp. 744 (D.D.C. 1997) (describing settlement after appellate proceedings).

185. Nelson v. Corr. Med. Servs., 583 F.3d 522, 529–30 (8th Cir. 2009).

186. Nelson v. Corr. Med. Servs., 583 F.3d 522, 530 (8th Cir. 2009).

187. Nelson v. Corr. Med. Servs., 583 F.3d 522, 530 n.5 (8th Cir. 2009).

188. To learn more about informed consent issues for prisoners with mental illness, see Part C(1) of Chapter 29 of the JLM, "Special Issues for Prisoners with Mental Illness."

189. N.Y. Pub. Health Law § 2805(d) (McKinney 2007).

190. Foote v. Rajadhyax, 268 A.D.2d 745, 745, 702 N.Y.S.2d 153, 154 (3d Dept. 2000) (granting prisoner a new trial to show that she had not consented to a root canal).

191. Pabon v. Wright, 459 F.3d 241, 246 (2d Cir. 2006) (finding a constitutionally protected interest, but affirming the grant of summary judgment to prison officials because of qualified immunity); see White v. Napoleon, 897 F.2d 103, 113 (3d Cir. 1990) ("Prisoners have a right [under the 14th Amendment] to such information as is reasonably necessary to make an informed decision to accept or reject proposed treatment."); see also Benson v. Terhune, 304 F.3d 874, 884–85 (9th Cir. 2002) (explaining that the recognition of the right to medical information is a "reasonable application of Supreme Court precedent").

provide you with the kind of information that a reasonable patient would need to make an informed decision; (2) that you would have refused the medical treatment if you had been so informed; and (3) that the officials failed to provide you with information with deliberate indifference to your right to refuse medical treatment.[192] However, a prison official can still forcibly give you medical treatment even if you do not consent as long as the official reasonably determines that it "furthers a legitimate penological purpose."[193]

2. Medical Privacy

Prisoners have constitutional privacy rights protecting their medical information.[194] Prisoners are entitled to confidentiality of information about their medical condition and treatment[195] and about their choice to refuse medical treatment, meaning that they can restrict how that information gets distributed.[196] But like all prisoners' rights, prisoners' privacy rights are limited by the needs of prison administration and depend on the circumstances.[197]

The courts have "long recognized the general right to privacy in one's medical information: 'There can be no question that ... medical records, which may contain intimate facts of a personal nature, are well within the ambit of materials entitled to privacy protection.'"[198] The Third Circuit has held that prisoners have a Fourteenth Amendment privacy interest in their medical information because it is among those rights that "are not inconsistent with their status as prisoners or with the legitimate penological objectives of the corrections system."[199] Similarly, in Powell v. Schriver, the Second Circuit held that prisoners do have a constitutional right to keep previously undisclosed medical information confidential as long as the disclosure "is not reasonably related to a legitimate penological interest."[200]

In 1996, Congress passed the Health Insurance Portability and Accountability Act ("HIPAA"), which contains significant protection for prisoners' medical privacy rights.[201] Under the final HIPAA Privacy rule,

---

192. Pabon v. Wright, 459 F.3d 241, 246 (2d Cir. 2006).

193. Pabon v. Wright, 459 F.3d 241, 246 (2d Cir. 2006).

194. Powell v. Schriver, 175 F.3d 107, 111 (2d Cir. 1999) ("[T]he right to confidentiality includes the right to protection regarding information about the state of one's health … [because] … there are few matters that are quite so personal as the status of one's health, and few matters the dissemination of which one would prefer to maintain greater control over."); see Hunnicutt v. Armstrong, No. 04-1565-pr, 152 Fed. Appx. 34, 35-–36, 2005 U.S. App. LEXIS 22220, at *3–4 (2d Cir. Oct. 13, 2005) (unpublished) (finding that prisoner stated a constitutional privacy claim where prisoner alleged prison publicly discussed his mental health issues in front of other prisoners and "allowed non-health staff access to [prisoners'] confidential health records").

195. Doe v. Delie, 257 F.3d 309, 315–17 (3d Cir. 2001) (noting that a right to privacy in medical information extends to prescription medications and is "particularly strong" for HIV status); Powell v. Schriver, 175 F.3d 107, 111 (2d Cir. 1999) (finding a right to privacy in transsexuality); see O'Connor v. Pierson, 426 F.3d 187, 201 (2d Cir. 2005) ("Medical information in general, and information about a person's psychiatric health and substance-abuse history in particular, is information of the most intimate kind."); Hunnicutt v. Armstrong, No. 04-1565-pr, 152 Fed. Appx. 34, 35–36, 2005 U.S. App. LEXIS 22220, at *2–4 (2d Cir. Oct. 13, 2005) (unpublished) (finding an allegation that a prisoner's mental health consultations occurring in a housing unit within other prisoners' hearing stated a constitutional privacy claim).

196. White v. Napoleon, 897 F.2d 103, 113 (3d Cir. 1990) (holding that a prisoner who was allergic to penicillin had the right to refuse treatment when a doctor would not disclose whether the proposed treatment contained penicillin); see Cruzan v. Director, Mo. Dept. of Health, 497 U.S. 261, 278, 110 S. Ct. 2841, 2851, 111 L. Ed. 2d 224, 242 (1990) (finding a general right to refuse medical treatment by relying on previous holdings regarding prisoners' right to refuse psychotropic medications and prisoners' liberty interest in avoiding transfer to a mental hospital and unwanted behavior modification treatment).

197. See generally Hudson v. Palmer, 468 U.S. 517, 527, 104 S. Ct. 3194, 3200, 82 L. Ed. 2d 393, 403 (1984) (explaining that prisoners do not retain a right of privacy in their prison cells protecting them against unreasonable searches because otherwise it would be impossible to run the prison).

198. Doe v. Delie, 257 F.3d 309, 315 (3d Cir. 2001) (quoting United States v. Westinghouse Elec. Corp., 638 F.2d 570, 577 (3d Cir. 1980)).

199. Doe v. Delie, 257 F.3d 309, 315–17 (3d Cir. 2001) (quoting Pell v. Procunier, 417 U.S. 817, 822, 94 S. Ct. 2800, 2804, 41 L. Ed. 2d 495, 501 (1974)).

200. Powell v. Schriver, 175 F.3d 107, 112–13 (2d Cir. 1999) (emphasis added) (holding that "the gratuitous disclosure of a [prisoner's] confidential medical information as humor or gossip" is not reasonably related to penological interests and violates the prisoner's constitutional right to privacy). The court noted that "disclosure of an inmate's HIV-positive status could further legitimate penological interests" when, for example, a prison needs to segregate HIV-positive prisoners or when prison officials need "to warn prison officials and inmates who otherwise may be exposed to contagion." Powell v. Schriver, 175 F.3d 107, 112 (2d Cir. 1999).

201. 45 C.F.R. §§160, 162, 164 (2009).

identifiable health information pertaining to "inmates" has been deemed "protected health information," called "PHI." A hospital providing prison health care may disclose PHI to a "correctional institution" or a law enforcement official having lawful custody of a prisoner only if the correctional institution or law enforcement official represents that disclosing such protected health information is necessary for: (1) the provision of health care to such individuals; (2) the health and safety of such individual or other prisoners; (3) the health and safety of officers, employees, or others at the correctional institution; (4) the health and safety of such individuals and officers or other persons responsible for the transport of prisoners or their transfer from one institution, facility, or setting to another; (5) the health and safety of law enforcement on the premises of the correctional institution; or (6) the administration and maintenance of the safety, security, and good order of the correctional institution.[202]

A prison hospital's disclosure is permitted to entities outside the hospital if the correctional institution or law enforcement official represents that the protected health information is necessary for any of the purposes listed above. Furthermore, a prison hospital may reasonably rely upon any such representations from public officials regarding the health of a prisoner. However, when a prisoner is released from custody—including probation, parole, and supervised release—that person is no longer categorized as an "inmate," and these permitted use and disclosure provisions no longer apply.[203]

You should also note that some courts have held prison officials liable for disclosing a prisoner's confidential medical information, not because they violated the prisoner's privacy rights but because by disclosing the information the officials put the prisoner in danger. In Anderson v. Romero, for example, the court indicated that prison employees would violate a prisoner's Eighth Amendment rights if, "knowing that an inmate identified as HIV positive was a likely target of violence by other inmates yet indifferent to his fate, [the employees] gratuitously revealed his HIV status to other inmates and a violent attack upon him ensued."[204]

F. Actions You Can Bring When You Are Denied Medical Care

Now that you know your rights, it is important to be able to enforce them. This Part describes the actions you can bring when your right to adequate medical care is violated. Remember that in almost every instance, your case will be helped by attempting to go through your institution's complaint process. For more information on doing so, see Chapter 15 of the JLM, "Inmate Grievance Procedures."

1. Remedies for State Prisoners

(a) 42 U.S.C. § 1983 Actions

Section 1983 is a federal statute that allows you to enforce federal constitutional rights. When your right to adequate medical care is violated by persons acting under state authority (for example, prison guards, doctors, and/or administrators), you may use Section 1983 to bring a suit in federal court. For a discussion of Section 1983 actions, see Chapter 16 of the JLM, "Using 42 U.S.C. § 1983 and 28 U.S.C. § 1331 to Obtain Relief from Violations of Federal Law."

(b) Tort Actions

As discussed in Part B of this Chapter, the federal constitutional standard established by Wilson and Farmer cannot be proven by claiming only negligence.[205] If the facts of your case are not enough to prove a constitutional violation, but only show negligence, you may want to consider bringing a tort action against state officials instead of a constitutional claim. See Chapter 17 of the JLM, "The State's Duty to Protect You and Your Property: Tort Actions," to learn how to do so.

To succeed on a negligence claim you must prove three things:

(1) "Duty of Care"—that the defendants had a duty of care towards you;

---

202. 45 C.F.R. §164.512(k)(5)(i) (2009).

203. 45 C.F.R. §164.512(k)(5)(iii) (2009) (stating that there is "no application [of this section] after release [from custody]," since "an individual is no longer an inmate when released on parole, probation, supervised release, or otherwise is no longer in lawful custody.").

204. Anderson v. Romero, 72 F.3d 518, 523 (7th Cir. 1995).

205. See Sanderfer v. Nichols, 62 F.3d 151, 155 (6th Cir. 1995) (finding that a failure to check medical records that contained a history of hypertension amounts to "negligence at most," even though the prisoner died because medication worsened his hypertension and led to a heart attack).

(2) "Breach of Duty"—that the defendants failed to meet that duty; and
(3) "Injury"—that you were injured as a result of that failure.[206]

There are several ways to prove that the prison has a duty of care towards you. First, as discussed above, Estelle v. Gamble held that prison officials have a duty to provide adequate medical care.[207] Second, a state statute may declare, or require, a prison's duty of care. Many states have statutes that require prison officials to provide adequate medical care. For example, in New York, Section 70(2)(c) of the New York State Correction Law directs Department of Correctional Services officials to maintain and operate correctional facilities "with due regard to ... [t]he health and safety of every person in the custody of the Department."[208] There are also common law (law made through judge's opinions, rather than by statute) claims of medical malpractice and negligence actions that you may bring.

The most common method of proving that a defendant breached a duty is to have an expert provide testimony that the defendant did not use the usually accepted procedures. For example, in Stanback v. State, the plaintiff's expert testified that an x-ray of plaintiff's knee would have revealed his torn ligament. Yet, prison doctors only offered ace bandages, braces, and painkillers and did not x-ray the knee for over three and one-half years.[209] Expert testimony is not always necessary. In Rivers v. State, the court stated that "[a] medical expert's testimony is not required where a lay person, relying on common knowledge and experience, can find that the harm would not have occurred in the absence of negligence."[210] In other words, if an ordinary person could have used common sense to find out that negligence must have occurred, you do not need an expert witness. Thus, no expert testimony was necessary in Rivers to prove that a doctor was negligent when he performed a hernia operation on a prisoner's right side, even though the patient required the operation on his left side and the hernia was visible on the left side.[211] As previously noted in Part B of this Chapter, there are differences between medical malpractice and medical negligence claims. The need for an expert is linked to this distinction: if you do decide to file a medical malpractice claim, you may need an expert witness to support your claim that a reasonable medical practitioner would not have caused the injury you claim was caused.

Finally, you must prove that the breach of duty was the direct cause of your injury. This element is not ordinarily difficult to prove, but if you interfere with your treatment in any way, you may fail to prove direct causation. For example, in Brown v. Sheridan, the plaintiff lost his case when the court found that he did not receive immediate treatment because of his own failure to disclose the nature of his injury, and that defendants "took reasonable steps to ascertain and monitor plaintiff's condition."[212] The court noted that the prisoner did not openly display symptoms of his injury, and refused to cooperate with psychiatric care that that could have aided defendants in discovering and treating his injury sooner.[213] Also, in Marchione v. State, the plaintiff, who was given medication for hypertension and became permanently impotent as a result, lost on his negligence claim because he did not report his symptoms in time.[214] At trial, medical experts found that the impotence would have occurred if not treated within eight hours after the onset of 206. Brown v. Sheridan, 894 F. Supp. 66, 69–72 (N.D.N.Y. 1995) (finding that prison officials were not negligent for failing to treat a prisoner's broken leg because the officials were not told by the prisoner of his injury and it was not unreasonable for the officials to not have discovered the injury: "the record shows that these [officials] took reasonable steps to ascertain and monitor plaintiff's condition, and that when plaintiff disclosed his injury to them he received prompt medical attention.").

207. Estelle v. Gamble, 429 U.S. 97, 103–06, 97 S. Ct. 285, 290–92, 50 L. Ed. 2d 251, 259–61 (1976). Note that the Court in Estelle v. Gamble finds that "[m]edical malpractice does not become a constitutional violation merely because the victim is a prisoner," and that a proper claim for breach of this duty must include allegations of "acts or omissions sufficiently harmful to evidence deliberate indifferences to serious medical needs." Estelle v. Gamble, 429 U.S. 97, 103, 97 S. Ct. 285, 290, 50 L. Ed. 2d 251, 259 (1976).

208. N.Y. Correct. Law § 70(2)(c) (McKinney 2003 & Supp. 2009).

209. Stanback v. State, 163 A.D.2d 298, 298–99, 557 N.Y.S.2d 433, 433–34 (2d Dept. 1990).

210. Rivers v. State, 142 Misc. 2d 563, 567, 537 N.Y.S.2d 968, 971 (N.Y. Ct. Cl. 1989), rev'd on other grounds, 159 A.D.2d 788, 552 N.Y.S.2d 189 (3d Dept. 1990).

211. Rivers v. State, 142 Misc. 2d 563, 567, 537 N.Y.S.2d 968, 971 (N.Y. Ct. Cl. 1989), rev'd on other grounds, 159 A.D.2d 788, 552 N.Y.S.2d 189 (3d Dept. 1990).

212. Brown v. Sheridan, 894 F. Supp. 66, 72 (N.D.N.Y. 1995).

213. Brown v. Sheridan, 894 F. Supp. 66, 71 (N.D.N.Y. 1995).

214. Marchione v. State, 194 A.D.2d 851, 855, 598 N.Y.S.2d 592, 594–95 (3d Dept. 1993).

symptoms. Although the prisoner noticed the symptoms by ten o'clock in the morning, he did not indicate his situation was an emergency and delayed making a specific report of his symptoms until the evening.[215]

An advantage to filing a state tort claim is that you only need to establish negligence, a lower standard than deliberate indifference. A disadvantage to filing a state tort claim is that you can only get money damages, while Section 1983 provides both declaratory relief (a judgment that is binding on both parties in the present and the future) and injunctive relief (a court order that prohibits or commands action to undo some wrong or injury) in addition to money damages. Furthermore, a negligence action may only be filed in state court while a Section 1983 claim can be filed in either federal or state court.

(c) Article 78 Proceedings in New York State

In New York, there is a legal procedure called an Article 78 proceeding that allows you to challenge a decision made by a state official.[216] If you are denied medical care, you can bring a complaint under Article 78 to require the prison to provide that care. In an Article 78 proceeding, you can recover only limited money damages.[217] To be successful, you must be able to show that the prison authorities were deliberately indifferent to your serious medical needs.[218] The statute of limitations requires that the proceeding be brought within four months of the denial or you cannot bring the claim.[219] Administrative remedies must be exhausted before beginning an Article 78 proceeding. See Chapter 22 of the JLM for more information on Article 78 proceedings in New York, "How to Challenge Administrative Decisions Using Article 78 of the New York Civil Practice Law and Rules."

2. Remedies for Federal Prisoners

(a) Bivens Actions Under 28 U.S.C. § 1331

A Bivens action is the federal prisoner's equivalent to a state prisoner's Section 1983 action.[220] In a Bivens action, you must prove that the doctor or official showed deliberate indifference to your serious medical needs. For more on Bivens actions, see Chapter 16 of the JLM, "Using 42 U.S.C. § 1983 and 28 U.S.C. § 1331 to Obtain Relief from Violations of Federal Law."

(b) Federal Tort Claims Act

Under the Federal Tort Claims Act ("FTCA"),[221] you can obtain relief if the prison doctor or official was negligent.[222] In other words, you can sue the federal government if something a government employee did or

---

215. Marchione v. State, 194 A.D.2d 851, 855, 598 N.Y.S.2d 592, 595 (3d Dept. 1993).

216. N.Y. C.P.L.R. 7801 (McKinney 2008).

217. Money damages are limited to those "incidental to the primary relief sought," and must be such "as [the plaintiff] might otherwise recover on the same set of facts in a separate action … in the supreme court against the same body or officer in its or his official capacity." N.Y. C.P.L.R. 7806 (McKinney 2008).

218. Estelle v. Gramble, 429 U.S. 97, 106, 97 S. Ct. 285, 292, 50 L. Ed. 2d 251, 261 (1976) (holding that a prisoner needs to show "deliberate indifference to serious medical needs" in order to show a violation of the 8th Amendment); Moore v. Leonardo, 185 A.D.2d 489, 490, 586 N.Y.S.2d 37, 37–38 (3d Dept. 1992) (finding prisoner failed to show deliberate indifference when facility's medical staff met with prisoner 23 times and gave treatment); DeFlumer v. Dalsheim, 122 A.D.2d 872, 873, 505 N.Y.S.2d 919, 920 (2d Dept. 1986) (finding prisoner did not meet standard when he complained officials gave him plastic frame glasses instead of metal frame ones); Bryant v. Brunelle, 284 A.D.2d 936, 936, 726 N.Y.S.2d 315, 315–16 (4th Dept. 2001) (finding prison officials were not deliberately indifferent for refusing to provide prisoner with orthopedic shoes and inserts and for granting an exam by a different podiatrist than requested).

219. N.Y. C.P.L.R. 217(1) (McKinney 2003).

220. Bivens v. Six Unknown Named Agents of Fed. Bureau of Narcotics, 403 U.S. 388, 91 S. Ct. 1999, 29 L. Ed. 2d 619 (1971); see also Porter v. Nussle, 534 U.S. 516, 524, 122 S. Ct. 983, 988, 152 L. Ed. 2d 12, 21 (2002) (holding that prisoner wishing to bring a Bivens suit must try administrative remedies first); 42 U.S.C. § 1997e(a) (1996) (federal statute stating that no remedy is available until administrative remedies are exhausted).

221. 28 U.S.C. §§ 1346(b) (1997), 2671–80 (2000).

222. United States v. Muniz, 374 U.S. 150, 150–52, 163–64, 83 S. Ct. 1850, 1852, 1858, 10 L. Ed. 2d 805, 808–09, 815–16 (1963) (allowing suit under the FTCA in two cases: one based on prisoner's claim that the negligence of prison employees was responsible for the delay in diagnosis and removal of the tumor which caused prisoner's blindness, and another based on prisoner's claim that prison guards were negligent for failing to prevent an assault on the prisoner by other inmates that resulted in injury); Clay v. Martin, 509 F.2d 109, 111–12, 114 (2d Cir. 1975) (permitting action under the FTCA for alleged negligence in medical experimentation on prisoner); Cain v. United States, 643 F. Supp. 175, 175–76, 181 (S.D.N.Y. 1986) (denying U.S. government's motion to dismiss suit alleging syphilis experimentation on prisoner without his consent).

failed to do while working for the government harmed you.[223] Courts look to see whether the behavior would be a tort in the state where the alleged behavior occurred. If it is a tort in that state, you can sue the federal government.

If the injury was caused by intentional behavior, however, a claim cannot be brought under the FTCA.[224] For example, an allegation of assault and battery (considered purposeful behavior under the law) could not be brought as an FTCA claim. If the act or omission that caused your injury arose from a discretionary duty, you cannot sue under the FTCA.

If you do meet FTCA suit requirements, you must bring it against the United States, not the federal employees who caused your injury. If you name employees as defendants, the court will dismiss your suit.[225]

(c) Choosing Between a Bivens Suit and an FTCA Action

If you are a federal prisoner, you may have the choice of bringing either a Bivens suit or an FTCA claim. While it is easier to bring a successful FTCA action because it allows suit for mere medical malpractice, there are several advantages to bringing a Bivens action not available under the FTCA. First, while you cannot bring an FTCA action for an intentional tort, you can bring a claim for an intentional tort in a Bivens suit against an individual. Second, under the FTCA you can only sue the federal government, while in a Bivens action you can sue the individuals who mistreated you. Third, under the FTCA you can only receive compensatory damages (money equal to the cost of repairing or compensating the actual injury you suffered), while in a Bivens suit you may receive punitive damages (extra money awarded as a penalty against the wrongdoer). Fourth, in an FTCA action, you cannot later sue the individuals who injured you, but in a Bivens action, if you are unable to collect on the judgment against the individual employees, you can bring a suit against the government. Finally, a judge hears an FTCA suit, but a jury hears a Bivens suit.

If your injury occurred because of a violation of your constitutional rights and also from a tort, you can bring both an FTCA and a Bivens action. If you do not wish to bring both, you can choose between them.

G. Conclusion

The Constitution and state law protect your right to adequate medical care. Part B explained what you need to prove to show you have been denied adequate medical care in violation of the Eighth Amendment. You must show that you suffered serious harm because you failed to receive medical treatment (the objective test),[226] and that the prison official who denied you treatment "[knew] of and [disregarded] an excessive risk to [your] health or safety" (the subjective test).[227] Part C talked about how courts treat certain common prisoner health complaints. Part D explained specific health rights for female prisoners. Part E explained your right to receive information before you are treated and your right to keep your medical records confidential. Part F talked about the different ways you can go to court if your rights have been violated. Because this Chapter focused on federal and New York State law, you will need to research the law in your own state if you are in a prison outside of New York. Also, read Chapters 26, 28, and 29 of the JLM for more information on your rights with respect to infectious diseases, disabilities, and mental illness.

If you believe you are not receiving adequate medical care, the first step is to assert your rights through your institution's grievance procedure. If your problem is not addressed, you will have preserved your right to bring a later suit in court. You can only bring your claim in federal court, or state court in New York (an Article 78 proceeding), after you are unsuccessful or do not receive a favorable result through the inmate grievance procedure. Read Chapter 15 of the JLM to learn about Inmate Grievance Procedures.

---

223. For the FTCA, conduct is within the scope of "employment" where there is a "reasonable connection between the act and the agent's duties" and where "the act is 'not manifestly or palpably beyond the [agent's] authority.'" Yalkut v. Gemignani, 873 F.2d 31, 34 (2d Cir. 1989) (quoting Niert v. Overby, 816 F.2d 1464, 1466 (10th Cir. 1987)).

224. You can bring a Bivens action for intentional torts. You may also bring a state tort claim. See JLM, Chapter 17, "The State's Duty to Protect You and Your Property: Tort Actions," for more information about state tort claims.

225. See Lee v. Carlson, 645 F. Supp. 1430, 1434 (S.D.N.Y. 1986) (dismissing FTCA claim where prisoner alleged liability against 13 defendants in their individual capacities because, under the FTCA, prisoners can sue only the federal government and not individuals).

226. Wilson v. Seiter, 501 U.S. 294, 304–05, 111 S. Ct. 2321, 2327, 115 L. Ed. 2d 271, 283 (1991). See also Rhodes v. Chapman, 452 U.S. 337, 345–48, 101 S. Ct. 2392, 2398–99, 69 L. Ed. 2d 59, 68–69 (1981) (holding that an objective standard must be used in determining whether prisoners suffered harm in violation of the 8th Amendment).

227. Farmer v. Brennan, 511 U.S. 825, 837, 114 S. Ct. 1970, 1979, 128 L. Ed. 2d 811, 825 (1994).

A JAILHOUSE LAWYER'S MANUAL

Chapter 24: Your Right To Be Free From Assault by Prison Guards and Other Prisoners

Columbia Human Rights Law Review

Ninth Edition 2011

Legal Disclaimer

A Jailhouse Lawyer's Manual is written and updated by members of the Columbia Human Rights Law Review. The law prohibits us from providing any legal advice to prisoners. This information is not intended as legal advice or representation nor should you consider or rely upon it as such. Neither the JLM nor any information contained herein is intended to or shall constitute a contract between the JLM and any reader, and the JLM does not guarantee the accuracy of the information contained herein. Additionally, your use of the JLM should not be construed as creating an attorney-client relationship with the JLM staff or anyone at Columbia Law School. Finally, while we have attempted to provide information that is up-to-date and useful, because the law changes frequently, we cannot guarantee that all information is current.

CHAPTER 24

YOUR RIGHT TO BE FREE FROM ASSAULT BY PRISON GUARDS AND OTHER PRISONERS*

A. Introduction

The United States Constitution and state laws protect prisoners from certain acts of violence and harassment, including attacks, rapes, and other forms of assault. If you believe that a guard or another prisoner has assaulted you, this Chapter can help explain your legal options. Part B of this Chapter describes your legal right not to be assaulted, and explains what you need to prove in order to sue under the Eighth Amendment. Part C discusses legal protections against sexual assault and rape. Part D outlines special issues for gay, homosexual, and/or effeminate prisoners. Part E explains how to protect your right to be free from physical and sexual assaults.

Before starting your research, keep in mind that there are two types of laws that protect your rights in prison: (1) federal constitutional law and (2) state law. Federal constitutional law comes from the United States Constitution, which protects prisoners from certain assaults. The most important constitutional protections against assault are in the Fifth, Eighth, and Fourteenth Amendments. This Chapter will explain these Amendments in more detail and help you figure out if anyone has violated your rights under them. For example, this Chapter will help you figure out if prison officials have violated your Eighth Amendment right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment in prison.[1] For a full list of the Constitution's amendments, see Part A of Chapter 16 of the JLM.

To help explain your constitutional rights, this Chapter will describe cases decided by the U.S. Supreme Court. These cases apply to you no matter where you are imprisoned. This Chapter will also describe cases decided by circuit courts of appeals, which are the federal appeals courts. Unlike Supreme Court cases, these cases do not set the law for the entire country; instead, they only apply in the particular group of states that make up the circuit. Therefore, before reading further, you may want to first look up which circuit your state is in. For instance, if you are in New York State, you are in the Second Circuit. Once you know what circuit you are in, you can use the cases from that circuit to understand and make an argument based on federal constitutional law. You can also use cases from other circuits to help support your argument, but a court in your circuit will not be required to follow these cases. If you are confused, you should read Chapter 2 of the JLM, "Introduction to Legal Research," for more information on how the judicial system is organized.

In addition to federal constitutional law, this Chapter describes New York State law. This means if you are in a prison outside of New York, you will need to research the specific laws of your state. You can still use this Chapter to understand federal constitutional law and how state laws work in general, but don't forget that the laws in your state might be different. For diagrams of the state and federal court systems, see the inside front and back covers of the JLM.

To summarize: if a guard or another prisoner has assaulted you in prison, you may be able to make a (1) federal constitutional law claim (that is, a claim that your constitutional rights were violated) and/or (2) a state law claim (that is, a claim that a state law was violated). The specific state law claim that you bring will depend on the state where you are imprisoned.

Regardless of where you are imprisoned, you must bring a civil law claim. You cannot bring criminal charges against your attacker, since only the government can bring charges under criminal law.[2] Note, however, that you do not have to wait for the government to criminally charge your attacker. If you have

---

* This Chapter was written by Anya Emerson based on previous versions by Sara Manaugh, Jennifer Parkinson, Hannah Breshin Otero, Aric Wu, Sara Pikofsky, and Tami Parker. Special thanks to John Boston of The Legal Aid Society, Prisoners' Rights Project for his valuable comments.

1. The 8th Amendment states that "[e]xcessive bail shall not be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted." U.S. Const. amend. VIII.

2. See Lewis v. Gallivan, 315 F. Supp. 2d 313, 316 (W.D.N.Y. 2004) (dismissing prisoner's claim that the county sheriff and district attorney had failed to investigate and criminally prosecute two corrections officers for threatening him: "[T]he law is well settled that no private citizen has a constitutional right to bring a criminal complaint against another individual" and "[t]here is … no constitutional right to an investigation by government officials" (quoting Stone v. Dept. of Investigation of N.Y., No. 91 Civ. 2471, 1992 U.S. Dist. Lexis 1120, at *7 (S.D.N.Y. Feb. 4, 1992)).

been assaulted and you want to sue your attacker in court, you can bring a civil suit even before the government charges your attacker with a crime, and even if the government never charges your attacker at all.

State civil law includes many different areas of law. The area of state civil law you would use to file a claim after a prison assault is called tort law.[3] Specifically, an assault is considered an intentional tort—which means a wrongful act one person does to another. Tort law has developed in each state as a part of the common law (laws made by judges when they decide cases) rather than statutory law (laws passed by the state legislature). This means that if you want to sue your attacker based on state law, you will need to read the cases decided in state courts to understand the laws that will apply to your case. In some states, the common law of torts has been codified, meaning that the state legislature has organized the judicial case law on torts into legislative statutes.[4] You should check to see whether your state legislature has codified tort law. If it has, you can find the definition of assault in the state statute. Tort law has not been codified in New York State. If you are confused about tort law, you should read Chapter 17 of the JLM, "The State's Duty to Protect You and Your Property: Tort Actions."

If you determine your rights have been violated under federal constitutional or state law, before you can go to court, you will first need to follow the administrative grievance procedures your prison has set up. Filing a grievance is explained in Chapter 15 of the JLM, "Inmate Grievance Procedures." If the grievance system does not help you, or if it does not help you enough, you can then file a suit in court. If you go to court, you must choose which court to go to and what type of lawsuit to bring. You can (1) bring an action under Section 1983 of Title 42 of the United States Code (42 U.S.C. §[5] 1983) in state or federal court, (2) file a tort action in state court (in the New York Court of Claims[6] if you are in New York), or (3) file an Article 78[7] petition in state court if you are in New York. More information on all of these types of claims can be found in other chapters of the JLM, including Chapter 5, "Choosing a Court and a Lawsuit;" Chapter 16, "Using 42 U.S.C. § 1983 and 28 U.S.C. § 1331 to Obtain Relief From Violations of Federal Law;" Chapter 17, "The State's Duty to Protect You and Your Property: Tort Actions;" and Chapter 22, "How to Challenge Administrative Decisions Using Article 78 of the New York Civil Practice Law and Rules." If you decide to file a federal court claim, you must first read JLM, Chapter 14 on the Prison Litigation Reform Act ("PLRA"). If you do not follow the steps required by the PLRA, you might lose your right to sue (and possibly your good-time credit also).

B. Your Right to be Free from Assault

This Part of the Chapter is organized into five different sections. Part B(1) explains the legal definition of assault and which prison assaults are considered unlawful. Part B(2) discusses how the Eighth

---

3. Note that if you are a prisoner in a federal institution, you will need to sue for simple tort violations using the Federal Tort Claims Act ("FTCA"). The FTCA is a law that allows you to sue the federal government for negligent or harmful actions by its employees. Without the FTCA, you could not sue the federal government in tort because the federal government would be "immune" from this kind of suit (incapable of being sued). It is important to note that "[u]nder the FTCA, courts apply the law of the state where the accident occurred." Robinson v. U.S. Bureau of Prisons, 244 F. Supp. 2d 57, 64 (N.D.N.Y. 2003). See also 28 U.S.C. §§ 1346(b)(1) (2006) (stating that government officials can be sued "in accordance with the law of the place where the act or omission occurred"); Part E(4) of Chapter 16 of the JLM, "Using 42 U.S.C. § 1983 and 28 U.S.C. § 1331 to Obtain Relief from Violations of Federal Law."

4. The general principles of tort law have also been organized into a "Restatement" by the American Law Institute. The Restatement is a useful resource for learning about tort law in general but is not itself binding law.

5. Remember that "§" is the symbol for "section." For example, § 1983 means "Section 1983." Therefore, "§ 1983" refers to a specific section, Section 1983, of a law (here a law in the United States Code).

6. The New York Court of Claims is a specific New York State court that only hears claims for damages against the State of New York. If the person who injured you was a state official or employee, and you decide to file a tort action in state court in New York, you should file your claim in the New York Court of Claims. The Court of Claims can only award money damages; it cannot issue an injunction. See Part C(4) of Chapter 5 of the JLM, "Choosing a Court & Lawsuit," for more information on the Court of Claims. See Chapter 17 of the JLM, "The State's Duty to Protect You and Your Property: Tort Actions," for more explanation of tort actions.

7. An Article 78 petition refers to a petition using Article 78 of the New York Civil Practice Law. You cannot use Article 78 to seek damages for assault or other injury. Instead, you can use an Article 78 petition to go to court to challenge decisions made by New York State administrative bodies or officers, like the Department of Correctional Services or prison employees, if you think the decision was illegal, arbitrary, or grossly unfair. See Part C(6) of Chapter 5, "Choosing a Court & Lawsuit," and Chapter 22 of the JLM, "How to Challenge Administrative Decisions Using Article 78 of the New York Civil Practice Law and Rules," for more about Article 78 proceedings.

Amendment, which forbids cruel and unusual punishment, protects you against assaults by both prison guards and other prisoners. Part B(3) outlines your rights against harassment. Part B(4) explains why you should not use force to resist, even if you think an order, assault, or search by prison officials is illegal. Finally, Part B(5) explains how state laws and state constitutions protect you from assault.

1. The Legal Concept of Assault

Many people confuse the legal term assault with the legal term battery. They do not mean the same thing in legal language. Battery means a violent physical attack.[8] Assault means any act—including a threat, verbal abuse, or harassment—that makes a person fear he will be physically attacked.[9] For example, an assault and battery charge means you are charged with both making someone afraid that you will attack him (assault) as well as actually physically attacking him (battery). Both assault and battery are torts.

Outside prison, most threats, unwanted touching, and uses of force are torts and are therefore illegal. But in prison, tort law privileges (allows) prison staff to use some force that would not be allowed outside. Therefore, most courts will not find that prison officials violated your rights if they only verbally threatened or harassed you. Courts will generally only find that an assault violated your rights (that the act against you was illegal and an actionable tort) if you were physically attacked. For more on torts and assault under state tort law, see Part B of Chapter 17 of the JLM on tort actions.

Constitutional law is similar to tort law in this respect. Verbal threats by prison staff generally do not violate the Constitution.[10] But if the verbal abuse comes with a believable threat of serious physical harm, courts might find a constitutional violation.[11] Even then, under the Prison Litigation Reform Act ("PLRA"), you cannot sue for compensatory damages[12] (and, in some circuits, punitive damages[13]) in federal court for 8. Battery is "[t]he use of force against another, resulting in harmful or offensive contact." Black's Law Dictionary 173 (9th ed. 2009).

---

9. Assault is "[t]he threat or use of force on another that causes that person to have a reasonable apprehension of imminent harmful or offensive contact; the act of putting another person in reasonable fear … of an immediate battery … [or] [a]n attempt to commit battery [with] the specific intent to cause physical injury." Black's Law Dictionary 130 (9th ed. 2009).

10. See Adkins v. Rodriguez, 59 F.3d 1034, 1037 (10th Cir. 1995) (holding that verbal sexual harassment by a prison guard did not violate a constitutional right); Oltarzewski v. Ruggiero, 830 F.2d 136, 139 (9th Cir. 1987) (holding that prison official's use of vulgarity (bad language) did not violate a constitutional right); Collins v. Cundy, 603 F.2d 825, 828 (10th Cir. 1979) (holding that sheriff's laughing at prisoner and threatening to hang him did not state a constitutional claim); Maclean v. Secor, 876 F. Supp. 695, 698 (E.D. Pa. 1995) ("It is well established that verbal harassment or threats … will not, without some reinforcing act accompanying them, constitute a constitutional claim."); Murray v. Woodburn, 809 F. Supp. 383, 384 (E.D. Pa. 1993) ("Mean harassment … is insufficient to state a constitutional deprivation."); Prisoners' Legal Ass'n v. Roberson, 822 F. Supp. 185, 189 (D.N.J. 1993) ("[V]erbal harassment does not give rise to a constitutional violation enforceable under § 1983."); Govan v. Campbell, 289 F. Supp. 2d 289, 300 (N.D.N.Y. 2003) ("A claim under '42 U.S.C. § 1983 is not designed to rectify harassment or verbal abuse.'" (quoting Gill v. Hoadley, 261 F.Supp.2d 113, 129 (N.D.N.Y. 2003))); Johnson v. Dellatifa, 357 F.3d 539, 546 (6th Cir. 2004) ("[H]arassment and verbal abuse … do not constitute the type of infliction of pain that the Eighth Amendment prohibits."); Graves v. N.D. State Penitentiary, 325 F. Supp. 2d 1009, 1011–12 (D.N.D. 2004) (finding that even though a guard's racially derogatory language was "offensive, degrading, and reprehensible," "the use of racially derogatory language will not, by itself, violate the 14th Amendment 'unless it is pervasive or severe enough to amount to racial harassment'" (quoting Blades v. Schuetzle, 302 F.3d 801, 805 (8th Cir. 2002))).

11. See Northington v. Jackson, 973 F.2d 1518, 1524 (10th Cir. 1992) (finding prisoner stated a § 1983 8th Amendment excessive force claim for psychological injuries when plain-clothed corrections officers surprised plaintiff on the street while he was out on work release and, without identifying themselves, threatened at gunpoint to kill him before taking him back to jail; the court held the "brandishing of a lethal weapon" was "not an idle and laughing threat" but was malicious and sadistic and, though plaintiff was not physically injured, his alleged psychological injury was not de minimus because "convicted prisoners have a constitutional 'right to be free from the terror of instant and unexpected death' at the hands of their keepers" (citations omitted)); Burton v. Livingston, 791 F.2d 97, 100 (8th Cir. 1986) (finding the allegation that a guard drew a weapon, made racial epithets, and threatened to shoot a black prisoner in the back to prevent him from exercising free speech stated a § 1983 claim); see also Hudson v. McMillian, 503 U.S. 1, 17, 112 S. Ct. 995, 1004, 117 L. Ed. 2d 156, 172 (1992) (Blackmun, J., concurring) (stating a "guard placing a revolver in an inmate's mouth and threatening to blow [the] prisoner's head off" was an unnecessary and wanton infliction of pain—although psychological, not physical pain—amounting to an 8th Amendment excessive force violation); Douglas v. Marino, 684 F. Supp. 395, 398 (D.N.J. 1988) (upholding a constitutional claim where a prison employee threatened to kill a prisoner while gesturing with a butcher's knife, since "this was not a 'mere threat with words alone [but] … words along with action, the action being the threatening use of a weapon").

12. Compensatory damages are money damages that reimburse you for the actual injury you suffered in an effort mental or emotional injury unless you were also physically injured.[14] See JLM, Chapter 14, "The Prison Litigation Reform Act," for information on the PLRA's physical injury requirement.

(a) You Must Prove That Your Attacker Intended to Touch or Harm You

(i) State Torts and Intent

Because assault and battery are torts and each state has its own state tort law, state courts use different tests to determine whether someone's use of force against you is wrongful (whether that person has committed the torts of assault and battery against you).[15] All states require you to show that the defendant intended to act against you in some way. Some states require you to prove that the defendant intended to touch you in an offensive or violent way.[16] Other states require you to show that the defendant acted unlawfully[17] or that the defendant behaved with willful disregard for your rights.[18] In New York, courts use the "intentional touching" standard.[19]

All state courts believe the use of force in prison by prison officials is sometimes necessary for safety reasons and to maintain order. Therefore, courts often think that a prison official's intentional use of physical force on a prisoner is not wrongful, even if the same use of force outside prison would be illegal.

In New York, to prove the tort of battery (physical assault), you must show the defendant intentionally acted, but you do not have to show the officer intended to harm you.[20] Let's say a prison official handcuffed you very tightly, permanently hurting your wrists and hands. To prove this was battery, you must show the guard intended to handcuff you, but you do not have to show the guard intended to hurt you when he handcuffed you.

(ii) Constitutional Torts and Intent

It is much more difficult to prove that an assault, in addition to being a tort under state law, also violated your constitutional rights under the Eighth Amendment's prohibition of cruel and unusual punishment. To prove that an assault against you violated your constitutional rights, you must show your attacker both intended to handcuff you and intended to hurt you. Under state tort law, if you were injured to "make you whole again" or to put you in the same position as you were before the injury occurred. These types of damages might include reimbursement for medical expenses or money in recognition of pain and suffering.

---

13. Punitive damages are damages awarded in addition to compensatory damages, and are meant to punish a defendant who was reckless or acted with intent.

14. The PLRA prohibits all federal civil actions (constitutional and tort claims) brought in federal court by prisoners (convicted felons, misdemeanants, and pretrial detainees) for mental or emotional injury suffered while in custody where there was no related physical injury. 42 U.S.C. § 1997e(e) (2006). The Federal Tort Claims Act has a similar limitation for convicted felons (but not pretrial detainees or misdemeanants): no convicted felon can "bring a civil action against the United States or an agency, officer, or employee of the Government, for mental or emotional injury suffered while in custody without a prior showing of physical injury." 28 U.S.C. § 1346(b)(2) (2006). See Chapter 14 of the JLM, "The Prison Litigation Reform Act" for more information.

15. As described in the Introduction to this Chapter, the tests used by courts today come from past judicial decisions—called the common law—that some states have now made into statutes.

16. See, e.g., Tower Ins. Co. of N.Y. v. Old N. Blvd. Rest. Corp., 245 A.D.2d 241, 242, 666 N.Y.S.2d 636, 637 (1st Dept. 1997) ("To establish a civil battery a plaintiff need only prove intentional physical contact by defendant without plaintiff's consent; the injury may be unintended, accidental or unforeseen.").

17. See, e.g., Glowacki v. Moldtronics, Inc., 636 N.E.2d 1138, 1140, 264 Ill. App. 3d 19, 22 (Ill. App. 2d Dist. 1994) (dismissing plaintiff's battery action after plaintiff failed to allege either that defendants were involved in illegal activity or that defendants acted with specific intent to harm when they exposed her to chemicals at work).

18. See, e.g., Ashcraft v. King, 228 Cal. App. 3d 604, 613, 278 Cal. Rptr. 900, 904 (Cal. App. 2d Dist. 1991) ("In an action for civil battery the element of intent is satisfied if the evidence shows defendant acted with a 'willful disregard' for the plaintiff's rights.").

19. See, e.g., Tower Ins. Co. of N.Y. v. Old N. Blvd. Rest. Corp., 245 A.D.2d 241, 242, 666 N.Y.S.2d 636, 637 (1st Dept. 1997) ("To establish a civil battery a plaintiff need only prove intentional physical contact by defendant without plaintiff's consent; the injury may be unintended, accidental or unforeseen."); Allegany Co-Op Ins. Co. v. Kohorst, 254 A.D.2d 744, 744, 678 N.Y.S.2d 424, 424 (4th Dept. 1998) ("'Accidental results can flow from intentional acts. The damage in question may be unintended even though the original act or acts leading to the damage were intentional.'" (quoting Salimbene v Merchants Mut. Ins. Co., 217 A.D.2d 991, 994, 629 N.Y.S.2d 913, 915–916 (4th Dept 1995))).

20. See, e.g., Tower Ins. Co. of N.Y. v. Old N. Blvd. Rest. Corp., 245 A.D.2d 241, 242, 666 N.Y.S.2d 636, 637 (1st Dept. 1997) ("To establish a civil battery a plaintiff need only prove intentional physical contact by defendant without plaintiff's consent; the injury may be unintended, accidental or unforeseen.").

when prison staff intentionally touched you, you could bring a successful claim of assault and battery—even if you cannot prove that the official specifically meant to hurt you. But, if you can show the official intended to harm you, you could include both the constitutional violation and the state torts of assault and battery in your suit.

(b) Suing the Prison if You Were Assaulted by Other Prisoners

(i) State Tort of Negligence

If you were physically attacked by another prisoner and believe that prison officials were partly responsible for the attack, you may also be able to file a lawsuit against the prison and/or the prison officials. But here, you cannot claim assault and battery (because the prison officials did not actually attack you).[21] Instead, you can use the law of negligence.[22] Negligence is a separate tort from assault and battery under state tort law; it means that a person did not act reasonably to fulfill his duty toward you.[23] If another prisoner is attacking you, prison officials have a duty to try to stop the attack. If they do not, you could sue them for negligence. To prove the prison officials' negligence in such a situation, you must show the court that the officials "failed to exercise [or use] reasonable care" in allowing the attack to happen[24]—in other words that the officials did not act like reasonably careful people to prevent the attack. You will need evidence that: (1) the officials knew (or reasonably should have known) that you would be harmed or that there was a substantial risk that you would be harmed;[25] and (2) the officials did not act to prevent it.[26]

Winning a negligence claim against prison officials for a prisoner-on-prisoner assault is difficult.[27] Courts only find negligence in limited situations, for example: when the attacker is a prisoner who officials knew or should have known was drunk or violent;[28] when the plaintiff (the prisoner bringing the suit) was

---

21. If an officer participated in the attack, however, you can also claim assault and battery against the participating officer (in addition to your claim of negligence against the other officers who you believe allowed the attack to happen).

22. See Part B(2) of Chapter 17 of the JLM, "The State's Duty to Protect You and Your Property: Tort Actions," for more on negligence and negligent torts.

23. Negligence is "the failure to exercise the standard of care a reasonably prudent person would have exercised in a similar situation; any conduct that falls below the legal standard established to protect others against unreasonable risk of harm, except for conduct that is intentionally, wantonly, or willfully disregardful of others' rights; a tort grounded in this failure, usually expressed in terms of the following elements: duty, breach of duty, causation, and damages." Black's Law Dictionary 1133–34 (9th ed. 2009).

24. The Restatement (Second) of Torts defines the general rule: "One who is required by law to take or who voluntarily takes the custody of another under circumstances such as to deprive the other of his normal power of self-protection or to subject him to association with persons likely to harm him, is under a duty of exercising reasonable care so to control the conduct of third persons as to prevent them from intentionally harming the other or so conducting themselves as to create an unreasonable risk of harm to him, if the actor (a) knows or has reason to know that he has the ability to control the conduct of the third persons, and (b) knows or should know of the necessity and opportunity for exercising such control." Restatement (Second) of Torts, § 320. The Restatement of Torts is published by the American Law Institute and presents the general principles of tort law.

25. See Sanchez v. New York, 99 N.Y.2d 247, 255, 784 N.E.2d 675, 680, 754 N.Y.S.2d 621, 626 (2002) (holding that "the State owes a duty of care to inmates for foreseeable risks of harm; and that foreseeability is defined not simply by actual notice but by actual or constructive notice—by what the 'State knew or had reason to know' [or] … what the State 'is or should be aware' of …. The requisite foreseeability is as to a 'risk of harm' … or 'risk of inmate-on-inmate attack'"; actual notice or "proof of specific notice of time, place or manner of the risk" is not required); see, e.g., Flaherty v. State, 296 N.Y. 342, 346, 73 N.E.2d 543, 544 (1947) (denying plaintiff prisoner's claim after finding it was not foreseeable that a fellow prisoner with whom the plaintiff had been arguing would pour acid on the sleeping plaintiff).

26. See, e.g., Sanchez v. New York, 99 N.Y.2d 247, 252, 784 N.E.2d 675, 677, 754 N.Y.S.2d 621, 623 (2002).

27. See, e.g., Wilson v. New York, 303 A.D.2d 678, 679, 760 N.Y.S.2d 51, 52 (2d Dept. 2003) ("While the State's duty to an inmate encompasses protection from the foreseeable risk of harm at the hands of other prisoners … the State is not an insurer of an inmate's safety. The State will be liable in negligence for an assault by another inmate only upon a showing that it failed to exercise adequate care to prevent that which was reasonably foreseeable.").

28. See, e.g., Littlejohn v. New York, 218 A.D.2d 833, 833–34, 630 N.Y.S.2d 407, 408 (3d Dept. 1995) (holding that the State has a duty to use reasonable care to protect prisoners from foreseeable risks of harm and affirming judgment for prisoner where prisoner's face was slashed by a "known dangerous prisoner," who prison officials knew was violent and had many prior assaults); Kemp v. Waldron, 125 Misc. 2d 197, 199, 479 N.Y.S.2d 440, 441 (Sup. Ct. Schenectady County 1984) (finding that prisoner, who was assaulted by two fellow prisoners, adequately stated a claim against the sheriff for negligence because the sheriff knew the fellow prisoners were dangerous and violent), aff'd, 115 A.D.2d 869, 497 N.Y.S.2d 158 (3d Dept. 1985).

exposed to a mentally ill prisoner;[29] when the plaintiff was exposed to an armed prisoner;[30] when the plaintiff was exposed to a prisoner overseer or "trustee";[31] when the plaintiff was exposed to a prisoner who had a grudge against him or who had threatened him;[32] or when the prison does not have enough supervisory staff on duty.[33]

(ii) Constitutional "Tort" of Deliberate Indifference

If another prisoner assaulted you, you may be able to make a federal constitutional claim of deliberate indifference as well as a state tort claim of negligence. But, remember that constitutional violations are harder to prove than state tort claims. Deliberate indifference refers to prison officials' actions or inactions that are worse than negligence (carelessness) and are so bad they violate the Eighth Amendment's ban on cruel and unusual punishment. You will have to prove that the prison officials actually knew that you were going to be attacked but did nothing or too little to stop the attack (were "deliberately indifferent" to the danger), not just that the officials were negligent and "should have known" you were in danger. Part B(2)(a)(ii) below explains more about how to show prison officials' deliberate indifference.[34]

---

29. See, e.g., Bartlett v. Commonwealth, 418 S.W.2d 225, 227, 228 (Ky. Ct. App. 1967) (finding that the trial court erred in refusing to admit evidence showing that two prisoners who murdered a 15-year-old prisoner in a state juvenile facility had records of violence and mental and emotional disability; noting the general rule that the keeper of a prison must exercise ordinary care for the protection of his prisoner if there is reasonable grounds to foresee danger to the prisoner); Dunn v. Swanson, 7 S.E.2d 563, 564, 217 N.C. 279, 280–81, (1940) (finding cause of action against sheriff and county jail official for negligence in locking a prisoner in the same cell with a violently insane man who killed him by beating him with a leg torn from a table, which was left in the cell by the jailer and sheriff). But see Mobley v. State, 1 A.D.2d 731, 732, 147 N.Y.S.2d 414, 417 (3d Dept. 1955) (finding no negligence in state's failure to segregate or more closely guard an allegedly dangerous prisoner once diagnosed with psychosis, where there was no showing that the state had notice that the prisoner was so much more dangerous than the other prisoners that it was improper to allow him to perform ordinary tasks in the prison or mix with the other prisoners), rehearing and appeal denied, 1 A.D.2d 928, 150 N.Y.S.2d 561 (3d Dept. 1956), appeal denied 1 N.Y.2d 643 (1956); Hann v. State, 137 Misc. 2d 605, 611, 521 N.Y.S.2d 973, 977 (N.Y. Ct. Cl. 1987) (finding that it was not foreseeable that prisoner with history of assaultive behavior and who was recently released from psychiatric hospital would attack fellow prisoner).

30. See, e.g., Huertas v. State, 84 A.D.2d 650, 650, 444 N.Y.S.2d 307, 308–309 (3d Dept. 1981) (finding negligence where, immediately before fatal assault, assailant left his work area with iron bar visible under his clothes, in plain view of five correction officers); Jackson v. Hollowell, 714 F.2d 1372, 1373 (5th Cir. 1983) (finding prison officials liable when prisoner was struck by a ricocheting pellet that was fired by an armed prison trustee using a sawed-off shotgun). Prison trustees are "inmates … armed with loaded shotguns and … entrusted with the responsibility of guarding other inmates." Jackson v. Hollowell, 714 F.2d 1372, 1374 n.2 (5th Cir. 1983).

31. Jackson v. Mississippi, 644 F.2d 1142, 1146 (5th Cir. 1981) (establishing a "constitutional right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment in the form of trusty shooters who were inadequately screened for mental, emotional, or other problems"), aff'd by Jackson v. Hollowell, 714 F.2d 1372, 1373, 1374 n.2 (5th Cir. 1983).

32. See, e.g., Rangolan v. County of Nassau, 51 F. Supp. 2d 236, 238 (E.D.N.Y. 1999) (upholding judgment that county jail was negligent as a matter of law for housing prisoner in the same "jail pod" as prisoner he had served as a confidential informant against and who subsequently beat him badly), vacated in part on other grounds, 370 F.3d 239 (2d Cir. 2004); Ashford v. D.C., 306 F. Supp. 2d 8, 16–19 (D.D.C. 2004) (finding prisoner did state a common law negligence claim where prisoner was severely stabbed by a fellow prisoner against whom he had a permanent separation order after being transferred to a new prison not aware of the separation order).

33. Negligence is seldom found in such a case. For an unusual example, see Bourgeois v. United States, 375 F. Supp. 133, 135 (N.D. Tex 1974) (holding that under the Federal Tort Claims Act, federal prison officials were negligent in, among other things, failing to provide adequate supervisory personnel when a prisoner was injured after a fellow prisoner threw a "Molotov cocktail" into his cell). But see Robinson v. U.S. Bureau of Prisons, 244 F. Supp. 2d 57, 65 (N.D.N.Y. 2003) (noting that, to determine the foreseeability of an attack, courts may look at evidence "including staffing levels, the ability of staff to monitor the inmates, past behavior of inmates and prison staff, state regulations regarding the staffing of correctional facilities and the monitoring of inmates, and expert testimony regarding the staffing levels at issue"); Colon v. State, 209 A.D.2d 842, 844, 620 N.Y.S.2d 1015, 1016 (3d Dept. 1994) (reversing court of claims judgment for prisoner who claimed the prison failed to provide adequate supervision after being attacked by a fellow prisoner in a prison engine repair shop during a supervisor's brief absence; instead finding the State provided reasonable supervision and that "unremitting supervision … was unnecessary and the fact that [the prison official was] not present at the time of the incident, in and of itself, is insufficient to support a finding that the State failed to exercise reasonable care").

34. See Farmer v. Brennan, 511 U.S. 825, 829, 114 S. Ct. 1970, 1974, 128 L. Ed. 2d 811, 820 (1994) (announcing that deliberate indifference requires showing "the official was subjectively aware of the risk"); Knowles v. N.Y. City Dept. of Corr., 904 F. Supp. 217, 222 (S.D.N.Y. 1995) ("Mere negligence, however, on the part of a prison official will not give rise to a claim under § 1983.").

(c) Body Searches and Sexual Attacks As "Assault"

Assaults occurring in prison can include more than just violent physical attacks. Forced sexual contact and illegal body cavity searches interfere with your body and may also be assaults and batteries.[35] Courts use the same civil and constitutional tort laws (including the Eighth Amendment) to decide claims of sexual assault. Part C of this Chapter explains some special legal protections you have against sexual assault.

In contrast to assaults, courts usually use the Fourth Amendment, not the Eighth Amendment, to decide claims of illegal searches. The Fourth Amendment protects your right to be free from unreasonable searches and seizures.[36] Some illegal body cavity searches, however, may also violate the Eighth Amendment if a court feels the search is so unreasonable that it constitutes cruel and unusual punishment.[37] But remember that most courts will not find any constitutional violations as long as the official who searched you was acting to further some legitimate penological interest (an interest related to running the prison, such as maintaining security or discipline) and the pain you suffered was only a side effect, not the main purpose of the search.[38] See Part B(3) of Chapter 25, "Your Right to Be Free From Illegal Body Searches," for more information on when searches may violate the Eighth Amendment.

(d) When is Assault Prohibited by the Law?

As this Chapter explained above, not all physical touching or physical force is unlawful assault. The difference between lawful and unlawful assault is particularly important for prisoners. Actions that would be considered unlawful outside prison may be allowed as "lawful force" in prison. For example, prison officers may use lawful force against prisoners to maintain order and ensure rules are obeyed.[39]

Also, because corrections officers are government actors, they can use the defense of qualified immunity[40] when sued under Section 1983. This means even if you can prove you were assaulted, the officials may not be liable because of qualified immunity. For a detailed discussion of qualified immunity and Section 1983, see Part (C)(3)(c) ("Qualified Immunity") and Part B ("Section 1983") of Chapter 16 of the JLM, "Using 42 U.S.C. § 1983 and 28 U.S.C. § 1331 to Obtain Relief From Violations of Federal Law."

2. Protection from Assault Under the Eighth Amendment

This Section is about the right of convicted state and federal prisoners to be free from assault under the Eighth Amendment,[41] which prohibits "cruel and unusual punishment."[42] Under the Eighth Amendment,

---

35. See, e.g., Hammond v. Gordon County, 316 F. Supp. 2d 1262, 1303 (N.D. Ga. 2002) (holding female plaintiff had sufficient evidence to claim assault and battery against male prison official who placed the plaintiff "in apprehension of an unlawful touch when guard pointed a gun at plaintiff and attempted to engage in sexual conduct with her"; also recognizing second plaintiff's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress when another guard penetrated her vagina with his fingers).

36. The 4th Amendment states that "[t]he right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated." U.S. Const. amend. IV.

37. See, e.g., Jordan v. Gardner, 986 F.2d 1521, 1522–23 (9th Cir. 1993) (finding that random, non-emergency clothed body searches of women prisoners by male guards violated the 8th amendment); Tribble v. Gardner, 860 F.2d 321, 325 (9th Cir. 1988) (finding prisoner's claim that a rectal probe may have been punitive could proceed, where prisoner's clothing, hair, hands, and other body cavities were not searched and prisoner's recent X-ray revealed no contraband in his rectum); Dellamore v. Stenros, 886 F. Supp. 349, 351 (S.D.N.Y. 1995) (finding that plaintiff subjected to body cavity search without a medical practitioner present stated a colorable claim under the 8th Amendment).

38. See Del Raine v. Williford, 32 F.3d 1024, 1038–42 (7th Cir. 1994) (finding that while rectal searches may inflict pain, if the official has a legitimate reason to conduct them, they do not violate the 8th Amendment).

39. N.Y. Correct. Law § 137(5) (McKinney 2003 & Supp. 2009) ("When any inmate, or group of inmates, shall offer violence to any person, or do or attempt to do any injury to property, or attempt to escape, or resist or disobey any lawful direction, the officers and employees shall use all suitable means to defend themselves, to maintain order, to enforce observation of discipline, to secure the persons of the offenders and to prevent any such attempt or escape." (emphasis added)).

40. Qualified immunity is defined as "[i]mmunity from civil liability for a public official who is performing a discretionary function, as long as the conduct does not violate clearly established constitutional or statutory rights." Black's Law Dictionary 818 (9th ed. 2009).

41. This Chapter explains how the 8th Amendment's right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment can protect you from assaults and body searches. But, the 8th Amendment protects prisoners in other ways too, like from general prison conditions such as overcrowding and uncleanliness (see Part B(2)(d) of Chapter 16 of the JLM, "Using 42 U.S.C. § 1983 and 28 U.S.C. § 1331 to Obtain Relief From Violations of Federal Law"), and lack of proper medical care (see Chapter 23 of the JLM, "Your Right to Adequate Medical Care").

prison officials cannot use excessive physical force against you[43] or deliberately allow you to be seriously injured by someone else.[44]

There are two parts of an Eighth Amendment claim, and you must prove both of them in order to successfully show that an assault against you violated the Eighth Amendment. First you must show what the prison official was thinking or knew at the time of the assault (this is assault's subjective component, explained in Part B(2)(a)). You must also show what injuries (if any) you received from an assault by a prison official, or show how a prison official's actions caused you to be in "substantial risk of serious harm" of being attacked by another prisoner (this is assault's objective component, explained in Part B(2)(b)).

To summarize, to show that an assault against you violated the Eighth Amendment, you must prove that the force used against you had two components (parts):

(1) A subjective component: prison officials must have acted with a sufficiently culpable (guilty enough) state of mind;[45] and

(2) An objective component: you were injured somehow[46] or placed in substantial risk of serious injury.[47]

(a) Subjective Component—Culpable State of Mind

The subjective component of assault means you must prove what the prison official was thinking or knew at the time you were assaulted. Courts use two different standards (the Hudson and Farmer standards) for the subjective component. The standard used depends on who assaulted you: a prison official or another prisoner. If an official hurt you, courts use the Hudson standard to look at whether the guard used force as part of his job to keep the prison safe and orderly, or instead whether the guard's force was intended to cruelly hurt you for no legitimate reason. If another prisoner hurt you, courts use Farmer to look at whether the prison officials knew about the danger to you but did not stop or act to prevent the assault.[48]

---

42. U.S. Const. amend. VIII.

43. See Hudson v. McMillian, 503 U.S. 1, 6–7, 112 S. Ct. 995, 999, 117 L. Ed. 2d 156, 165–66 (1992) (holding that excessive force may constitute an 8th Amendment injury even if prisoner is not seriously physically harmed).

44. See Farmer v. Brennan, 511 U.S. 825, 833–34, 114 S. Ct. 1970, 1976–77, 128 L. Ed. 2d 811, 822–23 (1994) (holding that prison officials are obligated to protect prisoners from violent attacks by other prisoners); s*ee also* Vaughan v. Ricketts, 859 F.2d 736, 741 (9th Cir. 1988) ("[P]rison administrators' indifference to brutal behavior by guards toward inmates [is] sufficient to state an Eighth Amendment claim.").

45. Hudson v. McMillian, 503 U.S. 1, 7, 112 S. Ct. 995, 999, 117 L. Ed. 2d 156, 166 (1992) ("[T]he core judicial inquiry is ... whether force was applied in a good-faith effort to maintain or restore discipline, or maliciously and sadistically to cause harm.").

46. Hudson v. McMillian, 503 U.S. 1, 7, 112 S. Ct. 995, 999, 117 L. Ed. 2d 156, 166 (1992) ("[T]he extent of injury suffered by a prisoner is one factor that may suggest 'whether the use of force could plausibly have been thought necessary' in a particular situation." (quoting Whitley v. Albers, 475 U.S. 312, 321, 106 S. Ct. 1078, 1085, 89 L. Ed. 2d 251, 261–62 (1986))).

47. Farmer v. Brennan, 511 U.S. 825, 834, 114 S. Ct. 1970, 1977, 128 L. Ed. 2d 811, 823 (1994) (holding that in a claim of failure to protect, "the inmate must show that he is incarcerated under conditions posing a substantial risk of serious harm").

48. Note that if a prison official injured you in the presence of or with the knowledge of other officials, you could sue both the official who harmed you and the officials and/or supervisors who knew about it and did nothing. The prison officials who knew but did nothing about your assault would be liable under the Farmer standard—not the Hudson "malicious and sadistic" standard. See, e.g., Blyden v. Mancusi, 186 F.3d 252, 264 (2d Cir. 1999) (finding the deliberate indifference standard applied to prison supervisors if "after learning of the violation through a report or appeal, … [the supervisor] failed to remedy the wrong …, created a policy or custom under which unconstitutional practices occurred, or allowed such a policy or custom to continue …, [or] was grossly negligent in managing subordinates who caused the unlawful … event." (citations omitted)); Buckner v. Hollins, 983 F.2d 119, 122 (8th Cir. 1993) (applying the deliberate indifference, or Farmer, standard to a claim based on prison official's failure to act); Meriwether v. Coughlin, 879 F.2d 1037, 1048 (2d Cir. 1989) ("[S]upervisory liability may be imposed when an official has actual or constructive notice of unconstitutional practices and demonstrates 'gross negligence' or 'deliberate indifference' by failing to act."); Vaughan v. Ricketts, 859 F. 2d 736, 741 (9th Cir. 1988) ("[P]rison administrators' indifference to brutal behavior by guards toward inmates [is] sufficient to state an Eighth Amendment claim."); Madrid v. Gomez, 889 F. Supp. 1146, 1249 (N.D. Cal. 1995) (noting supervisors may be liable for "conduct of a completely different nature: abdicating their duty to supervise and monitor the use of force and deliberately permitting a pattern of excessive force to develop and persist").

(i) Assault by a Prison Official—The Hudson Standard

If you are suing a prison official who injured you, a court will use the "malicious and sadistic" (evil and cruel) standard the Supreme Court created in Hudson v. McMillian[49] to determine whether the official's force against you was so bad ("excessive") as to violate the Eighth Amendment. Under Hudson, a prisoner must demonstrate that the prison official's force was not "a good-faith effort to maintain or restore discipline," but rather was used "maliciously and sadistically" to hurt the prisoner.[50]

If officials are using force for legitimate reasons, they are not violating the Eighth Amendment.[51] Prison officials are generally allowed to use force during a riot or other major prison disturbance,[52] and during smaller individual incidents when prisoners behave violently or disruptively.[53] But, if the force has no purpose and is simply meant to harm the prisoner for no legitimate reason, then the official may be found to have used excessive force. [54] In other words, if the force is inflicted with the purpose of causing harm and not with the purpose of restoring discipline, then the official may be found to have used excessive force.

To decide if the prison official intended to act maliciously and to harm you (to determine the official's "state of mind"), courts will look at:

(1) the seriousness of your injuries;[55]
(2) if the force was necessary under the circumstances (why the official used force);
(3) the relationship between the need to use force and the amount of force that was actually used;
(4) the size of the threat as a prison official would reasonably see it; and
(5) efforts made by prison guards to decrease the amount of force used.[56]

You should think about each of these factors when you try to prove that prison officials intentionally used violence against you only to cause you pain. You need to remember that "not every push or shove, even if it may later seem unnecessary," violates your constitutional rights.[57] Even if force was used, you may not have a successful claim. Nevertheless, some uses of force may be so excessive that they are unconstitutional, even in emergency or urgent circumstances.[58]

---

49. Hudson v. McMillian, 503 U.S. 1, 112 S. Ct. 995, 117 L. Ed. 2d 156 (1992).

50. Hudson v. McMillian, 503 U.S. 1, 6–7, 112 S. Ct. 995, 998–99, 117 L. Ed. 2d 156, 165–66 (1992).

51. Hudson v. McMillian, 503 U.S. 1, 6, 112 S. Ct. 995, 998, 117 L. Ed. 2d 156, 165 (1992) ("[T]he question whether the measure taken inflicted unnecessary and wanton pain and suffering ultimately turns on whether force was applied in a good faith effort to maintain or restore discipline or maliciously and sadistically for the very purpose of causing harm." (quoting Whitley v. Albers, 475 U.S. 312, 320–21, 106 S. Ct. 1078, 1085, 89 L. Ed. 2d 251, 261 (1986))); see also Skinner v. Cunningham, 430 F.3d 483, 489 (1st Cir. 2005) (finding that prison officials used reasonable force in forcibly extricating the prisoner from his cell after he refused to be handcuffed during a cell search).

52. Whitley v. Albers, 475 U.S. 312, 318–26, 106 S. Ct. 1078, 1083–88, 89 L. Ed. 2d 251, 259–66 (1986) (finding no 8th Amendment violation where prisoner was shot as part of a good-faith effort to restore prison security); see also Wright v. Goord, 554 F.3d 255, 269–270 (2d Cir. 2009) (finding that although guard had placed one hand on prisoner's abdomen at the site of his colon surgery, there was no evidence that that placement was sadistic or malicious because prisoner did not testify that guard knew or had reason to know that his abdomen was unusually tender, nor did the record reveal any basis for inferring that guard would have been aware that it was a surgical site).

53. Hudson v. McMillian, 503 U.S. 1, 6, 112 S. Ct. 995, 998–99, 117 L. Ed. 2d 156, 165 (1992) (finding that during a riot or a lesser disruption, "corrections officers must balance the need to maintain or restore discipline through force against the risk of injury to inmates"); see also Bellotto v. County of Orange, 248 Fed. Appx. 232, 235 (2d Cir. 2007) (finding that guards did not use excessive force in forcibly restraining and handcuffing female prisoner who was violently banging her head against the wall of her cell and refusing to settle down).

54. See, e.g., Estate of Davis by Ostenfeld v. Delo, 115 F.3d 1388, 1394–95 (8th Cir. 1997) (finding an 8th Amendment excessive force violation when a corrections officer struck a non-resisting prisoner in the head and face 20 to 25 times while four other officers restrained his limbs, resulting in serious injury); Locicero v. O'Connell, 419 F. Supp. 2d 521, 428–29 (S.D.N.Y. 2006) (finding that a prisoner adequately stated a claim that his 8th amendment rights were violated when he was seriously assaulted by a prison officer, the prisoner did not provoke the assault, and the prison facility had prior notice of, but failed to act about, the officer's previous use of excessive force).

55. Courts also look at the seriousness of your injuries in deciding the objective component of an 8th Amendment violation. But, the seriousness of your injuries is also important to proving the subjective component because it can help show whether it was reasonable for the guard to think the force he used was necessary. Hudson v. McMillian, 503 U.S. 1, 7, 112 S. Ct. 995, 999, 117 L. Ed. 2d 156, 166 (1992).

56. Hudson v. McMillian, 503 U.S. 1, 7, 112 S. Ct. 995, 999, 117 L. Ed. 2d 156, 166 (1992).

57. Johnson v. Glick, 481 F.2d 1028, 1033 (2d Cir. 1973), distinguished on other grounds by Graham v. Connor, 490 U.S. 386, 109 S. Ct. 1865, 104 L. Ed. 2d 443 (1989).

58. See Jones v. Huff, 789 F. Supp. 526, 535–36 (N.D.N.Y. 1992) (finding violations of prisoner's 8th Amendment

The Ninth Circuit has held there is no requirement of specific intent to harm or punish a specific individual.[59] This means even if the officer meant to hit someone else, he can still be found liable if he hit you instead. For instance, in Robins v. Meecham, a prisoner was injured by birdshot a correction officer had fired at another prisoner.[60] The court held even though the officer did not have a specific intent to harm or punish Robins, the officer did intend to harm a different prisoner, thus satisfying the intent requirement.[61]

Still, it is important to note that if a prison official intends to harm a prisoner, but in the end does not hurt the prisoner, the prisoner will not have a claim.[62] For example, in Warren v. Humphrey, a prison official attempted to kick a prisoner in the head but missed.[63] Because he missed, there was no harm and no case.[64] Remember that the Prison Litigation Reform Act would probably also prevent you from making a similar claim because it requires a physical injury, not just a mental injury.[65]

(ii) Assault by Another Prisoner—The Farmer Standard

If you are suing a prison official who did not stop or act to prevent another prisoner from attacking you, the court will use the "deliberate indifference"[66] standard from Farmer v. Brennan.[67] Prison officials may be found liable under the deliberate indifference standard if they:

(1) knew of a substantial risk of serious harm to the prisoner; and
(2) disregarded the risk by failing to act reasonably to avoid it.[68]

Because prisoners often cannot protect themselves, courts have decided that the government must take reasonable steps to protect prisoners against violence by other prisoners.[69] The Eighth Amendment creates a constitutional right for prisoners to be protected from harm by fellow prisoners.[70] Although courts have mainly applied the "deliberate indifference" standard to cases where a prison official does not prevent a prisoner from assaulting another prisoner, courts have also applied the standard to situations where a rights when corrections officers repeatedly used gratuitous force against prisoner, causing injury).

---

59. See Robins v. Meecham, 60 F.3d 1436, 1439 (9th Cir. 1995) ("[T]he Eighth Amendment does not require a specific intent to punish a specific individual. The basic threshold of the Eighth Amendment is that the offending conduct must be wanton.").

60. Robins v. Meecham, 60 F.3d 1436, 1438 (9th Cir. 1995).

61. Robins v. Meecham, 60 F.3d 1436, 1440 (9th Cir. 1995).

62. Warren v. Humphrey, 875 F. Supp. 378, 382 (E.D. Tex. 1995) ("[P]laintiff must allege some injury in order to sustain a claim of being subject to excessive force."); Jackson v. Culbertson, 984 F. 2d 699, 700 (5th Cir. 1993) (finding trivial amounts of force not repugnant to the conscience of mankind do not violate the 8th Amendment's Cruel and Unusual Punishment Clause).

63. Warren v. Humphrey, 875 F. Supp. 378, 380 (E.D. Tex. 1995).

64. Warren v. Humphrey, 875 F. Supp 378, 382 (E.D. Tex. 1995).

65. 42 U.S.C. § 1997e(e) (2006). See Part F of Chapter 14 of the JLM, "The Prison Litigation Reform Act," for more information on the PLRA's limitations on actions for mental or emotional injury.

66. Note that "deliberate indifference" is also the legal standard for 8th Amendment violations regarding medical care and general prison conditions, in addition to prisoner-on-prisoner assaults.

67. Farmer v. Brennan, 511 U.S. 825, 834, 114 S. Ct. 1970, 1977, 128 L. Ed. 2d 811, 823 (1994) ("[A] prison official must have a sufficiently culpable state of mind …. In prison-conditions cases that state of mind is one of 'deliberate indifference' to inmate health or safety.").

68. Farmer v. Brennan, 511 U.S. 825, 837, 114 S. Ct. 1970, 1979, 128 L. Ed. 2d 811, 825 (1994).

69. See Dace v. Solem, 858 F.2d 385, 388 (8th Cir. 1988) ("[T]he Constitution requires prison officials to protect prisoners from inmate attack while in custody."); see also Berry v. City of Muskogee, 900 F.2d 1489, 1496–99 (10th Cir. 1990) (finding where prisoner was strangled to death in prison by two men who he had identified as helping him commit the crime for which he was serving time, officials could have known of the danger based on the prior relationship); Cortes-Quinones v. Jiminez-Nettleship, 842 F.2d 556, 562–63 (1st Cir. 1988) (finding officials were deliberately indifferent to the safety needs of a psychiatrically disturbed prisoner who was killed in an overcrowded prison); Gangloff v. Poccia, 888 F. Supp. 1549, 1555 (M.D. Fla. 1995) (finding that prison officials have a duty to protect prisoners from one another); Fisher v. Koehler, 692 F. Supp. 1519, 1559 (S.D.N.Y. 1988) ("Although the state is not obliged to insure an assault-free environment, a prisoner has a constitutional right to be protected from the unreasonable threat of violence from his fellow inmates.").

70. See Smith v. Marcantonio, 910 F.2d 500, 501 (8th Cir. 1990) (stating that a prisoner's right to be protected from harm by other prisoners is "beyond dispute"); see also Farmer v. Brennan, 511 U.S. 825, 833–34, 114 S. Ct. 1970, 1976–77, 128 L. Ed. 2d 811, 822–23 (1994) ("[P]rison officials have a duty ... to protect prisoners from violence at the hands of other prisoners .... [G]ratuitously allowing the beating or rape of one prisoner by another serves no legitimate penological objectiv[e], any more than it squares with evolving standards of decency. Being violently assaulted in prison is simply not part of the penalty that criminal offenders pay for their offenses against society.").

prison official does not prevent another official from attacking a prisoner.[71] Thus, Farmer deliberate indifference lawsuits are also known as "failure-to-protect" claims.[72] You can go to court to claim prison officials are being deliberately indifferent to unsafe conditions or a threatened assault against you, even if you have not yet been assaulted.[73]

The Supreme Court in Farmer v. Brennan held that prison staff show deliberate indifference when they fail to take reasonable safeguards despite their actual knowledge of an excessive or substantial risk[74] to a prisoner's safety.[75] If you were assaulted by another prisoner (or prison guard) and believe prison officials' deliberate indifference allowed the assault to happen, you will have to prove to the court that:

(1) There was a substantial risk to your safety; and
(2) The prison officials knew of this risk to your safety; and
(3) The prison officials did not try to prevent the assault; or
(4) The prison officials did nothing to stop the assault; or
(5) The prison officials tried to prevent or stop the assault, but they did not try as hard as they should have (their attempts to prevent the assault were not reasonable).

Remember, courts also use the deliberate indifference standard in claims against supervisors for inadequate supervision and control of subordinates, and against bystanding officers witnessing an assault.[76]

(1) Proving a Substantial Risk to Your Safety

You must first show that there was/is a substantial risk of serious harm to your safety from another prisoner to satisfy the objective component of the Farmer test (see Part B(2)(b)(ii), below).

(2) Proving the Prison Officials Knew About This Risk

You must also provide evidence that the official knew of the substantial risk to your safety.[77] You do not have to prove the official definitely knew you were going to be attacked. You only have to show the official knew there was a substantial risk that you would be harmed.[78] But you do not have to show that the officials knew you were personally at risk or that the risk came from a particular prisoner.[79]

---

71. See Buckner v. Hollins, 983 F.2d 119, 123 (8th Cir. 1993) (finding grounds for an 8th Amendment claim when state corrections officer failed to stop an assault by county corrections officer on naked, handcuffed prisoner in cell).

72. See, e.g., Farmer v. Brennan, 511 U.S. 825, 831, 114 S. Ct. 1970, 1975, 128 L. Ed. 2d 811, 821 (1994).

73. Helling v. McKinney, 509 U.S. 25, 34, 113 S Ct. 2475, 2481, L. Ed. 2d 22, 32 (1993) ("[A] prisoner need not wait until he is actually assaulted before obtaining relief ... [T]he Eighth Amendment protects against sufficiently imminent dangers as well as current unnecessary and wanton infliction of pain and suffering.").

74. Farmer v. Brennan, 511 U.S. 825, 843, 114 S. Ct. 1970, 1982, 128 L. Ed. 2d 811, 829 (1994) ("The question under the Eighth Amendment is whether prison officials, acting with deliberate indifference, exposed a prisoner to a sufficiently substantial 'risk of serious damage to his future health,' and it does not matter whether the risk comes from a single source or multiple sources, any more than it matters whether a prisoner faces an excessive risk of attack for reasons personal to him or because all prisoners in his situation face such a risk." (citation omitted)).

75. Farmer v. Brennan, 511 U.S. 825, 843, 114 S. Ct. 1970, 1982, 128 L. Ed. 2d 811, 829 (1994).

76. See, e.g., Blyden v. Mancusi, 186 F.3d 252, 264 (2d Cir. 1999) (holding correctional officers to a deliberate indifference standard); Madrid v. Gomez, 889 F. Supp. 1146, 1248 (N.D. Cal. 1995) ("Municipalities can be found liable where the failure to train or supervise subordinates evinces deliberate indifference that leads to constitutional deprivations.").

77. See Lewis v. Richards, 107 F.3d 549, 553–54 (7th Cir. 1997) (finding no 8th Amendment violation where prisoner failed to present sufficient evidence that officials knew of risk to his safety and consciously disregarded that risk after the prisoner was subjected to three separate sexual assaults); Davis v. Scott, 94 F.3d 444, 446–47 (8th Cir. 1996) (finding no 8th Amendment violation where prison informant was attacked after his return to the general population, because there was no "solid evidence" that anyone in the general population posed an "identifiable serious risk" to his safety).

78. See Jensen v. Clarke, 94 F.3d 1191, 1197 (8th Cir. 1996) (finding that prison officials, who knew that violence in the prison was frequent and regular, but did not use available classification information to try to assign compatible prisoners as cellmates, were deliberately indifferent to the increased risk of violence arising from random cell assignments).

79. Farmer v. Brennan, 511 U.S. 825, 843, 114 S. Ct. 1970, 1982, 128 L. Ed. 2d 811, 829 (1994); see Brown v. Budz, 398 F.3d 904, 914–15 (7th Cir. 2005) (holding deliberate indifference can be established by knowledge either of a victim's vulnerability or of an assailant's predatory nature; both are not required); Pierson v. Hartley, 391 F.3d 898, 902–03 (7th Cir. 2004) (holding that a prisoner could recover for assault by a violent prisoner assigned to an open-air dormitory (which allowed unrestricted movement) in violation of prison policy, regardless of whether prison staff knew of the risk to the particular prisoner who was injured); Greene v. Bowles, 361 F.3d 290, 294 (6th Cir. 2004) (holding that a transsexual prisoner could recover for assault by a known "predatory inmate" either because leaving her in a unit containing high-security prisoners threatened her safety, or because placing the attacker in protective custody created a

Remember that for Eighth Amendment deliberate indifference claims, saying prison officials should have known of the substantial risk to your safety is not enough[80] (although in that case you still may be able to make a state law negligence tort claim as described in Part (B)(1)(a)(i)). Eighth Amendment deliberate indifference claims require the prison officials to have had actual knowledge of the substantial risk to your safety.[81]

You can show that the officials actually knew about this substantial risk by presenting both direct evidence and circumstantial evidence of the threat.[82] Courts consider "[w]hether a prison official had the requisite knowledge of a substantial risk ... [which is] a question of fact."[83] For example, if you have evidence that the threat to your safety was "longstanding, pervasive, well-documented, or expressly noted by prison officials in the past," or that the official must have known about the risk, then generally such evidence is enough to prove that the official did in fact know about it.[84] You should expect that prison officials will try to prove that they did not actually know about the facts showing you were in danger, or that even if they did know of some risk to your safety, they reasonably believed the risk was insignificant.[85] In addition to your own complaints, you should try to present other evidence that you were in danger in order to show that the prison officials actually knew of the risk to your safety. Your complaints alone may not prove that prison officials knew about the risk because courts do not expect guards to believe every protest or complaint a prisoner makes.[86] risk for the other occupants); Marsh v. Butler County, Ala., 268 F.3d 1014, 1027–30 (11th Cir. 2001) (en banc) (finding that prisoners who were assaulted in a county jail stated a claim where the jail had no functioning cell locks or surveillance, prisoners made weapons from pieces of the run-down building, violent prisoners were not disciplined or segregated, there was a lack of mental health screening, and the prisons were generally crowded and understaffed), overruled in unrelated part as stated by Hollywood East Artful Designs, Inc. v. Gutentag, 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 52948 at *3 (S.D. Fla. 2007); Hayes v. N.Y. City Dept. of Corr., 84 F.3d 614, 621 (2d Cir. 1996) (prisoner's refusal to name his enemies to prison staff does not by itself determine if staff knew of risk to him); Jensen v. Clarke, 94 F.3d 1191, 1198–1200 (8th Cir. 1996) (affirming injunction based on generalized increase in violence attributed to random assignment of cellmates); LaMarca v. Turner, 995 F.2d 1526, 1535–36 (11th Cir. 1993) (liability can be based on "general danger arising from a prison environment that both stimulated and condoned violence"); Coleman v. Wilson, 912 F. Supp. 1282, 1316 (E.D. Cal. 1995) (risk of harm from systemic medical care deficiencies is obvious); Abrams v. Hunter, 910 F. Supp. 620, 624–25 (M.D. Fla. 1995) (acknowledging potential liability based on awareness of generalized, substantial risk of serious harm from prisoner violence), aff'd, 100 F.3d 971 (11th Cir. 1996); Knowles v. N.Y. City Dept. of Corr., 904 F. Supp. 217, 221 (S.D.N.Y. 1995) (finding a valid claim where prison officials knew of an ethnic "war" among prisoners, that a Hispanic prisoner who had been cut had been transferred to plaintiff's jail, and that plaintiff was part of a group at risk because of his accent and appearance).

---

80. See Riccardo v. Rausch, 375 F.3d 521, 526 (7th Cir. 2004) ("'Deliberate indifference' means subjective awareness. It is not enough, the Court held in Farmer, that the guard ought to have recognized the risk. Instead, 'the official must both be aware of facts from which the inference could be drawn that a substantial risk of serious harm exists, and he must also draw the inference.'" (citations omitted)); Knowles v. N.Y. City Dept. of Corr., 904 F. Supp. 217, 222 (S.D.N.Y. 1995) ("Mere negligence, however, on the part of a prison official will not give rise to a claim under § 1983.").

81. See Carter v. Galloway, 352 F.3d 1346, 1350 (11th Cir. 2003) (per curiam) (dismissing medium-security prisoner plaintiff's claim for assault, after plaintiff was stabbed by his maximum-security cellmate, a known "problem inmate," after plaintiff complained his cellmate was "acting crazy" but had not specifically told prison officials his cellmate had threatened him as "[s]uch a generalized awareness of risk in these circumstances does not satisfy the subjective awareness requirement").

82. Johnson v. Johnson, 385 F.3d 503, 524 (5th Cir. 2004) ("The official's knowledge of the risk can be proven through circumstantial evidence, such as by showing that the risk was so obvious that the official must have known about it."); see also Farmer v. Brennan, 511 U.S. 825, 840, 114 S. Ct. 1970, 1980, 128 L. Ed. 2d 811, 827 (1994) (stating that the "concept of constructive knowledge is familiar enough that the term 'deliberate indifference' would not, of its own force, preclude a scheme that conclusively presumed awareness from a risk's obviousness."). In other words, a finder of fact, like a judge or a jury, may conclude that an official was aware of the risk if the risk was obvious.

83. Farmer v. Brennan, 511 U.S. 825, 842, 114 S. Ct. 1970, 1981, 128 L. Ed. 2d 811, 829 (1994).

84. Farmer v. Brennan, 511 U.S. 825, 842–43, 114 S. Ct. 1970, 1981–82, 128 L. Ed. 2d 811, 829 (1994).

85. See Johnson v. Johnson, 385 F.3d 503, 525 (5th Cir. 2004) (noting prison officials defended themselves by trying to show that it was reasonable to believe, based on the information they had at the time, that there was no danger to the prisoner or that it was reasonable to disbelieve the prisoner's repeated complaints of sexual abuse); Farmer v. Brennan, 511 U.S. 825, 844, 114 S. Ct. 1970, 1982, 128 L. Ed. 2d 811, 830 (1994) (stating that prison officials can try to show that they "did not know of the underlying facts" or "believed (albeit unsoundly) that the risk ... was insubstantial or nonexistent.").

86. Riccardo v. Rausch, 375 F.3d 521, 527, 528 (7th Cir. 2004) (stating that "[t]he Constitution does not oblige guards to believe whatever inmates say," and that "a prisoner's bare assertion is not enough to make the guard

(3) Prison Officials Did Not Act Reasonably to Prevent or Stop Assault

Finally, you must prove that the official acted unreasonably or failed to act in a situation where the official knew that you were at a substantial risk of harm.[87] It is important to understand that if a prison official does take reasonable steps to help you, but you are assaulted anyway, then you will likely lose in court because courts will not find the official acted with deliberate indifference.[88] For example, in the First Circuit case Burrell v. Hampshire County, the court found that the prison guards did not act unreasonably after they failed to transfer a prisoner who was proficient in martial arts and who did not have any previous altercations with his assailant.[89]

(4) Examples of Farmer Deliberate Indifference Cases

In the Eighth Circuit case Reece v. Groose,[90] Reece was in administrative segregation because he had been an informant for the Drug Enforcement Agency and had the reputation among other prisoners of being a "snitch."[91] While he was in segregation, a prisoner assigned to sweep the corridors in the segregation unit attacked Reece by throwing hot water on him.[92] The prisoner who attacked Reece had a prior history of threatening behavior and numerous infractions.[93] The court said that because Reece had the reputation of being a "snitch," and was therefore a target for other prisoners, he faced an obvious substantial risk of harm.[94] Moreover, the court said that if the risk is obvious, you can assume that the prison official knew of the risk.

The Fifth Circuit in Horton v. Cockrell held that a prisoner had an Eighth Amendment claim when prison officials failed to protect him from another prisoner.[95] During a two-week period, the prisoner filed three grievances and made at least one oral complaint regarding fears of an attack by a fellow prisoner who had assaulted other prisoners.[96] Because Horton had filed complaints against the other prisoner, who had a history of assaulting others, the court found that officials were probably aware of the risk of assault.

New York courts have also dealt with claims that guards failed to protect a prisoner from other prisoners. In Knowles v. New York City Department of Corrections, another prisoner slashed Knowles in the face while they were in the recreation area.[97] Knowles brought an action against prison officials stating they had known of the risk to him and were deliberately indifferent to it.[98] The guards had only patted down the prisoners when they had entered the recreation area, instead of going through the normal strip search procedures.[99] Furthermore, evidence existed that the prison officials knew about a "war" going on between subjectively aware of a risk, if the objective indicators do not substantiate the inmate's assertion.").

---

87. See Farmer v. Brennan, 511 U.S. 825, 841–42, 114 S. Ct. 1970, 1981, 128 L. Ed. 2d 811, 828 (1994) (holding that under the 8th Amendment, prison officials could not be liable for inhumane conditions of confinement unless the official had knowledge of the risk to the prisoner); see also Leibach v. State, 215 A.D.2d 978, 627 N.Y.S.2d 463 (3d Dept. 1995) (stating that where an attack was planned in secret, and correction staff was not aware of it, staff was not culpable).

88. Farmer v. Brennan, 511 U.S. 825, 844, 114 S. Ct. 1970, 1982–83, 128 L. Ed. 2d 811, 830 (1994) (emphasizing that there is no 8th Amendment violation if the official "responded reasonably to the risk, even if the harm ultimately was not averted").

89. Burrell v. Hampshire County, 307 F.3d 1, 8–9 (1st Cir. 2002).

90. Reece v. Groose, 60 F.3d 487 (8th Cir. 1995).

91. Reece v. Groose, 60 F.3d 487, 488 (8th Cir. 1995).

92. Reece v. Groose, 60 F.3d 487, 488 (8th Cir. 1995).

93. Reece v. Groose, 60 F.3d 487, 488 (8th Cir. 1995).

94. Reece v. Groose, 60 F.3d 487, 491 (8th Cir. 1995) (quoting Farmer v. Brennan, 511 U.S. 825, 833, 114 S. Ct. 1970, 1976, 128 L. Ed. 2d 811, 822 (1994)); see also Hamilton v. Leavy, 117 F.3d 742, 745–46 (3d Cir. 1997) (finding possible deliberate indifference under Farmer when a prisoner who had been labeled a "snitch" had a history of being violently attacked by other prisoners, and officials failed to take additional protective steps beyond recommending protective custody); Northington v. Marin, 102 F.3d 1564, 1567–68 (10th Cir. 1996) (finding deliberate indifference under Farmer when guard spread rumor that prisoner was a snitch knowing that prisoner would thereby face serious risk of assault by other prisoners).

95. Horton v. Cockrell, 70 F.3d 397, 401 (5th Cir. 1995).

96. Horton v. Cockrell, 70 F.3d 397, 399 (5th Cir. 1995); see also Williams v. Mueller, 13 F.3d 1214, 1216 (8th Cir. 1994) (finding cognizable 8th Amendment claim when, as two prisoners beat another for 20 minutes, officer stood idly, delayed requesting assistance, and blocked prisoner's attempt to escape assailants).

97. Knowles v. N.Y. City Dept. of Corr., 904 F. Supp. 217 (S.D.N.Y. 1995).

98. Knowles v. N.Y. City Dept. of Corr., 904 F. Supp. 217, 218 (S.D.N.Y. 1995).

99. Knowles v. N.Y. City Dept. of Corr., 904 F. Supp. 217, 218–19 (S.D.N.Y. 1995).

Spanish and Jamaican prisoners and that Knowles was among those prisoners at risk due to his physical appearance and accent.[100] The court held that this was enough evidence to create uncertainty about whether or not the guards were deliberately indifferent to Knowles' safety.[101]

In sum, prison officials may be found liable under the Farmer deliberate indifference standard if they (1) know the prisoner is facing a substantial risk of serious harm; and (2) disregard the risk by failing to take reasonable measures to avoid it. If they meet these requirements, officials may be liable if they fail to prevent another prisoner or prison official from attacking you. Prison officials may also be liable if there is a policy of permitting and condoning a pattern of excessive force.[102]

(b) Objective Component

In addition to the subjective component discussed above, remember that you also have to prove a second, objective component. To prove this objective component of an Eighth Amendment violation, you must show either that you were actually injured (if assaulted by a prison official)[103] or that the prison official's actions/inaction put you at "substantial risk of serious harm" from another prisoner, whether or not you were actually assaulted.

(c) Seriousness of Harm in Assaults by Prison Officials

To win a lawsuit against a prison official who assaulted you, your injuries must be bad enough that your Eighth Amendment constitutional rights against "cruel and unusual punishment" have been violated.[104] Most often, courts require that you show you were seriously injured by the prison official, although a few courts only require an injury, not a serious injury.[105] In deciding if your injuries are bad enough, courts look to society's standards of decency for guidance.[106] In general, society's standards of decency are violated whenever prison officials maliciously, evilly, or cruelly use force to cause harm "whether or not significant injury is evident."[107] But in reality, "not ... every malevolent [cruel] touch by a prison guard gives rise to a federal cause of action."[108]

---

100. Knowles v. N.Y. City Dept. of Corr., 904 F. Supp. 217, 222 (S.D.N.Y. 1995).

101. Knowles v. N.Y. City Dept. of Corr., 904 F. Supp. 217, 222 (S.D.N.Y. 1995).

102. See Matthews v. Crosby, 480 F.3d 1265, 1270–71 (11th Cir. 2007) (holding that a prison warden's knowledge of the violent propensities of some of his prison guards and his failure to act to prevent them from assaulting prisoners could constitute deliberate indifference); Ruiz v. Estelle, 503 F. Supp. 1265, 1302 (S.D. Tex. 1980) (finding 8th Amendment violations where prison officials encouraged staff to indulge in excessive physical violence by rarely investigating reports of violence and failing to take corrective disciplinary action against officers whom they knew to have brutalized prisoners), aff'd in part, rev'd in part, 688 F.2d 266 (5th Cir. 1982), and 679 F.2d 1115 (5th Cir. 1982).

103. Hudson v. McMillian, 503 U.S. 1, 8, 112 S. Ct. 995, 999, 117 L. Ed. 2d 156, 166 (1992) (quoting Wilson v. Seiter, 501 U.S. 294, 298, 111 S. Ct. 2321, 2326, 2329, 1115 L. Ed. 2d 271, 278 (1991)); see also Wright v. Goord, 554 F.3d 255, 268–269 (2d Cir. 2009).

104. U.S. Const. amend. VIII.

105. Note that in some circuits a de minimis (minimal) injury may be sufficient to establish a claim. See Archuleta v. Marshall, No. 00-2033, 2000 U.S. App. LEXIS 17501, at *5 (10th Cir. Jul. 20, 2000) (unpublished) ("The extent of the plaintiff's injury is not determinative in assessing whether an Eighth Amendment violation occurred. The inquiry for Eighth Amendment excessive force claims by convicted prisoners is 'whether force was applied in a good-faith effort to maintain or restore discipline, or maliciously and sadistically to cause harm.'" (citations omitted)); Flowers v. Phelps, 956 F.2d 488, 491 (5th Cir. 1992) (holding that a prisoner, who had a sprained ankle from being beaten by corrections officers, suffered a serious enough injury to have a successful 8th Amendment claim because such deliberate excessive force claims required no minimum injury), vacated in part on other grounds, 964 F.2d 400 (5th Cir. 1992); Northington v. Jackson, 973 F.2d 1518, 1523 (10th Cir. 1992) ("The 'malicious and sadistic' requirement applies regardless of whether the plaintiff has alleged significant physical injury, for the ultimate constitutional inquiry is directed at whether an unnecessary and wanton infliction of pain has occurred."); see also Watford v. Bruce, 126 F. Supp. 2d 425, 427 (E.D. Va. 2001) ("[T]he United States Supreme Court recognized that a per se non de minimis injury requirement would give prison officials carte blanche ability to 'punish' prisoners physically so long as the injuries inflicted were not severe .... The Hudson Court did not specify what type or level of injury is necessary to state a viable claim.").

106. Hudson v. McMillian, 503 U.S. 1, 2, 112 S. Ct. 995, 996, 112 L. Ed. 2d 156, 157 (1992); Estelle v. Gamble, 429 U.S. 97, 102–103, 97 S. Ct. 285, 290, 50 L. Ed. 2d 251, 259 (1976); see also Wright v. Goord, 554 F.3d 255, 268–69 (2d Cir. 2009).

107. Hudson v. McMillian, 503 U.S. 1, 9, 112 S. Ct. 995, 1000, 112 L. Ed. 2d 156, 167 (1992) (internal quotations omitted) (emphasis added).

108. Hudson v. McMillian, 503 U.S. 1, 9, 112 S. Ct. 995, 1000, 112 L. Ed. 2d 156, 167 (1992).

In other words, if your injuries are too small, there is probably no constitutional violation. Courts call injuries they think are too small "de minimis," or state that they occurred as the result of de minimis force. De minimis refers to the idea that a fact or thing is "so insignificant that a court may overlook it in deciding an issue or case."[109] Some examples of injuries courts have thought were de minimis are bumping, discomfort, sore wrists,[110] cuts and swelling to the wrists,[111] being slammed against a wall,[112] and being hit by swinging keys.[113] Some examples of force courts have called de minimis are hitting a prisoner once on the head,[114] spraying a prisoner with water,[115] pressing a fist against a prisoner's neck,[116] and bruising a prisoner's ear during a routine search.[117] So, if you go to court, you will most likely have to show the physical force used against you was not minor and that you received serious injuries as a result of this use of force.[118]

Courts do not have an exact definition for the type or degree of harm that you need in order to claim cruel and unusual punishment. Courts usually say that "the unnecessary and wanton infliction of pain" violates the Eighth Amendment,[119] but they look at each case individually. The following cases will show you in more detail what kinds of actions, intentions, and injuries violate your constitutional rights and what kinds do not.

In Hudson, the prisoner suffered blows that caused "bruises, swelling, loosened teeth, and a cracked dental palate."[120] The Supreme Court found that the violence against Hudson and his injuries were serious enough to satisfy the "objective component" of the Eighth Amendment. This provided the basis for a constitutional claim. But you should notice that the Hudson Court, in finding a constitutional violation, also thought that it was important that the officers intended to humiliate the prisoner.

Soon after the Supreme Court decided Hudson, a district court in New York used the Hudson guidelines to determine the constitutionality of force used by corrections officers. In Jones v. Huff, corrections officers failed to stop other officers from unnecessarily beating a prisoner.[121] The beating badly bruised and injured the prisoner, including a fracture to his left eye. The same officers who did not stop the beating later ripped off the prisoner's clothes because they thought he was stripping too slowly. Even though the prisoner had

---

109. Black's Law Dictionary 496 (9th ed. 2009).

110. Fillmore v. Page, 358 F.3d 496, 504–05 (7th Cir. 2004) (holding that incidental bumping, discomfort, and sore wrists were de minimis and do not meet the constitutional threshold).

111. Watson v. Riggle, 315 F. Supp. 2d 963, 969–70 (N.D. Ind. 2004) (holding injuries to prisoner's wrists, including a cut and some swelling, caused when guards removed his handcuffs were de minimis); cf. Liiv v. City of Coeur D'Arlene, 130 Fed. Appx. 848, 852 (9th Cir. 2005) (clarifying that while past cases, such as Wall v. County of Orange, 364 F.3d 1107, 1112 (9th Cir. 2004), have "recognized that excessively tight handcuffing can constitute a Fourth Amendment violation" a finding of such violation requires either actual injury to the wrists, or a complaint to the officers involved that the handcuffs were too tight).

112. Govan v. Campbell, 289 F. Supp. 2d 289, 300 (N.D.N.Y. 2003) (holding that prisoner's claims guard slammed him against the wall and rubbed up against him was "de minimis" and insufficient to state a constitutional violation).

113. Norman v. Taylor, 25 F.3d 1259, 1263–64 (4th Cir. 1994) (requiring prisoner to establish more than de minimis injury by deputy's swinging of keys at the prisoner to maintain claim of excessive force); White v. Holmes, 21 F.3d 277, 281 (8th Cir. 1994) (requiring prisoner to establish more than de minimis injury caused by prison librarian throwing keys at prisoner and flailing her arms at prisoner's head). But see U.S. v. LaVallee, 439 F.3d 670, 687–88 (10th Cir. 2006) (rejecting the view that de minimis injury is conclusive evidence that de minimus force was used).

114. Olson v. Coleman, 804 F. Supp. 148, 150–51 (D. Kan. 1992) (holding that single blow that struck prisoner on the head while he was handcuffed was not excessive use of force), vacated on other grounds, No. 92-3281, 1993 U.S. App. LEXIS 10086, at * 3 (D. Kan. April 28, 1993) (unpublished).

115. Jackson v. Culbertson, 984 F.2d 699, 700 (5th Cir. 1993) (holding that guard's spraying prisoner with water because he started a fire was a de minimis use of physical force and was thus too trivial to make out a violation of 8th Amendment rights).

116. Candelaria v. Coughlin, 787 F. Supp. 368, 374–75 (S.D.N.Y. 1992) (finding that guard pressing his fist against prisoner's neck, resulting in no physical injury, was de minimis force for 8th Amendment purposes), aff'd, 979 F.2d 845 (2d Cir. 1992).

117. Siglar v. Hightower, 112 F.3d 191, 193–94 (5th Cir. 1997) (finding no 8th Amendment violation where plaintiff suffered bruised ear during routine search; court deemed this a de minimis use of force).

118. See, e.g., Thomas v. Stalter, 20 F.3d 298, 301–02 (7th Cir. 1994) (finding that excessive force was used when an officer hit a prisoner in the mouth with his fist while the prisoner was held by at least nine other officers); Munz v. Michael, 28 F.3d 795, 799 (8th Cir. 1994) (finding that excessive force was used when marshals kicked and stomped on prisoner in retaliation for vandalizing interior of squad car).

119. Gregg v. Georgia, 428 U.S. 153, 173, 965 S. Ct. 2909, 2925, 49 L. Ed. 2d 859, 874–75 (1976).

120. Hudson v. McMillian, 503 U.S. 1, 4, 112 S. Ct. 995, 997, 117 L. Ed. 2d 156, 164 (1992).

121. Jones v. Huff, 789 F. Supp. 526, 535–36 (N.D.N.Y. 1992).

originally disobeyed orders, the court found the officers liable for not trying to stop the other officers from beating the prisoner.[122] There were several incidents examined in this case. In one instance, liability was found where an officer kicked a prisoner in the buttocks for no reason.[123] Again, as in Hudson, the court found a constitutional violation partly because the officers intended to humiliate the prisoner.

The Eighth Circuit in Estate of Davis by Ostenfeld v. Delo found an Eighth Amendment violation where a corrections officer struck a prisoner in the head and face over twenty times while four other officers restrained the prisoner's limbs. The prisoner was seriously injured as a result.[124] The officers committed these acts even though the prisoner obeyed an order to lie face down on the floor and did not resist efforts to restrain him.

In Hickey v. Reeder, the Eighth Circuit ruled that the use of a stun gun to force a prisoner to clean his cell violated the prisoner's Eighth Amendment rights.[125] The Fourth Circuit held in Williams v. Benjamin that a prisoner sprayed with mace and then restrained on a bare-metal bed frame for over eight hours, without access to medical care or a toilet, had an Eight Amendment claim.[126]

The Fifth Circuit in Flowers v. Phelps held that a prisoner who was beaten by corrections officers, resulting in a sprained ankle, suffered a serious enough injury to have a successful Eighth Amendment claim.[127] The court stated that there is no minimum injury required for Eighth Amendment claims of excessive force.[128] In this way, even though a sprained ankle may not seem like a bad injury, in Flowers it was serious enough not to be de minimis.

The Sixth Circuit has held that minor physical contact is enough to satisfy the objective harm component for a constitutional claim if there is no legitimate reason for the contact. In Pelfrey v. Chambers, the Sixth Circuit ruled that the prisoner had a legitimate claim against a corrections officer who pulled a knife on him, grabbed his hands, and cut his hair with the knife.[129] The court said that the corrections officer's acts could not have been meant to further any institutional objective and were designed "to frighten and degrade [the prisoner] by reinforcing the fact that his continued well-being was entirely dependent on the good humor of his armed guards."[130] The court found this action to be a totally unnecessary, malicious, and sadistic use of force to cause harm.[131]

Pelfrey demonstrates that when you bring a claim against a prison official, you might not always need a significant physical injury. In this case, the fear caused by the official was enough, even without any physical injury. After Pelfrey was decided, however, the Prison Litigation Reform Act ("PLRA") barred bringing claims in federal civil court for mental or emotional injury not related to physical injury. So if you are bringing a claim in federal civil court for mental or emotional injury not related to physical injury, the PLRA requirements may now prevent you from recovering compensatory damages (and in some courts, punitive damages as well).[132]

(i) Substantial Risk of Serious Harm from Other Prisoners

To prove the objective component in a Farmer deliberate indifference claim about a prisoner assault, you must show you faced an objective, "substantial risk of serious harm." You can make a deliberate indifference claim even if you were never injured or attacked, as long as you can show you were at substantial risk of an assault. For a prison official's actions (or failure to act) to violate the Eighth Amendment, "the deprivation

---

122. Jones v. Huff, 789 F. Supp. 526, 535–36 (N.D.N.Y. 1992) (finding that kicks and punches were not part of a good-faith effort to restore discipline and could not have been thought necessary since the prisoner was already pinned down by two other officers, and that stripping the prisoner "was done maliciously with the intent to humiliate him").

123. Jones v. Huff, 789 F. Supp. 526, 532, 536–37 (N.D.N.Y. 1992).

124. Estate of Davis by Ostenfeld v. Delo, 115 F.3d 1388, 1394–95 (8th Cir. 1997).

125. Hickey v. Reeder, 12 F.3d 754, 757 (8th Cir. 1993).

126. Williams v. Benjamin, 77 F.3d 756, 764–65 (4th Cir. 1996).

127. Flowers v. Phelps, 956 F.2d 488, 489–90 (5th Cir. 1992), vacated in part on other grounds, 964 F.2d 400 (5th Cir. 1992).

128. Flowers v. Phelps, 956 F.2d 488, 491 (5th Cir. 1992).

129. Pelfrey v. Chambers, 43 F.3d 1034, 1035 (6th Cir. 1995).

130. Pelfrey v. Chambers, 43 F.3d 1034, 1037 (6th Cir. 1995).

131. Pelfrey v. Chambers, 43 F.3d 1034, 1037 (6th Cir. 1995).

132. See Part F of Chapter 14 of the JLM, "The Prison Litigation Reform Act," for further information on the PLRA and its actual injury requirement.

alleged must be, objectively, 'sufficiently serious,'" and you "must show that [you are] incarcerated under conditions posing a substantial risk of serious harm."[133]

It is important you understand that "not ... every injury suffered by one prisoner at the hands of another ... translates into constitutional liability for prison officials responsible for the victim's safety."[134] In other words, if you never faced a substantial risk (or cannot prove you did), then you cannot prove prison officials were deliberately indifferent to that risk. For example, in Berry v. Sherman,[135] the Eighth Circuit decided that the plaintiff, a prisoner who was assaulted by his cellmate, did not have an Eighth Amendment failure-to-protect claim because no one, including the victim, had thought the cellmate was dangerous. Therefore, the court rejected the prisoner's lawsuit because he had failed to show a "substantial risk of serious harm."[136]

In Farmer, the Court did not explain how serious the risk must be in order to be "substantial."[137] Generally, courts assess whether society considers the risk that the prisoner complains of to be so bad that it violates modern standards of decency to expose anyone unwillingly to such a risk.[138] In other words, the prisoner must show that today's society does not tolerate the risk he faced.[139] Courts do not consider the general, everyday risk of assault from other prisoners to be a "substantial risk" by itself.[140]

Remember that after you show you faced substantial risk of serious harm, you must show prison officials knew about the risk but were deliberately indifferent (see Part B(2)(a)(ii)(3) and (4)).

3. Harassment by Prison Officials

This Section explains when different types of harassment violate the Eighth Amendment. Harassment can be verbal, physical, or sexual. Harassment may be about race, sex, disability, language, national origin, sexual orientation, etc. New York State defines harassment as "[e]mployee misconduct meant to annoy, intimidate or harm an inmate."[141] Generally, verbal harassment alone does not violate the Eighth Amendment unless you are also physically threatened at the same time. Sexual harassment is any unwanted sexual attention. Generally, sexual comments by themselves are not sufficient to establish an Eighth Amendment violation.[142] If you are being harassed, you should first try to file a grievance through the inmate grievance system, discussed in JLM, Chapter 15.

---

133. Farmer v. Brennan, 511 U.S. 825, 834, 114 S. Ct. 1970, 1977, 128 L. Ed. 2d 811, 823 (1994).

134. Farmer v. Brennan, 511 U.S. 825, 834, 114 S. Ct. 1970, 1977, 128 L. Ed. 2d 811, 823 (1994).

135. Berry v. Sherman, 365 F.3d 631, 631 (8th Cir. 2004).

136. Berry v. Sherman, 365 F.3d 631, 634–35 (8th Cir. 2004); see also Riccardo v. Rausch, 375 F.3d 521, 526–27 (7th Cir. 2004) (holding that the prisoner plaintiff had not faced a substantial risk from his cellmate, who later assaulted him, because while the prisoner was at risk of attack from the Latin Kings, his cellmate attacked him not for that reason but out of a personal fantasy: "The risk from which [the prisoner plaintiff] Riccardo sought protection was not realized; for all this record shows, the (objectively evaluated) risk to Riccardo of sharing a cell with Garcia was no greater than the risk of sharing a cell with any other prisoner.").

137. Farmer v. Brennan, 511 U.S. 825, 834 n.3, 114 S. Ct. 1970, 1977 n.3, 128 L. Ed. 2d 811, 823 n.3 (1994) (noting that the Court did not reach the question of "[a]t what point a risk of inmate assault becomes sufficiently substantial for Eighth Amendment purposes").

138. See Hudson v. McMillian, 503 U.S. 1, 8, 112 S. Ct. 995, 1000, 117 L. Ed. 2d 156, 167 (1992) ("the Eighth Amendment's prohibition of cruel and unusual punishments 'draw[s] its meaning from the evolving standards of decency that mark the progress of a maturing society' and so admits of few absolute limitation.").

139. See, e.g., Helling v. McKinney, 509 U.S. 25, 35, 113 S. Ct. 2475, 2481, 125 L. Ed. 2d 22, 32–33 (1993) (finding that being exposed to a cellmate who smoked five packs of cigarettes a day created, in theory, a potentially valid claim under the 8th Amendment due to unreasonable health risk).

140. Jones v. Marshall, 459 F. Supp. 2d 1002, 1008 (E.D. Cal. 2006) ("[T]he legal standard must not be applied to an idealized vision of prison life, but to the prison as it exists." (quoting Berg v. Kincheloe, 794 F.2d 457, 462 (9th Cir. 1986))).

141. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 701.2(e) (2009).

142. See Adkins v. Rodriguez, 59 F.3d 1034, 1037–38 (10th Cir. 1995) (finding prison official's alleged verbal sexual harassment of prisoner did not violate the 8th Amendment because it was not objectively, sufficiently serious and the prison official did not act with deliberate indifference to the prisoner's health or safety). When other forms of harassment are combined with comments of a sexual nature, they may constitute cruel and unusual punishment in violation of the 8th Amendment. See, e.g., Berry v. Oswalt, 143 F.3d 1127, 1133 (8th Cir. 1998) (holding that allegations of attempted non-routine pat-downs combined with sexual comments and propositions that caused fear and frustration met the objective prong of the 8th Amendment claim). See Parts B(3)(a) and (c) of this Chapter for more information on verbal and sexual harassment.

(a) Verbal Harassment Alone

You cannot have an Eighth Amendment claim for verbal assault only.[143] Courts do not think verbal abuse, including racial and sexual comments, violates the Constitution. For example, the Ninth Circuit held in Austin v. Terhune that a prisoner did not have an Eighth Amendment claim where a guard verbally harassed the prisoner in a sexual and racial manner and briefly exposed the guard's genitals.[144] Similarly, the Sixth Circuit in Johnson v. Dellatifa decided that a prisoner had no constitutional claim against a guard who banged his cell door, threw food trays, made aggravating and insulting remarks, and behaved in a racially prejudicial manner because harassment and verbal abuse are not Eighth Amendment violations.[145]

(b) Verbal Harassment With Physical Threats

While simple verbal harassment does not violate the Eighth Amendment, courts have held that when these assaults are accompanied by very serious physical threats (most cases involve credible death threats), you may have a claim for psychological injury.[146] However, the PLRA states that prisoners may not bring a federal civil action for mental or emotional injury suffered while in custody "without a prior showing of physical injury."[147] The courts have interpreted this to mean that if you can only demonstrate a psychological injury, you will not be able to recover money damages. The court can still grant you injunctive relief (a court order to prevent officials or prisoners from harassing you) if you can show that this conduct is likely to be repeated in the future.[148] For more information on injunctive relief, see Part L of Chapter 14 of the JLM, "The Prison Litigation Reform Act."

(c) Sexual Harassment

Sexual harassment (or sexual assault) can be "any unwanted sexual attention a woman [or man] experiences ... ranging from leering, pinching, patting, verbal comments, and subtle pressure for sexual activity, to attempted rape and rape."[149] Both men and women can be sexually harassed.[150] Because prison officials have so much power over prisoners, a corrections officer may try to force a prisoner into sexual conduct by threatening him or her with disciplinary action or some other punishment. This can be considered cruel and unusual punishment violating a prisoner's Eighth Amendment rights.

---

143. Webster v. City of New York, 333 F. Supp. 2d 184, 201 (S.D.N.Y. 2004) ("Being subjected to verbally abusive language does not rise to the level of a constitutional claim in an Eighth Amendment context."); Minifield v. Butikofer, 298 F. Supp. 2d 900, 904–05 (N.D. Cal. 2004) (holding prisoner did not state a constitutional claim for sexual harassment, where a prison official twice unzipped his pants and told prisoner to grab his penis, because the Ninth Circuit has "specifically differentiated between sexual harassment that involves verbal abuse and that which involves allegations of physical assault, finding the later [sic] to be in violation of the constitution"; also noting the prisoner had not alleged any physical injury, and under the Prison Litigation Reform Act, "[f]ailure to allege and establish an appropriate physical injury is ground for dismissal" (citations omitted)); Jones v. Brown, 300 F. Supp. 2d 674, 681 (N.D. Ind. 2003) (holding pretrial detainee had no constitutional claim, where guard incorrectly told him criminal charges had been dismissed, when in fact they had been referred to the prosecutor and eventually became part of a plea bargain, because verbal abuse and harassment are not sufficient).

144. Austin v. Terhune, 367 F.3d 1167, 1171–72 (9th Cir. 2004) ("Although prisoners have a right to be free from sexual abuse, whether at the hands of fellow inmates or prison guards, the Eighth Amendment's protections do not necessarily extend to mere verbal sexual harassment." (citations omitted)).

145. Johnson v. Dellatifa, 357 F.3d 539, 546 (6th Cir. 2004) ("[T]he allegations, if true, demonstrate shameful and utterly unprofessional behavior [but] they are insufficient to establish an Eighth Amendment violation …. [H]arassment and verbal abuse … do not constitute the type of infliction of pain that the Eighth Amendment prohibits." (citation omitted)).

146. See, e.g., Northington v. Jackson, 973 F.2d 1518, 1524 (10th Cir. 1992) (finding alleged death threats accompanied by the brandishing of lethal weapons would, if true, violate the 8th Amendment).

147. 42 U.S.C. § 1997e(e) (2006).

148. See Hutchins v. McDaniels, 512 F.3d 193, 196–98 (5th Cir. 2007) (noting that "the physical injury requirement does not bar declaratory or injunctive relief for violations of a prisoner's Constitutional rights"); Zehner v. Trigg, 133 F.3d 459, 461–63 (7th Cir. 1997) (finding that in a suit for mental and emotional injuries because of exposure to asbestos, a prisoner cannot sue for monetary damages but can sue for other kinds of relief).

149. Laurie A. Hanson, Comment, Women Prisoners: Freedom from Sexual Harassment—A Constitutional Analysis, 13 Golden Gate U. L. Rev. 667, 667 n.2 (1983) (citing Alliance Against Sexual Coercion, Fighting Sexual Harassment 3 (1979)).

150. See Boddie v. Schnieder, 105 F.3d 857, 861 (2d Cir. 1997) (finding that, in principle, sexual abuse of a male prisoner by a female corrections officer could potentially violate the 8th Amendment).

To decide if an act of sexual harassment or assault violated a prisoner's Eighth Amendment rights, courts look to see if the act offends "evolving standards of decency."[151] In other words, a court will look at what society believes is acceptable and decent behavior to decide whether an attacker's behavior violated that standard. Sexual assault is a clear violation, but comments of a sexual nature by themselves are usually not enough to violate the Eighth Amendment.[152]

If a prison official sexually harassed you, you can file a lawsuit both against that official and the prison. But you should know that it is difficult to make an Eighth Amendment claim for sexual harassment against a correctional institution because you must prove that the administrators showed "deliberate indifference" toward the harassment.[153] In other words, you must show that the prison administrators knew or must have known of the risk of harassment, but ignored it. Showing this knowledge is difficult unless you have evidence that you notified administrators of the problem or asked for help.

(d) Reporting Harassment in New York

New York law defines harassment as "employee misconduct meant to annoy, intimidate or harm an inmate"[154] and creates a special procedure for reporting harassment.[155] The procedure says that if you think you are the victim of prison employee misconduct or harassment, you should report the incident to the prison employee's direct supervisor (but be aware that this is not a prerequisite for filing a formal grievance).[156] You should also file a formal grievance with the Inmate Grievance Resolution Committee ("IGRC").[157] The Committee will forward this grievance to the prison superintendent for review.[158] After receiving the grievance, the superintendent will decide within twenty-five calendar days if the employee's conduct was harassment.[159] If you do not get an answer from the superintendent within this time, you can appeal the grievance to the Central Office Review Committee ("CORC").[160]

If you are a victim of sexual harassment, you should use the confidential procedure your prison has in place to bring a formal complaint.[161] If you keep copies of these complaints, you may be able to later show administrators were aware of the problem and were deliberately indifferent to your complaint.

4. Force Used to Carry Out an Illegal Order

If you refuse to follow an order from a prison official, even if that order is illegal, prison officials can use force to make you obey. Courts have held that prisoners must follow orders so that prisons can be administered in a safe and orderly way.[162] Even if you believe an order violates your constitutional rights, courts say you do not have the right to resist the order.[163]

---

151. Trop v. Dulles, 356 U.S. 86, 101, 78 S. Ct. 590, 598, 2 L. Ed. 2d 630, 642 (1958).

152. See Adkins v. Rodriguez, 59 F.3d 1034, 1037–38 (10th Cir. 1995) (finding prison official's alleged verbal harassment of prisoner did not violate the 8th Amendment because it was not objectively, sufficiently serious and the prison official did not act with deliberate indifference to the prisoner's health or safety). When other forms of harassment are combined with comments of a sexual nature, they may constitute cruel and unusual punishment in violation of the 8th Amendment. See, e.g., Berry v. Oswalt, 143 F.3d 1127, 1133 (8th Cir. 1998) (holding that allegations of attempted non-routine pat-downs combined with sexual comments and propositions that caused fear and frustration met the objective of the 8th Amendment claim).

153. See Daskalea v. D.C., 227 F.3d 433, 441, 343 U.S. App. D.C. 261, 269 (D.C. Cir. 2000) (stating that a municipality can be found liable when it is a policy or custom that inflicts the injury and finding that something constitutes a policy or custom when it arises out of deliberate indifference).

154. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 701.2(e) (2009).

155. See N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 701.8 (2009).

156. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 701.8(a) (2009).

157. See N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 701.5(a) (2009).

158. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 701.8(b) (2009).

159. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 701.8(f) (2009).

160. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 701.8(g) (2009).

161. Every facility should have a confidential and formal process for filing these complaints in order to prevent retaliation. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 701.6(k) (2009). However, be aware that complaints are not always kept "confidential" in reality.

162. Griffin v. Comm'r of Pa. Prisons, No. 90-5284, 1991 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 17951, at *11 (E.D. Pa. Dec. 6, 1991) (unpublished) ("Even if plaintiff considered the order illegal, plaintiff should not have refused to follow it because it is critical to the orderly administration of a prison that prisoners follow orders."), aff'd, 961 F.2d 208 (3d Cir. 1992).

163. Pressly v. Gregory, 831 F.2d 514, 518 n.3 (4th Cir. 1987) (holding the prisoner could not resist being taken into custody by claiming that it violated his civil rights when his habeas petition was still pending).

In Jackson v. Allen, a prisoner resisted prison guards because he thought they were going to use cruel and unusual punishment against him in violation of the Eighth Amendment.[164] The guards used force on him to overcome his resistance. The prisoner won his case against the guards, but only because they used excessive force. The prisoner's resistance to the guards' order, the court said, was not justified because guards have a legal right to make prisoners obey their orders and use force if necessary. The court stated a prisoner in this situation has the opportunity to recover damages in court for unconstitutional punishment but should not resist the order itself. Again, this assumes the force used was reasonable and necessary under the circumstances.[165] But, the court did say there was one exception to the general rule that prisoners may never resist orders—a prisoner may resist an illegal order to protect himself from "immediate, irreparable and permanent physical or mental damage or death."[166] The court declined to give specific examples of when a prisoner could legally refuse an order but stated such exceptions would be limited to extreme situations.

5. Protection Under State Constitutions and Statutes and Federal Statutes

You have already read how state tort law and federal constitutional law protect your rights against assault. But do not forget that state constitutions and statutes also protect your right to be free from assault. For example, the New York State Constitution, like the federal Eighth Amendment, prohibits cruel and unusual punishment.[167] And, like the federal Fifth and Fourteenth Amendment Due Process Clauses, the New York Constitution prohibits deprivation of your liberty without due process of law.[168]

New York State laws give prisoners additional protections. New York statutes prohibit prison officials from hitting prisoners except under emergency circumstances: "[N]o officer or other employee of the department shall inflict any blows whatever upon any inmate, unless in self defense, or to suppress a revolt or insurrection."[169] See Chapter 2 of the JLM, "Introduction to Legal Research," for information on how to find similar laws in your state.

In addition, federal statutes can also protect the rights of federal prisoners to be free from assault. The Federal Bureau of Prisons owes a duty of care to persons in federal custody, which can be the basis for a suit against prison officials if you are attacked by other prisoners.[170] But, it is state tort law that will determine when this duty is breached, so researching the laws of the state in which the prison sits is still necessary.[171]

C. Sexual Assault and Rape

This Part of the Chapter explains, for both men and women prisoners, the federal and state laws available if you have been sexually assaulted. Sexual assault and rape are both types of assaults. "Sexual assault" means any physical contact of a sexual nature, such as fondling your genitals (your private parts). If you have been sexually assaulted, you can make a claim using the laws described above, in Part B of this Chapter.

If you were attacked by a prison official, you can make an Eighth Amendment claim and a state tort law claim for assault and battery. Remember that even though prison officials have the right to use lawful force to maintain order and security within the prison, they do not have the right to sexually abuse you.[172] Any bodily contact between you and a prison official must be lawful force needed to maintain security and must relate to some penological need (meaning the action must assist the official in running the prison). A guard

---

164. Jackson v. Allen, 376 F. Supp. 1393, 1394 (E.D. Ark. 1974).

165. Jackson v. Allen, 376 F. Supp. 1393, 1395 (E.D. Ark. 1974).

166. Jackson v. Allen, 376 F. Supp. 1393, 1395 (E.D. Ark. 1974).

167. N.Y. Const. art. I, § 5.

168. N.Y. Const. art. I, § 6.

169. N.Y. Correct. Law § 137(5) (McKinney 2003 & Supp. 2009). See Chapter 17 of the JLM, "The State's Duty to Protect You and Your Property: Tort Actions," for information on how to bring tort actions against state employees.

170. 18 U.S.C. § 4042(a)(2) (2006). See United States v. Muniz, 374 U.S. 150, 164–65, 83 S. Ct. 1850, 1859, 10 L. Ed. 2d 805, 816 (1963) (holding that the duty of care owed to federal prisoners is fixed by 18 U.S.C. § 4042, regardless of any conflicting state rules).

171. Parrott v. United States, 536 F.3d 629, 637 (7th Cir. 2008) (finding that Indiana tort law governs whether the duty of care is breached in a suit brought under the Federal Tort Claims Act). See footnote 3 of this Chapter for more information on the Federal Tort Claims Act under which such claims must be brought.

172. See Women Prisoners v. D.C., 877 F. Supp 634, 665 (D.D.C. 1994) ("Rape, coerced sodomy, unsolicited touching of women prisoners' vaginas, breasts and buttocks by prison employees are 'simply not part of the penalty that criminal offenders pay for their offenses against society.'" (quoting Farmer v. Brennan, 511 U.S. 825, 834, 114 S. Ct. 1970, 1977, 128 L. Ed. 2d 811, 823 (1994))), vacated in part on other grounds, 93 F.3d 910, 320 U.S. App. D.C. 247 (D.C. Cir. 1996).

cannot claim that he is maintaining order or disciplining you for breaking some rule in order to force you to have sexual relations with him or to touch him in a sexual way.[173] If a prison official does this, you can seek the protection of the law.[174]

Even consensual sex (sex that both people agree to) between a prisoner and a prison official is not permitted. Such consensual sex will still violate the Eighth Amendment.[175] Federal law specifically criminalizes all sexual contact between corrections officers and prisoners in federal prisons, as Part C(2) explains below. Many states, including New York, have similar state laws,[176] as Part C(3) explains.

If you were sexually assaulted by another prisoner, you can claim prison officials were deliberately indifferent to the risk to your safety in violation of the Eighth Amendment (in other words, that prison officials knew you were at risk of harm but did nothing about it).[177] You could also make a state law negligence claim against prison officials.

1. What to Do If You Are Sexually Assaulted

If you are raped or sexually assaulted, you should tell someone immediately and ask to go to the hospital. There you should be tested for sexually transmitted infections, and women should also be tested for pregnancy. The health professional should collect your clothing, fingernail scrapings, pubic hair samples, blood samples, hair strands, and swab samples from the back of your throat and your rectum and/or vagina.[178] If you would like to speak with someone after the sexual assault or rape, the prison may provide counseling.

You may also want to file a report about the sexual assault and press criminal charges. Many prisoners are afraid that prison officials will retaliate against them if they file grievances, especially complaints against staff. You may fear that your complaint will not be kept confidential in your prisoner file and that you will be harassed or threatened. It can be difficult to report a sexual assault or rape, but you should know that any sexual contact by a corrections officer is wrong and you have a right not to be subject to such abuse. It is also wrong for the prison guards to retaliate against you for reporting the assault, although retaliation does happen.

If you bring a civil suit, it is important to know that the court recognizes only physical abuse, not emotional damage. According to Section 803(d) of the Prison Litigation Reform Act ("PLRA"), "no Federal civil action may be brought by a prisoner confined in a jail, prison or other correctional facility, for mental or emotional injury suffered while in custody without a prior showing of physical injury."[179] This makes the collection of physical evidence of sexual assault even more important. See Chapter 14 of the JLM for more information on the PLRA.

---

173. See Women Prisoners v. D.C., 877 F. Supp 634, 665 (D.D.C. 1994) (noting that although security concerns sometimes trump privacy interests, the evidence did not show any justification for invasion of prisoners' privacy or vulgar sexual remarks), vacated in part on other grounds, 93 F.3d 910, 320 U.S. App. D.C. 247 (D.C. Cir. 1996).

174. See Women Prisoners v. D.C., 877 F. Supp. 634, 665–66 (D.D.C. 1994) (holding that the District of Columbia was liable under § 1983 for 8th Amendment violations), vacated in part on other grounds, 93 F.3d 910, 320 U.S. App. D.C. 247 (D.C. Cir. 1996); see also Hovater v. Robinson, 1 F.3d 1063, 1068 (10th Cir. 1993) (stating that "an inmate has a constitutional right to be secure in her bodily integrity and free from attack by prison guards" (citing Alberti v. Klevenhagan, 790 F.2d 1220, 1224 (5th Cir. 1986))).

175. See, e.g., Carrigan v. Davis, 70 F. Supp. 2d 448, 452–53 (D. Del. 1999) (stating "as a matter of law, that an act of vaginal intercourse and/or fellatio between a prison inmate and a prison guard, whether consensual or not, is a per se violation of the Eighth Amendment"). Note that the holding in Carrigan was limited to vaginal intercourse and/or fellatio (oral sex); it did not include other sexual activities.

176. To learn about your state's laws on sexual misconduct in prison, you can go to http://www.justdetention.org/en/custodial_state.aspx (last visited Nov. 7, 2009) to find each state's laws.

177. Farmer v. Brennan, 511 U.S. 825, 847, 114 S. Ct. 1970, 1984, 128 L. Ed. 2d. 811, 832 (1994) (holding that a "prison official may be held liable under the Eighth Amendment for denying humane conditions of confinement only if he knows that inmates face a substantial risk of serious harm and disregards that risk by failing to take reasonable measures to abate it").

178. See Linda M. Petter & David L. Whitehill, Management of Female Sexual Assault, 58 Am. Family Physician 920 (1998), available at http://www.aafp.org/afp/980915ap/petter.html (last visited January 15, 2010).

179. Prison Litigation Reform Act of 1995, 42 U.S.C. §1997e(e) (2006).

2. Eighth Amendment Claims for Sexual Assault

Like any assault, if you were sexually assaulted by another prisoner, courts use the Eighth Amendment deliberate indifference standard to determine if a prison official is liable for failing to prevent the assault.[180]

If you were instead assaulted by a prison official, you can claim that the assault was "cruel and unusual punishment" violating your Eighth Amendment rights. Conduct violates the Eighth Amendment if it violates the "evolving standards of decency that mark the progress of a maturing society."[181] Courts have found that sexual assaults violate the Eighth Amendment because, as explained in Women Prisoners v. District of Columbia, for example, "rape, coerced sodomy, unsolicited touching of women prisoners' vaginas, breasts and buttocks by prison employees are 'simply not part of the penalty that criminal offenders pay for their offenses against society.'"[182]

In making your Eighth Amendment claim, you must show the same two components as for any assault by a prison official: (1) the subjective component that the prison official has a "sufficiently culpable state of mind," and (2) the objective component that the harm is "sufficiently serious."[183] Showing these two components is generally easier when proving sexual assault as compared to alleging a physical assault. Courts recognize that sexual assaults are usually both malicious and harmful. As the Second Circuit in Boddie v. Schnieder explained, a claim of sexual abuse may meet both the subjective and objective elements of the constitutional test because sexual abuse can cause severe physical and mental harm and may, on its own, exhibit a sufficiently culpable state of mind.[184]

3. Sexual Abuse of Women Prisoners

While both men and women prisoners have been sexually assaulted and/or raped, women prisoners are particularly vulnerable.[185] Although all prisoners' rights to privacy are very limited because of the nature of prison and incarceration,[186] courts are sometimes more sympathetic to female prisoners because of the greater chance of sexual abuses by prison guards. For example, some courts have found searches of women prisoners by male guards to be unconstitutional, even if searches of male prisoners by female guards would be allowed under the same circumstances.[187] To help prevent sexual abuse of women prisoners, some prisons have tried to hire only female corrections officers for women's prisons.[188] Though federal law prohibits 180. Farmer v. Brennan, 511 U.S. 825, 834, 114 S. Ct. 1970, 1977, 128 L. Ed. 2d 811, 823 (1994) (holding that to violate the 8th Amendment, a prison official must have a "sufficiently culpable state of mind" which means one of "deliberate indifference" to prisoner health or safety (citing Wilson v. Seiter, 501 U.S. 294, 111 S. Ct. 2321, 115 L. Ed. 2d 271 (1991))).

---

181. Hudson v. McMillian, 503 U.S. 1, 8, 112 S. Ct. 995, 1000, 117 L. Ed. 2d 156, 167 (1992) (quoting Rhodes v. Chapman, 452 U.S. 337, 346, 101 S. Ct. 2392, 2399, 69 L. Ed. 2d 59, 68 (1981)).

182. Women Prisoners v. D.C., 877 F. Supp. 634, 665 (D.D.C. 1994) (quoting Farmer v. Brennan, 511 U.S. 825, 834, 114 S. Ct. 1970, 1977, 128 L. Ed. 2d 811, 823 (1994)), vacated in part on other grounds, 9 F.3d 910, 320 U.S. App. D.C. 247 (D.C. Cir. 1996).

183. Farmer v. Brennan, 511 U.S. 825, 834, 114 S. Ct. 1970, 1977, 128 L. Ed. 2d 811, 823 (1994). See Part B(2) of this Chapter for more information on the objective and subjective components of 8th Amendment violations.

184. Boddie v. Schnieder, 105 F.3d 857, 861 (2d Cir. 1997); see also Hammond v. Gordon County, 316 F. Supp. 2d 1262, 1301 (N.D. Ga. 2002) (holding that prisoner had satisfied both the objective and subjective components of her 8th Amendment claim by alleging she had sexual intercourse with a prison guard, even though the guard claimed it was consensual; noting that under Georgia state law "an inmate may not consent to certain types of sexual contact with a prison guard" and that sexual intercourse "is objectively sufficiently serious to satisfy the [objective] element" of plaintiff's 8th Amendment claim as well as the subjective element because there is "no legitimate penalogical [sic] purpose that possibly could be served by a jailer's conduct in engaging in a sexual relationship with an inmate .... the conduct at issue is sufficient evidence, in and of itself, of [the defendant's] culpable state of mind").

185. Human Rights Watch, All Too Familiar: Sexual Abuse of Women in U.S. State Prisons (1996), available at http://hrw.org/reports/1996/Us1.htm (last visited January 15, 2010) (noting that the female prisoner population is "a population largely unaccustomed to having recourse against abuse; all the more necessary, then, for the state to present the available means of recourse clearly and in an accessible fashion").

186. See Hudson v. Palmer, 468 U.S. 517, 527–28, 104 S. Ct. 3194, 3200–01, 82 L. Ed. 2d 393, 403–04 (1983) (finding that the interest in ensuring institutional security necessitates a limited right of privacy for prisoners).

187. See, e.g., Jordan v. Gardner, 986 F.2d 1521, 1531 (9th Cir. 1993) (holding that prison policy requiring male guards to conduct non-emergency, suspicionless, clothed body searches on female prisoners was cruel and unusual punishment in violation of the 8th Amendment). See Part C(2)(f) of Chapter 25 of the JLM, "Your Right To Be Free From Illegal Body Searches," for more information about cross-gender body searches.

188. See, e.g., Ind. Code Ann. §§ 36-8-3-19, 36-8-10-5 (LexisNexis 2004). California protects all prisoners from employment discrimination based on sex,[189] hiring only female employees for female correctional facilities will not violate the law if it produces only a "minimal restriction" on employment[190] or if gender is an essential part of the job. Some courts have found that gender is an appropriate employment qualification where it advances goals of prison security and rehabilitation.[191]

4. Federal Law

While a prison official is permitted to touch a prisoner for security reasons (for example, while performing a legal search), he is never allowed to have sexual contact with a prisoner. Section 2243 of Title 18 of the United States Code[192] criminalizes sexual intercourse or any type of sexual contact between persons with "custodial, supervisory or disciplinary" authority and prisoners in federal correctional facilities.[193] Section 2241 makes it a felony to use or threaten force to engage in sexual intercourse in a federal prison.[194] This means it is always illegal in a federal prison for prison officials to have sexual contact with prisoners, and it is a felony if the officials use or threaten force. These laws only protect federal prisoners. Laws protecting state prisoners are discussed in the next Subsection.

In 2003, the federal government passed the Prison Rape Elimination Act, the first federal law addressing sexual assault in prisons. The Act calls for the collection of national statistics about sexual assault in federal, state, and local prisons. It also develops guidelines for states on addressing prisoner rape, creates a review panel to hold annual hearings, and provides grants to states to fight the problem.[195] With this Act, the federal government recognized that sexual assault in prisons is a major problem.[196]

5. State Law

In many states, including New York and California, any sexual conduct between a prison employee and a prisoner—even with the prisoner's consent—is a form of rape.[197] A New York State statute makes any sexual relations between prisoners and prison employees illegal. Specifically, the law says prisoners cannot legally "consent" to sexual relations with prison employees.[198] Thus, by state statute, New York State prison employees are criminally liable for rape, sodomy, sexual misconduct, or sexual abuse if they have sexual contact with or commit a sexual act with prisoners. In other words, courts will consider any sexual contact being searched by officers of the opposite sex. Cal. Penal Code § 4021(b) (West 2008). Michigan provides that if prisoners are subject to body cavity searches by officers of the opposite sex, an officer of the same sex must also be present. Mich. Comp. Laws Ann. § 764.25b(5) (West 2000).

---

189. 42 U.S.C. § 2000e-2(a)–(d)(2006).

190. See Tharp v. Iowa Dept. of Corr., 68 F.3d 223, 226 (8th Cir. 1995) (upholding a policy of assigning female guards to the prison's women's unit where doing so did not lead to termination, demotion, reduction of pay, or missed promotion opportunities); Grummett v. Rushen, 779 F.2d 491, 496 (9th Cir. 1985) (finding that to restrict or disallow female guards from holding positions that involve occasional viewing of male prisoners would require "tremendous rearrangement of work schedules and possibly produce a risk to both internal security needs and equal employment opportunities for the female guards").

191. See Robino v. Iranon, 145 F.3d 1109, 1111 (9th Cir. 1998) (concluding that gender constitutes a bona fide occupational qualification because the state's legitimate penological interests outweigh the employees' interests in holding certain posts); Torres v. Wis. Dept. of Health & Social Serv., 859 F.2d 1523, 1530 (7th Cir. 1988) ("[T]he superintendent … made a professional judgment that giving women prisoners a living environment free from the presence of males in a position of authority was necessary to foster the goal of rehabilitation … [especially due to the] high percentage of female inmates [that] has been physically and sexually abused by males.").

192. 18 U.S.C. § 2243 (2006).

193. For an example of criminal prosecution of a federal prison guard for violating this statute, see United States v. Vasquez, 389 F.3d 65, 77 (2d Cir. 2004) (affirming conviction of defendant prison guard for five counts of sexual abuse of prisoners and one count of misdemeanor abusive sexual contact, and sentencing of defendant to 21 months imprisonment).

194. 18 U.S.C. § 2241 (2006).

195. Prison Rape Elimination Act of 2003, 42 U.S.C. §§ 15601–15609 (2006). The National Prison Rape Elimination Commission ("NPREC") released an official report and guidelines in mid-2009. NPREC, Report and Standards, available at http://www.nprec.us/ (last visited November 9, 2009).

196. The U.S. Department of Justice ("DOJ") also recently released a report examining the DOJ's efforts to deter sexual abuse of federal prisoners by federal corrections officers, and made recommendations to help the DOJ prevent this sexual abuse (including better staff training and increased medical and psychological help for victims of abuse). Dept. of Justice, Office of the Inspector General, The Department of Justice's Efforts to Prevent Staff Sexual Abuse of Federal Inmates (2009), available at http://www.justice.gov/oig/reports/plus/e0904.pdf (last visited January 15, 2010).

197. Cal. Penal Code § 289.6 (West 2008; N.Y. Penal Law § 130.05(3)(e)–(f) (McKinney 2004).

198. N.Y. Penal Law §§ 130.05(3) (e)–(f) (McKinney 2004).

between a prison employee and a prisoner a crime, even if the prisoner believed such contact was consensual. Consent is not a valid defense for the prison official's acts.

Other states that criminalize sexual contact between prison employees and prisoners include Alaska, Arizona, Arkansas, California, Colorado, Connecticut, Delaware, the District of Columbia, Florida, Georgia, Hawaii, Idaho, Illinois, Iowa, Kansas, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maine, Maryland, Michigan, Minnesota, Mississippi, Missouri, Montana, Nevada, New Hampshire, New Jersey, New Mexico, North Dakota, Ohio, Oregon, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, South Carolina, South Dakota, Utah, Virginia, Washington, West Virginia, and Wisconsin.[199] States that have laws that do not refer specifically to prison employees but may also criminalize prison employees' sexual contact with prisoners include Nebraska, North Carolina, Oklahoma, Texas, and Wyoming.[200]

Some states have also taken steps to protect prisoners from retaliation for reporting sexual misconduct by prison staff. For example, California has made it illegal for prison guards to retaliate against prisoners who report them for sexual assault.[201] Of course, even with such laws, retaliation still occurs and is a real concern. But, if your state law prohibits retaliation, the fact that the law forbids this behavior only serves to strengthen your legal claim.

D. Assault on LGBT or Effeminate Prisoners

This Part of the Chapter discusses special issues for gay, homosexual, lesbian, and/or effeminate prisoners (prisoners with feminine characteristics). Chapter 30 of the JLM, "Special Information for Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual, and Transgender Prisoners," explains these issues in more detail. But, you should remember you do not have to wait to be attacked before bringing suit; you can sue before you are assaulted if you feel officials are ignoring a large risk that you will be seriously harmed.

Most LGBT prisoners who have been assaulted by other prisoners make Eighth Amendment deliberate indifference claims under Farmer,[202] although in one recent case, a court recognized a Fourteenth Amendment Equal Protection claim as well.[203] To make a claim that you are vulnerable to attack (in order to satisfy a deliberate indifference claim), you have to present evidence that you may be a target of assault.[204] If you are gay or effeminate, it may be easier for you to prove that there is/was a substantial risk to your safety

---

199. Alaska Stat. §§ 11.41.425.2, 11.41.427.1 (2008); Ariz. Rev. Stat. Ann. § 13-1419 (2001 & Supp. 2008); Ark. Code Ann. § 5-14-126(a)(1)(A) (2006 & Supp. 2009); Cal. Penal Code § 289.6 (West 2008); Colo. Rev. Stat. § 18-3-404(f) (2004 & Supp. 2009); Conn. Gen. Stat. Ann. §§ 53a-71(a)(5), 53a-73a(a)(1)(F) (West 2007); Del. Code Ann. tit. 11, § 1259 (2007); D.C. Code §§ 22-3013, 22-3014, and 22-3017 (2001 & Supp. 2009); Fla. Stat. Ann. § 944.35(3) (West 2006); Ga. Code Ann. § 16-6-5.1 (2007); Haw. Rev. Stat. Ann. §§ 707-731(1)(c), 707-732(1)(e) (LexisNexis 2009); Idaho Code Ann. § 18-6110 (2004 & Supp. 2008); 720 Ill. Comp. Stat. Ann. 5/11-9.2 (West 2002); Iowa Code Ann. § 709.16(1) (West 2003); Kan. Stat. Ann. § 21-3520 (2007); Ky. Rev. Stat. Ann. § 510.120 (LexisNexis 2008); La. Rev. Stat. Ann. § 14:134.1 (2004); Me. Rev. Stat. Ann. tit. 17-a, § 253(2)(E) (2006 & Supp. 2008); Md. Code Ann., [Crim. Law] § 3-314 (LexisNexis 2002); Mich. Comp. Laws Ann. §§ 750.520c (1)(i–k) (West 2004 & Supp. 2009); Minn. Stat. Ann. § 609.344(1)(m), 609.345(1)(m) (West 2009); Miss. Code Ann. § 97-3-104 (West 2008); Mo. Ann. Stat. § 566.145 (West 1999 & Supp. 2009); Mont. Code Ann. § 45-5-502(5)(a) (2008); Nev. Rev. Stat. Ann. § 212.187 (LexisNexis 2005); N.H. Rev. Stat. Ann. § 632-A:4(III) (2007 & Supp. 2008); N.J. Stat. Ann. § 2C:14-2(c)(2) (West 2005); N.M. Stat. § 30-9-11(E)(2) (2004 & Supp. 2009); N.D. Cent. Code § 12.1-20-06 (1997 & Supp. 2009); Ohio Rev. Code Ann. § 2907.03(A)(6,11) (West 2006 & Supp. 2009); Or. Rev. Stat. §§ 163.452, 454 (2009); 18 Pa. Cons. Stat. Ann. § 3124.2 (West 2000); R.I. Gen. Laws § 11-25-24 (2002); S.C. Code Ann. § 44-23-1150 (2002 & Supp. 2008); S.D. Codified Laws § 24-1-26.1 (2004); Utah Code Ann. § 76-5-412 (2008); Va. Code Ann. § 18.2-64.2 (2009); Wash. Rev. Code Ann. §§ 9A.44.160, 170, 180 (West 2009); W. Va. Code Ann. § 61-8B-10 (LexisNexis 2005 & Supp. 2009); and Wis. Stat. Ann. § 940.225 (West 2005). These laws vary significantly in detail, and you should consult the law of the state in which you are imprisoned. See Human Rights Watch, All Too Familiar: Sexual Abuse of Women in U.S. State Prisons 39–40 (1996), available at http://www.hrw.org/legacy/reports/1996/Us1.htm (last visited January 15, 2010).

200. Neb. Rev. Stat. §28-322.03 (2008); N.C. Gen. Stat. § 14-27.7 (2005); Okla. Stat. Ann. tit. 21 § 1114 (2005); Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 22.011 (2004); Wyo. Stat. Ann. § 6-2-303 (2005). See The Human Rights Watch Women's Rights Project Report, All Too Familiar: Sexual Abuse of Women in U.S. State Prisons 40 (1996), available at http://hrw.org/reports/1996/Us1.htm (last visited January 15, 2010).

201. Cal. Code Reg. Tit. 15, § 3401.5(f) (2003).

202. Farmer v. Brennan, 511 U.S. 825, 828–829, 114 S. Ct. 1970, 1975, 128 L. Ed. 2d 811, 820 (1994) (recognizing as actionable an 8th Amendment claim for a prison's "deliberate indifference" to a prominent risk of assault).

203. Johnson v. Johnson, 385 F.3d 503, 532–533 (5th Cir. 2004) (holding that prisoner's sexual-orientation-based equal protection claims were properly pleaded and actionable).

204. See Purvis v. Ponte, 929 F.2d 822, 825–27 (1st Cir. 1991) (per curiam) (finding 8th Amendment not violated when prisoner alleged general fear of "gay bashing" and suspicions that homophobic cellmates threatened his safety, because prisoner presented no evidence of likelihood violence would occur and officials had tried 6 different cellmates).

and that prison officials knew of this risk. In other words, your status as gay or effeminate may make it easier to prove that you are a vulnerable prisoner. As long as prison officials know of your status, they know there is a higher risk you will be assaulted.

Even if it might be easier for you to prove you are/were in danger of being assaulted, it is still important to report any threats against you so that prison officials know about specific problems. For example, if you seem vulnerable because you are gay, or because you look young or effeminate, then you should report to prison officials any harassment or threats of rape by other prisoners. When you report harassment or threats to prison officials, you need to have some specific evidence or examples (for example, that a prisoner who has raped other prisoners is threatening you) because suspicions alone are not enough.[205] With such evidence, prisoners who fall into the gay or effeminate categories may be able to make a deliberate indifference Eighth Amendment claim that prison officials should have taken previous threats into consideration in order to prevent an attack. Of course, you will still have to prove that prison officials did not act reasonably to try to prevent the assault.

You should also note you may be eligible for special protection even if you are not gay but are still more vulnerable to physical and sexual assaults by other prisoners because of your appearance.[206] If you fear you will be assaulted, you may request to be placed in special housing or protective custody, which unfortunately usually also means you will lose certain privileges. Prison officials may also put you, without your consent, in protective custody or even solitary confinement because they believe that is the only way to protect you.

1. Special Protection for Gay or Effeminate Prisoners

In general, courts have recognized that gay or effeminate men are often assaulted in prison, especially when placed in the general population,[207] and may need special consideration either at sentencing or after incarceration.[208] Courts are still creating the law in this area, but the Supreme Court has expressly recognized that a sentencing court may consider "susceptibility to abuse" in prison as a factor for a downward departure (a decrease from what the sentence would otherwise be) in extraordinary or unusual circumstances.[209] Where the judge believes there is a serious risk you could be assaulted in prison or where prison officials say that they can protect you only by putting you in protective custody or solitary confinement, you can request better protective custody conditions or a shorter sentence. For example, several courts have ordered reduced sentences for prisoners at risk of assault because of their sexual orientation or appearance.[210]

---

205. Riccardo v. Rausch, 375 F.3d 521, 527–28 (7th Cir. 2004) ("The Constitution does not oblige guards to believe whatever inmates say … [A] prisoner's bare assertion is not enough to make the guard subjectively aware of a risk, if the objective indicators do not substantiate the inmate's assertion.").

206. See, e.g., United States v. Gonzalez, 945 F.2d 525, 526 (2d Cir. 1991) (ruling in favor of decreasing prisoner's sentence because of his feminine appearance).

207. See, e.g., Farmer v. Brennan, 511 U.S. 825, 848, 114 S. Ct. 1970, 1984, 128 L. Ed. 2d 811, 832 (1994) (noting that placing a young effeminate man into general population could threaten his safety); Johnson v. Johnson, 385 F.3d 503, 517–19 (5th Cir. 2004) (holding officials must use all possible administrative means to protect prisoners from sexual abuse); Taylor v. Mich. Dept. of Corr., 69 F.3d 76, 77, 83–84 (6th Cir. 1995) (holding warden liable for providing inadequate protection against physical and sexual abuse of vulnerable prisoner).

208. United States v. Gonzalez, 945 F.2d 525, 526–27 (2d Cir. 1991) (holding that shortening the prison sentence for a prisoner was possible by balancing the government's interest in incarcerating criminals with the goal of diminishing the likelihood that the prisoner would be assaulted).

209. Koon v. United States, 518 U.S. 81, 111, 116 S. Ct. 2035, 2053, 135 L. Ed. 2d 392, 421 (1996). Note that Koon, however, dealt with prisoners who were susceptible to abuse because they were ex-police officers, not because of their sexual orientation or appearance. See also United States v. LaVallee 439 F.3d 670, 708 (10th Cir. 2006) (allowing a reduced sentence for police officers because of their clearly demonstrated increased "susceptibility to abuse" in prison).

210. See, e.g., United States v. Lara, 905 F.2d 599, 608–09 (2d Cir. 1990) (reducing a sentence for a gay prisoner after prison officials put him in solitary confinement because solitary confinement was the only way the officials could protect him from assault); United States v. Gonzalez, 945 F.2d 525, 526–27 (2d Cir. 1991) (approving the trial court's grant of a downward sentencing departure to a nineteen-year-old effeminate looking heterosexual prisoner based on the likelihood of assault by other prisoners, even though no such attack had yet occurred); cf. United States v. Parish, 308 F.3d 1025, 1032–33 (9th Cir. 2002) (upholding downward departure because prisoner was particularly susceptible to abuse); United States v. Wilke, 156 F.3d 749, 754–55 (7th Cir. 1998) (departing from sentencing guidelines because of prisoner's sexual orientation and demeanor). Note, however, that the Federal Sentencing Commission has discouraged, but not prohibited, the use of physical appearance in determining a prisoner's potential for victimization and thus reduction in sentence. See Koon v. United States, 518 U.S. 81, 107, 116 S. Ct. 2035, 2050, 135 L. Ed. 2d 392, 418 (1996).

Special treatment for effeminate or gay prisoners was considered by the Second Circuit in United States v. Lara.[211] In this case, the prisoner had a youthful appearance and bisexual orientation that made him extremely vulnerable to physical attack. Prison officials were able to protect him only by putting him in solitary confinement, so the court reduced his sentence.[212] A year after Lara, the Second Circuit also decided United States v. Gonzalez.[213] In Gonzalez, the court similarly reduced the sentence of a nineteen-year-old prisoner who was young, effeminate, and likely to be victimized by his fellow prisoners.[214] Unlike in Lara, however, the prisoner in Gonzalez was not gay or bisexual but still vulnerable to homophobic attacks since his physical appearance did not conform to traditional notions of masculinity.[215] In other words, as long as a prisoner looks like he might be gay, he is at a greater risk of attack, even if he is not actually gay. The Gonzalez court also found that the prisoner could get a shorter sentence even though he had not been attacked; oppressive conditions without an actual attack may be enough to get a shorter sentence.[216]

2. Examples of Legal Claims Brought by LGBT Prisoners.

In Farmer v. Brennan, a transsexual[217] prisoner with feminine characteristics was placed in the general male prison population and was later beaten and raped by another prisoner.[218] The Supreme Court held that the prisoner may have had an Eighth Amendment claim and sent the case back to the lower court to determine if prison officials acted with deliberate indifference by failing to protect him.[219]

The Third Circuit in Young v. Quinlan held prison officials violated the Eighth Amendment under the deliberate indifference standard when a prisoner, described as small, young, and effeminate, was sexually assaulted by other prisoners, and officials ignored his requests for protection.[220] Similarly, the Sixth Circuit in Taylor v. Michigan Department of Corrections held a prisoner (who was small and vulnerable looking, with a youthful appearance, low IQ, and a seizure disorder) had an Eighth Amendment claim for being placed in a sixty-person prison camp barracks where he was raped.[221] The Seventh Circuit also recognized an Eighth Amendment claim in Pope v. Shafer when a prisoner was assaulted after officials ignored the prisoner's and internal affairs officers' specific reports of threats against him and refused transfer requests.[222]

In Greene v. Bowles, a transsexual prisoner was placed in protective custody to prevent attacks from other prisoners, but was then severely beaten by another prisoner in the protective custody unit.[223] The Sixth Circuit recognized an Eighth Amendment deliberate indifference claim because the warden admitted knowing the attacker was a "predatory inmate," knew the plaintiff had been placed in protective custody because of her status as a vulnerable prisoner, and knew both attacker and plaintiff were being housed in the same unit.[224] Importantly, the Sixth Circuit held vulnerable (transsexual, gay, effeminate, etc.) prisoners who have been attacked can prove prison officials knew of the substantial risk to their safety in two different ways: (1) by proving the officials knew of the plaintiff's vulnerable status and of the general risk to the plaintiff's safety from other prisoners, even if the officials did not know of any specific danger; or (2) by proving that the officials knew that a predatory prisoner, without segregation or other protective measures,

---

211. United States v. Lara, 905 F.2d 599 (2d Cir. 1990).

212. United States v. Lara, 905 F.2d 599, 603 (2d Cir. 1990).

213. United States v. Gonzalez, 945 F.2d 525 (2d Cir. 1991).

214. United States v. Gonzalez, 945 F.2d 525, 526 (2d Cir. 1991).

215. United States v. Gonzalez, 945 F.2d 525, 526–27 (2d Cir. 1991) ("[E]ven if Gonzalez is not gay or bisexual, his physical appearance, insofar as it departs from traditional notions of an acceptable masculine demeanor, may make him as susceptible to homophobic attacks as was the bisexual defendant before us in Lara.").

216. United States v. Gonzalez, 945 F.2d 525, 527 (2d Cir. 1991); cf. Koon v. United States, 518 U.S. 81, 111, 116 S. Ct. 2035, 2053, 135 L. Ed. 2d 392, 421 (1996) (finding court did not abuse discretion in granting downward sentencing departure based on convicted police officers' susceptibility to abuse in prison).

217. A transsexual is someone whose anatomical sex does not match his or her gender identity.

218. Farmer v. Brennan, 511 U.S. 825, 830, 114 S. Ct. 1970, 1975, 128 L. Ed. 2d 811, 821 (1994).

219. Farmer v. Brennan, 511 U.S. 825, 849, 114 S. Ct. 1970, 1985, 128 L. Ed. 2d 811, 833 (1994).

220. Young v. Quinlan, 960 F.2d 351, 362–63 (3d Cir. 1992).

221. Taylor v. Mich. Dept. of Corr., 69 F.3d 76, 77, 84 (6th Cir. 1995).

222. Pope v. Shafer, 86 F.3d 90, 91–92 (7th Cir. 1996).

223. Greene v. Bowles, 361 F.3d 290, 292 (6th Cir. 2004).

224. Greene v. Bowles, 361 F.3d 290, 294 (6th Cir. 2004).

presented a substantial risk to others, including the plaintiff.[225] If you are a vulnerable prisoner attacked by a predatory prisoner, this makes it easier for you to prove that prison officials knew of the risk to your safety because you do not have to prove a particular prisoner presented a specific threat to your safety.[226]

In another important case, Johnson v. Johnson, an African-American homosexual prisoner sued prison officials after prison gangs sexually assaulted him and bought and sold him as a sexual slave for over eighteen months, despite the plaintiff's requests for protection.[227] The Fifth Circuit said the plaintiff had a deliberate indifference claim because the officials continued to house him with the general population even though he repeatedly requested protection: the prison officials' response—that Johnson must "learn to f or fight"—"was not a reasonable response and ... contravene[d] clearly established law."[228] The Court further held that "[a]lthough it is not clear exactly what type of action an official is legally required to take under Farmer, ... an official may not simply send the inmate into the general population to fight off attackers."[229]

In his lawsuit, Johnson also claimed that the prison officials' actions violated his Equal Protection rights under the Fourteenth Amendment.[230] Specifically, he claimed that the officials failed to protect him like they protected other prisoners because of his sexual orientation.[231] The Fifth Circuit recognized this claim, noting that "if they actually did deny Johnson protection because of his homosexuality, ... that decision would certainly not effectuate any legitimate [governmental] interest" and would be in violation of the Equal Protection Clause.[232] You should note that the Johnson court accepted the plaintiff's sexual-orientation-based equal protection claim without proof that other non-homosexual prisoners were treated differently, but remember that Johnson is a new case and the law is still developing.

E. Legal Remedies Available for Victims of Unlawful Assault

This Part explains what you can do, legally, if you have been the victim of an unlawful assault. Part E(1) explains how you should first complain using your prison's Inmate Grievance Program. Part E(2) describes how you can then file a Section 1983 suit if you believe prison officials or other government employees (including police officers) violated any of your constitutional rights. Part E(3) explains how you can also file a state tort claim. Finally, Part E(4) describes class actions (when groups of plaintiffs bring suit together).

Remembering that different laws apply in state and federal prisons is important. If you are in a federal prison, then it doesn't matter what state the prison is in, because federal prisons use federal law. If you are in state prison, you can use both state and federal laws. But, remember each state creates its own laws. Research the laws of your state and how prisoners in your state file suits in that state's courts. Federal constitutional rights are protected regardless of whether you are in a state or a federal prison, but the legal claims you make and how you make them will differ depending on whether you are in state or federal court.

---

225. Greene v. Bowles, 361 F.3d 290, 294 (6th Cir. 2004) ("[W]here a specific individual poses a risk to a large class of inmates, that risk can also support a finding of liability even where the particular prisoner at risk is not known in advance.").

226. Greene v. Bowles, 361 F.3d 290, 294 (6th Cir. 2004) ("[A] prison official cannot 'escape liability ... by showing that, while he was aware of an obvious, substantial risk to inmate safety, he did not know that the complainant was especially likely to be assaulted by the specific prisoner who eventually committed the assault.'" (quoting Farmer v. Brennan, 511 U.S. 825, 844, 114 S. Ct. 1970, 1982, 128 L. Ed. 2d 811, 829 (1994))); see also Curry v. Scott, 249 F.3d 493, 507–08 (6th Cir. 2001) (finding where a particular prison guard had a history of racially motivated harassment of African American prisoners, deliberate indifference could be demonstrated by factual record, without threat to particular prisoner), overruled in part on other grounds by Jones v. Bock, 549 U.S. 199, 216, 127 S. Ct. 910, 921, 166 L. Ed. 2d 798, 813 (2007).

227. Johnson v. Johnson, 385 F.3d 503, 512 (5th Cir. 2004).

228. Johnson v. Johnson, 385 F.3d 503, 527 (5th Cir. 2004).

229. Johnson v. Johnson, 385 F.3d 503, 527 (5th Cir. 2004); see also Farmer v. Brennan, 511 U.S. 825, 832–33, 114 S. Ct. 1970, 1976–77, 128 L. Ed. 2d 811, 822–23 (1994) (explaining that jailers must "take reasonable measures to guarantee the safety of the inmates" and "are not free to let the state of nature take its course" (internal quotation and citation omitted)).

230. U.S. Const. amend. XIV, Section 1 ("No State shall … deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws."). See Part B(2) and Part F(1) of Chapter 30 of the JLM, "Special Information for Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual, and Transgender Prisoners" for more information on the Equal Protection Clause.

231. Johnson v. Johnson, 385 F.3d 503, 512 (5th Cir. 2004) (noting Johnson's claim that officials told him "'[w]e don't protect punks on this farm'—'punk' being prison slang for a homosexual man").

232. Johnson v. Johnson, 385 F.3d 503, 532 (5th Cir. 2004); see Farmer v. Brennan, 511 U.S. 825, 833, 114 S. Ct. 1970, 1977, 128 L. Ed. 2d 811, 823 (1994) ("[G]ratuitously allowing the beating or rape of one prisoner by another serves 'no legitimate penological objective.'" (citation omitted)).

1. Inmate Grievance Program

If you believe your rights have been violated, you should first file an administrative grievance. See Chapter 15 of the JLM, "Inmate Grievance Procedures," for further information. It is very important that you fully complete any administrative grievance processes before filing a lawsuit. If you do not, the court will probably reject your claim because you did not "exhaust" (complete) all administrative remedies first.[233]

2. 42 U.S.C. § 1983

If you think that prison officials have violated your Eighth Amendment rights, you may sue the officials or guards using Section 1983 of Title 42 of the United States Code (42 U.S.C. § 1983). Section 1983 is a federal law that allows you to sue state officials who have violated your constitutional rights while acting "under color of any" state law.[234] You can sue federal officials in a similar suit, called a Bivens action.[235]

You can also use Section 1983 to sue local officials as long as you can show that they too acted under "color of state law." (You may be able to sue local officials under state tort law as well.) But note that you can only sue municipalities (towns, cities, or counties) under Section 1983 if your injury was the result of an official municipal policy or custom.[236] This means that to sue a city or a county, you will have to show that the "execution of [the] government's policy or custom ... inflict[ed] the injury."[237] In other words, a local government will be held liable only if an injury can be shown to be a direct result of the local government's official policy, either express or implied.[238] Therefore, a local government is not liable under Section 1983 "for an injury inflicted solely by its employees or agents" who were not following official local policy or custom,[239] even though the local officials may be individually liable under Section 1983.

You should read Chapter 16 of the JLM, "Using 42 U.S.C. § 1983 and 28 U.S.C. § 1331 to Obtain Relief From Violations of Federal Law," to learn more about Section 1983 claims. Part E(1) of Chapter 16 explains Bivens actions and Part C(3)(c) gives more information on qualified immunity.

3. Tort Actions

Chapter 17 of the JLM, "The State's Duty to Protect You and Your Property: Tort Actions," explains how to bring a tort action in New York's Court of Claims.[240] If you were assaulted, you can bring a state law tort action against those who assaulted you, their supervisors, and maybe the state itself.

---

233. See, e.g., Johnson v. Johnson, 385 F.3d 503, 515–23 (5th Cir. 2004) (dismissing prisoner's claims that prison officials had failed to protect him from repeated sexual assaults due to failure to exhaust).

234. 42 U.S.C. § 1983 (2006).

235. Bivens v. Six Unknown Named Agents of Fed. Bureau of Narcotics, 403 U.S. 388, 91 S. Ct. 1999, 29 L. Ed. 2d 619 (1971).

236. See, e.g., Williams v. Kaufman County, 352 F.3d 994, 1013–14 (5th Cir. 2003) (holding a county could be held liable for unlawful searches of detainees when the relevant policymaker, in this case the sheriff, authorized the policy).

237. Irwin v. City of Hemet, 22 Cal. App. 4th 507, 525, 27 Cal. Rptr. 2d 433, 442 (Cal. Ct. App. 1994) (quoting Monell v. Dept. of Soc. Servs., 436 U.S. 658, 694, 98 S. Ct. 2018, 2037–2038, 56 L. Ed. 2d 611, 638 (1978)). In Irwin, a California court found that a complaint, alleging that the City of Hemet's adoption of a policy or custom not to train its jailers in suicide screening and prevention was the proximate cause of a prisoner's suicide, may not be summarily dismissed without determination as to whether or not the city adopted a policy or custom to inadequately train jailers. For an example of such a municipal policy or custom, see Blihovde v. St. Croix County, 219 F.R.D. 607, 613 (W.D. Wis. 2003) (involving claims arising from a policy of strip searches for arrestees entering a jail).

238. Blihovde v. St. Croix County, 219 F.R.D. 607, 618 (W.D. Wis. 2003) ("Even when there is no express policy, a municipality may be liable when there is a 'custom' of unconstitutional conduct." (citing Monell v. Dept. of Social Servs., 436 U.S. 658, 691, 98 S. Ct. 2018, 2036, 56 L. Ed. 2d 611, 635 (1978))); see also Amnesty Am. v. Town of W. Hartford, 361 F.3d 113, 125–27 (2d Cir. 2004) (reviewing the law of municipal liability in a damage suit for excessive force); Walker v. Sheahan, 526 F.3d 973, 977 (7th Cir. 2008) (dismissing a § 1983 claim for lack of evidence of a practice of using excessive force and following a "code of silence").

239. Irwin v. City of Hemet, 22 Cal. App. 4th 507, 525, 27 Cal. Rptr. 2d 433, 442 (Cal. Ct. App. 1994) (quoting Monell v. Dept. of Soc. Servs., 436 U.S. 658, 694, 98 S. Ct. 2018, 2037–38, 56 L. Ed. 2d 611, 638 (1978)).

240. Remember the New York Court of Claims is a specific state court in New York that only deals with claims against the State of New York. If the person who injured you was a state official or employee and you decide to file a tort action in state court in New York, you should file your claim in the New York Court of Claims. The New York Court of Claims can only award money damages; it cannot issue an injunction. See Part C(4) of Chapter 5 of the JLM, "Choosing a Court & Lawsuit: An Overview of the Alternatives," for more information on the Court of Claims and Chapter 17 of the JLM, "The State's Duty to Protect You and Your Property: Tort Actions," for more detailed information on tort actions.

It is very important to read Chapter 17 because there is a time limit for filing a lawsuit in the Court of Claims. If you do not file before the deadline, then you cannot sue in the New York State court system. Both New York State prisoners and prisoners from outside New York should read Chapter 17 for more information on how to bring a tort claim in state court.

4. Class Action Suits

Class actions are a type of lawsuit in which many plaintiffs sue together for similar violations of their rights.[241] Courts generally allow class actions where the following conditions are present: (1) there are too many plaintiffs for the court to try each case individually, (2) each plaintiff's case is similar in fact and law, (3) the claims or defenses of the representative parties are typical of the claims or defenses of the class, (4) the representative parties will fairly and adequately protect the interests of the class,[242] and (5) most of the claims would not be brought otherwise because each plaintiff's individual damages are too small.[243]

If a pattern of excessive force against prisoners exists within a prison, a class action suit may be brought on behalf of all the prisoners against the wardens or administrators in charge of the overall operations of the prison.[244] Defendants in such an action are charged with "abdicating their duty to supervise and monitor the use of force and deliberately permitting a pattern of excessive force to develop and persist."[245] In cases where injunctive relief is sought against prison officials for patterns of excessive force, "the subjective prong of the Eighth Amendment is satisfied by a showing of deliberate indifference" rather than by the Hudson v. McMillian standard of maliciousness.[246]

F. Conclusion

This Chapter described the legal meaning of "assault" and explained your right to be free from physical and sexual assault in prison. There are different sources of law offering you protection against guard and prisoner assault, and different ways to obtain redress for rights violations. Remember to complete administrative grievance processes before filing suit. Otherwise, courts might not allow you to proceed.

---

241. See Chapter 5 of the JLM, "Choosing a Court & Lawsuit: An Overview of the Alternatives" on class actions in general and Part D(1) of Chapter 16 of the JLM, "Using 42 U.S.C. § 1983 and 28 U.S.C. § 1331 to Obtain Relief From Violations of Federal Law," for more detailed information on § 1983 class actions.

242. See Fed. R. Civ. P. 23.

243. See, e.g., Tardiff v. Knox County, 365 F.3d 1, 7 (1st Cir. 2004) (holding that class action status probably is the only feasible means for arrestees to pursue strip search claims); Amchem Prods., Inc., v. Windsor, 521 U.S. 591, 617, 117 S. Ct. 2231, 2246, 138 L. Ed. 2d 689, 709 (1997) (noting that the policy underlying class actions is to make it possible for individuals with small claims to aggregate those claims in order to vindicate their rights).

244. See, e.g., Ingles v. Toro, 438 F. Supp. 2d 203, 208–09 (S.D.N.Y. 2006) (approving settlement of a class action over excessive use of force by New York City prison guards; the city agreed to pay injured prisoners $2.2 million and revise its use-of-force directive and investigatory procedures, install new video cameras to watch guards and prisoners, and train guards in appropriate defensive techniques); Madrid v. Gomez, 889 F. Supp. 1146, 1254–60 (N.D. Cal. 1995) (granting injunction in class action on behalf of all prisoners at Pelican Bay State Prison where pattern of unnecessary and wanton infliction of pain and constitutionally inadequate provision of medical and mental health care was shown as cruel and unusual conditions of confinement as to mentally ill prisoners in a security housing unit); see also Mark Mooney, Inmates Win 1.5M in Rikers Abuse Settlement, Daily News, Feb. 14, 1996, at 12 (discussing a class action suit by 15 prisoners that involved allegations of abuse by corrections officers and that was settled by New York City for $1.5 million).

245. Madrid v. Gomez, 889 F. Supp. 1146, 1249 (N.D. Cal. 1995).

246. Madrid v. Gomez, 889 F. Supp. 1146, 1250 (N.D. Cal. 1995).

A JAILHOUSE LAWYER'S MANUAL

Chapter 25: Your Right To Be Free From Illegal Body Searches

Columbia Human Rights Law Review

Ninth Edition 2011

Legal Disclaimer

A Jailhouse Lawyer's Manual is written and updated by members of the Columbia Human Rights Law Review. The law prohibits us from providing any legal advice to prisoners. This information is not intended as legal advice or representation nor should you consider or rely upon it as such. Neither the JLM nor any information contained herein is intended to or shall constitute a contract between the JLM and any reader, and the JLM does not guarantee the accuracy of the information contained herein. Additionally, your use of the JLM should not be construed as creating an attorney-client relationship with the JLM staff or anyone at Columbia Law School. Finally, while we have attempted to provide information that is up-to-date and useful, because the law changes frequently, we cannot guarantee that all information is current.

CHAPTER 25

YOUR RIGHT TO BE FREE FROM ILLEGAL BODY SEARCHES*

A. Introduction

This Chapter explains your right to be free from involuntary exposure and illegal body searches. This Part, Part A, is the Introduction. Part B explains your rights regarding involuntary cross-gender exposure (when persons of the opposite sex see your body against your wishes) and your privacy rights about your body, in particular the rights of women prisoners. Part C focuses on body searches for both men and women. Finally, Part D explains what you can do and what legal remedies you can use to protect your rights.

This Chapter explains your rights using both federal constitutional law (from the U.S. Constitution) and New York State laws. For all searches, including body cavity searches, courts generally use the Fourth Amendment, which protects you against unreasonable searches.[1] Remember that rules from the U.S. Supreme Court apply to the whole country. If you are in a prison outside of New York, you should research the laws in your state. You should try to use the laws and court decisions of the federal circuit you are in. Reading Chapter 2 of the JLM, "Introduction to Legal Research," before you read this Chapter (or any other chapter of the JLM) is a good idea because it will help you understand how to research the law and understand which laws apply to you.

If you think your rights are being violated, you should first try to protect your rights through your institution's administrative grievance procedures.[2] You must go through the prison grievance process to protect your right to sue in federal court under the Prison Litigation Reform Act ("PLRA"). Read Chapter 14 of the JLM on the PLRA to know what to do—otherwise you might lose your right to sue (and possibly your good-time credit also).

If the grievance system does not help you, or if it does not help you enough, you can then file a lawsuit. Prisoners who challenge illegal body searches and involuntary exposure usually file claims under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 ("Section 1983"),[3] through a Bivens action in state or federal court, or through an Article 78[4] petition in state court (if in New York). Other chapters of the JLM have more information on these claims, including Chapter 5, "Choosing a Court and a Lawsuit," Chapter 16, "Using 42 U.S.C. § 1983 and 28 U.S.C. § 1331 to Obtain Relief From Violations of Federal Law," and Chapter 22, "How to Challenge Administrative Decisions Using Article 78 of the New York Civil Practice Law and Rules." If you want to learn more about your rights against assaults in prison, see Chapter 24 of the JLM, "Your Right to Be Free From Assault."

If you bring a civil suit, it is important to know that the court recognizes only physical abuse, not emotional damage. According to Section 803(d) of the PLRA, "no Federal civil action may be brought by a prisoner confined in a jail, prison or other correctional facility, for mental or emotional injury suffered while

---

* This Chapter was written by Anya Emerson based on previous versions by Sara Manaugh, Jennifer Parkinson, Hannah Breshin Otero, Aric Wu, Sara Pikofsky, and Tami Parker. Special thanks to John Boston of The Legal Aid Society, Prisoners' Rights Project for his valuable comments.

1. The 4th Amendment states that "[t]he right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated." U.S. Const. amend. IV.

2. See JLM, Chapter 15, "Inmate Grievance Procedures," for more information on prisoner grievance procedures.

3. Remember that "§" is the symbol for "section." For example, § 1983 means "Section 1983." Therefore, "§ 1983" refers to a specific section, section 1983, of a law (here the United States Code).

4. An Article 78 petition refers to a petition under Article 78 of the New York Civil Practice Law & Rules. You cannot use Article 78 to seek damages. You can only use an Article 78 petition to go to court to challenge decisions made by New York State administrative bodies or officers, like the Department of Correctional Services or prison employees, and only if you think the decision was illegal, arbitrary or grossly unfair. For instance, a prisoner might file an Article 78 petition to request judicial review of a prison disciplinary determination resulting from what the prisoner believes to have been an illegal search. See, e.g., Ocean v. Selsky, 252 A.D.2d 984, 985, 676 N.Y.S.2d 380, 381 (4th Dept. 1998) (challenging prison director's actions in violating the rules for a "pat frisk" using Article 78); see also Young v. Coombe, 227 A.D.2d 799, 800, 642 N.Y.S.2d 443, 444 (3d Dept. 1996) (seeking judicial review of Commissioner's determination that prisoner was in violation of prison disciplinary rules by, among other things, not complying with a frisk); Medina v. Portuondo, 298 A.D.2d 733, 734, 749 N.Y.S.2d 291, 293 (3d Dept. 2002) (challenging determination that prisoner violated prison rules by possessing contraband and controlled substances). See Part C(4) of Chapter 5 of the JLM, "Choosing a Court and a Lawsuit," and Chapter 22 of the JLM, "How to Challenge Administrative Decisions Using Article 78 of the New York Civil Practice Law and Rules," for more about Article 78 proceedings.

in custody without a prior showing of physical injury."[5] See Chapter 14 of the JLM for more information on the PLRA.

Also, because prison officers are government actors, they can use the defense of "qualified immunity"[6] when sued in a Section 1983 action. This means that even if you can prove you were illegally searched, the officials may not be liable because of their qualified immunity defense.[7] For a detailed discussion of qualified immunity and Section 1983, see Part (C)(3) (Qualified Immunity) and Part B (Section 1983) of Chapter 16 of the JLM, "Using 42 U.S.C. § 1983 and 28 U.S.C. § 1331 to Obtain Relief From Violations of Federal Law."

B. Involuntary Exposure

This Part discusses your privacy rights regarding your naked body.[8] "Involuntary exposure" is when your naked, or partly naked, body is seen by guards of the opposite sex, such as when you are using showers or toilets. In Turner v. Safley, the Supreme Court stated that although prisoners have diminished liberty interests, prison regulations that restrict the rights of prisoners must be reasonably related to legitimate penological (prison-related) interests.[9] Thus, your privacy rights can be limited if the prison gives a reason that is reasonably related to a legitimate prison policy.

It is hard to challenge involuntary exposure situations because prisons must obey federal employment discrimination laws that require male and female employees to be treated the same. Prohibiting guards from viewing nude prisoners of the opposite sex may violate laws requiring equal employment opportunities, because whether the guard is a man or a woman would then become a factor in employment decisions.[10] Most courts have held that prison policies allowing cross-sex viewing of nude prisoners do not violate prisoners' rights.[11] The Ninth Circuit in Oliver v. Scott held that a male prisoner's Fourth and Fourteenth

---

5. Prison Litigation Reform Act of 1995 (PLRA), Pub. L. No. 104-134, §§ 801–10, 110 Stat. 1321 (1996) (codified as 18 U.S.C. § 3626 and 28 U.S.C. § 1932).

6. "Qualified immunity" is defined as "[i]mmunity from civil liability for a public official who is performing a discretionary function, as long as the conduct does not violate clearly established constitutional or statutory rights." Black's Law Dictionary 766 (8th ed. 2004).

7. See, e.g., Way v. County of Ventura, 445 F.3d 1157, 1163 (9th Cir. 2006), cert. denied, 549 U.S. 1052, 127 S. Ct. 665, 166 L. Ed. 2d 513 (2006) (holding strip search of arrestee unconstitutional but finding in favor of the County because of the officers' qualified immunity); Lay v. Porker, 371 F. Supp. 2d 1159, 1167 (C.D. Cal. 2004) (holding that a body cavity search of naked male prisoner in the presence of a female officer did violate the prisoner's constitutional rights, but granting summary judgment to the prison because of the prison official's qualified immunity). But see Edgerly v. City and County of San Francisco, 495 F.3d 645, 657 (9th Cir. 2007) (finding that qualified immunity did not protect officers who conducted a post-booking strip search without reasonable suspicion).

8. For other privacy rights, see Chapter 19 of the JLM, "Your Right to Communicate with the Outside World" (monitoring of telephone calls, inspection of mail), and Chapter 26 of the JLM, "Infectious Diseases: AIDS, Hepatitis, and Tuberculosis in Prison," on the right to privacy regarding health status.

9. Turner v. Safley, 482 U.S. 78, 87, 107 S. Ct. 2254, 2261, 96 L. Ed. 2d 64, 78 (1987). This rule has been superseded by § 3 of the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA), which adds that the government's policy must be the least restrictive means of achieving its compelling interest. "No government shall impose a substantial burden on the religious exercise of a person residing in or confined to an institution … unless the government demonstrates that imposition of the burden on that person—(1) is in furtherance of a compelling governmental interest; and (2) is the least restrictive means of furthering that compelling governmental interest." 42 U.S.C.A. § 2000cc-1 (2000). See Warsoldier v. Woodford, 418 F.3d 989, 994 (9th Cir. 2005) (finding a prison regulation prohibiting male prisoners from having hair longer than three inches to be a substantial burden on prisoners' exercise of religion and in violation of RLUIPA); Washington v. Klem, 497 F.3d 272, 282–83 (3d Cir. 2007) (finding that a prison policy limiting a prisoner to keeping 10 books in his cell did burden his religious exercise, did not further a compelling state interest, and was not the least restrictive means for achieving safety and health interests).

10. See Csizmadia v. Fauver, 746 F. Supp. 483, 491 (D.N.J. 1990) (discussing the tension between prisoners' constitutional privacy rights and guards' equal employment rights). But see Tharp v. Iowa Dept. of Corr., 68 F.3d 223, 225 (8th Cir. 1995) (finding that assignment of female guards to female prison units did not violate equal employment rights and could been viewed as serving a positive interest for the prison as long as guards were not being denied opportunities for promotion or being discriminated against by these assignments).

11. See, e.g., Grummett v. Rushen, 779 F.2d 491, 496 (9th Cir. 1985) (rejecting prisoner's claim challenging assignment of female officers to male housing units); Smith v. Chrans, 629 F. Supp. 606, 611 (C.D. Ill. 1986) (dismissing case when prisoner alleged nothing more than occasional and inadvertent sightings by female prison employees of prisoners in cells or open shower or toilet facilities engaged in basic bodily functions); Mills v. City of Barbourville, 389 F.3d 568, 579 (6th Cir. 2004) (finding no 4th Amendment violation where male employee accidentally saw female plaintiff's bare chest while female jailers were searching her upon entry to prison). But see Morris v. Newland, No. CIV S-00-2794 GEB GGH P, 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 15725, at *17 (E.D. Cal. Mar. 6, 2007) (unpublished) (dismissing claim

Amendment rights were not violated after female prison guards strip searched the prisoner and observed him showering and using the bathroom.[12] Also, the Eighth Circuit in Timm v. Gunter held that allowing female guards, like male guards, to pat search male prisoners was a reasonable regulation and did not violate any privacy interests of the prisoners.[13]

But you can expect to have some privacy rights with respect to your naked body. Courts generally do not like prison policies requiring prisoners to be routinely searched or seen by guards of the opposite sex.[14] Courts have held that prisons may accommodate prisoners' privacy interests when such actions are reasonable and do not affect penological interests. But courts have not been clear about which specific prison actions violate your privacy rights.[15] The court in Hudson v. Goodlander held that a prisoner's privacy rights were violated by assigning female guards to posts where they could view a male prisoner while he was completely unclothed.[16] The court stated that voluntary restrictions on employment of female correction officers should adequately protect prisoner privacy and could be removed during times of emergency.[17]

Courts have used several methods to balance prisoners' privacy rights and correction officers' right to be free from sex discrimination in employment. One method is to allow guards of the opposite sex only quick and random views of unclothed prisoners. For example, the court in Johnson v. Pennsylvania Bureau of Corrections held that a prison's security interests were reasonable when it assigned female officers to various positions throughout the jail since the actual viewings were too limited to amount to a violation of that prisoner's 4th Amendment rights were violated by three prison guards watching him shower, but declining to dismiss the prisoner's retaliation claim that the guards had "repeatedly ogled him in retaliation for his having filed inmate grievances regarding female guards being allowed to watch him showering or otherwise undressed"); Cerniglia v. County of Sacramento, No. 2:99-cv-01938-JKS-DAD, 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 32346, at *48 (E.D. Cal. Apr. 18, 2008) (unpublished) (finding no violation of a prisoner's right to privacy where prisoner was strip searched in a dayroom where anyone could have seen him, but there was no evidence that anyone actually did).

---

12. Oliver v. Scott, 276 F.3d 736, 746 (5th Cir. 2002); see also Johnson v. Phelan, 69 F.3d 144, 147 (7th Cir. 1995) (noting that limiting the prison guards that could monitor prisoners in the shower or toilets to a specific gender or sexual orientation would be inefficient staff deployment and therefore is not required).

13. Timm v. Gunter, 917 F.2d 1093, 1100 (8th Cir. 1990) ("We are persuaded that allowing such searches on the same basis as same-sex pat searches is a reasonable regulation as applied at [the prison], and thus is not a constitutional violation.").

14. See Mills v. City of Barbourville, 389 F.3d 568, 579 (6th Cir. 2004) ("As to jail employees of the opposite gender viewing prison inmates or detainees, we have recognized that a prison policy forcing prisoners to be searched by members of the opposite sex or to be exposed to regular surveillance by officers of the opposite sex while naked—for example while in the shower or using a toilet in a cell—would provide the basis of a claim on which relief could be granted."); Fortner v. Thomas, 983 F.2d 1024, 1030 (11th Cir. 1993) (recognizing prisoners' right to bodily privacy "because most people have 'a special sense of privacy in their genitals, and involuntary exposure of them in the presence of people of the other sex may be especially demeaning and humiliating'" (quoting Lee v. Downs, 641 F.2d 1117, 1119 (4th Cir. 1981))); Sepulveda v. Ramirez, 967 F.2d 1413, 1415–16 (9th Cir. 1992) (noting that the right to bodily privacy was extended to prisoners in 1985 in the Ninth Circuit and to parolees in 1988); Kent v. Johnson, 821 F.2d 1220, 1226 (6th Cir. 1987) (recognizing that a prisoner has a constitutional claim when the prison fails to reasonably accommodate the interests of prisoners and female employees).

15. See Ashann-Ra v. Comm. of Va., 112 F. Supp. 2d 559, 565 (W.D. Va. 2000) (recognizing that routinely or regularly exposing an unclothed prisoner to female guards may constitute a constitutional violation, but noting an evidentiary hearing may be required to make the determination on particular encounters between female officers and naked male prisoners); Oliver v. Scott, 276 F.3d 736, 744–46 (5th Cir. 2002) (upholding under the Turner reasonable relationship standard a policy "permitting all guards to monitor all inmates at all times" because it "increases the overall level of surveillance" and finding that bathrooms and showers can be the site of violence); Hill v. McKinley, 311 F.3d 899, 903–05 (8th Cir. 2002) (holding both male and female staff could participate in transfer of unruly naked female prisoner, since not enough female guards were available; however, leaving the prisoner exposed on a restraint board in male officers' presence violated the 4th Amendment); Somers v. Thurman, 109 F.3d 614, 617–23 (9th Cir. 1997) (finding no clearly established 4th Amendment protection against cross-gender strip searches, and dismissing 8th Amendment claim that female officers subjected male plaintiff to visual body cavity searches, watched him shower, pointed at him, and made jokes about him).

16. Hudson v. Goodlander, 494 F. Supp. 890, 891–95 (D. Md. 1980); see also Fortner v. Thomas, 983 F.2d 1024, 1029–30 (11th Cir. 1993) (holding that male prisoners suing to prevent female guards from coming into living quarters where they were exposed may be entitled to injunctive relief in light of court's recognition of limited constitutional right to bodily privacy); Arey v. Robinson, No. Y-90-3009, 1992 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 21810, at *32 (D. Md. 1992) (unpublished) (finding the design and operation of bathroom facilities violated the prisoner's privacy rights), aff'd, 819 F.Supp. 478, 479 (D. Md. 1992).

17. Hudson v. Goodlander, 494 F. Supp. 890, 893–94 (D. Md. 1980).

prisoners' constitutional rights.[18] Other methods approved by the courts include allowing female prisoners to cover the windows of their cells for short periods of time,[19] allowing prisoners to cover their genitals with a towel when guards are present in the restrooms,[20] and providing pajamas for sleeping.[21] Some courts have even held that prisons should change the design of bathroom facilities to protect a prisoner's privacy rights.[22]

C. Body Searches

This Part discusses when and how prison officials are allowed to search your body. Part C(1) introduces the names which courts use for different types of body searches. Part C(2) explains the Fourth Amendment protections against illegal searches for convicted prisoners. Part C(3) explains how the Eighth Amendment also limits certain body searches. Part C(4) talks about privacy rights and DNA testing. Part C(5) describes your privacy rights under state statutes, especially New York law. Part C(6) explains how each prison's own rules can also protect you from illegal searches. Part C(7) explains why, in general, it is better for prisoners not to resist being searched, even if you believe the search is illegal.

Note that both arrestees and pretrial detainees have more constitutional protections against body searches than convicted prisoners. When you research your case, don't confuse the reasonableness standard for searches of arrestees/pretrial detainees with the reasonableness standard for convicted prisoners.[23]

1. Types of Body Searches

Remembering that most searches of prisoners are legal is important. Prison officials may legally touch you for security reasons, such as when performing a valid search.[24] But, courts have recognized that sometimes prison officials use searches, especially strip searches and body cavity searches, just to harass or abuse prisoners, and this is not legal. (For more on harassment, see Part B(3) of Chapter 24 of the JLM, "Your Right to Be Free From Assault.") The courts, and the Supreme Court, have created some standards to accommodate the needs of both prisons and prisoners.[25] This Section explains five types of searches:

(1) pat frisk search—a search where a prison guard searches your body and clothes while you are still dressed (but you will usually have to remove your hat, shoes, and coat);
(2) strip search—a search where you remove all of your clothing, and the prison official searches your clothes after you take them off (the prison guard does not touch you or search your body cavities);
(3) strip frisk search—a search where the official searches your clothes after you have taken them off and also looks at (but does not touch) your body cavities (all prisoners must bend over to have their anal cavities searched; women must also squat so that the guards can look into their vaginal cavity);
(4) body cavity search—a search that includes contact with any or all of your body cavities; these searches should be performed by trained medical personnel only; and
(5) cross-gender body search—any search performed by someone of the opposite sex.

---

18. Johnson v. Pa. Bureau of Corr., 661 F. Supp. 425, 432–34 (W.D. Pa. 1987).

19. See Torres v. Wis. Dept. of Health & Social Servs., 859 F.2d 1523, 1524 (7th Cir. 1988) (en banc) (permitting female prisoners at women's maximum security prison to cover windows in the doors of their rooms with privacy cards for up to 10 minutes between hours of 6 a.m. and 9 p.m. while they are dressing or using the toilet).

20. Timm v. Gunter, 917 F.2d 1093, 1102 (8th Cir. 1990).

21. Forts v. Ward, 621 F.2d 1210, 1217 (2nd Cir. 1980).

22. Arey v. Robinson, 819 F. Supp. 478 (D. Md. 1992).

23. Weber v. Dell, 804 F.2d 796, 802 (2d Cir. 1986) (holding strip/body cavity search unconstitutional where authorities had no reasonable suspicion arrestee was concealing contraband); Willis v. Artuz, 301 F.3d 65, 69 (2d Cir. 2002) (holding that law enforcement-related searches of pretrial detainees' cells are subject to the 4th Amendment, but searches of convicted prisoners' rooms are not, because "a convicted prisoner's loss of privacy rights can be justified on grounds other than institutional security," such as retribution).

24. Prison officials are allowed to use bodily force to maintain control and security within the prison as long as their actions relate to some penological need, meaning the action helps them manage and maintain control of the prison. See, e.g., N.Y. Correct. Law § 137(5) (McKinney 2006) ("When any inmate … shall offer violence to any person, or do or attempt to do any injury to property, or attempt to escape, or resist or disobey any lawful direction, the officers and employees shall use all suitable means to defend themselves, to maintain order, to enforce observation of discipline, to secure the persons of the offenders and to prevent any such attempt or escape."); See also Turner v. Huibregtse, 421 F. Supp. 2d 1149, 1152 (W.D. Wis. 2006) (finding inappropriate grabbing and fondling of the prisoner in a harassing manner rather than the touching requisite to a search may violate the prisoner's constitutional rights).

25. See generally Hudson v. Palmer, 468 U.S. 517, 526–27, 104 S. Ct. 3194, 3200–01, 82 L. Ed. 2d 393, 403–04 (1984) (establishing such standards); Bell v. Wolfish, 441 U.S. 520, 530, 99 S. Ct. 1861, 1869, 60 L. Ed. 2d 447, 462 (1979) (same).

2. Fourth Amendment Protections

Prisoners usually use the Fourth Amendment, which forbids "unreasonable searches and seizures,"[26] to challenge body searches. Prisoners have some, but very limited, privacy rights to their bodies under the Fourth Amendment.[27]

This Section first tells you when courts do allow body searches under the Fourth Amendment. Next, Part C(1)(a) explains the Fourth Amendment's "reasonableness standard," which courts use to decide if a search was lawful. Part C(1)(b) discusses strip search cases, Part C(1)(c) discusses strip frisks, and Part C(1)(d) covers body cavity searches. Finally, Part C(1)(e) explains your limited right not to be searched by someone of the opposite sex (cross-gender body searches).

(a) Reasonableness Standard for Searches of Prisoners

The lawfulness of a body search depends on whether a prison guard acts reasonably in conducting the search. In Bell v. Wolfish, the Supreme Court said that body searches are constitutional, but only if performed in a "reasonable manner."[28] Guards must act reasonably when searching prisoners because searches invade prisoners' privacy and can easily become abusive.[29] In other words, courts balance the state's need for the search against how much the prisoner's privacy is invaded.

The courts do not have a rule for what is reasonable in body searches. Instead, they have decided that some practices are unreasonable. To decide if a search is unreasonable (or reasonable) and unnecessarily invasive of prisoners' privacy, Bell v. Wolfish requires courts to look at: (1) how the search is performed; (2) the reason for the search; and (3) the place of the search.[30]

Different courts make different decisions using this test, depending on how reasonable a court finds the prison officials' explanation for the search and the conduct during the search. Note that courts will generally believe prison officials when they claim that they needed to search a prisoner for security reasons. Courts usually do not want to second-guess prison safety policies used to maintain prison control.[31] While courts

---

26. U.S. Const. amend. IV. But remember that the 4th Amendment does not protect you from searches and seizures of your prison cell, because the Supreme Court has said that prisoners have no legitimate expectation of privacy in their prison cells. See Block v. Rutherford, 468 U.S. 576, 591, 104 S. Ct. 3227, 3235, 82 L. Ed. 2d 438, 450 (1984) (holding searches of pretrial detainees' cells were not unconstitutional, because they served the important government purpose of maintaining security in the jail); Hudson v. Palmer, 468 U.S. 517, 526, 104 S. Ct. 3194, 3200, 82 L. Ed. 2d 393, 402–03 (1984) (holding that the 4th Amendment prohibition against unreasonable searches does not apply to prison cells because "[t]he recognition of privacy rights for prisoners in their individual cells simply cannot be reconciled with the concept of incarceration and the needs and objectives of penal institutions."); Willis v. Artuz, 301 F.3d 65, 68–69 (2d Cir. 2002) (holding that prisoners are not protected from cell searches by prosecutors or police even though such searches are not related to prison security). But see United States v. DeFonte, 441 F.3d 92, 94 (2d Cir. 2006) (finding that attorney-client privilege extends to documents kept in an inmate's cell, even though there is no reasonable expectation of privacy in them for 4th Amendment purposes).

27. Nicholas v. Goord, 430 F.3d 652, 658 (2d Cir. 2005), cert. denied, 549 U.S. 953, 127 S. Ct. 384, 166 L. Ed. 2d 270 (2006) ("[P]risoners retain a right to bodily privacy, even if that right is limited by institutional and security concerns."), overruled on other grounds by United States v. Amerson, 483 F.3d 73 (2d Cir. 2007); Fortner v. Thomas, 983 F.2d 1024, 1030 (11th Cir. 1993) ("We are persuaded to join other circuits in recognizing a prisoner's constitutional right to bodily privacy because most people have 'a special sense of privacy in their genitals, and involuntary exposure of them in the presence of people of the other sex may be especially demeaning and humiliating.'"); Peckham v. Wis. Dept. of Corr., 141 F.3d 694, 696 (7th Cir. 1998) (stating some loss of privacy is of course to be expected in prison, however "those convicted of criminal offenses do not surrender all of their constitutional rights"); Samson v. California, 547 U.S. 843, 856, 126 S. Ct. 2193, 2202, 165 L. Ed. 2d 250, 262 (2006) (holding that while suspicionless searches are not precluded, the prisoner's limited privacy right is protected by "California's prohibition on 'arbitrary, capricious or harassing' searches").

28. Bell v. Wolfish, 441 U.S. 520, 560, 99 S. Ct. 1861, 1885, 60 L. Ed. 2d 447, 482 (1979).

29. Bell v. Wolfish, 441 U.S. 520, 559–60, 99 S. Ct. 1861, 1884–86, 60 L. Ed. 2d 447, 481–83 (1979).

30. Bell v. Wolfish, 441 U.S. 520, 559, 99 S. Ct. 1861, 1884–85, 60 L. Ed. 2d 447, 481–82 (1979).

31. See Elliot v. Lynn, 38 F.3d 188, 191–92 (5th Cir. 1994) (deferring to the prison's claim that a state of emergency existed that necessitated the deprivation of privacy where prison officials conducted a massive prison shakedown after an increase in murders and violence, and the strip searches were conducted in front of other prisoners and several non-prison staff persons); Whitman v. Nesic, 368 F.3d 931, 934–35 (7th Cir. 2004) (deferring to prison's claim of security justifications for requiring prisoners to be strip-searched before giving urine samples in a random drug testing program, because "[p]rison officials must be accorded wide ranging deference in matters of internal order and security").

will not allow prison officials to do anything they wish (courts can and have struck down unreasonable policies), a prison official can typically prove the need for a search policy easily.

In general, searches should not be performed abusively[32] or conducted in an unnecessarily public manner.[33] Who conducts the search can be important—for example, courts like trained medical personnel to perform body cavity searches. Where the search is performed is also a factor—for example, prison officials should not perform strip searches in public without a good reason.[34] Which prisoners are being searched is considered critical—courts allow more intrusive searches of maximum security prisoners[35] or "troublemaker" prisoners, such as those previously caught with contraband.[36]

The New York State Department of Correctional Services ("DOCS") uses this reasonableness standard in its guidelines that describe when pat frisks are acceptable. According to Directive 4910, a pat frisk is justified if an official has "an articulable basis to suspect that an inmate may be in possession of contraband."[37] This directive replaced the old standard, which required "reasonable suspicion that an inmate is in possession of contraband." The new language—"articulable basis"—allows prison officials even greater discretion when determining if a pat frisk is necessary. As long as a prison official can give a reason (and it may not have to be a good reason) to suspect that you may be carrying contraband, he can pat frisk you. An official will also pat frisk you before you speak with Department officials or enter the visiting room.[38]

(b) Strip Search

In a strip search, you take off your clothes and a prison official searches them and inspects your naked body. In a strip search, the official does not touch you or search your body cavities. At least one circuit court has held that a strip search does not have to be "deliberate," meaning that it doesn't matter if the officer intended to see your naked body, as long as the officer did see your naked body.[39] Courts generally allow strip searches if prison officials have a reasonable security interest to justify the search.[40] Strip searches

---

32. Calhoun v. DeTella, 319 F.3d 936, 940 (7th Cir. 2003) (holding that conducting strip searches while opposite-sex staff were invited to watch, accompanied by sexual harassment and taunting, would be "designed to demean and humiliate" and would thus state an 8th Amendment claim). But see Somers v. Thurman, No. 96-55534, 1997 U.S. App. LEXIS 12272, at *31 (9th Cir. 1997) (unpublished) ("To hold that gawking, pointing, and joking violates the prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment would trivialize the objective component of the 8th Amendment test and render it absurd.").

33. Farmer v. Perrill, 288 F.3d 1254, 1260–61 (10th Cir. 2002) (holding that government must provide justification for doing the visual strip searches in public).

34. Farmer v. Perrill, 288 F.3d 1254, 1260–61 (10th Cir. 2002) (affirming denial of summary judgment as to a challenge to visual strip searches en route to the recreation yard conducted in view of other prisoners, and holding that government must provide justification for doing the visual strip searches in public); see Smith v. Taylor, 149 F. App'x 12, 14 (2d Cir. 2005) (holding that the presence of more officers at a strip search than prison rules authorized suggested a privacy violation not necessary to serve penological interests).

35. Arruda v. Fair, 710 F.2d 886, 886–88 (1st Cir. 1983) (upholding the practice of subjecting prisoners to body cavity searches upon non-contact visitations, visits to the infirmary and library, and upon leaving cells, finding the practice reasonable given prison officials' need to find smuggled contraband among segregated prisoners in maximum-security prison); Savard v. Rhode Island, 338 F.3d 23, 30–31 (1st Cir. 2003) (holding that maximum-security prison's policy authorizing blanket strip and body cavity searches did not violate prisoner's 4th Amendment rights, because the general interest of internal security in such a prison is compelling); Rickman v. Avaniti, 854 F.2d 327, 328 (9th Cir. 1988) (holding that policy of performing visual strip and body cavity searches on prisoners in administrative segregation unit whenever these prisoners left their cells was constitutional in light of security interests).

36. See Brown v. Hilton, 492 F. Supp. 771, 776–77 (D.N.J. 1980) (holding visual anal inspections of prisoners entering a segregated unit were proper for prisoner who was accomplice of two other prisoners caught with contraband).

37. State of New York, Department of Correctional Services, Directive No. 4910, Control of and Search for Contraband, at 2 (2001) (as revised Dec. 11, 2006).

38. State of New York, Department of Correctional Services, Directive No. 4910, Control of and Search for Contraband, at 2 (2001) (as revised Dec. 11, 2006).

39. Wood v. Hancock County Sheriff's Dept., 354 F.3d 57, 63–65 (1st Cir. 2003) (defining strip searches to be "exposing one's naked body to official scrutiny," and holding that "[t]he critical question is whether viewing the naked body was an objective of the search, rather than an unavoidable and incidental by-product," and finding a strip search does not necessarily involve inspection of prisoner's mouth or underarms). But see Stanley v. Henson, 337 F.3d 961, 963–64 (7th Cir. 2003) (finding observed clothing exchange in which prisoner was never fully naked was not a "strip search," because it was an administrative procedure with the purpose of ensuring that contraband was not brought into the jail).

40. See Peckham v. Wis. Dept. of Corr., 141 F.3d 694, 695–97 (7th Cir. 1998) (finding strip searches that were for legitimate, identifiable purposes and not for punishment or harassment purposes did not violate prisoner's rights); Thompson v. Souza, 111 F.3d 694, 700 (9th Cir. 1997) (upholding visual strip searches to search for drugs, even though designed only to harass prisoners, and not justified by any legitimate security concerns, may violate the Fourth or the Eighth Amendment.[41]

Courts vary on how they have interpreted the Fourth Amendment's reasonableness standard for strip searches. In Arruda v. Fair, the First Circuit held that a policy requiring strip searches of maximum security prisoners when entering or leaving the unit to go to the library or infirmary and after meeting visitors, was reasonable, even though a guard accompanied prisoners to the infirmary and there was a wire screen in the visiting area because particularly dangerous criminals were involved.[42] Courts also look at the place of the search and the conditions of the search to see if the prisoner's privacy rights were violated.[43] In Cornwell v. Dahlberg, the Sixth Circuit held that a male prisoner who was strip searched outdoors after a prison uprising in front of several female correction officers, raised a valid Fourth Amendment claim, because the search could have occurred in a more private place.[44] In Hodges v. Stanley, a prisoner complained that a strip search, and an accompanying physical attack prior to his placement in administrative detention, was unconstitutional.[45] Hodges alleged that he had been searched twice in a row, and he questioned the need for a second search. The Second Circuit said that the first search, a mandatory procedure when prisoners were put in administrative detention, was proper. The court found that Hodges stated a constitutional claim because the second search was unnecessary.[46]

(c) Strip Frisk

"Strip frisk" means a visual search of a prisoner's clothes and body, including body cavities.[47] For a male, this involves one or more of the following procedures:

(1) Opening his mouth and moving his tongue up and down and from side to side;
(2) Removing any dentures;
(3) Running his hands through his hair;
(4) Allowing his ears to be visually examined;
(5) Lifting his arms to expose his armpits;
(6) Bending over and/or spreading his buttocks to expose his anus to the frisking officer; or
(7) Spreading his testicles to expose the area behind his testicles.

---

this was not an "intended" purpose contained in a written plan); Bruscino v. Carlson, 854 F.2d 162, 165 (7th Cir. 1988) (upholding rectal searches in maximum security federal prison and noting the extreme violence and amount of contraband typically found in such searches); Goff v. Nix, 803 F.2d 358, 366–71 (8th Cir. 1986) (upholding visual body cavity searches on prisoners before and after trips to hospital, visits to prison infirmary, other such contacts with people outside the prison, and exercise period for prisoners in segregation; noting the high level of deference accorded to prison administrators' decisions about such searches); Roberts v. Rhode Island, 239 F.3d 107, 112 (1st Cir. 2001) (noting that prisons have discretion to base searches on the type of crime for which a prisoner is convicted, such as justifying a search on the fact that the prisoner was charged with a violent felony); Brown v. Blaine, 185 F. App'x 166, 169 (3d Cir. 2006) (finding visual strip searches appropriate when conducted under institutional policy that mandated strip searches upon reentry to the restricted housing unit).

41. Harris v. Ostrout, 65 F.3d 912, 916 (11th Cir. 1995) (stating that if strip searches "are devoid of penological merit and imposed simply to inflict pain, the federal courts should intervene," and that strip searches may not be used to retaliate against 1st Amendment-protected activity); Peckham v. Wis. Dept. of Corr., 141 F.3d 694, 697 (7th Cir. 1998) (stating that the 8th Amendment protects prisoners from unconstitutional strip searches). See also Whitman v. Nesic, 368 F.3d 931, 934 (7th Cir. 2004) (noting that a search must be "calculated harassment unrelated to prison needs" in order to be unconstitutional (citing Meriwether v. Faulkner, 821 F.2d 408, 418 (7th Cir. 1987))).

42. Arruda v. Fair, 710 F.2d 886, 886–88 (1st Cir. 1983).

43. See, e.g., Evans v. Stephens, 407 F.3d 1272, 1281 (11th Cir. 2005) (en banc) (holding that searches conducted with little respect for arrestees' privacy, without sanitary precautions, and that included threatening and racist language were unreasonable searches). But see Franklin v. Lockhart, 883 F.2d 654, 656 (8th Cir. 1989) (noting that a search conducted in front of other detainees may not be an unreasonable violation of detainee's privacy if there are security concerns that outweigh the intrusiveness of the searches).

44. Cornwell v. Dahlberg, 963 F.2d 912, 916–17 (6th Cir. 1992).

45. Hodges v. Stanley, 712 F.2d 34, 35 (2d Cir. 1983).

46. Hodges v. Stanley, 712 F.2d 34, 35–36 (2d Cir. 1983). See also Iqbal v. Hasty, 490 F.3d 143, 172 (2d Cir. 2007) (finding that detainee stated a 4th Amendment claim when he alleged that he was subjected to multiple consecutive strip searches and repeated strip and body cavity searches that might be understood to be punishment and not related to legitimate government purposes).

47. Prison officials only look at your body cavities in a strip frisk search. If officials touch any body cavity, they are conducting a body cavity search.

For females the procedures are the same, except females must squat to show the vagina.[48] It is important to remember courts sometimes use the terms "strip frisk search" and "body cavity search" to mean the same thing, so when a court refers to a "visual body cavity search," it is referring to a "strip frisk" search.

Because strip frisks invade prisoners' privacy more than strip searches, courts usually require prison officials to have individualized suspicion about the particular prisoner being searched to justify strip frisks or body cavity searches.[49] However, some courts now allow random strip frisk searches. For example, the Second Circuit in Covino v. Patrissi held that routine strip frisk searches were reasonable and should not be limited to searching prisoners after contact visits.[50] Using the reasonableness standard, the court in Covino found that a regulation allowing random visual body cavity searches (which required the prisoner to remove his clothing, lift his genitals, and spread his buttocks for a visual examination) was not unreasonable, because the prisoners were very dangerous and the prison needed to prevent contraband. Therefore, the prison officials' need to conduct these searches was more important than the prisoners' concerns.[51]

When prison officials conduct strip frisk searches to control a dangerous situation, courts usually do not find any constitutional violation.[52] The Eighth Circuit in Franklin v. Lockhart held that a policy requiring visual body cavity searches of prisoners on punitive status, in administrative segregation, or in need of protection was justified by security concerns.[53] The Fifth Circuit in Elliott v. Lynn held that a visual body cavity search of a prisoner in front of other prisoners and non-searching officers was justified as part of a prison-wide shakedown following an increase in murders.[54] The Ninth Circuit in Thompson v. Souza held that a visual strip search of a prisoner's body cavities was reasonably related to the prison's legitimate need to keep drugs out of the prison and therefore did not violate the Fourth Amendment.[55] The court reached this conclusion even though the prisoner was told to run his fingers around his gums after touching his genitalia, the search went beyond prison guidelines and the officials' search plan, and the search happened in front of other prisoners. Courts will therefore probably not find it difficult to hold that a prison's safety concerns override your privacy rights in a strip frisk situation.

(d) Body Cavity Search

A "body cavity search" (or "digital search") is an actual physical examination of the prisoner's anal and/or genital cavities conducted by a professional member of the health services staff. During a digital body cavity search, a guard or prison official places his or her fingers into a prisoner's nose, mouth, anus, and/or vagina. The test for deciding whether digital body cavity searches are reasonable is stricter than the test for any other type of search because body cavity searches are particularly intrusive. The Ninth Circuit has established two requirements which must be satisfied in order for a digital body cavity search to be constitutional under the Fourth Amendment:

(1) There must be a valid penological (prison management) need for the search;[56] and
(2) The search must be "conducted in a reasonable manner," which means the court will look at whether trained staff performed the search in private under hygienic (clean) conditions.[57]

---

48. See Gomez v. Coughlin, 685 F. Supp. 1291, 1299 n.5 (S.D.N.Y. 1988) (defining "strip frisk" search).

49. See, e.g., Vaughan v. Ricketts, 950 F.2d 1464, 1468–69 (9th Cir. 1991) (requiring "reasonable cause" to justify digital rectal searches), overruled on other grounds by Koch v. Ricketts, 68 F.3d 1191 (9th Cir. 1995).

50. Covino v. Patrissi, 967 F.2d 73, 79 n.5 (2d Cir. 1992).

51. Covino v. Patrissi, 967 F.2d 73, 79 (2d Cir. 1992).

52. See, e.g., Goff v. Nix, 803 F.2d 358, 367–68 (8th Cir. 1986) (holding visual body cavity searches by prison officials did not violate the 4th Amendment, and prison administrators' decision to conduct such searches as a condition of any movement outside segregation unit or confines of prison was entitled to deference).

53. Franklin v. Lockhart, 883 F.2d 654, 656 (8th Cir. 1989).

54. Elliot v. Lynn, 38 F.3d 188, 191 (5th Cir. 1994).

55. Thompson v. Souza, 111 F.3d 694, 700–01 (9th Cir. 1997).

56. Tribble v. Gardner, 860 F.2d 321, 325 (9th Cir. 1988) (holding that if rectal searches were conducted whenever prisoner is moved into secure housing unit within maximum security prison and for purposes unrelated to security considerations, searches would violate the 4th Amendment); see also Turner v. Safley, 482 U.S. 78, 107 S. Ct. 2254, 96 L. Ed. 2d 64 (1987) (holding that legislation that impinges on prisoners' constitutional rights must be reasonably related to a legitimate penological interest).

57. Vaughan v. Ricketts, 859 F.2d 736, 739–40 (9th Cir. 1988) (holding rectal searches in open hall on an unsanitary table were unreasonable), overruled on other grounds by Koch v. Ricketts, 68 F.3d 1191 (9th Cir. 1995).

The Seventh Circuit in Bruscino v. Carlson held that a policy requiring rectal searches of prisoners returning to cells was reasonable because guards found a lot of contraband, including knives and hacksaw blades, from the searches.[58] Furthermore, prison violence had decreased since the searches began.[59] Please note, however, that Bruscino v. Carlson involved the U.S. Penitentiary in Marion, Illinois, "the only prison in the U.S. currently designed to hold the most violent and dangerous prisoners in the federal system," which may explain why the court allowed searches to occur frequently.[60] As part of this search, prisoners returning to their cells were often subjected to a rectal search, where a paramedic inserted a gloved finger into the prisoner's rectum and felt around for contraband.

Courts often approve body cavity searches performed by X-ray.[61] The court in People v. Pifer held an X-ray search, which discovered a hypodermic syringe in the prisoner's rectal cavity, was reasonable.[62] The court found the prison had significant and legitimate security interests more important than the prisoner's rights. The court said, "an X-ray is far less humiliating, degrading, invasive, annoying and physically uncomfortable than a physical viewing of the anal cavity or physical invasion of the rectal cavity."[63]

The New York Department of Correctional Services (DOCS) rules say body cavity searches may only be done "once all other means have been exhausted" and "when there is imminent danger to an inmate's health or facility safety."[64] A doctor must explain the process to the prisoner before performing a body cavity search.[65] The prisoner should have the opportunity to give up the contraband at this time.[66] A corrections officer of the same sex as the prisoner should be present during the entire exam.[67]

Note that in New York, an X-ray search using the Body Orifice Scanning System ("the BOSS" or "the BOSS chair") is sometimes also called a metal detector search.[68] Whenever you are searched with the BOSS chair, you may be fully clothed.[69] Even if the X-ray search is being used after a strip search or a strip frisk, prison officials must let you put your underclothes back on first.[70] See Part C(5) of this Chapter for more information about these New York State prison rules.

(e) Cross-Gender Body Searches

This Subsection explains your right not to be searched by prison officials of the opposite sex. Part B of this Chapter, "Involuntary Exposure," explained your right not to be seen by prison officials of the opposite sex. You should read both sections because the laws are very similar.

Courts have held prisoners do have some rights not to be searched by guards of the opposite sex.[71] In general, courts have found that prisoners' legitimate expectations of privacy from persons of the opposite sex

---

58. Bruscino v. Carlson, 854 F.2d 162, 164–65 (7th Cir. 1988).

59. Bruscino v. Carlson, 854 F.2d 162, 164–65 (7th Cir. 1988).

60. Bruscino v. Carlson, 854 F.2d 162, 163 (7th Cir. 1988).

61. People v. Collins, 8 Cal. Rptr. 3d 731, 744 (Cal. App. 2004) (upholding an intended visual body cavity search of a prisoner); Thompson v. County of Cook, 412 F. Supp. 2d 881, 893 (N.D. Ill. 2005) (denying summary judgment for prison on the question of whether visual body cavity searches and urethral swabbing for all incoming prisoners were proper).

62. People v. Pifer, 216 Cal. App. 3d 956, 962–63, 265 Cal. Rptr. 237, 240–41 (Cal. Ct. App. 1989) (court found that routine X-ray searches of all prisoners being transferred from one prison facility to another were reasonable).

63. People v. Pifer, 216 Cal. App. 3d 956, 961, 265 Cal. Rptr. 237, 242 (Cal. Ct. App. 1989).

64. State of New York, Department of Correctional Services, Directive No. 4910, Control of and Search for Contraband, at 20 (2001) (as revised Dec. 11, 2006).

65. State of New York, Department of Correctional Services, Directive No. 4910, Control of and Search for Contraband, at 7 (2001) (as revised Dec. 11, 2006).

66. State of New York, Department of Correctional Services, Directive No. 4910, Control of and Search for Contraband, at 7 (2001) (as revised Dec. 11, 2006).

67. State of New York, Department of Correctional Services, Directive No. 4910, Control of and Search for Contraband, at 7 (2001) (as revised Dec. 11, 2006).

68. State of New York, Department of Correctional Services, Directive No. 4910, Control of and Search for Contraband, at 1–2 (2001) (as revised Dec. 11, 2006).

69. State of New York, Department of Correctional Services, Directive No. 4910, Control of and Search for Contraband, at 1–2 (2001) (as revised Dec. 11, 2006).

70. State of New York, Department of Correctional Services, Directive No. 4910, Control of and Search for Contraband, at 2 (2001) (as revised Dec. 11, 2006) (stating that underclothes means "undershorts for males and bras and panties for females").

71. See, e.g., Mills v. City of Barbourville, 389 F.3d 568, 579 (6th Cir. 2004) ("[W]e have recognized that a prison policy forcing prisoners to be searched by members of the opposite sex or to be exposed to regular surveillance by officers are very limited.[72] Courts must balance a prisoner's limited right to be free from invasions of privacy by members of the opposite sex, with the state's interests in maintaining the security of the prison[73] and in avoiding sex discrimination in prison employment.[74] Most cases addressing gender issues in prisons focus on the right to privacy and try to balance these competing interests.

This balancing test is difficult, so courts have different opinions. One court found a male prisoner had no Fourth Amendment protection against cross-gender strip searches and no Eighth Amendment claim against visual body cavity searches by female guards.[75] But in another case, the Seventh Circuit said specifically that not all cross-gender searches are permissible.[76] Prisons should respect a prisoner's constitutional privacy where it is reasonable, taking into account prison security and equal employment for female guards.[77]

Your state may also have laws protecting women prisoners or regulating searches by opposite-sex guards. For example, California law requires that all California prisoners be searched "in a professional manner."[78] Routine clothed searches of male prisoners may be performed by prison officials of either sex, but searches of clothed female prisoners should be performed only by female employees—except in emergency situations.[79] California prohibits opposite-sex guards (other than qualified medical staff) from performing unclothed body inspections "except under emergency conditions with life or death consequences."[80] of the opposite sex while naked ... would provide the basis of a claim on which relief could be granted."); Hayes v. Marriott, 70 F.3d 1144, 1147 (10th Cir. 1995) (holding that summary judgment was inappropriate because plaintiff was subjected to a body cavity search "in the presence of over 100 people, including female secretaries and case managers"); Moore v. Carwell, 168 F.3d 234, 237 (5th Cir. 1999) (holding that an allegation of a strip and body cavity search performed by an officer of the opposite sex, absent an emergency or unavailability of a same sex officer, was not frivolous for purposes of the 4th Amendment).

---

72. See, e.g., Michenfelder v. Sumner, 860 F.2d 328, 334 (9th Cir. 1988) (holding that strip searches of male prisoners that occasionally occurred in view of female guards does not violate the 4th Amendment); Grummett v. Rushen, 779 F.2d 491, 495 (9th Cir. 1985) (finding that a pat-down search of a male prisoner, including his groin area, by female guards does not violate the 4th Amendment). But see Lay v. Forker, 371 F. Supp. 2d 1159, 1166–67 (C.D. Cal. 2004) (finding that a strip search of a male prisoner in the presence of a female officer violated the 4th Amendment but that the officer was entitled to qualified immunity).

73. Hudson v. Palmer, 468 U.S. 517, 527, 104 S. Ct. 3194, 3201–02, 82 L. Ed. 2d 393, 403–04 (1984) ("Determining whether [a prisoner's] expectation of privacy is 'legitimate' or 'unreasonable' necessarily entails a balancing of interests. The two interests here are the interest of society in the security of its penal institutions and the interest of the prisoner in privacy within his cell.").

74. See, e.g., Smith v. Fairman, 678 F.2d 52, 53–55 (7th Cir. 1982) (per curiam) (considering the state's "strong interest in avoiding sex discrimination in its hiring practices at the prison" and holding that "requiring plaintiff to submit to a limited frisk-type search by a female guard infringes upon no right guaranteed by the Constitution"); Timm v. Gunter, 917 F.2d 1093, 1102 (8th Cir. 1990) (holding that it was not unreasonable for a prison to authorize female guards to conduct surveillance of all areas, including shower and toilet facilities, and to pat search male prisoners on the same basis as male guards, given the prison's interest in protecting the equal employment rights of prison guards); Berl v. County of Westchester, 849 F.2d 712, 716 (2d Cir. 1988) (finding county liable for employment discrimination under Title VII for refusing to consider two male guards for promotion to female unit of prison), rev'd on other grounds by Price Waterhouse v. Hopkins, 490 U.S. 228, 238 n.2, 109 S. Ct. 1775, 1784 n.2, 104 L. Ed. 2d 268, 280 n.2 (1989); Bagley v. Watson, 579 F. Supp. 1099, 1104–05 (D. Or. 1983) (holding that female corrections officers cannot be excluded from positions which involve performing pat-down frisk searches of clothed male prisoners and visual observations of male prisoners in various states of undress); Griffin v. Mich. Dept. of Corr., 654 F. Supp. 690, 702–03 (E.D. Mich. 1982) (finding gender an unacceptable occupational qualification for corrections officers). See Part B of this Chapter for a discussion of similar issues concerning involuntary exposure.

75. Somers v. Thurman, 109 F.3d 614, 617–23 (9th Cir. 1997).

76. Canedy v. Boardman, 16 F.3d 183, 188 (7th Cir. 1994).

77. Canedy v. Boardman, 16 F.3d 183, 188 (7th Cir. 1994) (finding that male prisoner did have a cause of action against strip searches by female guards, because "where it is reasonable—taking account of a state's interests in prison security and in providing equal employment opportunity for female guards—to respect an inmate's constitutional privacy interests, doing so ... is a constitutional mandate").

78. Cal. Code Regs. tit. 15, § 3287(b) (2006) (requiring that all searches of prisoners "be conducted in a professional manner which avoids embarrassment or indignity to the prisoner. Whenever possible, unclothed body inspections of prisoners shall be conducted outside the view of others."). Title 15 of the California Codes and Regulations (Crime Prevention and Corrections) contains the provisions concerning prisoner body searches.

79. Cal. Code Regs. tit. 15, § 3287(b)(2)–(3) (2006).

80. Cal. Code Regs. tit. 15, § 3287(b)(1) (2006). The CDCR Department Operations Manual (the DOM) reflects the same policies. CDCR Department Operations Manual §§ 52050.18.2, 52050.18.3 (1989), available at http://www.cdcr.ca.gov/Regulations/Adult_Operations/docs/DOM/Ch_5_Printed_Final_DOM.pdf.

In New York, DOCS allows female correction officers to routinely pat frisk most male prisoners.[81] For New York State female prisoners, however, DOCS requires that, "whenever possible," female guards should pat frisk female prisoners[82] (see Part C(2)(f)(1) below).

(i) Searches of Women Prisoners by Male Guards[83]

While all prisoners' rights to privacy are limited because of the nature of prison and incarceration,[84] courts are sometimes more sympathetic to female prisoners. Some courts recognize that women have a greater privacy interest in certain situations because female prisoners are particularly vulnerable to sexual abuse by correctional personnel. As a result, some courts have found searches of women prisoners by male guards to be unconstitutional, even if the same searches of male prisoners by female guards would be allowed under the same circumstances.

For example, in Jordan v. Gardner, the Ninth Circuit held that past sexual and physical abuse experienced by female prisoners may affect the way they react to searches by male prison guards. Because of this, the court found that female prisoners have a greater privacy interest than males. The court held that random, non-emergency, clothed body searches on female prisoners were cruel and unusual punishment, violating the Eighth Amendment.[85] In Jordan, the prison policy allowed both male and female guards to randomly and routinely search clothed female prisoners. During the searches, the guards rubbed, stroked, squeezed, and kneaded the women's bodies, including their covered breasts, buttocks, inner thighs, and crotches. The policy required guards to "push inward and upward when searching the crotch and upper thighs" of the prisoners and to check the crease in their buttocks with a downward motion with the edge of the hand.[86] Many of the female prisoners had been sexually or physically abused by men in the past, and one woman, after being searched, suffered severe distress. The court found that prison officials knew of the risks of mental trauma and acted with deliberate indifference to the harm that the cross-gender clothed body searches were likely to cause. The court said the policy violated the Eighth Amendment because it was "unnecessary" for male guards to search the women (since female guards could do the searches) and "wanton," meaning the searches were malicious and unjustifiable.[87] Other courts have also recognized that female prisoners are entitled to greater privacy protection, though with some limitations.[88]

---

81. State of New York, Department of Correctional Services, Directive 4910, Control of and Search for Contraband, at 3 (2001) (as revised Dec. 11, 2006) ("Pat frisks [of male prisoners] will be performed by officers regardless of sex," although male Muslim prisoners may request a male officer under certain circumstances). In general, cross-gender pat-down searches of male prisoners by female prison guards are constitutionally permissible. See Grummett v. Rushen, 779 F.2d 491, 495 (9th Cir. 1985) (permitting routine cross-gender pat-downs because "these searches do not involve intimate contact with an inmate's body"); Smith v. Fairman, 678 F.2d 52, 53 (7th Cir. 1982) (holding female guards may conduct pat-down searches without violating a male prisoner's privacy).

82. State of New York, Department of Correctional Services, Directive 4910, Control of and Search for Contraband, at 3 (2001) (as revised Dec. 11, 2006).

83. It is very important that you read all of Part C of this Chapter, not just this Section. Courts will use the general rules explained in Part C to decide if a search was legal. This Section only explains some additional protections women prisoners have against searches by male prison guards.

84. See Hudson v. Palmer, 468 U.S. 517, 527, 104 S. Ct. 3194, 3201, 82 L. Ed. 2d 393, 404 (1984) (stating that a right of privacy in traditional 4th Amendment terms is fundamentally incompatible with the close and continual surveillance of prisoners and their cells).

85. Jordan v. Gardner, 986 F.2d 1521 (9th Cir. 1993). Whether the doctrine of this case will be adopted by other circuits or the Supreme Court is questionable. See Hovater v. Robinson, 1 F.3d 1063, 1066 (10th Cir. 1993) (holding that a male guard having sole custody of a female prisoner does not create such a risk to her safety that it violates the 8th Amendment). The Jordan court's decision was fact-specific to the particular prison in the case, and other courts have indicated that the case did not create a per se constitutional violation. See Carl v. Angelone, 883 F. Supp. 1433, 1440 (D. Nev. 1995) (finding that although prison director transferred male correction officers out of female prisons based on Jordan, there was no per se rule of unconstitutionality for cross-gender searches; thus, prisons could not be forced to transfer the men based on their sex).

86. Jordan v. Gardner, 986 F.2d 1521, 1523, 1532 (9th Cir. 1993) (Reinhardt, J., concurring).

87. Jordan v. Gardner, 986 F.2d 1521, 1527–28 (9th Cir. 1993)) (Reinhardt, J., concurring); see also Berry v. City of Muskogee, 900 F.2d 1489, 1498 (10th Cir. 1990) (stating knowledge of risk of harm and failure to act to prevent the harm constitute deliberate indifference).

88. See, e.g., Sepulveda v. Ramirez, 967 F.2d 1413, 1416 (9th Cir. 1992) (denying qualified immunity to a male parole officer who walked in on a female parolee urinating as part of a required drug test); Torres v. Wis. Dept. of Health & Social Servs., 838 F.2d 944, 946–47 (7th Cir. 1988), rev'd in part, 859 F.2d 1523, 1524–25 (7th Cir. 1988) (suggesting that to protect female prisoners' privacy, prisons could provide them with appropriate sleepwear and allow them to cover

In general, male prison officials are allowed to conduct clothed body frisks of women prisoners (where the outer garments of the prisoner are searched),[89] cell searches,[90] and visual body cavity or strip searches (where prisoners take off their clothes and are visually inspected by a guard).[91] Some states require that only medical personnel, not correctional personnel, may conduct body cavity searches that involve physical intrusion or extraction of a foreign object from a body cavity.[92] Similarly, body cavity searches requiring the use of one's fingers, or a "digital body search," are unreasonable unless medical personnel do these searches in a hygienic manner in a private area.[93] The presence of male officers is also an aggravating circumstance that might make a digital body search unreasonable.[94] The prison official must have a particularly strong reason to conduct a vaginal search of a pregnant woman, whether visual or digital.[95]

Your state may have specific laws to protect you or to regulate searches by opposite-sex guards. California, for instance, prohibits opposite-sex guards from performing unclothed body inspections in non-emergency situations.[96] In New York, DOCS policy requires that, whenever possible, female guards—not male guards—should pat frisk female prisoners.[97] If a male officer has to perform a non-emergency pat frisk their windows while dressing or using the toilet); Forts v. Ward, 621 F.2d 1210, 1213 (2d Cir. 1980) (allowing female prisoners to cover the window of their cells for privacy for 15 minute intervals). But see Carlin v. Manu, 72 F. Supp. 2d 1177, 1180 (D. Or. 1999) (holding that observation by male guards during strip searches of female prisoners made by female guards was acceptable during an emergency removal to a male prison since the male guards were not touching the female prisoners).

---

89. See Smith v. Fairman, 678 F.2d 52, 53–54 (7th Cir. 1982) (holding female guards may conduct "pat down" searches without violating a male prisoner's privacy).

90. See Hudson v. Palmer, 468 U.S. 517, 525–26, 104 S. Ct. 3194, 3199–3200 82 L. Ed. 2d 393, 402–03 (1984) (holding that prisoner has no reasonable expectation of privacy in his cell); Martin v. Lane, 766 F. Supp. 641, 646 (N.D. Ill. 1991) (applying Hudson to deny relief under the 4th Amendment to a prisoner whose cell was searched during a lockdown).

91. See Bell v. Wolfish, 441 U.S. 520, 558, 99 S. Ct. 1861, 1884, 60 L. Ed. 2d 447, 481 (1979) (upholding visual body cavity searches of prisoners against 4th Amendment challenge; the gender of the guards assigned to conduct the searches is not mentioned).

92. See DaVee v. Mathis, 812 S.W.2d 816, 824–26 (Mo. Ct. App. 1991) (concluding that while searches involving physical intrusion and removal of foreign objects must be conducted by medical personnel, the search in question did not involve physical contact and was thus reasonably conducted by non-medical personnel); U.S. ex rel. Guy v. McCauley, 385 F. Supp. 193, 199 (E.D. Wis. 1974) ("The intrusion of either the vaginal or anal cavities must be made by skilled medical technicians.").

93. See Bonitz v. Fair, 804 F.2d 164, 172–73 (1st Cir. 1986) (holding that digital body searches of female prisoners were unreasonable and in violation of the 4th Amendment because non-medical personnel performed the searches in a non-hygienic manner and in the presence of male personnel), overruled on other grounds by Unwin v. Campbell, 863 F.2d 124, 128 (1st Cir. 1988); U.S. ex rel. Guy v. McCauley, 385 F. Supp. 193, 198 (E.D. Wis. 1974) (finding that a search "abused common conceptions of decency and civilized conduct" and violated the 5th Amendment even though it was done in a sanitary manner by female officers, because it involved forcing a pregnant woman to bend over painfully, the police officers conducting the search were not medically trained, and the search was not conducted in a medical environment). But see Rodriguez v. Furtado, 771 F. Supp. 1245, 1256–57 (D. Mass. 1991) (holding that a body cavity search of a female patient by a doctor in a hygienic and private setting pursuant to a search warrant was reasonable). Some states specifically require medical personnel by statute to perform body cavity searches of prisoners. See, e.g., Mich. Comp. Laws Ann. § 764.25b(5) (West 2000).

94. See Bonitz v. Fair, 804 F.2d 164, 172–73 (1st Cir. 1986) (searching female prisoners in the presence of male prisoners is one factor that the court considered in finding the search to be unreasonable), overruled on other grounds by Unwin v. Campbell, 863 F.2d 124, 128 (1st Cir. 1988).

95. See U.S. ex rel. Guy v. McCauley, 385 F. Supp. 193, 198 (E.D. Wis. 1974) (holding that a visual vaginal search of woman who is seven-months pregnant "abuses common conceptions of decency and civilized conduct" when the search is conducted in a non-medical environment by non-medical officers, and it was painful for the woman to bend over).

96. Cal. Code Regs. tit. 15, § 3287(b)(1) (2008). The California Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation Department Operations Manual (the DOM) reflects the same policies. CDCR Department Operations Manual § 52050.16.5 (revised Feb. 29, 2009), available at http://www.cdcr.ca.gov/Regulations/Adult_Operations/docs/DOM/DOM%20Ch%205-Printed%20Final.pdf (last visited Feb. 24, 2010).

97. State of New York, Department of Correctional Services, Directive 4910, Control of and Search for Contraband, at 2–3 (2001) (as revised Dec. 11, 2006). Pat frisks are required when prisoners are entering the visiting room, when an entire area of the institution is being searched, when an officer has an articulable basis to suspect a prisoner possesses contraband, or as directed by supervisory staff. Pat frisks are also allowed when a prisoner is going or returning to housing, program, and recreation areas and outside work details. See also Hamilton v. Goord, No. 97-CV-1363 (S.D.N.Y. June 5, 2000) (order granting stay of litigation so DOCS could take action relating to pat frisks of female prisoners), available at http://www.amnestyusa.org/women/custody/newyork.pdf (last visited Feb. 24, 2010).

search of a female prisoner (because, for example, a female officer is not available), he must try to search the prisoner in a public location. In New York, if more than fifty percent of all officers on duty are women, then male guards cannot perform non-emergency pat frisks, unless the pat frisk is based upon a justifiable suspicion that the female prisoner possesses contraband and a female officer is not present and available at the pat frisk location. Women prisoners who have been diagnosed with Post Traumatic Stress Disorder may also request a "Cross Gender Pat Frisk Exemption," which prevents male officers from routinely pat frisking them. However, male guards may still search them under emergency situations, when specifically directed to do so by a supervisor, or when the officer has an articulable basis to believe the female prisoner possesses contraband and a female officer is not available.[98]

Some prisons have tried to hire female prison officers for certain jobs in women's prisons.[99] But the prisons may be sued for employment discrimination, since federal law prohibits employment discrimination based on sex,[100] and courts have held that hiring only female employees for female correctional facilities violates this law.[101] The state's interest in equal employment opportunities for correctional officers is strong compared to a prisoner's privacy interest in her body, as long as the cross-gender interactions are not offensive, disrespectful, or unprofessional.[102] Therefore, prisons have not been as successful as they could have been in ensuring that there are enough women employees to search the female prisoners, so male employees are allowed to search you.

In sum, courts will balance the invasive nature of the search against the prison's penological concerns of security and equal employment opportunities. But prison officials must still try to provide privacy to prisoners if reasonable, and they should also train prison employees to carry out searches in the least intrusive manner possible.[103]

---

98. State of New York, Department of Correctional Services, Directive 4910, Control of and Search for Contraband, at 3 (2001) (as revised Dec. 11, 2006). These policies are the result of a 1998 lawsuit against DOCS by women prisoners who claimed cross-gender pat frisks violated their constitutional rights; the lawsuit settled. See Hamilton v. Goord, No. 97-CV-1363 (S.D.N.Y. June 5, 2000) (granting stay of litigation so DOCS could address psychological issues around cross-gender pat frisks), available at http://www.amnestyusa.org/women/custody/newyork.pdf (last visited Feb. 24, 2010).

99. See, e.g., Ind. Code Ann. §§ 36-8-3-19, 36-8-10-5 (LexisNexis 2004) (requiring a "prison matron" to be appointed for female prisons). California protects all prisoners from room searches by officers of the opposite sex and ensures that a trained female staff member is available and accessible for the supervision of female prisoners. Cal. Penal Code § 4021(b) (West 2000). Michigan provides that if prisoners are subject to body cavity searches by a person of the opposite sex, another person of the same sex must also be present. Mich. Comp. Laws Ann. § 764.25b(5) (West 2000).

99. 42 U.S.C. § 2000e-2(a)–(d) (2006) ("Title VII").

100. 42 U.S.C. § 2000e-2(a)–(d) (2006) ("Title VII").

101. See, e.g., Henry v. Milwaukee County, 539 F.3d 573, 581 (7th Cir. 2008) (finding that a prison policy which required staff overtime shifts to be staffed by same-sex guards and so reduced the number of shifts available to women was not reasonably necessary to achieve the goals of rehabilitation, security, and privacy); Forts v. Ward, 621 F.2d 1210, 1216 (2d Cir. 1980) (holding that male prison guards could not be excluded from night shifts in a women's prison because other measures to ensure prisoner privacy were available). But see Robino v. Iranon, 145 F.3d 1109, 1111 (9th Cir. 1998) (upholding policy excluding male prison guards from certain posts in order to accommodate the privacy of female prisoners and reduce risk of sexual conduct between guards and prisoners when male prison guards still had many other employment opportunities in the system).

102. See Grummett v. Rushen, 779 F.2d 491, 495 (9th Cir. 1985) (finding that to restrict or disallow female guards from holding positions which involve occasional viewing of male prisoners would require tremendous rearrangement of work schedules and possibly produce a risk to both internal security needs and equal employment opportunities for female guards, especially when the record indicates that female guards have acted professionally and appropriately); Robins v. Centinela State Prison, 19 F. App'x. 549, 550–51 (9th Cir. 2001) (while generally the search of male prisoners by female officers may not violate the 4th Amendment, a search that is "completely unprofessional and offensive" may be such a violation).

103. See, e.g., Timm v. Gunter, 917 F.2d 1093, 1100 (8th Cir. 1990) (upholding cross-gender pat searches when female guards are trained to perform pat searches of male prisoners in a professional manner); Torres v. Wis. Dept. of Health & Social Servs., 859 F.2d 1523, 1524 (7th Cir. 1988) (noting procedures in place to minimize intrusions on the privacy of prisoners). But see Cameron v. Hendricks, 942 F. Supp. 499, 503 (D. Kan. 1996) (stating that the availability of less intrusive measures is only one factor in determining the reasonableness of a search and that officials are not required to perform the "least intrusive" search).

3. Eighth Amendment Limitations

Chapter 24 of the JLM, "Your Right to Be Free From Assault," explains your rights under the Eighth Amendment, which prohibits cruel and unusual punishment. As this Chapter explains, courts usually view illegal search claims as possible violations of the Fourth Amendment. Sometimes, however, a court may believe a search was so unreasonable that it violates the Eighth Amendment's prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment.[104] (Some illegal searches may also be considered assault and battery.[105])

There is no clear standard about how much pain and suffering is unconstitutional. Courts usually say "the unnecessary and wanton infliction of pain" violates the Eighth Amendment.[106] Prison officials' behavior must meet this standard before a court will find a constitutional violation. But if the official acts only to further some legitimate penological interest and if the pain suffered is a result only incidental to (not the main purpose of) the procedure, then courts will probably say your constitutional rights were not violated.[107] If you believe your Eighth Amendment rights were violated by an illegal search, you should read JLM, Chapter 16, "Using 42 U.S.C. § 1983 and 28 U.S.C. § 1331 to Obtain Relief From Violations of Federal Law," as well as Chapter 24, "Your Right To Be Free From Assault," for more information.

In regard to body searches, the Eighth Amendment is most often triggered by the manner in which the searches are conducted and, at times, by the purpose of the searches. In Meriwether v. Faulkner, the prisoner had a sex change operation and claimed that guards made her strip to harass her and to see her unusual physical features.[108] She also claimed that there were no security reasons to search her.[109] The court said that such searches might violate the Eighth Amendment. In addition, in McRorie v. Shimoda, the court sustained an Eighth Amendment claim against a prison guard who rammed his baton into the anus of a prisoner during a strip search.[110]

The Seventh Circuit in Isby v. Duckworth held that a rectal cavity search conducted in a private room by a doctor, who inserted a gloved and lubricated finger into the prisoner's rectum to check for a weapon, was not abusive, even though the doctor laughed before doing the search while guards held the prisoner down.[111] Similarly, the Ninth Circuit in Somers v. Thurman held that a male prisoner did not state an Eighth Amendment claim based on allegations that female guards pointed and joked amongst themselves while observing him showering and while conducting a body cavity search of him.[112] However, the Ninth Circuit in Dockery v. Bass held that a prisoner may have an Eighth Amendment claim when officials subjected him to two strip searches, maliciously causing him pain with the excessive use of handcuffs and the forcible insertion of a tube up his anal cavity.[113]

---

104. See, e.g., Jordan v. Gardner, 986 F.2d 1521, 1524–25 (9th Cir. 1993); Tribble v. Gardner, 860 F.2d 321, 325–26 (9th Cir. 1988) (finding that a rectal probe may have violated the 8th Amendment if it was conducted for purposes unrelated to security considerations, where a prisoner's clothing, hair, hands, and other body cavities were not searched and prisoner's recent X-ray revealed no contraband in his rectum); Dellamore v. Stenros, 886 F. Supp. 349, 351 (S.D.N.Y. 1995) (finding that a plaintiff subjected to a body cavity search without a medical practitioner present stated a claim under § 1983).

105. See, e.g., Hammond v. Gordon County, 316 F. Supp. 2d 1262, 1293 (N.D. Ga. 2002) (holding that a female prisoner presented enough evidence to show assault and battery, because she alleged that a guard inserted his fingers into her vagina).

106. Gregg v. Georgia, 428 U.S. 153, 173, 965 S. Ct. 2909, 2925, 49 L. Ed. 2d 859, 874 (1976). See also Baze v. Rees, 553 U.S. 35, 128 S. Ct. 1520, 1531–32, 170 L. Ed. 2d 420, 432–33 (2008) (upholding the three-drug lethal injection protocol on the grounds that neither the risk of improper administration of the first drug nor the failure to adopt more humane alternatives constitute cruel and unusual punishment).

107. See Del Raine v. Williford, 32 F.3d 1024, 1038–42 (7th Cir. 1994) (finding that while rectal searches may inflict pain, if the official has a legitimate reason to conduct them, they do not violate the 8th Amendment). See also Gillis v. Litscher, 468 F.3d 488, 492 (7th Cir. 2006) (finding that a behavioral modification program imposed on a prisoner for breaking a rule may have imposed on him "an atypical and significant hardship" in violation of his 8th Amendment rights).

108. Meriwether v. Faulkner, 821 F.2d 408, 411 (7th Cir. 1987).

109. Meriwether v. Faulkner, 821 F.2d 408, 418 (7th Cir. 1987).

110. McRorie v. Shimoda, 795 F.2d 780, 783 (9th Cir. 1986).

111. Isby v. Duckworth, No. 97-3705, 175 F.3d 1020 (7th Cir. Mar. 11, 1999) (unpublished).

112. Somers v. Thurman, 109 F.3d 614, 624 (9th Cir. 1997).

113. Dockery v. Bass, No. 95-17250, 133 F.3d 926 (9th Cir. Dec. 15, 1997) (unpublished).

4. DNA Testing

Prisoners can be forced to give DNA samples by state or federal law.[114] Forced DNA testing of prisoners generally does not violate the Fourth Amendment.[115] It is unclear so far if all prisoners can be forced to give DNA samples, not just prisoners convicted of certain types of crimes[116] like sex offenses.[117] Some courts have found that laws requiring DNA sampling of all convicted felons do not violate the Fourth Amendment because the state's interest is more important than the bodily intrusion.[118] See Chapter 11 of the JLM, "Using Post-Conviction DNA Testing to Attack Your Conviction or Sentence," and Chapter 32, "Special Considerations for Sex Offenders," for more information.

5. Statutory Privacy Rights

You may also have privacy rights under state statutes and regulations, in addition to your federal constitutional rights.[119] For example, New York State law requires prisons to give prisoners certain clothing, and to follow specific procedures when giving prisoners urine tests or searching prisoners' religious items.

(a) Clothing

New York State law gives all prisoners the right to the same amount of "facility-issue clothing."[120] Look in your prison library for the New York DOCS Directives (specific prison rules) for more specific information about clothing. Prison officials in New York cannot take clothing away as punishment.[121] But they can take clothing away if they think it is dangerous to the prison and/or yourself and is a threat "to the safety,

---

114. United States v. Weikert, 504 F.3d 1, 3 (1st Cir. 2007) (upholding a blood draw from a prisoner on supervised release); State v. Martin, 955 A.2d 1144, 1144 (Vt. 2008) (upholding a state law requiring a blood draw from convicted nonviolent felons); United States v. Kincade, 379 F.3d 813, 832 (9th Cir. 2004) (holding that compulsory DNA profiling of qualified federal offenders was reasonable under the totality of the circumstances, which included the probationer's reduced expectations of privacy, the minimal intrusion occasioned by blood sampling, and the significant societal interests furthered by the collection of DNA information from convicted offenders); Velasquez v. Woods, 329 F.3d 420, 421 (5th Cir. 2003) (per curiam) (noting that every circuit court to consider the question of whether statutes compelling collection of DNA samples from felons were violations of the 4th Amendment has held they are not, so the lower court did not err in holding the same thing).

115. Groceman v. U.S. Dept. of Justice, 354 F.3d 411, 413–14 (5th Cir. 2004) (per curiam) ("[A]lthough collection of DNA samples from prisoners implicates Fourth Amendment concerns, such collections are reasonable in light of an inmates' diminished privacy rights, the minimal intrusion involved, and the legitimate government interest in using DNA to investigate crime … persons incarcerated after conviction retain no constitutional privacy interest against their correct identification."); United States v. Hugs, 384 F.3d 762, 769 (9th Cir. 2004) (finding that a supervised release condition requiring the defendant, a "qualified felon," to cooperate in the collection of DNA does not violate the 4th Amendment).

116. See Groceman v. U.S. Dept. of Justice, 354 F.3d 411, 413 n.2 (per curiam) (5th Cir. 2004) (noting variety of approaches); Roe v. Marcotte, 193 F.3d 72, 81–82 (2d Cir. 1999) (upholding statute applying to sex offenders but rejecting rationale that would extend to all offenses). But see Nicholas v. Goord, 430 F.3d 652, 671 (2d Cir. 2005) (upholding statute applying to assault, homicide, rape, incest, escape, attempted murder, kidnapping, arson, and burglary, and suggesting its rationale applies to all convicted felons); United States v. Amerson, 483 F.3d 73, 83–84 (2d Cir. 2007) (extending the applicability of the DNA collection statute to non-violent probationers under the two-pronged special needs test used in the Circuit when there was a strong governmental interest).

117. See, e.g., Boling v. Romer, 101 F.3d 1336, 1340 (10th Cir. 1996) (upholding requirement that prisoners convicted of sexual assault provide DNA samples).

118. Padgett v. Ferrero, 294 F. Supp. 2d 1338, 1342 (N.D. Ga. 2003) (finding felony convictions justified searches, so as to satisfy the 4th Amendment); United States v. Stegman, 295 F. Supp. 2d 542, 550 (D. Md. 2003) (finding DNA analysis was not an unreasonable search or seizure); United States v. Amerson, 483 F.3d 73, 83–84 (2d Cir. 2007) (extending the applicability of the DNA collection statute to non-violent probationers under the two-pronged special needs test used in the Circuit when there was a strong governmental interest and minimal intrusion and invasion of privacy on behalf of the probationers).

119. Prisoners should become familiar with the penal codes of their respective states, as well as the employee manual of their prisons, if possible. The employee manuals will tell you what procedures the guards must follow and may help you challenge the guards' behavior through internal prison grievance procedures.

120. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 9, § 7005.7 (2009). For men, this includes one shirt and one pair of pants. Women receive one shirt and one skirt, dress, or pair of pants. Both men and women should receive two pairs of socks, two sets of underwear, one pair of shoes, and one sweater or jacket for cold weather. Women prisoners are allowed to wear brassieres.

121. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 9, § 7612.6 (2009).

security or good order."[122] If officials want to take away some clothing from you because they think it is dangerous for you to have, they must follow specific procedures.[123] A deprivation order must be authorized by the officer of the day, the deputy superintendent for security services, or a higher official. You must receive a written copy of the order within twenty-four hours. The copy must include the reasons for the order and explain how you can challenge the order. The prison superintendent must also receive a copy. The deprivation order must be reviewed on a daily basis for seven days. If the order is still in effect after seven days, it must be reviewed in writing on a weekly basis. A copy of this review should be sent to you and the superintendent.[124]

(b) Urine Tests

Forcing people to take urine tests or give samples of other bodily fluids is considered a "search"[125] under the Fourth Amendment, and the procedures for urine tests are held to the same standard as other searches. Prison officials may require prisoners to give urine samples for drug testing either with reasonable cause or pursuant to a program designed to prevent selective enforcement or harassment.[126] New York has state regulations about privacy when you take a urinalysis test.[127] The rules have a specific procedure for urine tests. You will be pat-frisked before giving the sample, and someone will watch you give the sample. The person who watches you must be from the security or medical staff, and the person has to be the same sex as you. You should be in a private place where no other prisoners or staff can see you.[128]

(c) Searches of Religious Items

In New York, religious items such as a Native American prisoner's medicine bag can only be inspected in a manner that respects its religious significance. However, a medicine bag may be scanned at any time with a metal or other electronic detector. A prisoner must also hold the medicine bag open for prison officials to look inside if the official has reason to believe that it may contain contraband.[129] See JLM, Chapter 27, "Religious Freedom in Prison," for more information on religious rights in prison.

6. Departmental Directives and Privacy Rights

The New York DOCS Directives has specific rules for each state prison. Look in your prison library for a copy of these directives.

These directives have additional rules for searches that may be stricter than the court rules. For example, the directives say that only a physician under the supervision of Central Office physician guidance can conduct body cavity searches.[130] The body cavity search must take place in the examining room. The official must use professional, hygienic techniques and explain the procedure to you. The physician must also give you a chance to yield contraband voluntarily. One corrections officer of your sex must be present to

---

122. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 9, § 7612.6(d) (2009).

123. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 305.2 (2009).

124. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit.7, § 305.2(b) (2009).

125. Skinner v. Railway Labor Executives Ass'n, 489 U.S. 602, 617, 109 S. Ct. 1402, 1413, 103 L. Ed. 639, 660 (1989) (holding that the Federal Railroad Administration's policy of drug testing by collecting and testing urine samples and samples of other bodily fluids constitute "searches" under the 4th Amendment).

126. Hurd v. Scribner, No. 06CV0412, 2007 U.S. Dist. Lexis 32651, at *9 (S.D. Cal. May 02, 2007) (unpublished) (upholding, in response to habeas petition, discipline taken against a prisoner who refused a drug test); Louis v. Dept. of Corr. Servs. of Neb., 437 F.3d 697, 700 (8th Cir. 2006) (holding in a § 1983 action that prisons requiring tests do not need to allow prisoners to sign and seal their own urine specimens and do not have to conduct a GC/MS test where the test shows a positive result but prisoner denies using drugs); Thompson v. Souza, 111 F.3d 694, 702–03 (9th Cir. 1997) (upholding urine testing of group of 124 prisoners); Lucero v. Gunter, 17 F.3d 1347, 1350 (10th Cir. 1994) (upholding random tests); Forbes v. Trigg, 976 F.2d 308, 314–15 (7th Cir. 1992) (upholding urinalysis of all prisoners in certain jobs).

127. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 1020.4 (2008).

128. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 1020.4 (2008); see also State of New York, Department of Correctional Services, Directive 4937, Urinalysis Testing, at 2 (2006).

129. State of New York, Department of Correctional Services, Directive 4910, Control of and Search for Contraband, at 8 (2001) (as revised Dec. 11, 2006).

130. State of New York, Department of Correctional Services, Directive 4910, Control of and Search for Contraband, at 6 (2001) (as revised Dec. 11, 2006).

witness the examination.[131] These rules are intended to make sure that no one, including health officials, humiliates or harasses you. If anyone does harass you, you may bring a complaint alleging violation of the professional standards set out in the directives.

The New York Directives also say that when you are transferred from one DOCS facility to another, you will be strip frisked and subjected to a metal detector search at the facility from which you are being transferred, but you will not be strip searched or strip frisked at the receiving facility. You may be subjected to a metal detector search at the receiving facility, though. The same policy applies when you are transferred from one Special Housing Unit to another Special Housing Unit. However, there is an exception if an officer has "probable cause" to believe that you are carrying contraband.[132]

When you are strip searched or strip frisked, prison officials must make sure you have some privacy. Only the prison official doing the search should be there, although a supervisor may observe.[133] Additional corrections officers should be present only if there are major disturbances or if it is likely that you will resist the search, and prisoners may be searched in groups if there is a major disturbance at the facility. The prison should limit traffic as much as possible where strip searches are conducted. Officers of the same sex as you must conduct strip searches and strip frisks.[134]

A very important rule about strip searches in New York is that officers must always act professionally. They have to be aware of the sensitive nature of searches and must "conduct such searches in a manner least degrading to all involved."[135] Typically, if you cooperate in a non-body cavity search, the officer may not touch you, except to run fingers through your hair, if necessary.[136] If you believe that a search is conducted improperly, you can use the New York Inmate Grievance Program or an Article 78 proceeding to seek a remedy.[137] If you believe the search also violated your constitutional rights, then you can use the legal remedies in Part E of this Chapter. If you are incarcerated in another state, it is likely that there are similar regulations to protect your rights. See Chapter 2 of the JLM, "Introduction to Legal Research," for more information on legal research so that you can find the laws and regulations of the state where you are incarcerated.

D. Should You Resist an Illegal Body Search?

If you are searched in a way that you believe is illegal or against a prison regulation, it is best to allow the search to take place. (Prison officials can use force to make you obey orders, even if those orders may be illegal, so resisting is often not possible.) Courts have held that prisoners must follow orders so that prison rules can be administered safely and in an orderly way.[138] Even if you believe that an order violates your constitutional rights, courts say that you do not have the right to resist the order.[139]

---

131. State of New York, Department of Correctional Services, Directive 4910, Control of and Search for Contraband, at 7 (2001) (as revised Dec. 11, 2006).

132. State of New York, Department of Correctional Services, Directive 4910, Control of and Search for Contraband, at 8–9 (2001) (as revised Dec. 11, 2006).

133. State of New York, Department of Correctional Services, Directive 4910, Control of and Search for Contraband, at 5 (2001) (as revised Dec. 11, 2006).

134. State of New York, Department of Correctional Services, Directive 4910, Control of and Search for Contraband, at 5 (2001) (as revised Dec. 11, 2006).

135. State of New York, Department of Correctional Services, Directive 4910, Control of and Search for Contraband, at 5 (2001) (as revised Dec. 11, 2006).

136. State of New York, Department of Correctional Services, Directive 4910, Control of and Search for Contraband, at 6 (2001) (as revised Dec. 11, 2006).

137. See JLM, Chapter 15, "Inmate Grievance Procedures," and Chapter 22, "How to Challenge Administrative Decisions Using Article 78 of the New York Civil Practice Law and Rules," for more information on inmate grievance procedures and Article 78 proceedings.

138. Griffin v. Comm'r of Pa. Prisons, No. 90-5284, 1990 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 17951, at *11 (E.D. Pa. Dec. 10, 1991) (unpublished), aff'd, 961 F.2d 208 (3d Cir. 1992) ("Even if plaintiff considered the order illegal, plaintiff should not have refused to follow it because it is critical to the orderly administration of a prison that prisoners follow orders."). See also Williams v. Delo, 49 F.3d 442, 446 (8th Cir. 1995) (finding that prisoner's refusal to follow the orders of corrections officials posed a threat to institutional security); Eccleston v. Oregon ex rel. Or. Dept. of Corr., 168 F. App'x 760, 761 (9th Cir. 2006) (finding that prison official's use of chemical agent on prisoner who repeatedly refused to follow orders to leave his cell was not cruel and unusual punishment).

139. Pressly v. Gregory, 831 F.2d 514, 518 n.3 (4th Cir. 1987) (citing Wright v. Bailey, 544 F.2d 737 (1976), for the proposition that you cannot resist arrest by stating that the arrest is illegal unless the illegality is clear at the time of the arrest); Jackson v. Allen, 376 F. Supp. 1393, 1394–95 (E.D. Ark. 1974) (holding that, because of the discipline

It is safest for you not to resist the prison official, because if you resist you probably will be disciplined and you may be injured. You can later file a lawsuit to help prevent future violations of your rights and to punish the official. Any disciplinary action taken against you for resisting the search will be added to your record, affecting your good-time credit and your chances of parole. If you resist a search and then bring a lawsuit, winning the suit may mean the court will clear your disciplinary record after finding the search violated prison rules.[140] However, resisting a search—even if it is obviously illegal— is more likely to lead to a permanent mark on your disciplinary record. Courts rarely order a disciplinary record to be changed, so it is unlikely that a permanent mark due to your resisting an illegal search can ever be eliminated.[141] Courts want prisoners to challenge violations of their rights in courts, not to refuse to obey orders from prison officials.[142] Do not count on the courts to clear your record, especially if the order you disobey is not clearly contrary to a prison's own rules.

E. Legal Remedies

If you believe your rights have been violated, remember you must first file an administrative grievance at your institution. See Chapter 15 of the JLM, "Inmate Grievance Procedures," for further information.[143] You can then file a Section 1983 lawsuit if you believe prison officials or other government employees (including police officers) have violated any of your constitutional rights. In addition, you can file a class action law suit, which involves a group of plaintiffs bringing a lawsuit together.

If you think that prison officials have violated your Eighth or Fourth Amendment rights, you may sue the officials or guards using 42 U.S.C. § 1983. Section 1983 is a federal law that allows you to sue state officials who have violated your constitutional rights while acting "under color of state law."[144] You can sue federal officials in a similar suit, called a Bivens action.[145]

You can also use Section 1983 to sue local officials as long as you can show that they too acted under "color of state law." But note that you can only sue municipalities (towns, cities, or counties) under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 if your injury was the result of an official municipal policy or custom.[146] To sue a city or a county, then, you will have to show that the "execution of [the] government's policy or custom ... inflict[ed] the injury."[147] In other words, a local government will be held liable only if an injury can be shown to be a direct structure of prisons, prisoners do not have the right to resist an unconstitutional order or punishment unless resistance is necessary to prevent one's own death). But see Purcell v. Pa. Dept. of Corr., No. 95-6720, 1998 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 105, at *26–27 (E.D. Pa. Jan. 9, 1998) (finding that, because prisoner might have suffered injury by following order and had medical authorization that led him to believe that he did not have to obey the order, prisoner can proceed with action against prison officials).

---

140. See Dunne v. Reid, 93 Misc. 2d 50, 52, 402 N.Y.S.2d 923, 923 (Sup. Ct. Dutchess County 1978) (ordering prisoner's disciplinary record from resisting search cleared after finding prison officials acted in violation of prison regulations when they tried to search the prisoner in front of other people, despite prison rules that said searches must respect prisoners' privacy).

141. See, e.g., Mahogany v. Stalder, 242 F. App'x 261, 263 (5th Cir. 2007) (dismissing prisoner's claim seeking restoration of good-time credits and expungement of disciplinary proceedings from his record).

142. See Rivera v. Smith, 63 N.Y.2d 501, 515, 472 N.E.2d 1015, 1022, 483 N.Y.S.2d 187, 194 (1984) ("[T]he recognition and enforcement even of constitutional rights may have to await resolution in administrative or judicial proceedings; self-help by the inmate cannot be recognized as an acceptable remedy."). But see Sanchez v. Scully, 143 Misc. 2d 889, 889, 542 N.Y.S.2d 920, 920 (Sup. Ct. Dutchess County 1989) (holding that, given the existence of unambiguous statutory language in support of prisoner's refusal to work in excess of eight hours per day, the record of the subsequent disciplinary proceeding should be expunged from the inmate's record); Dunne v. Reid, 93 Misc. 2d 50, 52, 402 N.Y.S.2d 923, 923 (Sup. Ct. Dutchess County 1978) (finding disciplinary action inappropriate where the prisoner resisted a search that violated the prison's own regulations).

143. See, e.g., Johnson v. Johnson, 385 F.3d 503, 515–23 (5th Cir. 2004) (describing in detail the requirement that a prisoner exhaust administrative remedies before filing a lawsuit).

144. 42 U.S.C. § 1983 (2006).

145. Prisoners can make constitutional claims against federal officials in federal court under 28 U.S.C. § 1331 by using Bivens actions. See Part E(1) of Chapter 16 of the JLM, "Using 42 U.S.C. § 1983 and 28 U.S.C. § 1331 to Obtain Relief From Violations of Federal Law," for more information on Bivens actions.

146. See, e.g., Williams v. Kaufman County, 352 F.3d 994, 1013–14 (5th Cir. 2003) (holding that the municipality could be held liable for unlawful searches of detainees because the policy was authorized by the sheriff, the relevant policymaker).

147. Irwin v. City of Hemet, 22 Cal. App. 4th 507, 525–27 Cal. Rptr. 2d 433, 442–43 (Cal. Ct. App. 1994) (finding that a complaint alleging that City of Hemet's adoption of a policy or custom not to train its jailers in suicide screening and prevention was the proximate cause of a prisoner's suicide may not be summarily dismissed without determination result of the local government's official policy, either express or implied.[148] Therefore, a local government is not liable under Section 1983, "for an injury inflicted solely by its employees or agents" who were not following official local policy,[149] even though the local officials may be individually liable under Section 1983. You should read JLM, Chapter 16, "Using 42 U.S.C. § 1983 and 28 U.S.C. § 1331 to Obtain Relief From Violations of Federal Law," to learn more about Section 1983 claims.

There have also been successful class actions challenging official municipal policies under 42 U.S.C. § 1983. Class actions are a type of lawsuit where many plaintiffs sue together for similar violations of their rights.[150] Most successful class action cases challenging prison search policies have been brought on behalf of non-violent, non-drug misdemeanor arrestees, not convicted prisoners.[151]

It is important to remember different laws apply in state and federal prisons. If you are in a federal prison, it does not matter what state the prison is in. Federal prisons only use federal law. If you are in a state prison, you can use both state and federal laws. But, remember that each state creates its own laws. You must research the laws of your particular state and how prisoners in your state file suits in that state's courts. Federal constitutional rights are protected regardless of whether you are in state or federal prison, but the way you present your case—what legal claims you make and how you make them—will differ.

F. Conclusion

In conclusion, although your rights against involuntary exposure and body searches are substantially limited in prison, it is possible for your rights to be violated under the Fourth Amendment, Eighth Amendment, or under certain state statutory provisions. Whether your rights have been violated will depend in large part on the reasonableness behind the search, or behind the policy leading to the involuntary exposure. It will also depend on what kind of search or exposure is at issue. The more cases you can find with facts similar to your own situation, the better your chances of showing that your rights were violated.

---

of fact as to whether or not the city adopted a policy or custom to inadequately train jailers (quoting Monell v. Dept. of Soc. Servs., 436 U.S. 658, 690, 98 S. Ct. 2018, 2035, 56 L. Ed. 2d 611, 635 (1978))). For an example of such a municipal policy or custom, see Blihovde v. St. Croix County, 219 F.R.D. 607, 612 (W.D. Wis. 2003) (describing a county's strip-search policy).

148. Blihovde v. St. Croix County, 219 F.R.D. 607, 618 (W.D. Wis. 2003) ("Even when there is no express policy, a municipality may be liable when there is a 'custom' of unconstitutional conduct." (citing Monell v. Dept. of Soc. Servs., 436 U.S. 658, 691, 98 S. Ct. 2018, 2036, 56 L. Ed. 2d 611, 635 (1978))); see also Amnesty America v. Town of W. Hartford, 361 F.3d 113, 124–27 (2d Cir. 2004) (reviewing the law of municipal liability in a damage suit for excessive force).

149. Irwin v. City of Hemet, 22 Cal. App. 4th 507, 525, 27 Cal. Rptr. 2d 433, 442 (Cal. Ct. App. 1994).

150. See Chapter 5 of the JLM, "Choosing a Court and Lawsuit" for information on class actions in general and Part D(1) of Chapter 16 of the JLM, "Using 42 U.S.C. § 1983 and 28 U.S.C. § 1331 to Obtain Relief From Violations of Federal Law," for information on § 1983 class actions.

151. See, e.g., Bynum v. District of Columbia, 217 F.R.D. 43, 45–49 (D.D.C. 2003) (certifying a § 1983 class action claiming 4th and 5th Amendment violations, where plaintiffs challenged prison policy of conducting suspicionless strip searches of prisoners returning from court with orders for their release). Bynum later settled for $12 million and the District of Columbia agreed to "no longer strip search [detainees] who are entitled to release." Bynum v. District of Columbia, 384 F. Supp. 2d 342, 359 (D.D.C. 2005). See also Tardiff v. Knox County, 365 F.3d 1, 7 (1st Cir. 2004) (affirming class certification for non-violent, non-drug arrestees challenging policy of blanket, routine strip searches without reasonable suspicion); Blihovde v. St. Croix County, 219 F.R.D. 607, 613–21 (W.D. Wis. 2003) (affirming amended class definition in a § 1983 class action, alleging plaintiffs, all misdemeanor non-drug, non-violent arrestees, were subjected to strip searches without reasonable suspicion according to a county prison policy in violation of the 4th and 14th Amendments); Nilsen v. York County, 382 F. Supp. 2d 206, 209 (D. Me. 2005) (approving $3.3 million settlement in § 1983 class action over strip searches of non-drug, non-weapon, and non-violent arrestees at county jail; plaintiffs alleged the strip searches were conducted pursuant to county jail policy, without individualized reasonable suspicion in violation of the 4th Amendment; the settlement also required county to maintain a written policy prohibiting the challenged strip searches).

A JAILHOUSE LAWYER'S MANUAL

Chapter 26: Infectious Diseases: AIDS, Hepatitis, Tuberculosis and MRSA in Prisons

Columbia Human Rights Law Review

Ninth Edition 2011

Legal Disclaimer

A Jailhouse Lawyer's Manual is written and updated by members of the Columbia Human Rights Law Review. The law prohibits us from providing any legal advice to prisoners. This information is not intended as legal advice or representation nor should you consider or rely upon it as such. Neither the JLM nor any information contained herein is intended to or shall constitute a contract between the JLM and any reader, and the JLM does not guarantee the accuracy of the information contained herein. Additionally, your use of the JLM should not be construed as creating an attorney-client relationship with the JLM staff or anyone at Columbia Law School. Finally, while we have attempted to provide information that is up-to-date and useful, because the law changes frequently, we cannot guarantee that all information is current.

CHAPTER 26

INFECTIOUS DISEASES: AIDS, HEPATITIS, TUBERCULOSIS AND MRSA IN PRISONS*

A. Introduction

This Chapter explains your legal rights about infectious diseases in prison. This Chapter has information both for prisoners who already have an infectious disease (like HIV/AIDS, tuberculosis, hepatitis B, hepatitis C or Methicillin-resistant Staphylococcus aureus (MRSA)), and for prisoners who want to avoid getting an infectious disease. Part B gives you some basic facts about infectious diseases. Section (1)(a) of Part B also describes how women may have different symptoms of HIV/AIDS. Part C explains the general standard used to determine whether a prison policy is constitutional. Part D is about prison medical testing for infectious diseases—whether a prison can force you to get tested or have others tested. Part E discusses disease prevention and segregation issues. Part F discusses the role of confidentiality and what you can expect in terms of keeping your health status private in prison. Part G deals with treatment options and your legal rights to those options. Part H discusses issues of discrimination. Part I discusses sentencing issues. Part J discusses planning for your release, if you have an infectious disease. Finally, Appendix A lists resources for further information, counseling, and support for you and your family.

You should also read other Chapters of the JLM to understand your legal rights, especially Chapter 16, "Using 42 U.S.C. § 1983 and 28 U.S.C. § 1331 to Obtain Relief From Violations of Federal Law," Chapter 32, "Special Considerations for Sex Offenders," Chapter 28, "Rights of Prisoners with Disabilities," Chapter 23, "Your Right to Adequate Medical Care," and Chapter 35, "Getting Out Early: Conditional & Early Release."

There are more court cases about HIV/AIDS than about tuberculosis, hepatitis B, hepatitis C and MRSA. Because judges always look at the specific facts of each case, try to find cases about your disease. But, you also can try to make comparisons between different diseases because the diseases are very similar, including how they are spread and their effects on prisoners. For example, if you want to use a case about AIDS and argue the law should also apply to hepatitis C, you should try to explain your reasons as clearly as possible.

This Chapter is only a summary of the many issues about infectious diseases in the prison system. You probably will have to do more research elsewhere. This Chapter, for example, only includes HIV/AIDS, tuberculosis, hepatitis (the most common infectious diseases in prison), and MRSA, but there are many other diseases. Scientists are always discovering new information about infectious diseases, so some of this information may not be correct in the future.

B. Background Information on Infectious Diseases

1. HIV and AIDS

HIV, the Human Immunodeficiency Virus, is the virus that causes AIDS.[1] AIDS stands for Acquired Immunodeficiency Syndrome. Over time, the HIV virus weakens your immune system so your body cannot fight off infection properly. You may develop various infections—known as "opportunistic" infections—that take advantage of your body's weakened condition.[2]

---

* This Chapter was rewritten by Carrie Ellis based, in part, on previous versions of "AIDS in Prison" and "AIDS, Tuberculosis, and Hepatitis in Prison" by Emily Monroe, Jin Hee Lee, Stephanie I. R. Fidler, Sara Corello, and Paul Farrell Mapelli. Special thanks to Milton Zelermyer Prisoners' Rights Project, The Legal Aid Society of New York; Madeline deLone, Innocence Project; and Jennifer Wynn, Prison Visiting Project, Correctional Association of New York, for their helpful comments.

1. Div. of HIV/AIDS Prevention, U.S. Dept. of Health & Human Servs., What is HIV?, available at http://www.cdc.gov/hiv/resources/qa/definitions.htm (last visited Sept. 26, 2010). The JLM knows that many prisoners do not have access to the Internet, but because we want this information to be up-to-date, we cite frequently to different agencies' and organizations' Internet websites.

2. Div. of HIV/AIDS Prevention, U.S. Dept. of Health & Human Servs., Basic Information about HIV and AIDS, available at http://www.cdc.gov/hiv/topics/basic/index.htm.

About half of people with HIV develop AIDS within ten years of getting HIV. How long it takes for HIV to develop into AIDS is different for each person. Medical treatments can slow down how fast HIV weakens your body.[3] As HIV gets worse and becomes AIDS, people become sick with serious illnesses and infections.

Being HIV-positive does not mean that you have AIDS. It is very important that you consult a doctor to find out if you are infected with HIV or if you have developed AIDS so that you can receive the proper medical treatment. The only way you can know for certain if you are infected is to be tested.

In 2008, it was estimated that about 1,073,128 people in the United States had been diagnosed with AIDS.[4] The estimated rate of confirmed AIDS in State and Federal prisons was more than two times higher than in the general population.[5] In 2007, it was estimated that about 2,675 prisoners in New York State—excluding New York City—were HIV-positive, and 3,964 prisoners had AIDS.[6]

HIV is most commonly spread by having unprotected anal, vaginal, or oral sex with a person with HIV; sharing needles or injection equipment with a drug user who has HIV; from an HIV-infected mother to her baby, before or during birth or through breast-feeding;[7] and through unsanitary tattooing or body piercing procedures.[8]

You cannot get HIV by working with or being around someone who has HIV, or by sharing a cell with another prisoner who is HIV-positive. You also cannot get HIV from sweat, spit, tears, clothes, drinking fountains, telephones, toilet seats, or through everyday activities like sharing a meal. HIV is also not transmitted through insect bites or stings, donating blood, or through closed-mouth kissing (although there is a very small chance of getting it from open-mouthed or "French" kissing with someone who is HIV-positive because of possible blood contact through open wounds, warts, etc.).[9]

If you are currently HIV-negative, you can help avoid getting HIV by taking the following steps:

(1) Never share needles or syringes if you inject drugs or get a tattoo or body piercing.
(2) Do not share equipment used to prepare and inject drugs ("works").
(3) Use a latex condom—not a lambskin condom—every time you have sex, including anal and oral sex.
(4) Never share razors or toothbrushes because of the risk of contact with someone else's blood.

Taking these precautions can help protect you from contracting the HIV infection.

(a) Women and HIV/AIDS

Symptoms of HIV are often different for women than for men. Because these symptoms are typically not associated with HIV, many women go undiagnosed until the virus progresses to AIDS.[10] Early signs for a woman with HIV include gynecological disorders, especially pelvic inflammatory disease ("PID"), infections causing abnormal pap smears (cervical dysplasia), and chronic yeast infections.[11] HIV-positive women also have a higher risk of developing cervical cancer.[12] If you are HIV-positive, getting a complete gynecological

---

3. Div. of HIV/AIDS Prevention, U.S. Dept. of Health & Human Servs., How long does it take for HIV to cause AIDS?, available at http://www.cdc.gov/hiv/resources/qa/definitions.htm (last visited Sept. 26, 2010).

4. Div. of HIV/AIDS Prevention, U.S. Dept. of Health & Human Servs., Basic Statistics, available at http://www.cdc.gov/hiv/topics/surveillance/basic.htm#aidsdiagnoses (last visited Sept. 26, 2010).

5. Office of Justice Programs, U.S. Dept. of Justice, HIV in Prisons, 2007-2008, Publ'n No. NCJ 228307, available at http://bjs.ojp.usdoj.gov/content/pub/pdf/hivp08.pdf (last visited Sept. 26, 2010).

6. Bureau of HIV/AIDS Epidemiology, N.Y. Dept. of Health, New York State HIV/AIDS Surveillance Annual Report: For Cases Diagnosed Through December 2007, at 46 (May 2009), available at http://www.health.state.ny.us/diseases/aids/statistics/annual/2007/2007-12_annual_surveillance_report.pdf (last visited Sept. 26, 2010).

7. Div of HIV/AIDS Prevention, U.S. Dept. of Health & Human Servs., How is HIV Passed from One Person to Another?, available at http://www.cdc.gov/hiv/resources/qa/transmission.htm (last visited Sept. 26, 2010).

8. Div. of HIV/AIDS Prevention, U.S. Dept. of Health & Human Servs., Can I Get HIV From Getting a Tattoo or Through Body Piercing?, available at http://www.cdc.gov/hiv/resources/qa/transmission.htm (last visited Sept. 26, 2010).

9. Div. of HIV/AIDS Prevention, U.S. Dept. of Health & Human Servs., HIV and AIDS: Are You at Risk?, available at http://www.cdc.gov/hiv/resources/brochures/at-risk.htm (last visited Sept. 26, 2010).

10. See Louise G. Trubek & Elizabeth A. Hoffman, Vital Issues in National Health Care Reform: Searching for a Balance in Universal Health Care Reform: Protection for the Disenfranchised Consumer, 43 DePaul L. Rev. 1081, 1087 (1994).

11. Div.of HIV/AIDS Prevention, U.S. Dept. of Health & Human Servs., HIV/AIDS and Women, available at http://www.cdc.gov/hiv/topics/women/overview_partner.htm (last visited Sept. 26, 2010).

12. Nat'l Cancer Inst., What You Need to Know About: Cervical Cancer: Risk Factors, available at http://www.cancer.gov/cancertopics/wyntk/cervix/page4 (last visited Sept. 26, 2010) .

exam, including an inspection of the cervix (colposcopy) and a pap smear every six months, is important to detect any problems early. If you believe you may be infected with HIV or AIDS, try to get tested.

Appendix A includes several organizations and sources of information about HIV and AIDS. If you are HIV-positive, it is important that you be tested for tuberculosis, which is a very contagious and serious disease, because HIV-positive people have a much higher risk of getting tuberculosis.[13]

2. Tuberculosis

Tuberculosis ("TB") is a disease caused by bacteria that are spread through the air. When you breathe in the bacteria, they usually settle in and attack your lungs,[14] but the bacteria can also move to and attack other parts of your body.[15] Outside of prison, TB does not spread that easily, but in prison, TB spreads much more easily because of overcrowding and poor ventilation. People born outside the United States (especially in Latin America, the Caribbean, Africa, Asia, Eastern Europe, or Russia) are more likely to have been infected with the bacteria.[16] People who have spent time in places where TB is common, like homeless shelters, drug treatment centers, health care clinics, jails, and prisons, are also more likely to have TB infection.[17]

It is important to know that being infected with the TB bacteria is not the same as having TB disease. If you have TB infection ("latent TB"), you will have no symptoms and you cannot spread TB to others. But if you do not get medical treatment, your TB infection can develop into TB disease ("active TB").[18] If you have active TB, you can have symptoms like a bad cough lasting more than three weeks, pain in your chest, coughing up blood or phlegm, weakness or fatigue, weight loss, no appetite, chills, fever, or night sweating.[19]

TB is particularly dangerous for HIV-positive people because of their weakened immune systems. In fact, TB is one of the leading causes of death for HIV-positive people.[20] Although ten to fifteen million Americans have latent TB,[21] only about five to ten percent develop active TB disease during their lives.[22] But, people with both HIV and TB bacteria are much more likely to develop active TB than HIV-negative people.[23]

Be sure to consult other sources and prison medical professionals if you think you have TB. Active TB disease can be treated and cured if you get medical care, take prescription medication, and follow doctor's orders.[24]

---

13. Div. of Tuberculosis Elimination, U.S. Dept. of Health & Human Servs., TB and HIV Coinfection, available at http://www.cdc.gov/tb/topic/TBHIVcoinfection/default.htm (last visited Sept. 26, 2010).

14. Div. of Tuberculosis Elimination, U.S. Dept. of Health & Human Servs., Basic TB Facts, available at http://www.cdc.gov/tb/topic/basics/default.htm (last visited Sept. 26, 2010).

15. Div. of Tuberculosis Elimination, U.S. Dept. of Health & Human Servs., Basic TB Facts, available at http://www.cdc.gov/tb/topic/basics/default.htm (last visited Sept. 26, 2010).

16. Ctrs. for Disease Control & Prevention, Travelers' Health- Yellow Book, Chapter 5: Other Infectious Diseases Related to Travel: Tuberculosis, available at http://wwwnc.cdc.gov/travel/yellowbook/2010/chapter-5/tuberculosis.aspx (last visited Sept. 26, 2010).

17. Ctrs. for Disease Control & Prevention, Travelers' Health- Yellow Book, Chapter 5: Other Infectious Diseases Related to Travel: Tuberculosis, available at http://wwwnc.cdc.gov/travel/yellowbook/2010/chapter-5/tuberculosis.aspx (last visited Sept. 26, 2010).

18. Div. of Tuberculosis Elimination, U.S. Dept. of Health & Human Servs., Basic TB Facts, available at http://www.cdc.gov/tb/topic/basics/default.htm (last visited Sept. 26, 2010).

19.Div. of Tuberculosis Elimination, U.S. Dept. of Health & Human Servs., Basic TB Facts: Signs and Symptoms of TB Disease, available at http://www.cdc.gov/tb/topic/basics/signsandsymptoms.htm (last visited Sept. 26, 2010).

20. Div. of Tuberculosis Elimination, U.S. Dept. of Health & Human Servs., TB and HIV Coinfection, available at http://www.cdc.gov/tb/topic/TBHIVcoinfection/default.htm (last visited Sept. 26, 2010).

21. Div. of Tuberculosis Elimination, U.S. Dept. of Health & Human Servs., Fact Sheet – Trends in Tuberculosis (2009), available at http://www.cdc.gov/tb/publications/factsheets/statistics/TBTrends.htm (last visited October 12, 2010).

22. Div. of Tuberculosis Elimination, U.S. Dept. of Health & Human Servs., Fact Sheet – The Difference Between Latent TB Infection and Active TB Disease (2010), available at http://www.cdc.gov/tb/publications/factsheets/general/LTBIandActiveTB.htm (last visited October 12, 2010).

23. Div. of Tuberculosis Elimination, U.S. Dept. of Health & Human Servs., TB and HIV Coinfection, available at http://www.cdc.gov/tb/topic/TBHIVcoinfection/default.htm (last visited Sept. 26, 2010).

24. Div. of Tuberculosis Elimination, U.S. Dept. of Health & Human Servs., Tuberculosis (TB): Treatment, available at http://www.cdc.gov/tb/topic/treatment/default.htm (last visited Sept. 26, 2010).

3. Hepatitis B and Hepatitis C

Hepatitis is a disease that attacks the liver. There are different types of hepatitis, but the most common types among prisoners are hepatitis B and hepatitis C.

(a) Hepatitis B

In 2007, there were about 43,000 new hepatitis B infections in the United States.[25] About 2,000 to 4,000 people die each year from hepatitis B.[26] The hepatitis B virus, like HIV, is spread by having sex with infected persons without a condom, through sharing needles ("works") when shooting drugs, through needle sticks or sharp exposures on the job, or from an infected mother to her baby during birth.[27] You can avoid getting hepatitis B by taking the same precautions as you would for HIV.

People who have hepatitis B often do not have any symptoms, but can still spread the virus to other people.[28] If you do have symptoms, you may develop yellow eyes and skin, tiredness, loss of appetite, dark urine, abdominal pains, and nausea. There are vaccines to protect you from hepatitis B, but once you get hepatitis B, there is no cure. You should still get medical attention, however, because there are medical treatments to help your symptoms.[29] If you have hepatitis B, you should get tested for HIV and hepatitis C.

(b) Hepatitis C

Hepatitis C virus ("HCV") causes hepatitis C. In 2007, there were an estimated 17,000 new hepatitis C virus infections in the United States, and there were about 3.2 million chronically or permanently infected persons.[30] Almost 80% of infected persons do not show any signs or symptoms of hepatitis C. Many people infected with hepatitis C may not show any symptoms for twenty or thirty years. Hepatitis C symptoms include yellow skin, dark urine, fatigue, abdominal pain, and loss of appetite.[31] Most people (around 70%) with chronic HCV infection have some liver damage. If you have hepatitis C, you should not drink alcohol because alcohol can make your liver damage worse.[32]

While few people outside of prison have HCV, a very high percentage of prisoners are infected with HCV.[33] To avoid getting hepatitis C, you should:

(1) Never shoot drugs (if you cannot stop, never reuse or share syringes, water, or "works");
(2) Never share toothbrushes, razors, or other personal care items;
(3) Avoid getting a tattoo or body piercing if there is a chance that someone else's blood is on the tools or the artist or piercer does not follow good health practices;[34]
(4) Avoid having unprotected sex.

Though the risk of spreading hepatitis C through sexual intercourse is low, it is spread through direct contact with infected blood.[35] If you have hepatitis C, you should be tested for HIV and hepatitis B.

---

25. Div. of Viral Hepatitis, U.S. Dept. of Health & Human Servs., Hepatitis B FAQs for the Public, available at http://www.cdc.gov/hepatitis/B/bFAQ.htm#statistics (last visited Sept. 26, 2010).

26. Div. of Viral Hepatitis, U.S. Dept. of Health & Human Servs., Hepatitis B FAQs for the Public, available at http://www.cdc.gov/hepatitis/HBV/HBVfaq.htm#overview (last visited October 12, 2010).

27. Div. of Viral Hepatitis, U.S. Dept. of Health & Human Servs., Hepatitis B FAQs for the Public, available at http://www.cdc.gov/hepatitis/B/bFAQ.htm#overview (last visited Sept. 26, 2010).

28. Div. of Viral Hepatitis, U.S. Dept. of Health & Human Servs., Hepatitis B FAQs for the Public, available at http://www.cdc.gov/hepatitis/B/bFAQ.htm#overview (last visited Sept. 26, 2010).

29. Div. of Viral Hepatitis, U.S. Dept. of Health & Human Servs., Hepatitis B FAQs for the Public, available at http://www.cdc.gov/hepatitis/B/bFAQ.htm#overview (last visited Sept. 26, 2010).

30. Div. of Viral Hepatitis, U.S. Dept. of Health & Human Servs., Hepatitis C FAQs for the Public, available at http://www.cdc.gov/hepatitis/C/cFAQ.htm (last visited Sept. 26, 2010).

31. Div. of Viral Hepatitis, U.S. Dept. of Health & Human Servs., Hepatitis C FAQs for the Public, available at http://www.cdc.gov/hepatitis/C/cFAQ.htm (last visited Sept. 26, 2010).

32. Div. of Viral Hepatitis, U.S. Dept. of Health & Human Servs., Hepatitis C FAQs for the Public, available at http://www.cdc.gov/hepatitis/C/cFAQ.htm (last visited Sept. 26, 2010).

33. Div. of Viral Hepatitis, U.S. Dept. of Health & Human Servs., Viral Hepatitis Scientific Information- Specific Settings: Correctional Facilities and Viral Hepatitis, available at http://www.cdc.gov/hepatitis/Settings/Corrections.htm (last visited Sept. 26, 2010).

34. Div. of Viral Hepatitis, U.S. Dept. of Health & Human Servs., Hepatitis C General Information (2010), available at http://www.cdc.gov/hepatitis/HCV/PDFs/HepCGeneralFactSheet.pdf (last visited Sept. 26, 2010).

35. Div. of Viral Hepatitis, U.S. Dept. of Health & Human Servs., Hepatitis C General Information (2010), available at http://www.cdc.gov/hepatitis/HCV/PDFs/HepCGeneralFactSheet.pdf (last visited Sept. 26, 2010).

4. Methicillin-resistant Staphylococcus Aureus ("MRSA")

Staph is a kind of bacteria that can cause various infections, including everything from minor skin problems to serious, fatal infections.[36] Methicillin-resistant Staphylococcus aureus, or "MRSA," is a kind of staph not easily treatable with the antibiotics that normally cure a staph infection.[37] Many people carry staph bacteria in their nasal passages without getting sick.[38] Illness can develop if the bacteria enter the skin, often through a scratch, scrape or another minor wound. Most cases of MRSA happen in health-care settings like hospitals, but outbreaks in prisons are becoming more common.[39]

The first symptom of MRSA is usually a skin infection easily mistaken for a pimple, boil or insect bite.[40] The infection may be painful, swollen, red or produce pus.[41] It can develop into a large abscess or blister.[42] MRSA is usually treatable, either by draining the wound or taking antibiotics.[43] Do not drain the wound yourself, since this can cause the infection to spread.[44] The infection may return even after treatment.[45]

MRSA and other staph infections can be spread to other people through direct physical contact or, less commonly, through contact with an infected surface or object.[46] The risk can be lessened by keeping wounds clean, dry and covered.[47] It is also important to keep shared surfaces clean, wash your hands often (especially after touching a wound), and avoid sharing personal items like razors and clothing.[48] If you suspect you have MRSA, it is especially important to seek treatment if you have HIV or another immune system problem, because a MRSA infection may lead to more serious problems.[49]

C. Constitutional Rights In A Prison Setting

The rest of this Chapter discusses your rights to treatment for and protection from infectious diseases in prison. It also explains when and how a correctional facility can limit your rights to treatment and protection. This Part explains the general legal standard that courts use to determine if a prison policy is constitutionally valid. Knowing the rule will help you better understand the court decisions in this Chapter.

---

36. Div. of Healthcare Quality Promotion, U.S. Dept. of Health and Human Servs., Definition of MRSA, available at http://www.cdc.gov/mrsa/definition/index.html (last visited Sept. 26, 2010).

37. Div. of Healthcare Quality Promotion, U.S. Dept. of Health and Human Servs., Definition of MRSA, available at http://www.cdc.gov/mrsa/definition/index.html (last visited Sept. 26, 2010).

38. Div. of Healthcare Quality Promotion, U.S. Dept. of Health and Human Servs., Definition of MRSA, available at http://www.cdc.gov/mrsa/definition/index.html (last visited Sept. 26, 2010).

39. Div. of Healthcare Quality Promotion, U.S. Dept. of Health and Human Servs., Causes of MRSA Infections, available at http://www.cdc.gov/mrsa/causes/index.html (last visited Sept. 26, 2010).

40. Tara Parker-Pope, MRSA Warning Signs and Preventive Measures, N.Y. Times, Oct. 27, 2007 at B4, available at http://www.nytimes.com/2007/10/27/nyregion/27mrsa.html?scp=3&sq=%22tara+parker-pope%22+MRSA&st=nyt (last visited Sept. 26, 2010).

41. Div. of Healthcare Quality Promotion, U.S. Dept. of Health and Human Servs., Symptoms of MRSA, available at http://www.cdc.gov/mrsa/symptoms/index.html (last visited Sept. 26, 2010).

42. Tara Parker-Pope, MRSA Warning Signs and Preventive Measures, N.Y. Times, Oct. 27, 2007 at B4, available at http://www.nytimes.com/2007/10/27/nyregion/27mrsa.html?scp=3&sq=%22tara+parker-pope%22+MRSA&st=nyt. (last visited Sept. 26, 2010).

43. Div. of Healthcare Quality Promotion, U.S. Dept. of Health and Human Servs., Treatment of MRSA Infections, available at http://www.cdc.gov/mrsa/treatment/index.html (last visited Sept. 26, 2010).

44. Tara Parker-Pope, MRSA Warning Signs and Preventive Measures, N.Y. Times, Oct. 27, 2007 at B4, available at http://www.nytimes.com/2007/10/27/nyregion/27mrsa.html?scp=3&sq=%22tara+parker-pope%22+MRSA&st=nyt (last visited Sept. 26, 2010).

45. Div. of Healthcare Quality Promotion, U.S. Dept. of Health and Human Servs., Treatment of MRSA Infections, available at http://www.cdc.gov/mrsa/treatment/index.html (last visited Sept. 26, 2010).

46. Federal Bureau of Prisons, Clinical Practice Guidelines, Management of Methicillin-Resistant Staphylococcus aureus (MRSA) Infections, at 29 (2010), available at http://www.bop.gov/news/PDFs/mrsa.pdf (last visited Sept. 26, 2010).

47. Div. of Healthcare Quality Promotion, U.S. Dept. of Health and Human Servs., Personal Prevention of MRSA Skin Infections, available at http://www.cdc.gov/mrsa/prevent/personal.html (last visited Sept. 26, 2010).

48. Div. of Healthcare Quality Promotion, U.S. Dept. of Health and Human Servs., Personal Prevention of MRSA Skin Infections, available at http://www.cdc.gov/mrsa/prevent/personal.html (last visited Sept. 26, 2010).

49. Divya Ahuja, MD, and Helmut Albrecht, MD, HIV and Community-Acquired MRSA, Journal Watch HIV/AIDS Clinical Care (2009), available at http://aids-clinical-care.jwatch.org/cgi/content/full/2009/209/1 (last visited Jan. 27, 2010).

In general, correctional facilities can limit your constitutional rights if the prison's actions are "reasonably related to a legitimate penological interest."[50] To decide if a prison policy has a legitimate penological interest, courts look at four factors:

(1) The existence of a valid, rational connection between the prison policy and a legitimate state interest;
(2) The existence of alternative means of exercising the right being limited;
(3) The impact granting the right will have on correction officers, other prisoners, or the allocation of prison resources; and
(4) Whether the prison policy or regulation is an exaggerated response to prison concerns.[51]

These four factors are often referred to as the Turner standard, since the Supreme Court first stated this standard in Turner v. Safley.[52]

So, if you think a prison policy illegally violates your constitutional rights, you may want to argue that there is no legitimate penological interest which justifies the violation, or at least, that the interest is not "reasonably related" to the actions or policy of the prison officials. You can also try to argue that there are other ways of accomplishing the same governmental goal without compromising your constitutional rights.

D. Legal Rights Concerning Testing For Infectious Diseases

1. Involuntary Testing

Mandatory testing policies vary widely among states. States may also have different policies for different diseases, so a state may require prisoners to take a TB test but not an HIV test, for example. If you are outside New York State, you should check your state's laws to find out what its testing policies are. Courts generally allow prisons to test prisoners for infectious diseases, even without a prisoner's consent, because courts find that the prevention of disease is a legitimate state interest.[53]

(a) HIV Testing

In New York State prisons, you normally cannot be tested for HIV without your consent (you must voluntarily agree to be tested).[54] But, if you are convicted of certain sex offenses, you can be tested for HIV against your will if the victim requests that you be tested.[55] You will learn your test results and the results will also be sent to the victim, and possibly to the victim's immediate family, guardian, physicians, attorneys, and medical or mental health providers. Contacts of the victim may also be notified if there was a risk of HIV transmission.[56] Your test results cannot be used against you in a civil or criminal proceeding related to the events that were the basis of your conviction.[57]

Federal prisons, unlike New York state prisons, can require a prisoner to undergo HIV testing, although federal prisons do not test all prisoners. If you have a sentence of six months or more, and if medical personnel think you might be HIV-infected, they may require you to take an HIV test.[58] If you refuse the test, you might receive an incident report for failing to follow an order.[59] Also, if you refuse testing, you may not be able to file a claim for failure to receive adequate medical care.[60] Additionally, federal prisons conduct

---

50. Turner v. Safley, 482 U.S. 78, 87, 107 S. Ct. 2254, 2261, 96 L. Ed. 2d 64, 77–78 (1987) (holding that prison systems' regulations of inmate marriages and inmate-to-inmate correspondence must meet a "reasonable relationship" standard.)

51. Turner v. Safley, 482 U.S. 78, 89–91, 107 S. Ct. 2254, 2262, 96 L. Ed. 2d 64, 79–80 (1987).

52. Turner v. Safley, 482 U.S. 78, 107 S. Ct. 2254, 96 L. Ed. 2d 64 (1987).

53. See, e.g., Rossi v. Portuondo, 277 A.D.2d 526, 527, 714 N.Y.S.2d 816, 817 (3d Dept. 2000).

54. N.Y. Pub. Health Law § 2781(1) (Consol. 2010) (stating consent must be "written" and "informed" from a person who is capable of consenting; if the person is incapable, someone authorized by law may consent for the person).

55. N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 390.15(1)(a) (Consol. 2010) (stating that the sex offense must be an act of "sexual intercourse," "oral sexual conduct," or "anal sexual conduct" as defined by N.Y. Penal Law § 130.00).

56. N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 390.15(6)(a)(ii) (Consol. 2010).

57. N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 390.15(6)(a)(ii) (Consol. 2010).

58. 28 C.F.R § 549.12(a)(1)(2010).

59. 28 C.F.R. § 549.12(a)(3) (2010). See Chapter 18 of the JLM, "Your Rights at Prison Disciplinary Hearings," for more information about the consequences of prison incident reports.

60. Walker v. Peters, 989 F. Supp. 971, 975 (N.D. Ill. 1997) (finding that deprivation of medication cannot be considered deliberate indifference unless prisoner has received a positive HIV test first). See Chapter 23 of the JLM, "Your Right to Adequate Medical Care," for more information on the deliberate indifference standard.

mandatory random testing once a year. If you test positive, the prison cannot subject you to disciplinary proceedings based solely on your results, though you may be punished if you have performed an act to transmit the disease.[61] Also, federal prisons test prisoners being considered for release, parole, good conduct time release, furlough, or placement in a community-based program. Refusal to be tested may result in an incident report for refusing an order.[62] If you test positive, the prison cannot deny you participation in activities and programs just because of the result.[63]

Outside of New York, many states have mandatory HIV testing when you enter prison,[64] during custody, and/or upon your release.[65] Despite challenges on the basis of the Eighth Amendment's prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment, the Fourth Amendment's prohibition on unreasonable searches and seizures, the right to privacy, and the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, courts tend to uphold involuntary testing on the grounds that it is reasonably related to a legitimate penological interest.[66]

(b) TB Testing

While HIV cannot be passed from person to person by casual contact, TB is spread through the air. So, prison TB testing policies often differ from prison HIV testing policies. In New York state, Department of Correctional Services ("DOCS") policy requires all prisoners entering prison to be tested for tuberculosis. The TB screening includes a chest x-ray and a skin test, where a small amount of purified protein derivative ("PPD") is injected beneath your skin and observed for a reaction. After the initial test, you will be re-tested yearly. If you refuse testing, medical personnel will counsel you as to the benefits of the test. If you still refuse, then you will be placed in medical keeplock (also known as "tuberculin (TB) hold") for up to a year until you have received three negative chest x-rays or you agree to be tested. While in TB hold, you are only allowed one hour of solitary exercise per day and three showers a week. You lose your telephone privileges and can receive visits from lawyers.[67]

Courts have generally upheld the New York state DOCS TB testing policy against challenges claiming violation of the Fourth Amendment protection against unreasonable searches or the Eighth Amendment prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment because they consider the policy to be reasonably related to preventing the spread of tuberculosis in correctional facilities.[68] Additionally, some courts have upheld

---

61. 28 C.F.R. § 549.13(c) (2010).

62. 28 C.F.R. § 549.12(a)(1) (2010).

63. See 28 C.F.R. § 549.13(b) (2010) (stating that prisoners may be limited in programming if they have an infectious disease which can be transferred through casual conduct, possibly showing that limitations in programming are not allowed based on a prisoner's disease which cannot be passed on through casual conduct (like HIV)). See also 42 U.S.C. § 2000cc-1 (2000) (stating generally that the government shall not impose restrictions on the religious activity of prisoners unless the government can show that such restriction furthers a compelling governmental interest using the least restrictive means possible). This is limited to available programs to institutionalized persons which are federally funded. See also 42 U.S.C. § 2000d-4a (1964) (defining "program or activity" as "all of the operations of a department, agency, special purpose district, or other instrumentality in a state or local government"). Note that this only applies to religious activity, meaning that this law does not prevent you from being excluded from a non-religious activity if you test positive for HIV, and that you may still be excluded if the government has a compelling interest in doing this.

64. Alabama, Georgia, Idaho, and Missouri are among the states that mandate testing of prisoners entering the prison system. See Ala. Code § 22-11A-17 (2006) (subjecting all persons sentenced to confinement or imprisonment for more than 30 consecutive days to mandatory testing); Ga. Code Ann. § 42-5-52.1(c) (1997 & Supp. 2009); Idaho Code § 39-604(1) (2004); Mo. Rev. Stat. § 191.659 (2004).

65. Alabama, Idaho, and Missouri are among the states that test upon release. See Ala. Code § 22-11A-17(a) (2006); Idaho Code § 39-604(1) (2004); Mo. Rev. Stat. § 191.659 (2004).

66. See, e.g., Dunn v. White, 880 F.2d 1188, 1196–98 (10th Cir. 1989) (finding no 1st, 4th, or 14th Amendment constitutional violations when prisoner alleged he was threatened with disciplinary segregation if he failed to submit to the HIV blood test even though he claimed his religious beliefs did not allow the test).

67. Division of Health Services, New York Department of Correctional Services, Health Services Policy Manual, § 1.18, at 6 (June 21, 2004).

68. See Lee v. Frederick 519 F. Supp. 2d 320, 327 (W.D.N.Y. 2007) (finding that prisoner's 8th Amendment rights were not violated when he was placed on TB hold because, while plaintiff did suffer some loss of his freedom of movement, he didn't present evidence that he suffered a serious deprivation of his rights or that defendants acted with the culpable state of mind—unnecessary and wanton infliction of pain); Delisser v. Goord, 2003 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 488, at *4, *16, *18–19, *23 (N.D.N.Y. Jan. 15, 2003) (unpublished) (holding that prisoner, who was placed in TB hold for a total of 52 days for refusing to submit to PPD test and then for refusing to take TB medication, did not suffer a violation of his 8th or 14th Amendment rights); Word v. Croce, 169 F. Supp. 2d 219, 222, 225 (S.D.N.Y. 2001) (finding that where plaintiff alleged violations of the 4th Amendment because she was put on TB Hold, her claims were more appropriately mandatory TB testing or confinement in TB hold even if the test is against the prisoner's religious beliefs.[69] However, DOCS TB policy states that "[a]ccommodations for those with religious objections to tuberculin skin test may be made if they can be done without putting the health of other inmates and staff at significant risk."[70] According to the policy, if you refuse the PPD test on religious grounds, you are placed in TB hold while the legitimacy of your objection is determined. If the Chief Medical Officer determines that you sincerely hold a religious belief that prohibits PPD testing, he may request that you take a blood test and chest x-ray instead of the skin test. You will remain in TB hold until the results of the blood test, chest x-ray, and physical examination indicate that you do not have latent TB.[71]

If the TB test is against your religious beliefs and you want to challenge the policy as a violation of your First Amendment right to free exercise of religion, you should try to show how the policy is applying the policy to your particular circumstances does not make sense.[72] If you have submitted to the test in the past or are willing to undergo a chest x-ray, you might strengthen your chances of succeeding.[73] You may also be able to argue that being placed on TB hold is a violation of your Eighth Amendment rights, especially if the ventilation system does not somehow prevent the air that circulates in your cell from reaching other prisoners or staff, you might also be able to argue that the keeplock policy does not make sense as applied to you since it does not help protect others' safety.[74] brought under the 8th Amendment, and also finding that the TB Hold was not a violation of her Constitutional rights); Davidson v. Kelly, 1997 U.S. App. LEXIS 33796, at *4–5, *8 (2d Cir. Nov. 24, 1997) (unpublished) (placing a prisoner in TB hold for three days until he agreed to be tested for TB did not violate the prisoner's 8th Amendment rights because it furthered a legitimate penological interest); Johnson v. Keane, 1994 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 1228, at *3 (S.D.N.Y. Feb. 9, 1994) (unpublished) (holding that the Fourth Amendment rights of prisoner, who was confined to his cell after refusing a PPD test on the grounds that he might contract AIDS or be otherwise harmed, were not violated).

---

69. See, e.g., Rossi v. Portuondo, 277 A.D.2d 526, 527, 714 N.Y.S.2d 816, 817 (3d Dept. 2000) (holding that giving prisoners the option of testing or being placed in medical confinement is "reasonably related" to the "legitimate penological interest" of preventing the spread of the disease; therefore, the testing policy did not violate prisoner's First Amendment right to free exercise of religion).

70. Division of Health Services, New York Department of Correctional Services, Health Services Policy Manual, § 1.18, at 25 (June 21, 2004).

71. Division of Health Services, New York Department of Correctional Services, Health Services Policy Manual, § 1.18, at 25 (June 21, 2004).

72. Reynolds v. Goord, 103 F. Supp. 2d 316, 337 (S.D.N.Y. 2000) (holding that Rastafarian prisoner who expected to be in tuberculin hold for a year after refusing a TB test showed a clear and substantial likelihood of proving at trial that the prison policy as applied violated his 1st Amendment rights). If you are a federal prisoner, also see Jolly v. Coughlin, 76 F.3d 468, 480 (2d Cir. 1996) (stating that prison officials likely violated the prisoner's religious freedom under the Religious Freedom Restoration Act (RFRA), 42 U.S.C. §§ 2000bb–bb-4). If you are a state prisoner, however, RFRA is no longer good law and Jolly will not apply to your case. City of Boerne v. Flores, 521 U.S. 507, 117 S. Ct. 2157, 138 L. Ed. 2d 624 (1997). After RFRA was declared unconstitutional as applied to states, some states enacted state laws modeled on RFRA to fill the gap. So if you are a state prisoner, you should check to see if your state has enacted a "mini-RFRA" state law. If you are a state or federal prisoner, you may also be able to make an argument under the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act of 2000 (RLUIPA) which states that "[n]o government shall impose a substantial burden on the religious exercise of a person residing in or confined to an institution" unless the government establishes that the burden furthers "a compelling governmental interest," and does so by "the least restrictive means." 42 U.S.C. § 2000cc-1(a)(1)-(2). For a discussion of a possible RLUIPA argument, see Johnson v. Sherman, 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 24098, at *14 (E.D. Cal. April 2, 2007) (unpublished) ("Preventing the spread of tuberculosis among the closely confined population within the prison by use of the least restrictive means possible greatly outweighs the harm posed to the plaintiff by submitting to the skin test. While the harm to plaintiff's ability to practice his belief is no doubt burdened, the CDCR has a grave responsibility to protect the inmate populations confined within its prisons from the spread of a highly contagious and debilitating disease.")

73. See Selah v. Goord, 255 F. Supp. 2d 42, 55 (N.D.N.Y. 2003) (holding DOCS TB policy as applied to petitioner was irrational since he had been tested while incarcerated); Reynolds v. Goord, 103 F. Supp. 2d 316, 337 (S.D.N.Y. 2000) (holding that Rastafarian prisoner who expected to be in tuberculin hold for a year after refusing a PPD test showed a clear and substantial likelihood of proving at trial that the prison policy as applied violated his 1st Amendment rights).

74. Jolly v. Coughlin, 76 F.3d 468, 480 (2d Cir. 1996) (finding a substantial likelihood of an 8th Amendment violation when New York state prison officials placed a prisoner in "medical keeplock" for three-and-a-half years, after the prisoner refused to undergo a TB test for religious reasons). In Jolly, the court considered these facts: (1) prisoners who refused to be tested were placed in medical keeplock; (2) medical keeplock did not involve "respiratory isolation" and thus did not reduce the risks of infection; (3) prisoners were allowed to leave their cells only once each week for a 10-minute shower and could leave for meetings with counsel; and (4) plaintiff suffered headaches, hair loss, rashes, and difficulty standing or walking due to his confinement. Jolly v. Coughlin, 76 F.3d 468, 472 (2d Cir. 1996). Although the portion of Jolly addressing RFRA violations is no longer good law for state prisoners (see footnote 72), it is still good law

If you are in a federal prison, you must undergo a PPD test and possibly a chest x-ray when you enter the facility.[75] If you refuse both tests, the prison will conduct them without your consent.[76] Refusing to be tested may result in an incident report, although you will not be placed in medical isolation unless there is a clinical indication for such measures.[77]

(c) Hepatitis B and Hepatitis C

New York state does not require HCV testing for all prisoners, but does test all prisoners who are determined to be at high risk.[78] You are considered to be at high risk of HBV or HCV if you have a history of the following: HIV infection, intravenous drug use, intranasal cocaine use, sexually-transmitted diseases, blood transfusions before July 1992, hemodialysis, infusion of clotting factor before 1987, tattoos or body piercing with non-sterile equipment, solid organ transplants, or symptoms of hepatitis.

In New York state, during your initial health screening, you will be offered a hepatitis B vaccine if you are not currently infected but are at high risk, unless your medical history suggests otherwise. You are considered at high risk if you are eighteen years old or younger and not immune, you have had more than one sex partner in six months, you recently had a sexually-transmitted disease, you are male and have had sex with other men, you inject illegal drugs, you have been exposed to blood or blood-contaminated products, you have had household contact with persons suffering from chronic hepatitis B infection, you are a hemodialysis patient, you take clotting factor concentrates (you are a hemophiliac), or you have chronic hepatitis C and are not immune. The vaccine consists of three doses over six months.[79]

If you are in a federal prison, you will be screened to determine if you are likely to be HBV- or HCV-infected. Similar to the federal prison system's TB policy, refusal to submit to the test will result in an incident report for failure to follow an order.

(d) MRSA

The Federal Bureau of Prisons recommends that all prisoners should be checked for skin infections at their initial intake screening and also after returning from a hospitalization.[80] Prisoners at high risk for MRSA infections (including those with HIV, diabetes, or open wounds) are supposed to be screened at all routine medical examinations.[81] for both state and federal prisoners for arguments based on 8th Amendment violations.

---

75. Fed. Bureau of Prisons, U.S. Dept. of Justice, Program Statement P6190.03, Infectious Disease Management, at 9 (June 28, 2005), available at http://www.bop.gov/policy/progstat/6190_003.pdf; see also Washington v. Cambra, 165 F.3d 920, 1998 U.S. App. LEXIS 30072 (9th Cir. 1998) (unpublished table decision).

76. See, e.g., Ballard v. Woodard, 641 F. Supp. 432, 437 (W.D.N.C. 1986) (performing a PPD test without a prisoner's consent does not constitute the denial of any federal constitutional rights where the prison had a legitimate interest in "orderly and uniform implementation" of the test); Dunn v. Zenk, No. 1:07-CV-2007-RLV, 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 73891, at *9 (N.D. Ga. Oct. 1, 2007) (holding that involuntary testing for tuberculosis does not violate prisoner's constitutional rights).

77. Fed. Bureau of Prisons, U.S. Dept. of Justice, Program Statement P6190.03, Infectious Disease Management, at 8 (June 28, 2005), available at http://www.bop.gov/policy/progstat/6190_003.pdf.

78. See Division of Health Services, New York Department of Correctional Services, Health Services Policy Manual: Health Appraisal, § 1.19 at 2 (Feb. 20, 2004); Memorandum from Lester N. Wright, Departure Comm'r/Chief Med. Officer N.Y. Dept. of Corr. Servs., on Revised Hepatitis C Primary Care Practice Guidelines to Facility Health Servs. 1 (Mar. 25, 2003).

79. See Division of Health Services, New York Department of Correctional Services, Health Services Policy Manual, § 1.19 (Feb. 20, 2004) (outlining the procedure for a prisoner's initial health appraisal upon entry); Division of Health Services, New York Department of Correctional Services, Health Services Policy Manual: Standing Orders for Immunizations, § 1.54 (May 11, 2004) (specifying under what circumstances the vaccine should be offered).

80. See Federal Bureau of Prisons, Clinical Practice Guidelines, Management of Methicillin-Resistant Staphylococcus aureus (MRSA) Infections 2 (2005), available at http://www.bop.gov/news/PDFs/mrsa.pdf (last visited September 26, 2010).

81. See Federal Bureau of Prisons, Clinical Practice Guidelines, Management of Methicillin-Resistant Staphylococcus aureus (MRSA) Infections 2 (2005), available at http://www.bop.gov/news/PDFs/mrsa.pdf (last visited September 26, 2010).

2. Right to Testing upon Request

(a) HIV Testing

Many states provide HIV tests for prisoners upon request. If you are denied a test, you might consider challenging the denial as a violation of the correctional facility's own policy. In New York state prisons, you will be offered a test when you first enter the facility. Also, anonymous testing (where you do not include your identity) is available through the Criminal Justice Initiative ("CJI").[82]

If you are a federal prisoner, you can request HIV testing, but not more than once per year.[83] At least one federal court has failed to recognize a constitutional right to HIV testing, especially in cases where the prisoner cannot allege specific exposure to HIV.[84] But, you may have an Eighth Amendment claim if you belong to a high-risk group and are denied an HIV test, since such a denial would prevent you from getting proper medical care. Additionally, if you meet the prison's specified criteria and are still refused a test, you may also have a claim.[85] You should check to see how the courts in your jurisdiction have decided this issue.

(b) Hepatitis B

If you are in a federal prison, you can request a hepatitis B test after consulting with a Bureau of Prisons' health care provider. However, you cannot be tested more than once per year.[86]

(c) MRSA

If you have a skin infection that may be caused by MRSA, the wound may be tested if your doctor feels it is necessary to determine the proper treatment.[87]

3. Consequences of Testing Positive for HIV in New York

States have different rules about what happens after a prisoner tests positive for HIV. In New York, in order to track HIV/AIDS better and to increase prevention of HIV infection, the state assembly adopted the HIV Reporting and Partner Notification (HIVRPN) law, which became effective in 2000.[88] This law requires doctors and other medical providers (including the laboratories doing the tests) to report to the Department of Health the names of people infected with HIV, HIV-related illness, or AIDS.[89] The information is supposed to remain confidential.[90] However, New York regulations allow for HIV status to be revealed to employees or

---

82. The Criminal Justice Initiative is a project funded by the New York Department of Health's AIDS Institute, in which community-based organizations go into prisons and provide tests, counseling, peer education, and discharge planning. N.Y. Dept.. of Health, Prevention and Support Services, available at http://www.health.state.ny.us/diseases/aids/about/prevsup.htm#cji (last visited September 26, 2010).

83. 28 C.F.R. § 549.12(a)(4) (2007).

84. See St. Hilaire v. Lewis, No. 93-15129, 1994 U.S. App. LEXIS 14867, at *10 (9th Cir. June 7, 1994) (unpublished) (finding no constitutional violation for failure to provide an HIV test because prisoner was not a member of a high-risk group and had no alleged exposure to HIV). Doe v. Wigginton, 21 F.3d 733, 738–739 (6th Cir. 1994) (finding no 8th Amendment violation where a prisoner was refused an HIV test because the state policy required an HIV test if a prisoner "provides a presumptive history of exposure" and the prisoner did not provide such information).

85. See Doe v. Wigginton, 21 F.3d 733, 739–740 (6th Cir. 1994) (holding the prison did not violate the 8th or 14th Amendments for refusing to test for HIV on request because it could reasonably limit the testing based on a prisoner's history, medical symptoms, prior drug use, or sexual activity). It is possible the court would have allowed Doe's claim to prevail if he had given officials information indicating that he met the criteria for testing and was still refused a test.

86. 28 C.F.R. § 549.12(a)(4) (2005) (providing that a prisoner may request to be tested only once per year, unless more testing is determined to be necessary by the Bureau).

87. See generally Fed. Bureau of Prisons, U.S. Dept. of Justice, Program Statement P6190.03, Infectious Disease Management, at 3 (June 28, 2005), available at http://www.bop.gov/policy/progstat/6190_003.pdf (last visited September 26, 2010).

88. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 10, §§ 63.1–63.11 (2007) pgs. 4049-4064. See also N.Y. Dept. of Health, HIV Reporting & Partner Notification: What You Need to Know about the Law (2002), available at http://www.health.ny.gov/diseases/aids/regulations/reporting_and_notification/about_the_law.htm#quest1 (last visited September 26, 2010).

89. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 10, § 63.4(a)(1) (2007) pg. 4053. See also N.Y. Dept. of Health, HIV Reporting and Partner Notification: What You Need to Know about the Law (1001), available at http://www.health.ny.gov/diseases/aids/regulations/reporting_and_notification/about_the_law.htm#quest1 (last visited September 26, 2010); Mew York City Department of Health and Mental Hygiene: HIV Reporting/Partner Notification Law (1008), http://www.nyc.gov/html/doh/html/ah/ahn1.shtml (last visited Feb. 29, 2008).

90. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 10, § 63.6 (2007) pgs. 4055–4059. See also N.Y. Dept. of Health, HIV Reporting and Partner Notification: What You Need to Know about the Law (2000), available at agents of the Division of Probation and Correctional Alternatives, Division of Parole, Commission of Correction, or any local probation department. Disclosure of HIV status is only allowed to the extent that the individuals who receive such information are authorized to access records containing such information to carry out their functions, powers, and duties.[91] If you are diagnosed with an HIV-related illness, your medical care provider will ask for the names of your spouse, sexual partners, and/or needle-sharing partners.[92] If you provide those names, those individuals will receive notice they are at risk of being infected with HIV,[93] and they will be offered counseling and HIV testing.[94] Your name will not be given to them.[95] You have the right to refuse to give that information at no legal penalty (civil or criminal).[96]

E. Legal Rights and Prevention of Infectious Diseases

1. Prevention and Prison Policy

The government has a duty to provide medical care to the people it incarcerates.[97] This duty may also include protecting prisoners from infectious diseases, such as TB.[98] But, it is also very important to take the necessary precautions to protect yourself and others from disease. If you have anal, vaginal, or oral sex, it is extremely important to use latex condoms in order to protect yourself against HIV infection and other sexually-transmitted diseases. This is particularly vital in the prison system, where a higher proportion of the population is HIV-positive. Very few jails or prisons provide condoms for prisoners. A few jails in Los Angeles, New York City, Philadelphia, San Francisco, and Washington, D.C. supply condoms on a limited basis, and Mississippi and Vermont offer condoms to prisoners.[99] In some prisons, condoms may be considered contraband, so make sure to check whether your prison considers condoms contraband.[100]

Prisons have some duty to prevent MRSA's spread once they know infection is present within the prison. But as a prisoner, you have limited options to enforce this duty. An Eighth Amendment claim for failing to protect a prisoner from contracting MRSA would have to show the prison's "deliberate indifference" to the prisoner's serious medical needs.[101] Courts generally hold that prisons do not have to take every possible http://www.health.ny.gov/diseases/aids/regulations/reporting_and_notification/about_the_law.htm#quest1 (last visited September 26, 2010). This brochure emphasizes that this information is confidential:

---

Under the law, identifying information about people with HIV infection is ONLY to be used to help the Health Department track the epidemic and for partner notification. The Health Department will NOT disclose this information to other government or private agencies like the United States Citizenship and Services (USCIS), police, welfare, insurance companies or landlords.

91. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 10, § 63.6(a)(13) (2007).

92. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 10, § 63.8(a)(3) (2007).

93. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 10, § 63.8(a)(3) (2007).

94. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 10, § 63.8(g) (2007).

95. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 10, §§ 63.6, 63.8(a)(3) (2007).

96. N.Y. Dept. of Health, HIV Reporting and Partner Notification, N.Y. Dept. of Health, HIV Reporting and Partner Notification: What You Need to Know about the Law (2000), available at http://www.health.ny.gov/diseases/aids/regulations/reporting_and_notification/about_the_law.htm#quest1 (last visited September 26, 2010).

97. See Estelle v. Gamble, 429 U.S. 97, 103, 97 S. Ct. 285, 290, 50 L. Ed. 2d 251, 259 (1976) (confirming "the government's obligation to provide medical care for those whom it is punishing by incarceration"). See JLM, Chapter 23 for more information on a prison's duty to provide medical care and what you can do if you are not receiving proper care.

98. See Lareau v. Manson, 651 F.2d 96, 109 (2d Cir. 1981) (finding that a prison's failure to adequately screen incoming prisoners constituted a "threat to the well-being of the inmates [that] is so serious, and the record [is] so devoid of any justification for the defendants' policy, that under the standard of Bell v. Wolfish this practice constitutes 'punishment' in violation of the Due Process Clause"); Smith v. Sullivan, 553 F.2d 373, 380 (5th Cir. 1977) (holding that though a prison is not required to conduct medical exams on prisoners within 36 hours of entering the facility, leaving persons with communicable or contagious diseases, like scabies or gonorrhea, among other prisoners for a month or more, without medical care, violated the standard of adequate medical services).

99. Beth Shuster, Sheriff Approves Handout of Condoms to Gay Inmates, L.A. Times, Nov. 30, 2001, at A38.

100. See, e.g., Karen Cropsey, Gloria Eldridge and Melanie Spector, The American Psychological Association (APA) HIV Office for Psychology Education (HOPE) Training Resource Package, HIV, Mental Health, and Prisons 15, (2006), available at http://www.apa.org/pi/aids/programs/hope/training/index.aspx (last visited September 26, 2010).
Amy Wooten, House Rejects Prison Condom Bill, Windy City Times, Mar. 21, 2007, available at http://www.windycitymediagroup.com/gay/lesbian/news/ARTICLE.php?AID=14325 (last visited September 26, 2010);
Rebecca Nerenberg, Spotlight: Condoms in Correctional Settings, HEPP News, Jan. 2002, available at http://www.thebody.com/content/art13017.html (last visited September 26, 2010).

101. See Estelle v. Gamble, 429 U.S. 97, 104, 97 S. Ct. 285, 291, 50 L. Ed. 2d. 251 (1976).

measure to prevent MRSA's spread. As long they take reasonable steps, you cannot make a constitutional claim by showing the prison could have done more.[102]

2. Segregation of Prisoners with Infectious Diseases

(a) Mandatory Segregation

(i) Mandatory Segregation of Prisoners with TB

Prisons may want to segregate (separate) prisoners with infectious diseases from other prisoners to prevent the disease's spread. This type of segregation is often mandatory and involves separate housing. New York law allows prison officials to separate prisoners if a "contagious disease" becomes widespread.[103] But, New York law also states that all who are "sick shall receive all necessary care and medical assistance," and that all such prisoners should be transferred back to the general population as soon as possible.[104]

Because TB can be spread through the air, the law often treats people with TB differently. Prisons can usually isolate prisoners who are suffering from TB to prevent the spread of a "contagious disease."[105] New York City law even allows non-incarcerated persons infected with TB to be hospitalized in certain circumstances.[106] DOCS TB policy requires prisoners with contagious TB to be placed in respiratory isolation. While in respiratory isolation, you are only allowed to leave the area for certain medical treatment and you will have to wear a surgical mask.[107]

(ii) Mandatory Segregation of Prisoners with HIV

Because HIV does not spread as easily as TB, New York state prisons[108] and federal prisons[109] do not determine housing or program assignments based upon HIV status alone. New York prisons are not allowed to automatically segregate HIV-positive prisoners. New York state courts have found that mandatory segregation violates your right to privacy—specifically, your right to medical confidentiality—because 102. See Lopez v. McGrath, No. C 04-4782 MHP, 2007 WL 1577893, at * 8, 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 39409 at *24-25, (N.D. Cal. May 31, 2007) available at http://www.websupp.org/data/NDCA/3:04-cv-04782-63-NDCA.pdf at 12 (stating that while taking more hygienic measures would have reduced the risk of infection, there is no evidence they were necessary to reduce risk to the plaintiff to acceptable levels); Walker v. Floyd County, No. 4:07-CV-0014-SEB-WGH, 2007 WL 2237622, at *9, 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 56134 at *25-27 (S.D. Ind. July 31, 2007) (holding that a showing that there were additional measures a prison could have taken to stop MRSA's spread is not enough to demonstrate a constitutional violation).

---

103. N.Y. Correct. Law § 141 (McKinney 2003).

104. N.Y. Correct. Law § 141 (McKinney 2003).

105. See Dunn v. Zenk, 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 73891, at *9 (N.D. Ga. 2007) (holding that states have a legitimate penological interest in controlling the spread of tuberculosis so the involuntary administration of a TB test does not offend the Constitution); Davidson v. Kelly, 1997 U.S. App. LEXIS 33796, at *4 (2d Cir. Nov. 24, 1997) (unpublished) (holding that placing a prisoner in TB hold for three days until he agreed to be tested for TB did not violate the prisoner's 8th Amendment rights because it furthered a legitimate penological interest); McCormick v. Stalder, 105 F.3d 1059, 1061–62 (5th Cir. 1997) (holding that prison policy requiring TB patients to be medicated or isolated was reasonably related to legitimate penological interests); Washington v. Cambra, 1998 U.S. App. LEXIS 30072, at *3 (9th Cir 1998) (unpublished) (holding that a policy of testing prisoners twice for TB is reasonably related to the legitimate penological goal of detecting and containing TB and the second test did not violate the prisoner's rights under the 8th or 14th Amendments); Delisser v. Goord, 2003 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 488, at *16, *18–19, *23 (N.D.N.Y. Jan. 15, 2003) (unpublished) (holding that prisoner, who was placed in TB Hold for a total of 93 days for refusing to submit to PPD test and then for refusing to take TB medication, did not suffer a violation of his 8th or 14th Amendment rights).

106. See 24 RCNY Health Code § 11.47(d)(1) (2007) (authorizing "the removal to and/or detention in a hospital or other treatment facility for appropriate examination for tuberculosis of a person who has active tuberculosis or who is suspected of having active tuberculosis and who is unable or unwilling voluntarily to submit to such examination by a physician or by the Department"); City of New York v. Doe, 205 A.D.2d 469, 469, 614 N.Y.S.2d 8, 9 (1st Dept. 1994) (holding that patient could be detained pursuant to New York City Health Code § 11.47 where there was no less restrictive way to treat patient's TB infection).

107. Division of Health Services, New York Department of Correctional Services, Health Services Policy Manual: Tuberculosis, § 1.18 at 10–11 (June 21, 2004).

108. See, e.g., Nolley v. Erie, 776 F. Supp. 715, 719 (W.D.N.Y. 1991) (noting that "DOCS stopped isolating HIV+ inmates from the general population in 1987").

109. 28 C.F.R. § 549.13(c) (2007) ("Except as provided for in disciplinary policy, no special or separate housing units may be established for HIV-positive inmates."). However, as a federal prisoner, you can be placed in controlled housing if there is reasonable evidence that you will pose a health risk to others. 28 C.F.R. § 541.61 (2007).

housing in an AIDS unit tells other prisoners and staff that you are HIV-positive.[110] If you are a federal prisoner who has HIV or AIDS, the prison can only separate you if prison officials have reasonable evidence that you pose a health risk.[111] For more information on confidentiality issues, see Part F of this Chapter, and for information regarding discriminatory treatment based on your health status, see Part H of this Chapter.

Although New York prisons may not automatically segregate HIV-positive prisoners, some states require that all HIV-infected prisoners reside separately, and many courts outside of New York have upheld prisons' decisions to segregate HIV-positive prisoners. Courts generally view segregation as a reasonable means to limit other prisoner's exposure to HIV, and courts consider preventing the spread of HIV to be a legitimate interest of prisons.[112] Additionally, at least one federal court of appeals found that there is a high risk of transmitting HIV in prison, even though the specific prison in question did not present evidence of actual HIV transmission. Nonetheless, the court thought that the mere presence of high-risk behavior—like intravenous drug use, sex, and violent exchanges—was enough to establish a significant risk of transmitting HIV.[113] The court also rejected the prisoners' suggestions to either hire more corrections officers or to identify prisoners who were both HIV-positive and also likely to engage in high-risk conduct. The court found that these two suggestions were unreasonable and created an "undue hardship" on the prison facility.[114] The court's ruling might make it more difficult to argue that your segregation is unconstitutional.

(iii) Mandatory Segregation of Prisoners with MRSA

Prisons may segregate prisoners who have active MRSA infections to prevent the spread of the infection to others through contact. The Federal Bureau of Prisons generally recommends, however, that prisoners do not need to be housed separately, if they have MRSA wounds that are either not draining or that can be easily covered with bandages.[115] As the infection becomes more serious or develops into MRSA pneumonia, separate housing is recommended or required.[116] A prison may have the right to threaten you with solitary confinement if you refuse to accept the prison's prescribed treatment for your MRSA infection.[117]

(b) Segregation Requested by Prisoners

If you are afraid of contracting an infectious disease, read Part B of this Chapter to get a sense of the steps that you can take to protect yourself. In general, prisoners who are afraid of getting infectious diseases from other prisoners have not been able to successfully sue prison officials. Some prisoners have tried to get prisons to segregate other prisoners who are infected with a communicable disease, but these prisoners have been generally unsuccessful. Prisoners who already are infected have also been unsuccessful when they request that the prison give them a single cell (or vaccinate other prisoners) so that they do not spread their

---

110. See Nolley v. Erie, 776 F. Supp. 715, 733–36 (W.D.N.Y. 1991) (holding that segregating HIV prisoners violated constitutional and statutory rights to privacy because HIV status was improperly disclosed to non-medical personnel); Doe v. Coughlin, 697 F. Supp. 1234, 1240–41 (N.D.N.Y. 1988) (holding that involuntary segregation of prisoners with HIV or AIDS violates prisoners' right to privacy).

111. 28 C.F.R. § 541.61 (2007).

112. See, e.g., Moore v. Mabus, 976 F.2d 268, 271 (5th Cir. 1992) (holding that Mississippi prisons had reasonable interests in segregating HIV prisoners, and that segregation did not violate rights to privacy, equal protection, or due process).

113. Onishea v. Hopper, 171 F.3d 1289, 1299 (11th Cir. 1999) (holding that risk of HIV transmission justified segregation of HIV-positive prisoners, including exclusion from programs and activities offered to other prisoners).

114. Onishea v. Hopper, 171 F.3d 1289, 1302–04 (11th Cir. 1999) (finding that the cost of special programs to reduce the risk of HIV transmission would be too high).

115. See Federal Bureau of Prisons, Clinical Practice Guidelines, Management of Methicillin-Resistant Staphylococcus aureus (MRSA) Infections 35 (2005), available at http://www.bop.gov/news/PDFs/mrsa.pdf.

116. See Federal Bureau of Prisons, Clinical Practice Guidelines, Management of Methicillin-Resistant Staphylococcus aureus (MRSA) Infections 35 (2005), available at http://www.bop.gov/news/PDFs/mrsa.pdf.

117. See Keller v. Bucks, 209 F. App'x 201, 205–206 (3d Cir. 2006) (unpublished) (holding that it was not a constitutional violation to isolate a pre-trial detainee who refused treatment for a MRSA infection when the isolation was medically determined); Munoz v. Fortner, No. 6:07cv170, 2007 U.S Dist. LEXIS 91543, at *20–21 (E.D. Tex. Dec. 13, 2007) (holding that it does not violate the Constitution to threaten to put prisoners in isolation who both have MRSA and do not comply with recommended treatment).

diseases.[118] Courts seem to support a prison's decision not to segregate prisoners with HIV-related illnesses.[119]

Although prisons may have a legal responsibility to protect prisoners from exposure to communicable diseases,[120] to win a lawsuit against prison officials for exposing you to infectious diseases, you must prove that (1) there was a specific and significant risk of infection, and (2) prison officials were aware of that risk but disregarded it.[121] In order to win such a lawsuit, you must show that there is a significant possibility that you will contract the virus or disease. For example, some courts have held that this standard is met when prisoners are housed with people who have known MRSA infections. In order to meet the standard, however, the infected prisoner must have open wounds that are not being adequately covered or cleaned and that are likely to infect other prisoners.[122] You will not win, if you only have a general fear of getting the virus.

Additionally, the Prison Litigation Reform Act ("PLRA") makes winning money damages even more difficult. Under the PLRA, if you seek money damages, you will have to show you were physically injured, not just mentally or emotionally injured, or placed at an increased risk of being infected. For more information on the PLRA, see JLM Chapter 14, "The Prison Litigation Reform Act."

F. Legal Rights and Confidentiality

Under the U.S. Constitution, you have a right to privacy (a "privacy interest") regarding the disclosure of personal matters.[123] For information about your medical privacy, please see Part E (2) of JLM Chapter 23, "Your Right to Adequate Medical Care."

Prisoners who have infectious diseases generally have a limited right to keep information about their medical condition confidential. Some courts have held that the right to medical confidentiality also applies to an individual's HIV status.[124] But, other courts have held that there is no constitutional right to privacy

---

118. Johnson v. Horn, 782 A.2d 1073, 1076–77 (Pa. Commw. Ct. 2001) (refusing to give court order forcing prison officials to assign prisoner to a single cell so he would not spread hepatitis C to other prisoners).

119. See Deutsch v. Fed. Bureau of Prisons, 737 F. Supp. 261, 267–68 (S.D.N.Y. 1990), aff'd, 930 F.2d 909 (2d Cir. 1991) (holding that prisoner did not have the right to have another HIV-positive prisoner segregated unless the inmate poses a known health risk); Glick v. Henderson, 855 F.2d 536, 539–40 (8th Cir. 1988) (holding that prisoner's fear of contracting HIV either through sharing work assignments with an HIV-infected prisoner or through eating food that might have been prepared by an HIV-infected prisoner, was not sufficient to justify an order to segregate HIV-infected prisoners).

120. See Hutto v. Finney, 437 U.S. 678, 682–88, 98 S. Ct 2565, 2569–2572 (1978) (finding that prison conditions unconstitutional under the 8th Amendment where (among other concerns) inmates in "punitive isolation" were crowded into cells, and some had infectious conditions such as hepatitis and venereal diseases); Lareau v. Manson, 651 F.2d 96, 109 (2d Cir. 1981) (finding that prison's failure to adequately screen incoming prisoners violated the due process and 8th Amendment rights of other prisoners); Smith v. Sullivan, 553 F.2d 373, 380 (5th Cir. 1977) (stating that leaving persons with communicable or contagious diseases, such as scabies or gonorrhea, without medical attention for over a month, and in the midst of other prisoners violated the required standard of adequate medical services).

121. See Massick v. N. Cent. Corr. Facility, 136 F.3d 580, 581 (8th Cir. 1998) (holding that there was no 8th Amendment violation when prison officials placed the plaintiff in a cell with an HIV-positive prisoner, who had open bleeding wounds, without warning the plaintiff of his cellmate's HIV status; the court found no constitutional violation, because the risk of plaintiff contracting HIV was small and because prison officials acted reasonably by granting plaintiff's request to change cellmates); Billman v. Ind. Dept. of Corrs., 56 F.3d 785, 788–89 (7th Cir. 1995) (holding that prison officials who knowingly and without warning assign a prisoner to share a cell with an HIV-positive prisoner who has a known propensity to rape, constitutes an 8th Amendment violation due to the official's "deliberate indifference" to the "fear and humiliation inflicted by the rape and the fear of contracting the AIDS virus"); DeGidio v. Pung, 920 F.2d 525, 532–33 (8th Cir. 1990) (holding that prison officials' pattern of reckless or negligent responses to TB outbreaks was sufficient to constitute deliberate indifference, violating the 8th Amendment).

122. See Lopez v. McGrath, No. C 04-4782 MHP, 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 39409, at *31 (N.D. Cal. May 31, 2007) (finding a triable issue of fact where plaintiff claimed that administrators knew medical staff were putting prisoners with MRSA infections back into the general population, possibly creating "substantial risk" to other prisoners); Kimble v. Tennis, No. 4:CV-05-1871, 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 36285, at *11 (M.D. Pa. June 5, 2006) (holding that evidence that prison doctor authorized release of a MRSA-infected prisoner with open sores to the general population may be sufficient to support a claim of deliberate indifference).

123. See Whalen v. Roe, 429 U.S. 589, 599–600, 97 S. Ct. 869, 876, 51 L. Ed. 2d 64, 73 (1977) (finding that the U.S. Constitution protects your right to make personal decisions and against disclosure of your personal information) (non-prison case); O'Connor v. Pierson, 426 F.3d 187, 201 (2d Cir. 2005) ("Medical information in general, and information about a person's psychiatric health and substance-abuse history in particular, is information of the most intimate kind.") (non-prison case).

124. See Doe v. Delie, 257 F.3d 309, 315–17 (3d Cir. 2001) (finding prisoners retain their right to medical privacy regarding HIV status.[125] If you are in federal prison, your HIV test results, if positive, must be disclosed to the prison's employees.[126]

In New York state, your HIV-related information cannot be disclosed to anyone other than you and individuals who are authorized by statute.[127] Individuals who are authorized to receive your HIV information include health care providers (when knowledge is necessary to provide you with adequate care),[128] employees of the Division of Parole,[129] employees of the Division of Probation and Correctional Alternatives or local probation department,[130] the medical director of the local correctional facility,[131] or an employee or agent of the Commission of Correction.[132] These authorized individuals are entitled to access your HIV information to the extent that they need such information to carry out their duties and functions.[133]

In New York, prisoners have won claims of statutory and constitutional rights violations when their HIV status was improperly disclosed. In particular, it is improper for a prison official to disclose your HIV status to other prisoners or non-medical personnel.[134] The courts seem to permit disclosure of your HIV status only if such disclosure is reasonably related to legitimate prison interests, like protecting prisoners or corrections officers from infection. But, unnecessary disclosure of such information for humor or gossip violates your constitutional rights.[135]

In other jurisdictions, courts are divided about medical privacy. Some courts find that a prisoner's right to medical confidentiality is limited,[136] while other courts protect such rights for prisoners and arrestees.[137] But now that the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA) has been enacted, there may be different outcomes for similar cases brought today. For more information on the PLRA, see Chapter 14 of the JLM. It is and that the right is "particularly strong" for HIV status); Doe v. New York, 15 F.3d 264, 267 (2d Cir. 1994) ("Individuals who are infected with the HIV virus clearly possess a constitutional right to privacy regarding their condition.").

---

125. See, e.g., Sherman v. Jones, 258 F. Supp. 2d 440, 444 (E.D. Va. 2003) (holding that there is no constitutional right to privacy of HIV status, and noting that different circuit courts have reached different conclusions on this issue).

126. 28 C.F.R. § 549.14 (2005).

127. N.Y. Pub. Health Law § 2782 (McKinney 2006). State agencies authorized to obtain confidential HIV-related information should have regulations to prevent discrimination, prohibit unauthorized disclosure, and establish criteria for determining who should receive the information and when. N.Y. Pub. Health Law § 2786(2)(a) (McKinney 2006).

128. N.Y. Pub. Health Law § 2782(1)(d) (McKinney 2006).

129. N.Y. Pub. Health Law § 2782(1)(l) (McKinney 2006).

130. N.Y. Pub. Health Law § 2782(1)(m) (McKinney 2006).

131. N.Y. Pub. Health Law § 2782(1)(n) (McKinney 2006).

132. N.Y. Pub. Health Law § 2782(1)(o) (McKinney 2006).

133. N.Y. Pub. Health Law §§ 2782(1)(l)–(o) (McKinney 2006).

134. See Lipinski v. Skinner, 781 F. Supp. 131, 140 (N.D.N.Y. 1991) (allowing prisoner to depose protected media sources in connection with lawsuit against law enforcement officials and prison officials when they disclosed his HIV status to a newspaper); V. v. New York, 150 Misc. 2d 156, 157–58, 566 N.Y.S.2d 987, 988–89 (N.Y. Ct. Cl. 1991) (holding that a prisoner stated a proper claim for relief when he accused his prison of improperly revealing his HIV information); Doe v. Coughlin, 697 F. Supp. 1234, 1240–41 (N.D.N.Y. 1988) (temporarily forbidding a plan to segregate AIDS prisoners, because it would disclose their AIDS status and therefore violate their right to privacy). But see Cordero v. Coughlin, 607 F. Supp. 9, 11 (S.D.N.Y. 1984) (holding that a plan which segregated prisoners with AIDS did not violate the prisoners' 1st Amendment right to privacy, because the right to privacy is limited by the prison's needs and by the prisoners' confinement).

135. See Powell v. Schriver, 175 F.3d 107, 112–13 (2d Cir. 1999) (holding that, while a prison official does not violate a prisoner's right to medical privacy, if the official's actions are reasonably related to legitimate prison interests, a prison official does violate a prisoner's medical privacy if he discloses a prisoner's medical information as gossip or a joke); see also Baez v. Rapping, 680 F. Supp. 112, 115 (S.D.N.Y. 1988) (holding that prison officials did not violate a prisoner's right to confidentiality when they warned other officials to avoid contact with prisoner's body fluids). But see Nolley v. Erie, 776 F. Supp. 715, 725–28 (W.D.N.Y. 1991) (holding that a policy of putting red stickers on HIV-positive prisoners' possessions, and therefore revealing prisoners' HIV status, violated privacy rights under New York law).

136. See Anderson v. Romero, 72 F.3d 518, 523–24 (7th Cir. 1995) (holding that prisoners do not have a constitutional right to the confidentiality of their HIV status, especially in light of the fact that HIV-positive prisoners could be identified when segregated from the rest of the prison population); Doe v. Wigginton, 21 F.3d 733, 740 (6th Cir. 1994) (holding that the prisoner's right to privacy was not violated when a corrections officer, opened his file in the presence of other witnesses, after the prisoner refused to answer questions about his medical condition); Adams v. Drew, 906 F. Supp. 1050, 1055–58 (E.D. Va. 1995) (stating that prison officials' inadvertent disclosure of prisoner's HIV status to another prisoner did not violate right to privacy).

137. See A.L.A. v. W. Valley City, 26 F.3d 989, 990–91 (10th Cir. 1994) (stating that an arrestee brought a valid claim against the police for disclosing that he was HIV-positive to his family and strangers, even though it was later found that the arrestee was not HIV-positive).

important to remember that the PLRA requires a showing of physical injury, not just mental or emotional injury, to recover monetary damages. Thus, to be successful in a lawsuit, you would probably have to prove that the prison official's actions physically injured you. Some courts may require you to show the harm is likely to occur again to get injunctions (orders requiring officials to stop or change a policy).[138]

G. Legal Rights and Medical Treatment

1. Right to Medical Treatment

If you are denied medical treatment for an infectious disease, you may have a claim that the prison violated your rights under the Eighth Amendment. The Eighth Amendment protects you from cruel and unusual punishment. To win an Eighth Amendment claim, you must prove that prison officials showed "deliberate indifference" to your "serious medical needs."[139] It is important to remember that courts do not think that every claim of inadequate medical care is bad enough to be a constitutional violation.[140] But a few courts have held that a denial of prescribed AIDS or hepatitis C medical treatment does violate a prisoner's constitutional rights.[141] See Chapter 23 of the JLM, "Your Right to Adequate Medical Care," for more information on how to bring an Eighth Amendment claim for failure to provide adequate medical treatment.

Courts generally do not believe prisoners have a constitutional right to a private doctor or experimental medication.[142] You may still be able to get experimental drugs, but you will probably not have an Eighth Amendment claim against your facility if it does not prescribe them for you. But some prisons have participated in clinical trials for anti-retroviral therapy for AIDS. To take part in such trials, you must first get approval from the Institutional Review Board of the testing site and your prison's medical department.[143]

If you believe that your health is suffering because you are being wrongfully denied medication, you will probably have to show that the medical community agrees that this medication will help your condition. Otherwise, the court may see your claim as a simple disagreement between you and your doctor.[144] If you

---

138. Davis v. District of Columbia, 158 F.3d 1342, 1346–47 (D.C. Cir. 1998) (holding that an HIV-positive prisoner could not obtain an injunction against prison officials for the unauthorized disclosure of his medical files because he could not show a threat that it might happen again).

139. Chance v. Armstrong, 143 F.3d 698, 702 (2d Cir. 1998) (describing the standard for bringing an 8th Amendment claim for failure to receive proper medical care) (citing Estelle v. Gamble, 429 U.S. 97, 104, 97 S. Ct. 285, 291, 50 L. Ed. 2d 251, 260 (1976)). HIV and hepatitis are generally considered "serious medical needs." Brown v. Johnson, 387 F.3d 1344, 1351 (11th Cir. 2004).

140. See Smith v. Carpenter, 316 F.3d 178, 184, 186–87 (2d Cir. 2003) (citing Estelle v. Gamble, 429 U.S. 97, 104, 97 S. Ct. 285, 291, 50 L. Ed. 2d 251, 260 (1976)) (holding that brief interruptions of HIV medications, with no discernible adverse effects, did not constitute a denial of serious medical needs. However, the court also noted that a showing of increased risk, even absent presently detectable symptoms, might be serious enough to constitute denial of medical care).

141. See Montgomery v. Pinchak, 294 F.3d 492, 500 (3d Cir. 2002) (finding HIV-positive prisoner's claim regarding violation of his right to adequate medical treatment had merit and holding that because HIV is a life-threatening disease if left untreated, the prisoner had met the serious medical need prong of Estelle v. Gamble). But see Johnson v. Wright, 412 F.3d 398 (2d Cir. 2005) (finding that although a facility's refusal to give a prisoner the medication most prisoners received for hepatitis C because he had used illegal drugs constituted deliberate indifference, there was medical reason for denying the prison therapy); Niemic v. Maloney, 448 F. Supp. 2d 270 (9th Cir. 2006) (finding that the denial of a medicine subsequent to a failed drug test does not violate Due Process under the 14th Amendment, especially given that a decision to deny the medicine to active drug users is in accord with medical custom).

142. See Chance v. Armstrong, 143 F.3d 698, 703 (2d Cir. 1998) ("[M]ere disagreement over the proper treatment does not create a constitutional claim."); McKenna v. Wright, 01 Civ. 6571 (WK), 2002 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 3489, at *21 (S.D.N.Y. Mar. 4, 2002) (unpublished) (dismissing plaintiff's claim on the basis that the doctor's treatment decision was his medical judgment and consistent with current medical literature); Carter v. Cash, No. 92 Civ. 5526 (JG), 1995 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 22209, at *2–3 (E.D.N.Y. May 31, 1995) (unpublished) (finding that prisoner was not entitled to medication of his choice if doctor decided, based on his professional judgment, that it would not be in the prisoner's best interest).

143. You can find information about clinical trials from publications such as the American Foundation for AIDS Research ("AMFAR") AIDS/HIV Treatment Direction. AMFAR's contact information is included in Appendix A at the end of this Chapter.

144. See Perkins v. Kansas Dept. of Corrs., 165 F.3d 803, 811 (10th Cir. 1999) (upholding the denial of protease inhibitor to prisoner with HIV because other treatment was provided); Loch v. County of Bucks, No. 03-CV-4833, 2006 WL 2559296, at *3, 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 62620, at *10–11 (E.D. Pa. Sept. 1, 2006), available at http://www.paed.uscourts.gov/documents/opinions/06D1114P.pdf at 5 (last visited September 27, 2010) (holding that a prisoner who had been treated for conditions including MRSA did not assert a constitutional violation simply because they claim the treatment they received was inadequate); Matthews v. Crosby, No. 3-06-CV-38, 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS want to bring a claim about medical treatment or medication denied to you sometime in the past, a court may look back to see what the accepted medical practices were at that time.[145]

If you received medical treatment but think that a prison doctor incorrectly diagnosed your condition, it will be difficult to bring a successful case against the prison officials. In the past, courts have dismissed cases for a variety of reasons, such as because the prisoner could not prove that the prison officials had personal involvement,[146] the prisoner could not show any physical harm, or that his needs were ignored.[147]

If you have hepatitis C and prison officials determine that you should receive a certain treatment for a certain length of time, and you are then denied that treatment, you may have a claim under the Eighth Amendment. The initial requirements to bring a claim will be met if you can say that the removal from the prescribed treatment is endangering your life by failing to treat your disease.[148] You do not have to also claim that you have suffered an independent harm, other than the progress of your disease, in order to bring your claim.[149] Meeting these requirements allows you to begin your case, but does not mean that you will win. You will still need to show that there was "deliberate indifference" to your medical needs.[150]

This does not change the rule that courts do not like to question doctors' medical decisions. If you have received treatment for hepatitis C but think you should have been given different treatment,[151] or if your doctors said you do not have a condition requiring any treatment, this rule will not allow you to bring suit.[152]

2. Right to Refuse Medical Treatment

Some people, for a variety of reasons, choose to refuse medical treatment. Competent people—people who can think and understand well enough to make medical decisions for themselves—have the right to refuse treatment, even if it means they will die as a result.[153] However, your right to refuse treatment is limited as a prisoner.[154] Most courts have held that prisons can treat TB-infected prisoners without their consent.[155]

35049, at *7 (N.D. Fla. May 31, 2006), available at http://www.websupp.com/data/NDFL/3:06-cv-00038-10-NDFL.pdf at 4 (holding that a complete denial of available treatment, but not a dispute over the care received, could be a constitutional violation).

145. See Parker v. Proffit, Civ. A. No. 94-00815-R, 1995 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 15941, at *19 (W.D. Va. Oct. 27, 1995) (unpublished) (evaluating denial of medication by standards of medical treatment at time of denial); Adams v. Poag, 61 F.3d 1537, 1543 (11th Cir. 1995) (to show a prison official's actions were deliberately indifferent, a plaintiff could produce opinions of medical experts asserting the official's actions were contrary to contemporary accepted medical practices).

146. See Timmons v. N.Y. State Dept. of Corr. Servs., 887 F. Supp. 576, 580 (S.D.N.Y. 1995) (holding a prisoner bringing a claim against prison officials for misdiagnosing him in 1986 as having HIV had not shown the officials had any personal involvement in the alleged violations and was thus not entitled to relief under 42 U.S.C. § 1983). Section 1983 governs suits against prison officials for federal statutory and constitutional violations and is described in detail in JLM, Chapter 16, "Using 42 U.S.C. § 1983 and 28 U.S.C. § 1331 to Obtain Relief From Violations of Federal Law."

147. See Smith v. Carpenter, 316 F.3d 178, 184 (2d Cir. 2003) (dismissing 8th Amendment claim because prisoner failed to show that he suffered any adverse medical effects from the sporadic lack of treatment).

148. See Erickson v. Pardus, 551 U.S. 89, 93, 127 S. Ct. 2197, 2200, 167 L. Ed. 2d 1081, 1085 (2007) (holding that the pleading requirements of Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 8(a)(2) were met by statements that a prisoner with hepatitis C had been removed from his prescribed course of treatment and denied all treatment for his disease due to suspicion of drug use).

149. See Erickson v. Pardus, 551 U.S. 89, 93, 127 S. Ct. 2197, 2200, 167 L. Ed. 2d 1081, 1085 (2007) (stating that allegations in complaint were sufficient to bring an initial claim, and no claim of "cognizable independent harm" apart from removal from treatment is required).

150. See Estelle v. Gamble, 429 U.S. 97, 104, 97 S. Ct. 285, 291, 50 L. Ed. 2d 251, 260 (1976).

151. See Loukas v. Mich. Dept. of Corr., No. 2-07-CV-142, 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 14724, at *2 (W.D. Mich. Feb. 27, 2008) (holding that a prisoner who has not been denied medical care, but simply questions whether the treatment he has been receiving is adequate, does not have an 8th Amendment claim).

152. See Hix v. Tenn. Dept. of Corr., 196 Fed.App'x. 350, 357 n.1 (6th Cir. 2006) (stating hepatitis C does not require treatment in all cases, and a difference of opinion over medical treatment does not violate the 8th Amendment).

153. For New York law, see N.Y. Pub. Health Law §§ 2960–79 (McKinney 2007) ("Orders Not to Resuscitate") (regulating right of "adult with capacity" to direct issuance of orders not to resuscitate); N.Y. Pub. Health Law §§ 2980–94 (McKinney 2007) ("Health Care Agents and Proxies") (allowing appointment of agents to make important health care decisions including the refusal of life-saving treatment for the appointer); Quill v. Koppell, 870 F. Supp. 78, 84 (S.D.N.Y. 1994) ("It is established under New York law that a competent person may refuse medical treatment, even if the withdrawal of such treatment will result in death."). See also Quill v. Vacco, 80 F.3d 716 (2d Cir. 1996) (holding that physicians can prescribe death-inducing drugs for mentally competent patients who wish to end their lives during the end stages of terminal illness. This case may lend strength to the proposition that a competent person may refuse medical treatment, even if such refusal will result in death).

154. See Washington v. Harper, 494 U.S. 210, 110 S. Ct. 1028, 108 L. Ed. 2d 178 (1990) (recognizing 14th

Courts balance your interest in refusing treatment with the prison's "legitimate penological interest" in preventing the spread of disease. Courts will also consider whether the prison's actions are reasonably related to the prison's interests. If you do not have a disease that is transmitted through air, the prison will have a weaker argument for forcing you to take medication than if you have a disease such as TB that is easily spread. See Part C of Chapter 29, "Special Issues for Prisoners with Mental Illness," for more information about your right to refuse medical treatment.

H. Discriminatory Treatment and Infectious Diseases

1. Constitutional Rights

The Fourteenth Amendment may protect you from discriminatory treatment on the basis of having an infectious disease. For example, your rights under the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment prohibit discrimination by the state that is not rationally related to a legitimate purpose.[156] The Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment forbids the prison facility from taking away your entitlements without due process of law.[157] The Eighth Amendment protects you from "cruel and unusual punishment."[158] Keep in mind, however, that the courts balance these constitutional rights against legitimate penological interests,[159] which may allow prison officials to lawfully infringe upon your rights. Prison policies are valid if they are reasonably related to a legitimate penological interest; however, the prison is required to use the least restrictive means of achieving the goals of the policy.[160]

If you bring a suit challenging a prison practice under the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause, you must prove you were entitled to something the prison took away.[161] Any entitlement must be created by state law. If you think you are entitled to something, you should first determine whether or not a state statute or regulation gives you a right to that entitlement. Also know that prison officials can treat prisoners with infectious diseases differently from other prisoners if their reasons further legitimate penological interests.[162] But, the reasons must be rational and not purely discriminatory.

Amendment right to refuse medical treatment, using Turner v. Safley, 482 U.S. 78, 107 S. Ct. 2254, 96 L. Ed. 2d 64 (1987), to balance prisoner's rights against the state's duty to treat mentally ill prisoners and protect the safety of prisoners and correction officers, and finding the state did not deprive right to refuse treatment without due process).

155. See McCormick v. Stalder, 105 F.3d 1059, 1062 (5th Cir. 1997) (holding that prison officials did not violate the 8th Amendment when they required a prisoner with TB to undergo drug therapy without his consent).

156. U.S. Const. amend. XIV, § 1 ("No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.").

157. U.S. Const. amend. XIV, § 1. ("No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.").

158. U.S. Const. amend. VIII ("Excessive bail shall not be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted.").

159. See Turner v. Safley, 482 U.S. 78, 107 S. Ct. 2254, 96 L. Ed. 2d 64 (1987) (analyzing whether a prison regulations that burden fundamental rights are "reasonably related" to legitimate penological objectives).

160. See Turner v. Safley, 482 U.S. 78, 91, 107 S. Ct. 2254, 2262, 96 L. Ed. 2d 64, 80 (1987) ("But if an inmate claimant can point to an alternative that fully accommodates the prisoner's rights at de minimis cost to valid penological interests, a court may consider that as evidence that the regulation does not satisfy the reasonable relationship standard." This means if a prisoner can point to a different procedure not requiring more money or time, the alternative can be used as evidence that the challenged policy is not reasonable); Perkins v. Kan. Dept. of Corr., 165 F.3d 803, 810–11, (10th Cir. 1999) (holding HIV-positive prisoner could claim a constitutional violation for being forced to wear a face mask whenever he left his cell and noting that wearing such a mask could become a humiliating form of branding that violated the 8th Amendment's prohibition of punishing individuals for a physical condition). But see Parker v. Proffit, Civ. A. No. 94-00815-R, 1995 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 15941, at *19–21 (W.D. Va. Oct. 27, 1995) (unpublished) (stating that making an HIV-positive prisoner wear a mask and protective clothing may have caused some embarrassment, but the practice did not rise to a constitutional violation of the 8th Amendment prohibition on cruel and unusual punishment).

161. See Anderson v. Romero, 72 F.3d 518, 527 (7th Cir. 1995) (ruling a state statute directing prisons to provide "barber facilities" gave the plaintiff an entitlement to a haircut, and keeping plaintiff from this entitlement because of his HIV status deprived him of his property and liberty rights under the 14th Amendment's Due Process Clause).

162. See Laureano v. Vega, 92 Civ. 6056 (LMM), 1994 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 2107, at *23–24 (S.D.N.Y. Feb. 25, 1994) (unpublished), aff'd, 40 F.3d 1237 (2d Cir. 1994) (rejecting prisoner's claim that he had received difficult work assignments because of his HIV status; holding that he had failed to establish any retaliatory motive by prison officials and that there is no right to a particular prison job); Farmer v. Moritsugu, 742 F. Supp. 525, 528 (W.D. Wis. 1990) (finding that prison had legitimate interest in maintaining security and order and therefore refusal of HIV-infected

The Fourteenth Amendment only applies to the states, but the Fifth Amendment's Due Process Clause protects your rights against the federal government. If you are in a federal prison, you might consider bringing your lawsuit under federal statutes, instead of under the Fifth Amendment.

2. Statutory Rights

Certain laws protect you from forms of discrimination based on disabilities, including HIV status. The Federal Rehabilitation Act of 1973 ("FRA") prohibits discrimination, or denial of programs or benefits based on disability, by a federal, state, or local government agency, or any recipient of federal funding.[163] Similarly, the Americans with Disabilities Act ("ADA") prohibits public and private entities from discriminating, excluding, or denying services, programs, or activities to a person with a disability.[164] These laws recognize TB and HIV infection as a form of disability because they are physical impairments limiting major life activities.[165] Also, in Bragdon v. Abbott, the Supreme Court clearly stated that under the ADA, "HIV infection satisfies the ... definition of a physical impairment during every stage of the disease."[166]

Although HIV is viewed as a disability according to the FRA and the ADA, your rights are limited to some extent if: (1) your HIV infection poses a significant risk to the health or safety of others; or (2) it would be an undue hardship on the prison facility to accommodate your needs.[167] Also, the U.S. Supreme Court has decided that individuals cannot recover monetary damages from the state for its failure to comply with the ADA.[168] However, you can still seek injunctive relief, which means that you can file a claim in which you ask the court to require the state to end practices that violate the ADA.[169]

If you are suing for violation of your statutory rights, you should cite both the FRA and the ADA, since the remedies, procedures, and rights are the same under both laws.[170] The only difference is the FRA only applies to public (government) entities while the ADA can support a claim against both private and public entities. You should also check the law of your state and city since sometimes states and localities enact additional laws to protect persons with communicable diseases, like HIV or hepatitis, from discrimination. In New York State, the Executive Law prohibits discrimination in several settings based on carrier status.[171] If you are suing in New York, you should review New York law to see if it applies to your circumstances.

---

prisoner's request for food service job was not denial of equal protection); Doe v. Coughlin, 71 N.Y.2d 48, 54, 56, 60, 518 N.E.2d 536, 540, 541, 544, 523 N.Y.S.2d 782, 786, 787, 790 (N.Y. 1987) (upholding prison officials' refusal to allow a prisoner with AIDS to participate in a Family Reunion Program and holding that prisoner's privacy rights and his rights under the Due Process Clause and the Equal Protection Clause had not been violated, reasoning that there is no right to marital relations and that the prison officials had a rational basis to believe that such visits would help the spread of a disease). Note, however, the New York State Department of Corrections' official policy does not currently deny participation in the Family Reunion Program based solely on the HIV status of the prisoner. Instead, there is a special review of each prisoner's application because of potential health risks to the visitor. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7 §§ 220.2–220.9 (2008).

163. 29 U.S.C. § 701(a)–(c) (2006).

164. 42 U.S.C. § 12132 (2006).

165. 28 C.F.R. § 35.104(4)(1)(ii) (2009) ("The phrase physical or mental impairment includes, but is not limited to, such contagious and non-contagious diseases and conditions as ... HIV disease (whether symptomatic or asymptomatic), tuberculosis ...."); 42 U.S.C. § 12102(2) (2006) ("The term 'disability' means ... a physical or mental impairment that substantially limits one or more of the major life activities of such individual; a record of such impairment; or being regarded as having such an impairment.").

166. Bragdon v. Abbott, 524 U.S. 624, 637, 118 S. Ct. 2196, 2204, 141 L. Ed. 2d 540, 556–57 (1998). This case concerned a dentist's refusal to examine an HIV-infected patient in his office. Though the facts did not involve prisoners, the legal principle is the same regarding HIV infection as a disability. For a lower court decision finding an HIV-positive prisoner disabled under the FRA and ADA, see, e.g., Dean v. Knowles, 912 F. Supp. 519, 521 (S.D. Fla. 1996).

167. See Onishea v. Hopper, 171 F.3d 1289, 1297–99 (11th Cir. 1999) (holding any amount of risk through a "specific and theoretically sound means of possible transmission" is a significant risk, and allowing segregation of HIV-positive prisoners).

168. Bd. of Trs. of the Univ. of Ala. v. Garrett, 531 U.S. 356, 374, 121 S. Ct. 955, 968, 148 L. Ed. 2d 866, 884 (2001) (holding Alabama State employees could not recover damages because of state's failure to comply with the ADA).

169. Bd. of Trs. of the Univ. of Ala. v. Garrett, 531 U.S. 356, 374 n.9, 121 S. Ct. 955, 968 n.9, 148 L. Ed. 2d 866, 884 n.9 (2001) ("[ADA] standards can be enforced by … private individuals in actions for injunctive relief.").

170. 42 U.S.C. § 12133 (2006) ("The remedies, procedures, and rights set forth in [29 U.S.C. § 794(a)] shall be the remedies, procedures, and rights this subchapter provides to any person alleging discrimination on the basis of disability in violation of [42 U.S.C. § 12132].").

171. See N.Y. Exec. Law § 296 (McKinney 2010).

Most prison facilities are controlled and financed by federal, state, or local governments, so they are generally subject to the ADA and FRA. Furthermore, the U.S. Supreme Court has stated the ADA and FRA prohibit discrimination in the prison system.[172] This means prison facilities cannot exclude or deny prisoners "benefits of the services, programs, or activities of a public entity" or subject them to discrimination.[173] Benefits include recreational activities, medical services, and educational and vocational programs.[174]

However, when a court evaluates a prison policy, it will consider whether the restriction is reasonably related to a legitimate penological interest.[175] When a prison is defending a policy, it only has to show that the possibility of a risk exists; it does not have to demonstrate that the risk has actually occurred. Examples of interests cited by prison authorities include prison safety and undue financial or administrative burden.[176]

I. Sentencing Persons With Infectious Diseases

If you have an infectious disease and you have been indicted for a crime but not yet sentenced, you may be able to ask the judge to dismiss the indictment or decrease your sentence because of your health condition. Different states have different rules, so be sure to look at your state's statutes and cases.

If your case is in New York State and you have a terminal illness, you may: (1) ask for lower bail; (2) ask to be released on your own recognizance; or (3) make a Clayton motion to have your case dismissed "in the interest of justice" (under New York Criminal Procedure Law § 210.40 and § 210.45).[177] The court will look at the evidence of guilt, the seriousness of the offense, your character, and your criminal record.[178] To support a request for dismissal, try to provide medical documentation that imprisonment would worsen your health.

If you have a terminal disease and are in prison because you violated your parole, you can request to: (1) be returned to parole status; (2) be released to time served or granted conditional release to probation; or (3) have your case adjourned in contemplation of dismissal. The adjournment may be extended indefinitely, which may allow you to live your last days out of prison.

---

172. Pa. Dept. of Corr. v. Yeskey, 524 U.S. 206, 213, 118 S. Ct. 1952, 1956, 141 L. Ed. 2d 215, 221 (1998) ("[T]he plain text of Title II of the ADA unambiguously extends to state prison inmates....").

173. 42 U.S.C. § 12132 (2006).

174. Pa. Dept. of Corr. v. Yeskey, 524 U.S. 206, 210, 118 S. Ct. 1952, 1955, 141 L. Ed. 2d 215, 219 (1998).

175. See Gates v. Rowland, 39 F.3d 1439, 1448 (9th Cir. 1994) (finding a legitimate penological interest allowed prison to discriminate against HIV-positive prisoners by denying them food service jobs). In Gates the prison claimed that although the medical risk of infecting other prisoners through food service is admittedly small, the perception of a risk by other prisoners could be threatening and could lead to violence. Thus, the prison interest was not in preventing the spread of HIV so much as promoting prison safety, a typical prison interest. See also Onishea v. Hopper, 126 F.3d 1323, 1336 (11th Cir. 1999) (the FRA "mandates judicial consideration of interests particular to the prison system").

176. Bullock v. Gomez, 929 F. Supp. 1299, 1305–08 (C.D. Cal. 1996) (finding the California Men's Colony possibly violated the ADA and the FRA when it prohibited HIV-infected prisoners from visiting their spouses in a family visiting program permitting prisoners to visit immediate family members in private conditions for relatively extended periods of time, including overnight stays; stating that the discrimination may be justified under the standard in Turner v. Safley, 482 U.S. 78, 89, 107 S. Ct. 2254, 2261–62, 96 L. Ed. 2d 64, 79 (1987), as a legitimate penological interest if accommodating HIV-prisoners proved to be an undue financial or administrative burden, or if the concerns of other prisoners could lead to prison violence; and noting that proof of previous prison violence is not required to prove a legitimate penological interest).

177. People v. Clayton, 41 A.D.2d 204, 208, 342 N.Y.S.2d 106, 110 (2d Dept. 1973) (listing factors a court should consider where defendant seeks to dismiss case "in the furtherance of justice," including the (1) nature of the crime; (2) available evidence of guilt; (3) defendant's prior record; (4) punishment already suffered by defendant; (5) purpose and effect of further punishment; (6) any prejudice to defendant by time's passage; and (7) the impact on the public interest of indictment's dismissal); see also People v. Lawson, 198 A.D.2d 71, 73, 74, 603 N.Y.S.2d 311, 313 (1st Dept. 1993) (dismissing indictment of defendant, described as "'thin as a rail'" and unable to stand properly, who had not been involved in any other criminal activity, was honorably discharged from the Air Force, and was in final stages of AIDS), aff'd, People v. Herman L., 83 N.Y.2d 958, 960, 639 N.E.2d 404, 405, 615 N.Y.S.2d 865, 866 (1994) (dismissing indictment pursuant to N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 210.40 (McKinney 1993), which allows dismissals "in furtherance of justice" and in judge's discretion).

178. See, e.g., People v. Sierra, 149 Misc. 2d 588, 590, 566 N.Y.S.2d 818, 819 (Sup. Ct. Kings County 1990) (refusing to dismiss conviction because defendant suffered from AIDS Related Complex ("ARC") and would eventually develop AIDS, since he was a repeat felon with a long criminal history; the court also considered the evidence of the defendant's guilt, the offense's seriousness, his character, and criminal history to find he was not entitled to dismissal).

If you are facing sentencing in federal court, judges consider the sentencing guidelines on an advisory basis.[179] The court may impose a lesser sentence ("downward departure") if mitigating circumstances exist.[180] The U.S. Sentencing Commission Guidelines Manual states, "an extraordinary physical impairment may be a reason to depart downward; e.g., in the case of a seriously infirm defendant, home detention may be as efficient as, and less costly than, imprisonment."[181] Courts usually do not reduce sentences unless the defendant's AIDS is serious enough to be an "extraordinary physical impairment."[182] Some courts only consider the defendant's health at the time of sentencing, even if the disease will likely worsen in prison.[183]

Most courts require you to be seriously ill before dismissing an indictment or reducing your sentence, but one federal district court did grant a downward departure to an HIV-positive defendant in stable condition. The court reasoned the defendant believed his good health was a result of his special regimen of strict diet, regular exercise, acupuncture, and a combination of vitamins and natural supplements under the close supervision of a medical professional.[184] In this case the judge was not concerned whether the treatment actually contributed to the defendant's good health under the reasoning that since the defendant believed his regimen was effective, he would suffer emotional harm if he had to change treatments in prison.[185]

If you are trying to get your sentence dismissed or reduced because of your health, you have a greater chance of success if you suffer from a very serious illness, like advanced-stage AIDS. You should try to present medical documentation that being in prison will harm your health. Also, keep in mind courts might not be sympathetic to you if you have a long criminal history. Remember, courts have discretion to grant downward departures. The law does not say exactly what an "extraordinary physical impairment" is, so you may be able to get a reduced sentence or dismissal even if you do not have AIDS, but TB or hepatitis instead.

J. Life After Imprisonment: Planning for Your Release

Chapter 35 of the JLM, "Getting Out Early: Conditional & Early Release," contains information about compassionate release and medical parole. If you have been diagnosed with an infectious disease, you should read that Chapter carefully to see whether you might be eligible for either of these options.

If you are about to be paroled or released, you should get a confidential HIV test before leaving prison. Getting a test can be more difficult or expensive outside of prison. If you do have HIV/AIDS or hepatitis, you should continue to be careful to avoid infecting other people. Before release, you should also try to contact local agencies and organizations for help transitioning from prison to community life. You can contact the public health department in your area for free brochures. Appendix A lists other helpful agencies.

K. Conclusion

If you have AIDS, TB, hepatitis B or C, MRSA or another infectious disease, people may treat you differently due to ignorance and fear. Protect yourself by becoming aware of the facts of the disease and your legal rights. As a prisoner, you may find information and support is not always readily available. But many of the organizations in Appendix A of this Chapter work with prisoners and may be able help you.

---

179. United States v. Booker, 543 U.S. 220, 245, 125 S. Ct. 738, 756–57, 160 L. Ed. 2d 621, 651 (2005) (holding that the sentencing guidelines are not binding on federal judges).

180. U.S. Sentencing Guidelines Manual, 18 U.S.C.S. Appx. § 5H1.4 (2010).

181. U.S. Sentencing Guidelines Manual, 18 U.S.C.S. Appx. § 5H1.4 (2010).

182. See 16 A.L.R. Fed. 2d 113 (2007).

183. See United States v. Thomas, 49 F.3d 253, 261 (6th Cir. 1995) (denying downward departure because defendant's HIV infection had not progressed into advanced AIDS and was not an "extraordinary physical impairment"); United States v. Woody, 55 F.3d 1257, 1275 (7th Cir. 1995) (refusing downward departure because HIV-positive defendant did not have full-blown AIDS); United States v. Rabins, 63 F.3d 721, 729 (8th Cir. 1995) (denying downward departure because defendant's AIDS had not become life-threatening; also holding that the defendant's condition should be assessed at the time of sentencing, regardless of the serious physical difficulties that may develop over the years).

184. United States v. Blarke, 7 F. Supp. 2d 192 (E.D.N.Y. 1998).

185. United States v. Blarke, 7 F. Supp. 2d 192, 212 (E.D.N.Y. 1998).

APPENDIX A

RESOURCES FOR INFORMATION, COUNSELING, AND SUPPORT

National AIDS Organizations

AIDS in Prison Project's Hotline
Phone: (212) 674-0800 (in English, en Español)
Hours: Tuesday, Thursday 3:00 pm to 8:00 pm Eastern Time (ET).
HIV/AIDS hotline for prisoners. All collect calls accepted.

Center for Disease Control National AIDS Hotline (CDC-INFO)
Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, 1600 Clifton Rd, Atlanta, GA 30333
Phone: (800) CDC-INFO (232-4636) (24 hours, in English, en Español)
TTY (for callers with hearing impairments): (888) 232-6348 (24 hours)

Center for Disease Control National Prevention Information Network (CDC-NPIN)
Phone: (800) 458-5231
TTY (for callers with hearing impairments): (800) 243-7012 (M-F 9am-6pm ET)

HIV/AIDS Treatment Information Service (ATIS)
P.O. Box 6303
Rockville, MD 20849
Toll free: 1-800-448-0440 (M-F 12pm-5pm ET) http://www.aidsinfo.nih.gov/
Free literature, including U.S. guidelines on HIV treatment from the Department of Health and Human Services (DHHS).

HIV/AIDS/HCV Education Project
ACLU NATIONAL PRISONER PROJECT
915 15th St. NW, 7th Floor
Washington D.C. 20005
http://www.aclu.org/hiv/index.html
Referrals to city and state programs nationwide. Resource center, including free copies of PLAY IT SAFER, a booklet on STIs (sexually transmitted infections), and HIV/AIDS magazines.

National HCV Prison Coalition
Hepatitis C Awareness Project
Phyllis Beck, Director
PO Box 41803
Eugene, OR 97404

Phone: (541) 607.5725
Fax: (541) 607-5684
Email: hepinfo@hepeducation.org
http://www.hcvinprison.org/
Education, advocacy and support for prisoners with hepatitis C and HIV co-infection.

National Minority AIDS Counsel Prison Initiative
1931 13th Street NW
Washington, DC 20009-4432
Phone: (202) 483-NMAC (6622)
Fax: (202) 483-1127, (202) 483-1135, (202) 483-5387
www.nmac.org/index/prison-initiative
E-mail: info@nmac.org
The Prison Initiative is a project of NMAC, which helps community and faith-based organizations, correctional facilities and health departments evaluate, improve and implement effective discharge planning for HIV positive prisoners and former prisoners.

National Native American AIDS Prevention Center
720 S. Colorado Blvd., Suite 650-S
Denver, CO 80246
Phone: (720) 382-2244
Fax: (720) 382-2248
Automated fax info: 1-800-283-6880
Hours: Monday–Friday 9:00 am to 5:00 pm
http://www.nnaapc.org/
E-mail: information@nnaapc.org
The National Native American AIDS Prevention Center (NNAAPC) offers a variety of programs to help promote education about HIV/AIDS, support prevention efforts, and help foster healthy attitudes about sexuality and sexual health in the Native community.

AIDS Organizations in New York

AIDS Related Community Services
40 Sawmill River Road
Hawthorne, NY 10523
Phone: (914) 345-8888
Fax: (915) 785 8299
Counseling, education, food, and pantry. Other locations available in Westchester, Rockland, Dutchess, Putnam, Ulster, and Sullivan counties.
American Foundation for AIDS Research
120 Wall Street, 13th Floor
New York, NY 10005-3902

Phone: (212) 806-1600
Toll-free: (800) 392-6327
Fax: (212) 806-1601
This group is a non-profit organization that supports AIDS research, HIV prevention, treatment education, and the advocacy of AIDS-related public policy.

Asian Pacific Islander Coalition on HIV/AIDS
400 Broadway
New York, NY 10013
Phone: (212) 334-7940
(866) 274-2429 (Infoline)
Fax: (212) 334-7956
This group is a non-profit organization providing HIV/AIDS-related services, education, and research to Asian and Pacific Islander Communities in New York City. Services include HIV testing, STI screening and treatment, acupuncture, and more.

Correctional Association of New York
2090 Adam Clayton Powell, Suite 200
New York, NY 10027
Phone: (212) 254-5700
Fax: (212) 473-2807
This organization provides advocacy, research, information, and referral to prisoners and parolees living with HIV.

Gay Men's Health Crisis
119 West 24th Street
New York, NY 10011-1913
Phone: (212) 367-1000
Toll free: (800) 243-7692 (Hotline) (in English, en Español) (Weds. 10am–2pm; Fri. 10am–6pm)
Assists prisoners with obtaining public benefits when on parole, and publishes a variety of informational brochures. It provides legal services to anyone who is HIV-positive. It also provides referrals and serves women and children.

HIV Law Project
15 Maiden Lane, 18th Floor
New York, NY 10038
Phone: (212) 577-3001 (in English, en Español)
Fax: (212) 577-3192
This organization provides legal advocacy. However, it only deals with civil law cases, not criminal law. It provides free civil legal services primarily related to entitlements, housing, immigration (including permanency planning), and family law. It serves residents of Manhattan and the Bronx, and homeless people in all five boroughs. Collect calls are accepted.

Hispanic AIDS Forum, Inc.
Manhattan Office:
213 West 35th Street, 12th Floor
New York, NY 10010
Phone: (212) 868-6230 (in English, en Español)
Fax: (212) 868-6237

Bronx Office:
975 Kelly Street, Suite 402
Bronx, NY 10459
Phone: (718) 328-4188 (in English, en Español)
Fax: (718) 328-2888

The Hispanic AIDS Forum is New York's largest Latino-run AIDS outreach organization. It has a bilingual staff and provides seminars, outreach programs, case management services, counseling and other support, and referrals to other organizations.

Latino Commission on AIDS
24 West 25th Street, 9th Floor
New York, NY 10010
Phone: (212) 675-3288
Fax: (212) 675-3466
A grass-roots organization working in collaboration with the AIDS in Prison Project.

Legal Action Center (LAC)
225 Varick Street, 4th Floor
New York, NY 10014
Phone: (212) 243-1313
Toll-free: (800) 223-4044
Fax: (212) 675-0286
This organization provides legal services for ex-offenders with HIV, such as help with housing and employment discrimination.

New York AIDS Coalition (NYAC)
400 Broadway, 2nd Floor
New York, NY 10013
Phone: (646) 744-1598
Brings together community-based HIV/AIDS organizations and their supporters to work for increased funding and fair policies for people living with HIV/AIDS in New York State.

The Osborne Association AIDS in Prison Project
809 Westchester Avenue
Bronx, NY 10455
Phone: (718) 842-0500
Fax: (718) 842-0971
Email: info@osborneny.org
AIDS in Prison Project Hotline (718) 378-7022

(T,W,R, 3–8 p.m.; collect calls accepted)
www.osborneny.org
Provides information, counseling, education, placement in service organizations, and medical advocacy for New York prisoners.

Prisoners' Rights Project of the Legal Aid Society
199 Water Street
New York, NY 10038
Phone: (212) 577-3300
Fax: (212) 509 8433
Provides services to prisoners only. It also helps prisoners in New York City and New York State with medical concerns and brutality cases.

Prisoners Legal Services of New York (PLSNY)
Albany Location:
41 State Street, Suite M112
Albany, NY 12207
Prisons served: Arthurkill, Bayview, Beacon, Bedford Hills, Mt. McGregor, Summit Shock, CNYPC, Coxsackie, Downstate, Eastern, Edgecombe, Fishkill, Fulton, Great Meadow, Greene, Greenhaven, Hale Creek, Hudson, Lincoln, Marcy, Midstate, Mid-Orange, Mohawk, Oneida, Otisville, Queensboro, Shawangunk, Sing Sing, Sullivan, Taconic, Ulster, Wallkill, Walsh, Washington, Woodbourne.

Buffalo Location:
237 Main St., Suite 1535
Buffalo, NY 14203
Prisons served: Albion, Attica, Buffalo, Collins, Gowanda, Groveland, Lakeview, Livingston, Orleans, Rochester, Wende, Wyoming.

Ithaca Location:
102 Prospect St.
Ithaca, NY 14850
Prisons served: Auburn, Butler, Camp Georgetown, Monterey Shock, Camp Pharsalia, Cape Vincent, Cayuga, Elmira, Five Points, Southport, Watertown, Willard.

Plattsburgh Location:
121 Bridge Street, Suite 202
Plattsburgh, NY 12901
Prisons served: Adirondack, Altona, Bare Hill, Camp Gabriels, Chateaugay, Clinton, Franklin, Gouverneur, Lyon Mountain, Moriah Shock, Ogdensburg, Riverview, Upstate.

(Due to the large number of inquiries, PLSNY does not accept telephone calls from prisoners and their family members).

PLSNY is a non-profit legal services organization providing civil legal services to indigent prisoners in New York State correctional facilities in cases where no other counsel is available.

Women's Prison Association
Reentry Unit
110 2nd Avenue
New York, NY 10003
Phone: General Info: (212) 292-7740
Reentry Services: (718) 637-6877
Fax: (212) 292-7763
WPA Reentry Services include a full array of prison, jail, and community-based assistance aimed at helping women become full participants in community life following incarceration or other criminal justice involvement.

AIDS Organizations in California

San Francisco AIDS Foundation
1035 Market St, Ste 400
San Francisco CA 94103
Phone: (415) 487-8000
Fax: (415) 487-8079
http://www.sfaf.org
Provides vital services and programs designed to improve the quality of life for people living with HIV/AIDS and to reduce the number of new infections that occur each year.

Center for Health Justice
900 Avila Street, Ste. 301
Los Angeles, CA 90012
Phone: (213) 229-0985
Fax: (213) 229-0986
Email: info@healthjustice.net
http://www.healthjustice.net
Provides HIV legal and education information inside and outside correctional facilities.

Project Inform's National HIV/AIDS Treatment Hotline
1375 Mission Street
San Francisco, CA 94103
Toll free: 1-800-822-7422
Hours: Monday-Friday, 10am-4pm Pacific Time (PT).
Nightline: 1-800-628-9240
Hours: 5pm-5am every day.
Provides legal and educational information for those with HIV/AIDS. Will mail out materials to prisoners and accepts collect calls from correctional institutions.

AIDS Project Los Angeles
611 South Kingsley Drive
Los Angeles, CA 90005
Phone: (213) 201-1600, (213) 201-1500
http://www.apla.org/

AIDS Organizations in Illinois

Illinois AIDS Hotline
Toll-free: (800) 243-2437 (in English, en Español)
Hours: daily 8am-10pm Central Time (CT).
Up-to-date information on HIV transmission, HIV counseling and testing sites. Offers information and support resources, risk reduction. Bilingual.

AIDS Organizations in Pennsylvania

Lewisburg Prison Project
P.O. Box 128
Lewisburg, PA 17837-0128
Phone: (570) 523-1104
Fax: (570) 523-3944
Email: prisonproject@dejazzd.com
Non-profit organization that provides legal and other assistance to prisoners in Central Pennsylvania for non-criminal issues. Counsels and assists prisoners who encounter treatment they perceive as illegal or unfair, including medical treatment.

Pennsylvania AIDS Hotline
Toll-free: (800) 662-6080
Up-to-date information on HIV transmission, HIV counseling and testing sites. Offers information and support resources, risk reduction.

AIDS Organizations in Texas

AIDS Arms
219 Sunset, Suite #116-A
Dallas, Texas 75208
Phone: (214) 521-5191
Fax: (214) 528-5879
TDD: (214) 231-0151
www.aidsarms.org
Assists individuals in accessing the healthcare, resources, and support necessary to successfully manage the challenges of living with HIV/AIDS. Assists prisoners in obtaining information regarding HIV/AIDS and other STIs.

Urban League of Greater Dallas
4315 South Lancaster Road
Dallas, Texas 75216
Phone: (214) 915-4600
Fax: (214) 915-4601
www.dallasurbanleague.com
Referral for anonymous and confidential HIV testing, prevention counseling, individual ongoing counseling (not prevention counseling), health education/risk reduction, HIV prevention education, STI prevention education, street outreach, peer education, HIV early intervention, hepatitis education/counseling, TB testing, substance abuse intervention, support groups, peer counseling, financial education/entitlement assistance, emergency financial assistance, clothing assistance, computer technology training, G.E.D. classes, employment programs, brochures, videos.

AIDS Foundation Houston
3202 Weslayan Street
Houston, Texas 77027
Phone: (713) 623-6796
Fax: (713) 623-4029
Email: info@AFHouston.org
www.aidshelp.org
Special Prison Initiative Program. Prevention counseling, health education/risk reduction, HIV prevention education, STI prevention education, street outreach, peer education, case management for HIV/AIDS, hepatitis education/counseling, hotline/telephone counseling, peer counseling, food pantry, nutrition services, volunteer services, HOPWA, emergency financial assistance, clothing assistance, housing programs.

National Hepatitis B Organization

Hepatitis B Foundation
3805 Old Easton Rd.
Doylestown, PA 18902
Phone: (215) 489-4900
Fax: (215) 489-4920
Email: contact@hepb.org
Hepatitis B Foundation provides information and support for people with Hepatitis B and supports research for a cure. It also offers online support groups.

A JAILHOUSE LAWYER'S MANUAL

Chapter 27:
Religious Freedom in Prison

Columbia Human Rights Law Review

Ninth Edition 2011

Legal Disclaimer

A Jailhouse Lawyer's Manual is written and updated by members of the Columbia Human Rights Law Review. The law prohibits us from providing any legal advice to prisoners. This information is not intended as legal advice or representation nor should you consider or rely upon it as such. Neither the JLM nor any information contained herein is intended to or shall constitute a contract between the JLM and any reader, and the JLM does not guarantee the accuracy of the information contained herein. Additionally, your use of the JLM should not be construed as creating an attorney-client relationship with the JLM staff or anyone at Columbia Law School. Finally, while we have attempted to provide information that is up-to-date and useful, because the law changes frequently, we cannot guarantee that all information is current.

CHAPTER 27

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM IN PRISON*

A. Introduction

While in prison, you have the right to observe and practice the religion of your choice.[1] The U.S. Constitution, as well as federal and state laws, protects this right. This Chapter describes these protections and explains how courts determine whether a prisoner's right to religious freedom has been violated.

1. Constitutional Protections

The First Amendment to the Constitution is the most basic protection of your right to religious freedom. This Amendment says that "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof."[2]

The first part of the Amendment, known as the Establishment Clause, prohibits government officials from establishing a national religion. Generally, this means that the government is not allowed to start a church, to aid one religion, to aid all religions, or to favor one religion over another.[3]

The second part of the First Amendment, known as the Free Exercise Clause, means that government cannot prevent you from practicing your religion. However, under the Free Exercise Clause, prison officials can impose restrictions on your exercise of religion that are "reasonably related" to legitimate prison goals.[4] In other words, you might be barred from performing a religious practice if the justification reasonably relates to the prison's aims. These justifications may include deterring crime, rehabilitating prisoners, and ensuring security.[5]

Both the Establishment Clause and Free Exercise Clause are part of the First Amendment, but courts address these clauses separately, and this Chapter will also address them separately.

2. Statutory Protections

Laws passed by Congress and state legislatures provide additional protection of your religious freedom. Depending on whether you are in a state or federal prison, different laws apply. If you are in a state prison, the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act of 2000 (RLUIPA) protects your religious freedom;[6] if you are in a federal prison, the Religious Freedom Restoration Act of 1993 (RFRA) applies.[7]

Although RLUIPA and RFRA are two different laws, both use the same language to describe the religious free exercise protections given to prisoners.[8] Therefore, if you are a federal prisoner (and, thus, protected by RFRA), this Chapter's discussion of RLUIPA can still help you figure out how strong your RFRA claims are. Additionally, you can cite cases decided under either RLUIPA or RFRA to support your claim, regardless of whether you are in federal or state prison.[9]

---

* This Chapter was revised by Robert Schwimmer, based in part on previous versions by Shana L. Fulton, W. Kevin Brinkley, Jeffra Becknell, Jennifer Eichholz, Betty A. Lee, Richard F. Storrow, and Jimmy Wu. Thanks to John Boston for all of his work on this Chapter.

1. See Cruz v. Beto, 405 U.S. 319, 322, 92 S. Ct. 1079, 1082–83, 31 L. Ed. 2d 263, 268 (1972) (finding that prisoners retain 1st Amendment protections, including its directive that no law shall prohibit the free exercise of religion).

2. U.S. Const. amend. I.

3. See Everson v. Bd. of Educ., 330 U.S. 1, 15, 67 S. Ct. 504, 511, 91 L. Ed. 711, 723 (1947) ("The 'establishment of religion' clause of the First Amendment means at least this: Neither a state nor the Federal Government can set up a church. Neither can pass laws which aid one religion, aid all religions, or prefer one religion over another.").

4. Turner v. Safley, 482 U.S. 78, 89, 107 S. Ct. 2254, 2261, 96 L. Ed. 2d 64, 79 (1987) ("[W]hen a prison regulation impinges on inmates' constitutional rights, the regulation is valid if it is reasonably related to legitimate penological interests.").

5. Pell v. Procunier, 417 U.S. 817, 822–23, 94 S. Ct. 2800, 2804, 41 L. Ed. 2d 495, 501–02 (1974); Procunier v. Martinez, 416 U.S. 396, 412, 94 S. Ct. 1800, 1810–11, 40 L. Ed. 2d 224, 239 (1974).

6. Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act of 2000 (RLUIPA), 42 U.S.C. §§ 2000cc–cc-5. (2006).

7. Religious Freedom Restoration Act of 1993 (RFRA), 42 U.S.C. §§ 2000bb to bb-4. (2006).

8. Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act of 2000 (RLUIPA), 42 U.S.C. § 2000cc-1 (2006); Religious Freedom Restoration Act of 1993 (RFRA), 42 U.S.C. §§ 2000bb to bb-4 (2006).

9. See, e.g., Fowler v. Crawford, 534 F.3d 931, 938 (8th Cir. 2008) (holding that a RFRA case "dictate[d] the

Some states have also enacted state-specific laws that further protect the religious freedom of state prisoners. These laws are discussed in more detail in Part D of this Chapter.

3. Bringing a Religious Freedom Lawsuit

If you believe prison officials have violated your constitutional or statutory rights to religious freedom, and you wish to bring a suit against them, you will first need to follow your institution's administrative grievance procedure.[10] See JLM, Chapter 15 for further information on inmate grievance procedures.

If you do not receive a favorable result through the grievance procedure, you can file suit in federal court. Depending on which type of prison you are in, you will need to bring different claims. If you are a state prisoner, you should bring a RLUIPA claim under 42 U.S.C. § 2000cc and a First Amendment claim under 42 U.S.C. § 1983. If you are a federal prisoner, you should bring a RFRA claim under 42 U.S.C. § 2000bb and a First Amendment claim in a Bivens action.[11]

Regardless of which claims you bring, when you draft your complaint, you should be sure to begin by asserting a RLUIPA (or, if you are a federal prisoner, RFRA) claim, followed by a First Amendment claim. This is because it is easier to meet the RLUIPA or RFRA standards than the First Amendment standards, and you are thus more likely to receive relief under RLUIPA or RFRA than under the First Amendment.[12]

If you are a state prisoner, you can also file an action in a state court. If you are in a New York state prison, you can either file an action in the Court of Claims, or you can file an Article 78 petition, depending on what kind of relief you want. More information on all of these types of cases can be found in the following JLM chapters: Chapter 5 (Choosing a Court and a Lawsuit), Chapter 14 (Prison Litigation Reform Act), Chapter 16 (42 U.S.C. § 1983 and Bivens actions), Chapter 17 (Tort Actions), and Chapter 22 (Article 78 proceedings).

If you end up pursuing any claim in federal court, you should make sure to read JLM, Chapter 14 on the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA) before you file your claim. If you do not follow PLRA requirements, you can, among other things, lose your good time credit and your right to bring future claims in federal court without paying the full filing fee.

The next part of this Chapter discusses the First Amendment Establishment Clause. Part C discusses the First Amendment Free Exercise Clause and RLUIPA or RFRA protections. Part D discusses your rights under selected state statutes, while Part E considers recent developments in faith-based rehabilitation programs. The Appendix lists some religious organizations that may provide you with additional support.

B. The First Amendment Establishment Clause

The Establishment Clause of the First Amendment states that "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion."[13] This means that the government cannot form a church, aid any religion, prefer any religion over another, or participate in any religious organization.[14] Thus, prison officials violate the Establishment Clause if they give special treatment to certain religious groups. For example, if prison officials outcome" in the RLUIPA case before the court).

---

10. See Cutter v. Wilkinson, 544 U.S. 709, 723 n.12, 125 S. Ct. 2113, 2123 n.12, 161 L. Ed. 2d 1020, 1035 n.12 (2005) ("[A] prisoner may not sue under RLUIPA without first exhausting all available administrative remedies."); Sacred Feather v. Merrill, No. 07-18 B, 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 47543, at *9–10 (D. Me. June 19, 2008) (unpublished) (finding that the prisoners' claim that limited access to sweat lodges, powwows, ceremonial food, and music had to be dismissed because prisoners had not exhausted the prison's grievance procedure).

11. A Bivens action allows prisoners to sue federal officials for constitutional violations. See JLM, Chapter 16, "Using 42 U.S.C. § 1983 and 28 U.S.C. § 1331 to Obtain Relief From Violations of Federal Law," for a detailed discussion; see also Corr. Servs. Corp. v. Malesko, 534 U.S. 61, 72, 122 S. Ct. 515, 522, 151 L. Ed. 2d 456, 467 (2001) (holding that a federal prisoner alleging a constitutional violation can bring a Bivens claim against a federal officer).

12. See Shakur v. Schriro, 514 F.3d 878, 888 (9th Cir. 2008) ("RLUIPA ... mandates a stricter standard of review for prison regulations that burden the free exercise of religion than the reasonableness standard [used to review regulations under the 1st Amendment]."); see also Smith v. Allen, 502 F.3d 1255, 1266, 21 Fla. L. Weekly Fed. C. 54 (11th Cir. 2007) (noting RLUIPA affords a "heightened protection from government-imposed burdens" than the 1st Amendment); Desimone v. Bartow, No. 08-C-638, 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 64419, at *11 (E.D. Wis. Aug 12, 2008) (unpublished) ("RLUIPA provides more expansive protection [than the 1st Amendment], prohibiting institutions that receive federal funding from substantially burdening an inmate's exercise of religion, even by a rule of general applicability, unless that burden is the least restrictive means of furthering a compelling governmental interest.").

13. U.S. Const. amend. I.

14. See Kerr v. Farrey, 95 F.3d 472, 479–80 (7th Cir. 1996) (finding a violation of the Establishment Clause where plaintiff had been required to attend a substance abuse counseling program with explicit religious content while in prison and where the only option available to the prisoner was religious in nature).

were to set up a church within the prison and then force prisoners to attend religious services, that would violate the Establishment Clause.[15]

In order for your Establishment Clause claim to succeed, you will first need to prove that there was government action, often called "state action." The Supreme Court has held that "state action may be found if, though only if, there is such a close nexus between the State and the challenged action that seemingly private behavior may be fairly treated as that of the State itself."[16]

Generally, courts will consider actions by prison officials and private groups acting under the authority of prison officials to be state action.[17] For example, in 2007, the Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit held that when a department of corrections gave private religious organizations the power to incarcerate, treat, and discipline prisoners, as well as access to facilities and substantial aid to effectuate a faith-based program, the religious organizations could be considered state actors.[18]

Unauthorized actions by individuals, on the other hand, may be less likely to constitute state action. For example, one federal appeals court held that there was no state action when a prison officer, who was also a Christian minister, brought a bible to work and put it in the prisoners' view, sang Christian songs, debated and discussed religion with prisoners, and tried to convert prisoners to Christianity. The court found no Establishment Clause violation because the jail had not approved these actions, had trained its staff to avoid such conduct, and transferred the officer when the plaintiff complained.[19]

Once you have shown that the practice or regulation you are challenging constitutes government action, you will need to prove that this action violated the Establishment Clause. To determine whether a prison regulation or practice violates the Establishment Clause, courts have used different tests,[20] including the Lee coercion test[21] and the Lemon test.[22] Both tests are explained below. While some courts have combined these tests,[23] the Supreme Court has yet to rule that either of these tests represents the sole constitutional standard.[24] So you should try to argue in your complaint that the challenged prison regulation or practice fails both of the Establishment Clause tests.

---

15. See Campbell v. Cauthron, 623 F.2d 503, 509 (8th Cir. 1980) (holding that allowing religious volunteers into a cell block was not a state establishment of religion, but that prison officials were required to make sure that no prisoners were subjected to forced religious indoctrination).

16. Brentwood Acad. v. Tenn. Sec. Sch. Athletic Ass'n, 531 U.S. 288, 295, 121 S. Ct. 924, 930, 148 L. Ed. 2d 807, 817 (2001).

17. See Monroe v. Pape, 365 U.S. 167, 184, 81 S. Ct. 473, 482, 5 L. Ed. 2d 492, 503 (1961) (finding that constitutional violations committed by state officers in performance of their duties were committed "under color of" state law, and rejecting the argument "that 'under color of' state law included only action taken by officials pursuant to state law").

18. Americans United for Separation of Church and State v. Prison Fellowship Ministries, Inc., 509 F.3d 406, 421–23 (8th Cir. 2007).

19. Canell v. Lightner, 143 F.3d 1210, 1214 (9th Cir. 1998).

20. See Ross v. Keelings, 2 F. Supp. 2d 810, 816–18 (E.D. Va. 1998) (noting that courts have sometimes used the Lemon test and other times declined to apply Lemon in favor of the Lee test).

21. See Lee v. Weisman, 505 U.S. 577, 578, 112 S. Ct. 2649, 2655, 120 L. Ed. 2d 467, 480 (1992); Warner v. County Dept. of Probation, 115 F.3d 1068, 1074–75 (2d Cir. 1997) (applying the Lee coercion test to determine whether a probation practice violates the Establishment Clause); Warburton v. Underwood, 2 F. Supp. 2d 306, 318 (W.D.N.Y. 1998) (holding that while proof of government coercion is not necessary to prove an Establishment Clause violation, it is sufficient).

22. See Lemon v. Kurtzman, 403 U.S. 602, 91 S. Ct. 2105, 29 L. Ed. 2d 745 (1971); Kaufman v. McCaughtry, 419 F.3d 678, 683–84 (7th Cir. 2005) (applying the Lemon test to determine whether a prison practice violates the Establishment Clause). But see Gray v. Johnson, 436 F. Supp. 2d 795, 800 n.4 (W.D. Va. 2006) ("When deciding similar cases, the Second Circuit, the Seventh Circuit, and the Eastern District of Virginia have opted to apply a more basic coercion test in lieu of Lemon. These courts have simply examined whether the challenged program accomplished coerced religious participation, finding each time that the program did.").

23. See, e.g., Gray v. Johnson, 436 F. Supp. 2d 795, 800 n.4 (W.D. Va. 2006) (explaining how the coercion and endorsement tests fall within the second prong of the Lemon test).

24. See Van Orden v. Perry, 545 U.S. 677, 685–86, 125 S. Ct. 2854, 2860–61,162 L. Ed. 2d 607, 615–16 (2005) (explaining that many cases have either not relied on the Lemon test or applied it only after concluding that a regulation was invalid under a different 1st Amendment Establishment test); see e.g., Lynch v. Donnelly, 465 U.S. 668, 679, 104 S. Ct. 1355, 1362, 79 L. Ed. 2d 604, 613 (1984) ("[W]e have repeatedly emphasized our unwillingness to be confined to any single test or criterion in this sensitive area."); County of Allegheny v. ACLU, 492 U.S. 594, 595, 109 S. Ct. 3086, 3102, 106 L.E. 2d 472, 496 (1989) ("Every government practice must be judged in its unique circumstances to determine whether it [endorses] religion."); Lee v. Weisman, 505 U.S. 577, 597, 112 S. Ct. 2649, 2661, 120 L. Ed. 2d 467, 487 (1992)

1. The Lee Coercion Test

To determine whether a prison regulation or practice violates the First Amendment's Establishment Clause, a court may ask whether it amounts to "coercion." In Lee v. Weisman, the U.S. Supreme Court announced that "at a minimum, the Constitution guarantees that government may not coerce anyone to support or participate in religion or its exercise ...."[25] Applying this rule, the Court held that a policy permitting public schools to invite clergy members to say prayers at graduation ceremonies was unconstitutional because it amounted to forced participation in religion,[26] and thus failed the coercion test.

Although Lee dealt with religious freedom in the school context, other lower courts have held that a showing of coercion alone, without more, may be sufficient to prove an Establishment Clause violation in the prison or probation context.[27]

For instance, in Kerr v. Farrey,[28] a prisoner brought a federal civil rights claim against state corrections officials. The prisoner alleged that the officials required him to attend religious-based Narcotics Anonymous meetings as part of his rehabilitation.[29] The federal court of appeals applied the Lee coercion rule by asking three questions: (1) whether there was state action; (2) whether the action was coercive or forceful; and (3) whether the object of the coercion was religious or secular. The prison failed all three questions because the state had acted (through the prison officials) by forcing the prisoner to participate in the Narcotics Anonymous meeting, which contained a religious element.[30] The penalty for not attending the meetings was a higher security risk classification and negative effects on the prisoner's parole eligibility. Therefore, the court found that the prison had violated the Establishment Clause.[31]

A similar conclusion was reached in Warner v. Orange County Department of Probation. There, the Second Circuit Court of Appeals concluded that because the department of probation had required a prisoner to attend a religious Alcoholics Anonymous program as a condition of probation, it "plainly constituted coerced participation in religious exercise" and thus violated the Establishment Clause.[32]

2. The Lemon Test

If you are unable to show that the prison regulation or practice amounted to coercion, you might still have a valid First Amendment claim under the Lemon test.[33] This test, which comes from the U.S. Supreme Court's decision in Lemon v. Kurtzman,[34] is a "central tool" in the court's analysis of Establishment Clause cases[35] and ("Establishment Clause jurisprudence remains a delicate and fact-sensitive one.").

---

25. Lee v. Weisman, 505 U.S. 577, 587, 112 S. Ct. 2649, 2655, 120 L. Ed. 2d 467, 480 (1992).

26. Lee v. Weisman, 505 U.S. 577, 599, 112 S. Ct. 2649, 2661, 120 L. Ed. 2d 467, 488 (1992).

27. See Warburton v. Underwood, 2 F. Supp. 2d 306, 318 (W.D.N.Y. 1998) (holding proof of government coercion is sufficient but not necessary to prove an Establishment Clause violation).

28. Kerr v. Farrey, 95 F.3d 472 (7th Cir. 1996).

29. For a more detailed discussion of faith-based addiction treatment options, see Part E of this Chapter.

30. Kerr v. Farrey, 95 F.3d 472, 479–80 (7th Cir. 1996); see also Warner v. Orange County Dept. of Prob., 115 F.3d 1068, 1074–75 (2d Cir. 1996), vacated on other grounds by 115 F.3d 1068 (2d Cir. 1997) (holding that the a county probation department could be held liable for violating the Establishment Clause by requiring a probationer to attend Alcoholics Anonymous meetings that contained religious content); Ross v. Keelings, 2 F. Supp. 2d 810 (E.D. Va. 1998) (holding that prison officials violated the Establishment Clause by forcing a prisoner to attend a drug rehabilitation program that included a religious study component).

31. Kerr v. Farrey, 95 F.3d 472, 480 (7th Cir. 1996); but see Quigg v. Armstrong, 106 F. App'x 555, 556 (9th Cir. 2004) (holding that a privately-run pre-release program that served as an alternative to prison was free to offer religion-based treatment without providing nonreligious alternatives because the program employees were not state actors).

32. Warner v. Orange County Dept. of Probation, 115 F.3d 1068, 1076 n.8 (1996), vacated on other grounds by 115 F.3d 1068 (2d Cir. 1997).

33. See Alexander v. Schenk, 118 F. Supp. 2d 298, 301 (N.D.N.Y. 2000) ("In cases not involving coercion courts are required to examine whether practice [satisfies the Lemon test].").

34. Lemon v. Kurtzman, 403 U.S. 602, 91 S. Ct. 2105, 29 L. Ed. 2d 745 (1971) (finding that the state cannot give direct aid to parochial schools), noted in Zelman v. Simmons-Harris, 536 U.S. 639, 668–70, 122 S. Ct. 2460, 2476, 153 L. Ed. 2d 604, 627–28 (2002). The Lemon test has not been used recently by the Supreme Court, and some authors have suggested that the Supreme Court may abandon it. However, as recently as 2005, the Supreme Court affirmed a district court judge's use of the first factor of the test, and refused to abandon the "purpose" factor. See McCreary County, Ky. v. Am. Civil Liberties Union of Ky., 545 U.S. 844, 859, 125 S. Ct. 2722, 2733, 162 L. Ed. 2d 729, 746 (2005).

35. See Zelman v. Simmons-Harris, 536 U.S. 639, 668, 122 S. Ct. 2460, 2476, 153 L. Ed. 2d 604, 627 (2002) (describing the Lemon test as a "central tool in our analysis of cases in this area") (O'Connor, J., concurring).

is frequently cited. Therefore, you should be prepared to argue that the regulation which you are complaining about fails the Lemon test.

In order to demonstrate a violation of the Establishment Clause under the Lemon test, you must show one or more of the following:

(1) The regulation has a non-secular purpose (i.e., a religious purpose);
(2) Its principle or primary effect is to advance or inhibit religion; or
(3) It fosters excessive government entanglement with religion.[36]

This means that under Lemon, a court will uphold a prison regulation or practice if (1) it has a secular (non-religious) purpose; (2) its primary effect neither advances nor inhibits religion, and (3) it does not require "an excessive government entanglement with religion."

In assessing the first criterion—the purpose of the challenged practice—a court may be more likely to find that a prison regulation or practice has a non-religious purpose if it allows for airing more than one religious view. For example, in Murphy v. Missouri Department of Corrections,[37] the Eighth Circuit Court of Appeals found that a prison had not violated the Establishment Clause when it allowed a "broad spectrum" of religious programming to be shown on prison television, but refused to show programs of a specific prisoner's religious group. A central tenet of the prisoner's religion was that "its members must all be Caucasian because they are uniquely blessed by God and must separate themselves from all non-Caucasian persons."[38] The court explained that the prison's "purpose in providing the religious channel was to create a forum in which a large range of religious messages could air, subject only to [the prison's] economic and security concerns."[39] The court found no evidence that favored any one religion in its programming; the individual prisoner's religious programming posed a security risk that other religious programming did not.[40] Therefore, the prison did not violate the establishment clause when it aired other religious programming but refused to air the individual prisoner's religious programming.[41]

Similarly, in Gray v. Johnson,[42] a district court found that a prison rehabilitative program that involved some discussion of religion at mandatory meetings and offered both secular and religious library materials did not amount to a violation of the Establishment Clause, even if participants had sung a gospel song at a talent show and preached religion outside of the program.[43]

In contrast, the Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit found in Kaufman v. McCaughtry[44] that the Establishment Clause was violated where a prison refused to allow prisoners to organize an atheist study group. The prison had failed to show why such a gathering would pose a greater security risk than meetings of prisoners of other faiths. Thus, the court vacated a grant of summary judgment for the prison because it had not given a non-religious purpose for discrimination against the atheist group.[45]

In assessing the second and third parts of the Lemon test (which some courts have treated as a single inquiry),[46] courts have looked to whether the challenged practice either endorses or disapproves of religion.[47]

---

36. Lemon v. Kurtzman, 403 U.S. 602, 612–13, 91 S. Ct. 2105, 2111, 29 L. Ed. 2d 745, 755 (1971) (finding that the state cannot give direct aid to parochial schools), noted in Zelman v. Simmons-Harris, 536 U.S. 639, 668–70, 122 S. Ct. 2460, 2476, 153 L. Ed. 2d 604, 627–28 (2002).

37. Murphy v. Mo. Dept. of Corr., 372 F.3d 979, 985 (8th Cir. 2004).

38. Murphy v. Mo. Dept. of Corr., 372 F.3d 979, 981 (8th Cir. 2004).

39. Murphy v. Mo. Dept. of Corr., 372 F.3d 979, 985 (8th Cir. 2004).

40. Murphy v. Mo. Dept. of Corr., 372 F.3d 979, 985 (8th Cir. 2004).

41. Murphy v. Mo. Dept. of Corr., 372 F.3d 979, 985 (8th Cir. 2004).

42. Gray v. Johnson, 436 F. Supp. 2d 795 (W.D. Va. 2006).

43. Gray v. Johnson, 436 F. Supp. 2d 795, 800 (W.D. Va. 2006).

44. Kaufman v. McCaughtry, 419 F.3d 678 (7th Cir. 2005).

45. Kaufman v. McCaughtry, 419 F.3d 678, 684 (7th Cir. 2005).

46. See Bader v. Wren, 532 F. Supp. 2d 308, 313 (D.N.H. 2008) ("The second and third questions have been fused into one, because the same evidence often answers both questions."); see also Zelman v. Simmons-Harris, 536 U.S. 639, 668–69, 122 S. Ct. 2460, 2476, 153 L. Ed. 2d 604, 627 (2002) ("[T]he degree of entanglement has implications for whether a statute advances or inhibits religion."); Agostini v. Felton, 521 U.S. 203, 232, 117 S. Ct. 1997, 2015, 138 L. Ed. 2d 391, 420 (1997) (combining excessive entanglement into the effects inquiry).

47. Lynch v. Donnelly, 465 U.S. 668, 690, 104 S. Ct. 1355, 1368, 79 L. Ed. 2d 604, 621 (1984) (O'Connor, J., concurring) ("The effect prong asks whether, irrespective of government's actual purpose, the practice under review in fact conveys a message of endorsement or disapproval. An affirmative answer to either question should render the challenged practice invalid.").

In summary, to bring a successful First Amendment Establishment Claim, you should be able to show:

(1) The practice or regulation that you are challenging is a government action, and either;
(2) The practice or regulation has the effect of coercing you to practice religion and thus fails the Lee coercion test, or
(3) If there is no coercion, the practice or regulation fails the Lemon test because it either (a) has a religious purpose; (b) endorses, advances, or inhibits a religion; or (c) constitutes an excessive government entanglement with religion.

C. The First Amendment Free Exercise Clause, the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act of 2000 (RLUIPA), and the Religious Freedom Restoration Act (RFRA)

This section discusses your religious freedom rights under the First Amendment Free Exercise Clause and RLUIPA or RFRA.[48] Although this section describes the First Amendment Free Exercise Clause first, it is absolutely critical that when drafting a complaint, you first state a claim for relief under RLUIPA or RFRA. The RLUIPA or RFRA standards are easier to meet than the First Amendment standards, and thus, you are more likely to receive relief under RLUIPA or RFRA than under the First Amendment.[49] After you make this claim, you may then make an additional First Amendment claim.

1. First Amendment Free Exercise Clause

Under the Free Exercise Clause of the First Amendment,[50] prison officials must provide you with a "reasonable opportunity" for you to exercise your religious freedom without fear of penalty.[51]

However, in certain circumstances, prison officials may restrict this right to exercise or practice your religious beliefs.[52] Specifically, a prison may lawfully impose rules or regulations that interfere with your sincerely held religious beliefs, provided that these rules or regulations are "reasonably related" to a "legitimate penological purpose or goal" of the prison.[53] These legitimate goals might include maintaining prison order, discipline, safety, and security, among others[54]

So, in order to successfully challenge a prison regulation or practice under the Free Exercise Clause, you must be able to show that:

(1) Your belief is religious in nature;[55]
(2) Your belief is sincerely held; and
(3) The prison regulation is not reasonably related to a legitimate penological purpose or goal.[56]

---

48. RLUIPA and RFRA provide the same protection; the main difference is that RLUIPA applies to state and municipal prisoners, while RFRA applies to federal prisoners. See Cutter v. Wilkinson, 544 U.S. 709, 715 n.2, 125 S. Ct. 2113, 2118 n.2, 161 L. Ed. 2d 1020, 1030 n.2 (2005) (noting that courts of appeals have held that RFRA remains operative on the federal government and explaining that RLUIPA targets state and local governments).

49. See Shakur v. Schriro, 514 F.3d 878, 888 (9th Cir. 2008) ("RLUIPA ... mandates a stricter standard of review for prison regulations that burden the free exercise of religion than the reasonableness standard [used to review regulations under the 1st Amendment.").

50. U.S. Const. amend. I ("Congress shall make no law ... prohibiting the free exercise [of religion].").

51. Cruz v. Beto, 405 U.S. 319, 322, 92 S. Ct. 1079, 1081, 31 L. Ed. 2d 263, 268 (1972).

52. See O'Lone v. Estate of Shabazz, 482 U.S. 342, 353, 107 S. Ct. 2400, 2407, 96 L. Ed. 2d 282, 293 (1987) (restricting prisoners who were on work detail from participating in Jumu'ah did not violate the Constitution because it was reasonably related to legitimate penological objectives).

53. See O'Lone v. Estate of Shabazz, 482 U.S. 342, 349–50, 107 S. Ct. 2400, 2404–05, 96 L. Ed. 2d 282, 290 (1987), noted in Washington v. Harper, 494 U.S. 210, 223, 110 S. Ct. 1028, 1037, 108 L. Ed. 2d 178, 199 (1990).

54. See Pell v. Procunier, 417 U.S. 817, 822–23, 94 S. Ct. 2800, 2804, 41 L. Ed. 2d 495, 501–02 (1974) ("[A] prison inmate retains those First Amendment rights that are not inconsistent with his status as a prisoner or with the legitimate penological objectives of the corrections system," including deterrence of crime, protection of society, rehabilitation of the inmate, and internal security within corrections facilities); Procunier v. Martinez, 416 U.S. 396, 412, 94 S. Ct. 1800, 1810–11, 40 L. Ed. 2d 224, 239 (1974) ("The identifiable governmental interests at stake in [the maintenance of penal institutions] are the preservation of internal order and discipline, the maintenance of institutional security against escape or unauthorized entry, and the rehabilitation of the prisoners.").

55. See Wisconsin v. Yoder, 406 U.S. 205, 208, 92 S. Ct. 1526, 1530, 32 L. Ed. 2d 15, 21 (1972) (finding that the beliefs of Amish parents were religious and sincere enough to challenge a state law that required school attendance for their children).

56. See O'Lone v. Estate of Shabazz, 482 U.S. 342, 350, 107 S. Ct. 2400, 2405, 96 L. Ed. 2d 282, 291 (1987).

The answer to the first two questions must be "yes" before a court will consider whether the regulation is reasonably related to a legitimate purpose or goal.[57] The following discussion looks at each of these requirements in more detail.

(a) Religious Nature of Your Beliefs

The court will first decide whether your beliefs are religious.[58] The First Amendment only protects religious beliefs; therefore, if the court determines that your beliefs are simply moral or philosophical, it will not find any violation of the Free Exercise Clause.[59]

While this rule is fairly clear, courts have had difficulty defining what exactly constitutes a religious belief.[60] The Supreme Court has cautioned that "[t]he determination of what is a 'religious' belief or practice is more often than not a difficult and delicate task,"[61] and the court has not yet authoritatively or comprehensively defined "religion."[62] Without a fixed definition, lower courts have adopted various approaches.

For example, the Third Circuit has adopted an objective test to determine whether a belief is religious. In Africa v. Pennsylvania,[63] the court identified three factors that help distinguish a religion:

(1) A religion addresses fundamental and ultimate questions having to do with deep and imponderable matters;
(2) A religion is comprehensive in nature: it consists of a belief-system as opposed to an isolated teaching; and
(3) A religion often can be recognized by the presence of certain formal and external signs.[64]

In contrast, the Second Circuit has adopted a more subjective test, one that looks not to the external features of the belief system, but towards the "individual's inward attitudes towards a particular belief system."[65] In Patrick v. LeFevre,[66] the court described religion as "the feelings, acts, and experiences of individual men in their solitude, so far as they apprehend themselves to stand in relation to whatever they may consider the divine."[67] Thus, courts in the Second Circuit will probably look to "whether [your] beliefs ... are, in [your] own scheme of things, religious."[68]

These tests are not the only ones used in state or federal courts, so be sure to research the law in your state or federal circuit. Although predicting whether a particular court will recognize a particular religion is hard,

---

57. See Murphy v. Mo. Dept. of Corr., 372 F.3d 979, 983 (8th Cir. 2004) ("In analyzing [a 1st Amendment Free Exercise Claim], we consider first the threshold issue of whether the challenged governmental action 'infringes upon a sincerely held religious belief,' and then apply the Turner factors to determine if the regulation restricting the religious practice is 'reasonably related to legitimate penological objectives.'" (citations omitted)).

58. See Wisconsin v. Yoder, 406 U.S. 205, 216, 92 S. Ct. 1526, 1533, 32 L. Ed. 2d 15, 25 (1972) (preliminary determination of whether the beliefs of Amish parents were religious and sincere enough to challenge a state law that required school attendance for their children).

59. See Wisconsin v. Yoder, 406 U.S. 205, 215–16, 92 S. Ct. 1526, 1533, 32 L. Ed. 2d 15, 25 (1972) ("A way of life, however virtuous and admirable, may not be interposed as a barrier to reasonable state regulation of education if it is based on purely secular considerations; to have the protection of the Religion Clauses, the claims must be rooted in religious belief.").

60. See, e.g., Cloutier v. Costco Wholesale, 311 F. Supp. 2d 190, 196 (D. Mass. 2004) ("[C]ourts are poor arbiters of questions regarding what is religious and what is not.").

61. Thomas v. Review Bd., 450 U.S. 707, 714, 101 S. Ct. 1425, 1430, 67 L. Ed. 2d 624, 631 (1981).

62. See Scott C. Idleman, The Underlying Causes of Divergent First Amendment Interpretations, 27 Miss. C. L. Rev. 67, 71–79 (2008).

63. Africa v. Pennsylvania, 662 F.2d 1025 (3d Cir. 1981).

64. Africa v. Pennsylvania, 662 F.2d 1025, 1026 (3d Cir. 1981) (citing Malnak v. Yogi, 592 F.2d 197, 207–10 (3d Cir. 1979)) (holding that although members of the MOVE organization, a "revolutionary organization absolutely opposed to all that is wrong," held sincere beliefs, these beliefs did not amount to a religion).

65. Patrick v. LeFevre, 745 F.2d 153, 157 (2d Cir. 1984).

66. Patrick v. LeFevre, 745 F.2d 153 (2d Cir. 1984).

67. Patrick v. LeFevre, 745 F.2d 153, 158 (2d Cir. 1984) (quoting W. James, The Varieties of Religious Experience 31 (1910)). This definition is similar to the Supreme Court's description of religious belief as one "based upon a power or being, or upon a faith, to which all else is subordinate or upon which all else is ultimately dependent." United States v. Seeger, 380 U.S. 163, 176, 85 S. Ct. 850, 859, 13 L. Ed. 2d 733, 743 (1965); accord, Welsh v. United States, 398 U.S. 333, 339–40, 90 S. Ct. 1792, 1796, 26 L. Ed. 2d 308, 317 (1970).

68. Jackson v. Mann, 196 F.3d 316, 320 (2d Cir. 1999) (quoting Patrick v. LeFevre, 745 F.2d 153, 157 (2d Cir. 1984); United States v. Seeger, 380 U.S. 163, 185, 85 S. Ct. 850, 863, 13 L. Ed. 2d 733, 747 (1965)) (emphasis in Jackson).

you should be aware of some guideposts when assessing whether a court will determine that your belief is religious.

First, the U.S. Supreme Court has stated that the main consideration in deciding whether beliefs are religious is the role they play in the life of the person making the claim.[69] Second, the Supreme Court has emphasized that "religious beliefs need not be acceptable, logical, consistent, or comprehensible to others in order to merit First Amendment protection."[70] Likewise, your religion does not need to be organized like traditional churches,[71] conform to an established doctrine,[72] or otherwise meet any other organizational or doctrinal test.[73]

For example, a federal district court recently held that a prisoner who had invented his own religion had a potentially valid claim under the First Amendment and RLUIPA.[74] In DeSimone v. Bartow,[75] the prisoner argued that prison officials had violated his right to free exercise of religion when they prohibited him from keeping journals written in a language that he invented. The prisoner asserted that he believed that biblical scripture commanded him to write in this language and that the act of writing was itself a religious act. Accepting this argument, the court allowed the suit to proceed, finding that the prisoner had set forth cognizable claims under both the First Amendment and RLUIPA.[76]

Note, however, that although courts say that non-major religions are entitled to First Amendment protection,[77] you may encounter greater difficulty if your religion is not well-known.

(b) Sincerity of Your Beliefs

If the court determines your belief is religious, it will next consider whether your belief is sincerely held.[78] Prison officials and courts may require that you demonstrate sincerity, meaning a true deep commitment to your religion.[79]

In making this decision, courts are not supposed to judge whether your beliefs are "accurate or logical,"[80] or rule on the correctness of your beliefs.[81] Thus, a court may still find your belief sincerely held, even if the clergy

---

69. See U.S. v. Seeger, 380 U.S. 163, 185, 85 S. Ct. 850, 863, 13 L. Ed. 2d 733, 747 (1965) ("[C]ourts … are not free to reject beliefs because they consider them 'incomprehensible.' Their task is to decide whether the beliefs professed by a [prisoner] are sincerely held and whether they are, in his own scheme of things, religious.").

70. Thomas v. Review Bd. of Ind. Employment Sec. Div., 450 U.S. 707, 714, 101 S. Ct. 1425, 1430, 67 L. Ed. 2d 624, 631 (1981).

71. See Marria v. Broaddus, No. 97 Civ. 8297, 2003 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 13329, at *26–29 (S.D.N.Y. July 31, 2003) (unpublished) (finding the prisoner's beliefs as a member of the Nation of Gods and Earths to be sincere and religious).

72. See Sequoyah v. Tenn. Valley Auth., 620 F.2d 1159, 1163 (6th Cir. 1980) (finding that "[o]rthodoxy is not an issue" and that "[t]he Cherokees have a religion within the meaning of the Constitution ...").

73. See Sequoyah v. Tenn. Valley Auth., 620 F.2d 1159, 1163 (6th Cir. 1980) (finding that despite having "no written creeds and no man-made houses of worship ... [t]he Cherokees have a religion within the meaning of the Constitution ...").

74. DeSimone v. Bartow, No. 08-C-638, 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 64419, at *13 (E.D. Wis. Aug. 12, 2008) (unpublished) (holding that a prisoner who had created his own religion, which he refers to as the "Religious Society of Atlantis and the Sanctuary of the Yahweh" had a potentially valid claim under the 1st Amendment and RLUIPA).

75. DeSimone v. Bartow, No. 08-C-638, 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 64419 (E.D. Wis. Aug. 12, 2008) (unpublished).

76. DeSimone v. Bartow, No. 08-C-638, 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 64419, at *13 (E.D. Wis. Aug. 12, 2008) (unpublished) ("DeSimone's allegations can be understood to allege that he considers writing in [the fictional language] Atlantean as central to his faith, and that the Defendants have targeted his writing, as opposed to the writings of other inmates in foreign languages, because of his uncommon religious beliefs. Thus, Desimone will be permitted to proceed with his claims that by forbidding him from writing in Atlantean, the Defendants violated the First Amendment and RLUIPA."), dismissed on other grounds, No. 08-C-638, 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 48689 (E.D. Wis. June 10, 2009).

77. See Africa v. Pennsylvania, 662 F.2d 1025, 1031 (3d Cir. 1981).

78. See generally Wisconsin v. Yoder, 406 U.S. 205, 92 S. Ct. 1526, 32 L. Ed. 2d 15 (1972) (holding Amish children could be exempted from required high school attendance because formal education beyond eighth grade violated sincerely held Amish religious beliefs).

79. Cf. United States v. Seeger, 380 U.S. 163, 185, 85 S. Ct. 850, 863, 13 L. Ed. 2d 733, 747 (1965) (stating that a belief must be "sincerely held" and meet other criteria to qualify a believer for exemption from service in the armed forces).

80. See Jackson v. Mann, 196 F.3d 316, 320 (2d Cir. 1999) ("In determining whether a prisoner's particular religious beliefs are entitled to free exercise protection, the relevant inquiry is not whether, as an objective matter, the belief is 'accurate or logical.'" (quoting Jolly v. Coughlin, 76 F.3d 468, 476 (2d Cir. 1996)).

81. Cf. Presbyterian Church in United States v. Mary Elizabeth Blue Hull Mem'l Presbyterian Church, 393 U.S. 440, 451–52, 89 S. Ct. 601, 607, 21 L. Ed. 2d 658, 666–67 (1969) (holding that the constitution prohibits a court from interpreting church doctrine to settle a property dispute that depends upon whether a group is adhering to the doctrine); Bear v. Nix, 977 F.2d 1291, 1294 (8th Cir. 1992) (holding that a court would unconstitutionally intrude upon a good faith "application of says you are not a member of the religion.[82] Indeed, "clergy opinion has generally been deemed insufficient to override a prisoner's sincerely held religious belief."[83]

Instead, courts will look to factors including your familiarity with your faith's teachings,[84] your demonstrated observance of its rules,[85] and the length of time that you have practiced these religious beliefs.[86] Thus, evidence that you are familiar with your religion, have practiced it for a long time, have participated in religious ceremonies when possible, or have otherwise acted on the basis of your religion can help to establish the sincerity of your religious beliefs.

(c) The Validity of Prison Rules and Regulations

If the court decides your belief is religious and sincerely held, it will then apply the Turner test to the prison regulation or practice that you are challenging by asking whether a prison regulation "is reasonably related to legitimate penological interests," and therefore does not violate your constitutional rights.[87] Specifically, under Turner, a court will consider the following four factors:

(1) Whether there is "a valid, rational connection between the prison regulation and the legitimate governmental interest put forward to justify it";
(2) Whether there are other ways of exercising the right despite the regulation;
(3) If, by allowing you to exercise your right, there will be a "ripple effect" on others such as prison personnel, other prisoners, and on the allocation of prison resources; and
(4) Whether there is a different way for the prison to meet the regulation's goal without limiting your right in this way.[88]

When evaluating the first factor, courts have deferred to prison officials' judgment[89] and found that prison security is a legitimate governmental interest.[90] This means courts are not likely to second guess the reasons religious doctrine by a recognized spiritual leader of the relevant faith" if it overruled a refusal to admit plaintiff into a Native American religion).

---

82. See Jackson v. Mann, 196 F.3d 316, 320 (2d Cir. 1999) (remanding case in which prisoner sought to be served Kosher food because the lower court incorrectly evaluated the prisoner's claim that he was Jewish by relying on the chaplain's report that the prisoner was not Jewish, rather than looking to whether the prisoner's belief was "sincerely held").

83. Koger v. Bryan, 523 F.3d 789, 799–800 (7th Cir. 2008) (citing Ford v. McGinnis, 352 F.3d 582, 593–94 (2d Cir. 2003)) (holding that the role the Eid ul Fitr feast played in a prisoner's practice of Islam was determinative of whether there had been a substantial burden, and not the testimony of Muslim clerics as to the proper celebration of the feast); Jackson v. Mann, 196 F.3d 316, 320–21 (2d Cir. 1999) (holding that it was the sincerity of a prisoner's beliefs, and not the decision of Jewish religious authorities, that determined whether the prisoner was an adherent of Judaism entitled to a kosher meal); Frazee v. Ill. Dept. of Employment Sec., 489 U.S. 829, 834, 109 S. Ct. 1514, 1517, 103 L. Ed. 2d 914, 920 (1989) (holding that in the context of a denial of unemployment benefits, the plaintiff's refusal, based on his Christianity, to work on Sundays was entitled to protection even though "there are assorted Christian denominations that do not profess to be compelled by their religion to refuse Sunday work").

84. See, e.g., Robinson v. Foti, 527 F. Supp. 1111, 1113 (E.D. La. 1981) (ruling against a prisoner who sought an exemption from prison rules against dreadlocks in part because the prisoner failed to demonstrate familiarity with Rastafarian practice, history, or teachings, which suggested that the prisoner's Rastafarian beliefs were not sincere).

85. See, e.g., Reed v. Faulkner, 842 F.2d 960, 963 (7th Cir. 1988) ("Evidence of nonobservance is relevant on the question of sincerity, and is especially important in the prison setting, for an inmate may adopt a religion merely to harass the prison staff with demands to accommodate his new faith … [b]ut the fact that a person does not adhere steadfastly to every tenet of his faith does not mark him as insincere.").

86. See, e.g., Iron Eyes v. Henry, 907 F.2d 810, 813 (8th Cir. 1990) (upholding lower court's conclusion that a prisoner's belief was sincerely held where the lower court "noted that [prisoner] had maintained Sioux religious beliefs throughout his life, and that he had participated in religious ceremonies whenever possible").

87. Turner v. Safley, 482 U.S. 78, 89, 107 S. Ct. 2254, 2261, 96 L. Ed. 2d 64, 79 (1987) ("[W]hen a prison regulation impinges on inmates' constitutional rights, the regulation is valid if it is reasonably related to legitimate penological interests.").

88. Turner v. Safley, 482 U.S. 78, 89–90, 107 S. Ct. 2254, 2261–62, 96 L. Ed. 2d 64, 79–80 (1987) ("First, there must be a 'valid, rational connection' between the prison regulation and the legitimate governmental interest put forward to justify it …. A second factor … is whether there are alternative means of exercising the right that remain open to prison inmates …. A third consideration is the impact accommodation of the asserted constitutional right will have on guards and other inmates, and on the allocation of prison resources generally …. Finally, the absence of ready alternatives [for prison rules to accomplish the same goal] is evidence of the reasonableness of a prison regulation …. By the same token, the existence of obvious, easy alternatives may be evidence that the regulation is not reasonable, but is an 'exaggerated response' to prison concerns.").

89. See Thornburgh v. Abbott, 490 U.S. 401, 407–08, 109 S. Ct. 1874, 1878–79, 104 L. Ed. 2d 459, 469 (1989)

prison officials give for prison regulations. For example, a federal court of appeals used the Turner test to decide prison officials could prohibit religious items like a bear tooth necklace and a medicine bag in cells to protect the safety of other prisoners, prison security, and the prisoner himself.[91]

For the fourth factor, you will want to show that a different policy could meet the prison's needs without affecting your religious exercise as severely and hence that the current regulation is unnecessary: the U.S. Constitution does not require that the prison prove that the current regulation is necessary.[92]

2. RLUIPA and RFRA

In addition to the First Amendment protections described above, your right to religious freedom is also protected by federal laws. If you are in state prison, your right is protected by a law called the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act of 2000 (RLUIPA).[93] If you are in federal prison, your right is protected by a law called the Religious Freedom Restoration Act (RFRA).[94]

These laws prohibit the government from imposing a substantial burden on the religious practices of prisoners, unless the government can demonstrate the burden both (1) furthers a compelling governmental interest; and (2) is the least restrictive means of furthering that compelling interest.[95]

Both federal laws provide a higher level of protection for prisoners to exercise their religion than the protection provided by the First Amendment Free Exercise Clause.[96] Therefore, you should begin your complaint with an argument that the restriction violates RLUIPA (or, if you are in federal prison, RFRA). You may then make an argument that the restriction also violates the Free Exercise Clause of the First ("Acknowledging the expertise of these officials and that the judiciary is 'ill equipped' to deal with the difficult and delicate problems of prison management, this Court has afforded considerable deference to the determinations of prison administrators who, in the interest of security, regulate the relations between prisoners and the outside world."); Harbin-Bey v. Rutter, 420 F.3d 571, 578 (6th Cir. 2005) ("Courts generally afford great deference to prison policies, regulations, and practices relating to the preservation of these interests.").

---

90. Pell v. Procunier, 417 U.S. 817, 822–23, 94 S. Ct. 2800, 2804 (1974) ("[C]entral to all other corrections goals is the institutional consideration of internal security within the corrections facilities themselves").

91. See Hall v. Bellmon, 935 F.2d 1106, 1113 (10th Cir. 1991) (upholding on the grounds of security a prison policy that prohibited a Native American from wearing a bear tooth necklace and medicine bag); see also Spies v. Voinovich, 173 F.3d 398, 405 (6th Cir. 1999) (upholding on the grounds of security the prohibition of certain Buddhist religious materials from a prisoner's cell and the chapel).

92. See, e.g., O'Lone v. Estate of Shabazz, 482 U.S. 342, 350, 107 S. Ct. 2400, 2405, 96 L. Ed. 2d 282, 291 (1987) ("Though the availability of accommodations is relevant to the reasonableness inquiry, we have rejected the notion that 'prison officials ... have to set up and then shoot down every conceivable alternative method of accommodating the claimant's constitutional complaint.'") (quoting Turner v. Safley, 482 U.S. 78, 90–91, 107 S. Ct. 2254, 2262, 96 L. Ed. 2d 64, 80)). This case was decided before the RLUIPA and RFRA were passed into law. These statutes, discussed in Part C(2) of this Chapter, provide additional statutory protections for prisoners.

93. Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act of 2000 (RLUIPA), 42 U.S.C. §§ 2000cc to cc-5. (2006).

94. Religious Freedom Restoration Act (RFRA), 42 U.S.C. §§ 2000bb to bb-4 (2006). In 1997, the Supreme Court held that RFRA does not apply to claims against states. City of Boerne v. Flores, 521 U.S. 507, 534, 117 S. Ct. 2157, 2171, 138 L. Ed. 2d 624, 648 (1997) (holding that RFRA "is a considerable congressional intrusion into the States' traditional prerogatives and general authority to regulate for the health and welfare of their citizens" and overturning it as unconstitutional in that regard). However, RFRA still applies to prisoners' claims against federal prisons. See, e.g., Hankins v. Lyght, 441 F.3d 96, 106 (2d Cir. 2006) (noting that since Boerne, "every appellate court that has squarely addressed the question has held that the RFRA governs the activities of federal officers and agencies") (citation omitted).

95. Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act of 2000 (RLUIPA), 42 U.S.C. § 2000cc-1 (2006). ("No government shall impose a substantial burden upon the religious exercise of a person residing in or confined to an institution ... unless the government demonstrates that the imposition of the burden (1) is in the furtherance of a compelling governmental interest; and (2) is the least restrictive means of furthering that compelling governmental interest."); see also Religious Freedom Restoration Act (RFRA), 42 U.S.C. § 2000bb-1 (2006).

96. See Shakur v. Schriro, 514 F.3d 878, 888 (9th Cir. 2008) ("RLUIPA ... mandates a stricter standard of review for prison regulations that burden the free exercise of religion than the reasonableness standard [used to review regulations under the 1st Amendment]; see also Smith v. Allen, 502 F.3d 1255, 1266 (11th Cir. 2007) (noting that RLUIPA affords a "heightened protection from government-imposed burdens" compared with 1st Amendment standards); Desimone v. Bartow, No. 08-C-638, 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 64419, at *11 (E.D. Wis. Aug. 12, 2008) (unpublished) ("RLUIPA provides more expansive protection [than the 1st Amendment], prohibiting institutions that receive federal funding from substantially burdening an inmate's exercise of religion, even by a rule of general applicability, unless that burden is the least restrictive means of furthering a compelling governmental interest.").

Amendment. In practice, if a court finds that a regulation does not violate RLUIPA or RFRA, it will also almost certainly find that it does not violate the First Amendment Free Exercise Clause.[97]

Although RLUIPA and RFRA are separate laws, a court deciding a case under one law may also look to how a court decided a case under the other law. In other words, RLUIPA cases will be looked at by courts deciding RFRA cases and vice versa.[98] This is because both laws prohibit laws and policies that substantially burden the exercise of your religion, unless the restrictions further a compelling governmental interest using the least restrictive means available.[99] Additionally, both statutes protect the same type of "religious exercise."[100] Thus, although this Chapter primarily refers to RLUIPA, if you are a federal prisoner, this discussion of RLUIPA should help you to determine if you have a viable claim under RFRA.

The following sections will explain what you need to show to establish a RLUIPA or RFRA violation. In general, you first need to show that you meet the jurisdictional requirements of the law. Second, you will need to show (1) you are seeking to engage in an exercise of religion; (2) the prison regulation or practice you are challenging "substantially burdens" that exercise of religion; and (3) prison officials cannot demonstrate that regulation is the "least restrictive means" of achieving a "compelling government interest."[101]

(a) Jurisdictional Requirements

(i) RLUIPA

If you are a state prisoner bringing a claim under RLUIPA, you must first show that the law applies to the prison regulation or practice you are challenging. RLUIPA provides that its protections apply only when "(1) the substantial burden is imposed in a program or activity that receives Federal financial assistance; or (2) the substantial burden affects, or removal of that substantial burden would affect, commerce with foreign nations, among the several States, or with Indian tribes."[102]

This means that you will need to show that the prison regulation you are challenging is either (a) imposed in a program or activity that receives federal funds (called "Spending Clause jurisdiction") or (b) affects interstate commerce (called "Commerce Clause jurisdiction").[103]

In order to meet the Spending Clause jurisdictional requirement, the regulation that you are challenging must be imposed in the context of a program or activity that receives Federal financial assistance.[104] "Program or activity" means "all of the operations of ... a department, agency, special purpose district, or other instrumentality of a State or local government."[105] Basically, this means that whenever a state or local

---

97. See, e.g., Daker v. Wetherington, 469 F. Supp. 2d 1231, 1238 (N.D. Ga. 2007) (finding a prison's shaving policy did not violate either RLUIPA or the 1st Amendment); Nelis v. Kingston, No. 06-C-1220, 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 86036, at *17 (E.D. Wis. Nov. 19, 2007) (unpublished) (finding a prison's eligibility rule for religious activities did not violate either RLUIPA or the 1st Amendment); Borzych v. Frank, 439 F.3d 388, 390–91 (7th Cir. 2006) (finding a prison's refusal to provide access to books did not violate either RLUIPA or the 1st Amendment); Fegans v. Norris, 537 F.3d 897, 906–08 (8th Cir. 2008) (finding a prison's grooming policy did not violate either RLUIPA or the 1st Amendment).

98. See Hoevenaar v. Lazaroff, 422 F.3d 366, 370 (6th Cir. 2005) ("RFRA cases according deference to prison decisions [are] applicable to cases brought pursuant to the RLUIPA."); see also Murphy v. Mo. Dept. of Corr., 372 F.3d 979, 987 (8th Cir. 2004) (RLUIPA and RFRA apply the same standard) (overruled on other grounds, Van Wyhe v. Reisch, 536 F. Supp. 2d 1110; Congregation Kol Ami v. Abington Tp., No. 01-1919, 2004 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 16397, at *45, n. 11 (E.D. Pa. Aug. 12, 2004) (unpublished) ("Cases involving establishment clause challenges to the RFRA are as relevant as those involving the RLUIPA.").

99. Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act of 2000 (RLUIPA), 42 U.S.C. § 2000cc-1 (2006); Religious Freedom Restoration Act of 1993 (RFRA), 42 U.S.C. §§ 2000bb–bb-4. (2006).

100. Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act of 2000 (RLUIPA), 42 U.S.C. § 2000bb-2(4) (2006).

101. Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act of 2000 (RLUIPA), 42 U.S.C. §§ 2000cc-1(a)(1)–(2) (2006).

102. Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act of 2000 (RLUIPA), 42 U.S.C. § 2000cc-1(b) (2006).

103. Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act of 2000 (RLUIPA), 42 U.S.C. § 2000cc-1 (2006) ("[RLUIPA] applies in any case in which (1) the substantial burden is imposed in a program or activity that receives Federal financial assistance; or (2) the substantial burden affects, or removal of that substantial burden would affect, commerce with foreign nations, among the several States, or with Indian tribes."). If you are a federal prisoner bringing a claim under RFRA, these jurisdictional requirements do not apply to you; instead, you must allege that your Free Exercise rights were violated at a Federal prison or by an agent of the Federal Government.

104. Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act of 2000 (RLUIPA), 42 U.S.C. § 2000cc-1(f) (2006).

105. Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act of 2000 (RLUIPA), 42 U.S.C. § 2000d-4a (2006); 42 U.S.C. § 2000cc-5(6) ("[T]he term 'program or activity' means all of the operations of any entity as described in paragraph (1) or (2) or section 2000d-4a of this title.") (2006).

prison or department of corrections accepts federal funding, RLUIPA will apply to all of its programs.[106] Virtually every prison and jail system accepts some federal money, so you can and should plead in good faith in your complaint that the court has Spending Clause jurisdiction. After you have filed your complaint, you can then request the proof of that fact from the defendants during the discovery phase.

A court also has RLUIPA jurisdiction under the Commerce Clause if the substantial burden placed on your religious exercise "substantially affects interstate commerce."[107] However, because, as previously mentioned, nearly all prison and jail systems accept some federal funds, it is very unlikely that you will need to rely upon Commerce Clause jurisdiction.

(ii) RFRA

If you are a federal prisoner bringing suit under RFRA, these jurisdictional requirements do not apply. Instead, you must allege your Free Exercise rights were violated at a federal prison or by a federal agent.[108]

(b) Religious Exercise

Assuming you have met the jurisdictional requirements, a court will next assess whether the activity you are seeking to pursue is a religious exercise. To constitute a religious exercise, the activity you are seeking to pursue must be rooted in a (1) sincerely held belief that is (2) religious in nature.[109]

Congress has defined "religious exercise" broadly, to mean "any exercise of religion, whether or not compelled by, or central to, a system of religious belief."[110] This broad definition, which applies to both RLUIPA and RFRA,[111] significantly increases the likelihood your suit will succeed, or at least survive a summary judgment motion.[112]

Under this definition, RLUIPA also protects religious practices that are not necessarily central to your religion, such as practices that are a small part of your religion, or not of primary importance to your religion.[113] This means that, as a general rule, courts will not attempt to determine whether your religious

---

106. See Orafan v. Goord, 2003 WL 21972735, at *7 (N.D.N.Y. Aug. 11, 2003) (unpublished) ("No where [sic] in this definition [of program and activity] does it state that a receiver of federal funds is at liberty to decide which programs are under the auspice of RLUIPA. Quite the contrary, as the statute clearly applies to all of the operations.").

107. United States v. Lopez, 514 U.S. 549, 558–59, 115 S. Ct. 1624, 1629, 131 L. Ed. 2d 626 (1995) (describing the types of commerce authority enjoyed by Congress, including "the power to regulate those activities having a substantial relation to interstate commerce, i.e., those activities that substantially affect interstate commerce."). This means that if other people in the same situation as you were similarly burdened, the total effect of all of those situations combined would affect interstate commerce. See Wickard v. Filburn, 317 U.S. 111, 128, 63 S. Ct. 82, 91, 87 L. Ed. 122 (1942) (holding that interstate effect is measured by evaluating the activity in question "together with that of many others similarly situated.").

108. Religious Freedom Restoration Act (RFRA), 42 U.S.C. § 2000bb-3 (2006).

109. See Koger v. Bryan, 523 F.3d 789, 797 (7th Cir. 2008) ("RLUIPA is a guarantor of sincerely held religious beliefs"); see also Porter v. Burnett, No. 1:05-cv-562, 2008 WL 3050011, at *5, 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 58993 (W.D. Mich. Aug. 4, 2008) (unpublished) ("While [RLUIPA's] definition of religious exercise is broad, it does require that [p]laintiff's religious beliefs are 'sincerely held.'") (citing Episcopal Student Foundation v. City of Ann Arbor, 341 F. Supp. 2d 691, 700 (E.D. Mich. 2004) (citation omitted); Lovelace v. Lee, 472 F.3d 174, 187 n.2 (4th Cir. 2006) (citations omitted)); Starr v. Cox, No. 05-cv-368-JD, 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 34708, at *21 (D.N.H. Apr. 28, 2008) (unpublished) ("[C]ourts have construed RLUIPA to require a plaintiff to show that the exercise of religion is part of a (1) system of religious belief and (2) that the plaintiff holds a sincerely held belief in the religious exercise.") (citing Guzzi v. Thompson, 470 F. Supp. 2d 17, 26 (D. Mass. 2007)).

110. Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act of 2000 (RLUIPA), 42 U.S.C. § 2000cc-5(7)(A) (2006).

111. Congress amended RFRA through § 7 of RLUIPA. This amendment ensures that the type of "religious exercise" protected by RLUIPA is identical to that protected by RFRA. See Pub.L. 106-274, § 7, 114 Stat. 803, (2000); 42 U.S.C. § 2000bb-2(4) (2006). As a result, RFRA now defines "exercise of religion" as "religious exercise, as defined in section 2000cc-5 [RLUIPA]." Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act of 2000 (RLUIPA), 42 U.S.C. § 2000bb-2(4) (2006).

112. Because the determination of whether your belief is sincere and religious in nature is a fact-specific inquiry, some courts have expressed reluctance to grant summary judgment motions. See, e.g., Porter v. Caruso, 479 F. Supp. 2d 687, 691 (W.D. Mich. 2007) (holding that even when there is evidence in the record to suggest that a belief is sincerely held, summary judgment is inappropriate because the sincerity of a belief is a factual dispute that must be resolved at trial).

113. See Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act of 2000 (RLUIPA), 42 U.S.C. § 2000cc-5(7) (2006) ("'[R]eligious exercise' includes any exercise of religion, whether or not ... [it is] central to a system of religious belief.").

belief is accurate or supported by your religious teachings, but will simply determine whether it is sincerely held belief and religious in nature.[114]

The current definition of religious exercise prevents courts and government officials from deciding what types or levels of religious exercise are necessary or appropriate for membership in a certain religion. This definition also incorporates the idea that the judicial system is not competent to decide whether a particular act is central to a person's faith.[115]

(c) Substantial Burden

If the court finds that you have engaged in religious exercise, it will then evaluate whether the prison regulation that you are challenging substantially burdens this religious exercise.[116]

Although Congress did not define what "substantial burden" means, the Supreme Court has interpreted "substantial burden" to mean that the government action or regulation at issue either (1) puts substantial pressure on a believer to modify his behavior and violate his beliefs, or (2) prevents you from engaging in religious actions in a way that more than just inconveniences you.[117] The legislative history of RLUIPA indicates that Congress wanted courts to follow this interpretation.[118]

Although courts have emphasized that the question of whether a regulation imposes a substantial burden is a fact-specific inquiry requiring a case-by-case determination,[119] the examples discussed below in Part C(3) can help you assess whether a court would find a regulation to be a substantial burden.

(d) Compelling Government Interest and Least Restrictive Means

Once you have established that a prison rule or regulation places a substantial burden on your religious exercise, RLUIPA shifts the burden of production of evidence and the burden of persuasion to the government.[120] This means that in order to defeat your claim, the government needs to show that:

(1) the substantial burden it has placed on your religious exercise is necessary because of a "compelling government interest;" and
(2) the burden it placed on your religious exercise is the "least restrictive means" of achieving its goal.[121]

In order to meet the first of these requirements, the government must show that it has a compelling interest in restricting your religious exercise. The Supreme Court has defined "compelling interest" as "only

---

114. See Thomas v. Review Bd., 450 U.S. 707, 716, 101 S. Ct. 1425, 1431, 67 L. Ed. 2d 624, 632 (1981); see also Hernandez v. Comm'r, 490 U.S. 680, 699, 109 S. Ct. 2136, 2148, 104 L. Ed. 2d 766, 786 (1989) ("It is not within the judicial ken to question the centrality of particular beliefs or practices to a faith, or the validity of particular litigants' interpretations of those creeds.").

115. McEachin v. McGuinnis, 357 F.3d 197, 201–02 (2d Cir. 2004) ("Courts have long puzzled over how best to maintain the delicate balance between, on the one hand, preserving legitimate governmental needs to legislate, regulate, and maintain order, and, on the other, protecting the right of individuals to practice their faith unfettered by the state's definition of what constitutes a legitimate religious imperative.").

116. Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act of 2000 (RLUIPA), 42 U.S.C. § 2000cc-1 (2006).

117. See Thomas v. Review Bd., 450 U.S. 707, 718, 101 S. Ct. 1425, 1432, 67 L. Ed. 2d 624, 634 (1981); see also Midrash Sephardi, Inc. v. Town of Surfside, 366 F.3d 1214, 1227 (11th Cir. 2004) (summarizing the Supreme Court's interpretation of "substantial burden" and noting that "a 'substantial burden' must place more than an inconvenience on religious exercise; a 'substantial burden' is akin to significant pressure which directly coerces the religious adherent to conform his or her behavior accordingly. Thus, a substantial burden can result from pressure that tends to force adherents to forego religious precepts or from pressure that mandates religious conduct."); see also Coronel v. Paul, 316 F. Supp. 2d 868, 880 (D. Ariz. 2004) (holding that "state action substantially burdens the exercise of religion within the meaning of the RLUIPA when it prevents a religious adherent from engaging in conduct both important to the adherent and motivated by sincere religious belief.").

118. See 146 Cong. Rec. S7774, S7776 (daily ed. July 27, 2000) (Joint Statement of Sen. Hatch and Sen. Kennedy) (stating that the term "substantial burden" is to "be interpreted by reference to existing Supreme Court jurisprudence").

119. See, e.g., Adkins v. Kaspar, 393 F.3d 559, 571 (5th Cir. 2004) ("We recognize that our test requires a case-by-case, fact-specific inquiry to determine whether the government action or regulation in question imposes a substantial burden on an adherent's religious exercise; however, we perceive this kind of inquiry to be unavoidable under the RLUIPA and the circumstances that it addresses. This is why we make no effort to craft a bright-line rule.").

120. Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act of 2000 (RLUIPA), 42 U.S.C. § 2000cc-1(a) (2006); see also Koger v. Bryan, 523 F.3d 789, 796 (7th Cir. 2008) ("Once the plaintiff establishes this prima facie case, the defendants 'bear the burden of persuasion on any [other] element of the claim,' namely, whether their practice 'is the least restrictive means of furthering a compelling governmental interest.'").

121. Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act of 2000 (RLUIPA), 42 U.S.C. § 2000cc-1(a) (2006).

those interests of the highest order."[122] The government's interest in maintaining prison safety and security is a compelling interest.[123] However, other examples of state interests, such as reducing expenses, are less likely to be considered "compelling."[124]

In order to show that the challenged rule or restriction is the least restrictive means, the government must do more than merely claim that there is no less restrictive means available.[125] The government must also do more than simply speculate as to the possible negative effects that could occur if it were to accommodate your religious practice.[126] Moreover, in at least some circuits, the government must demonstrate that "it has actually considered and rejected the efficacy of less restrictive measures before adopting the challenged practice."[127] Like the compelling interest test, the least restrictive means test is quite strict and well established in constitutional law.[128]

Although you do not have the burden of proof, you can, and should, challenge the government's argument that the regulation is the least restrictive means. For example, if the government allows other types of practices in the prison that harm its stated compelling interest, or if other prisons allow the religious exercise you are seeking, you can use this evidence in an effort to overcome the government's argument.[129] Several courts have recognized that evidence of what other prisons have done to accommodate prisoners' religious practices is relevant to RLUIPA claims.[130] But "[c]ourts have repeatedly recognized that 122. Wisconsin v. Yoder, 406 U.S. 205, 215, 92 S. Ct. 1526, 1533, 32 L. Ed. 2d 15, 25 (1972).

---

123. See, e.g., Cutter v. Wilkinson, 544 U.S. 709, 725 n.13, 125 S. Ct. 2113, 2124 n.13, 161 L. Ed. 2d 1020, 1036 n.13 (2005) ("[P]rison security is a compelling state interest, and … deference is due to institutional officials' expertise in this area."); Pell v. Procunier, 417 U.S. 817, 823, 94 S. Ct. 2800, 2804, 41 L. Ed. 2d 495, 502 (1974) ("[C]entral to all other corrections goals is the institutional consideration of internal security within the corrections facilities themselves."); Jova v. Smith, 582 F.3d 410, 415 (2d Cir. 2009) ("Where a plaintiff adduces evidence sufficient to show that the government practice substantially burdens her religious exercise, the onus shifts to the government to demonstrate that the practice furthers a compelling governmental interest, and that the burden imposed on religion is the least restrictive means of achieving that interest.").

124. Some courts, however, have held that expense is a compelling governmental interest. See, e.g., Baranowski v. Hart, 486 F.3d 112, 125–26 (5th Cir. 2007) (holding "controlling costs" to be a compelling governmental interest), cert. denied, 128 S. Ct. 707, 169 L. Ed 553 (2007).

125. See Warsoldier v. Woodford, 418 F.3d 989, 1001 (9th Cir. 2005) (finding the government's conclusory statements insufficient to meet its burden that it had adopted the least restrictive means to achieve its interest in maintaining prison security).

126. See Gonzales v. O Centro Espirita Beneficente Uniao do Vegetal, 546 U.S. 418, 434–36, 126 S. Ct. 1211, 1222–24, 163 L. Ed. 2d 1017, 1034–35 (2006) (holding that under the compelling interest test of the Restoration of Freedom of Religion Act (RLUIPA's predecessor statute), the government's interest in enforcing the Controlled Substances Act uniformly was insufficient to justify the substantial burden on religious exercise imposed on a small religious group).

127. See, e.g., Spratt v. R.I. Dept. of Corr., 482 F.3d 33, 41 n.11 (1st Cir. 2007) ("[T]o meet the least restrictive means test, prison administrators generally ought to explore at least some alternatives."); see also Warsoldier v. Woodford, 418 F.3d 989, 999 (9th Cir. 2005) (citing United States v. Playboy Entm't Group, Inc., 529 U.S. 803, 824, 120 S. Ct. 1878, 1892, 146 L. Ed. 2d 865, 886 (2000) (finding, in context of 1st Amendment challenge to speech restrictions, that "[a] court should not assume a plausible, less restrictive alternative would be ineffective"); City of Richmond v. J.A. Croson, 488 U.S. 469, 507, 109 S. Ct. 706, 729–30, 102 L. Ed. 2d 854, 890–91 (1989) (holding that city's minority set-aside program was not narrowly tailored in part because city had not considered whether race-neutral measures would have achieved government's interest); Hunter ex rel. Brandt v. Regents of Univ. of Cal., 190 F.3d 1061, 1078 (9th Cir. 1999) (concluding that government "neglected to undertake any consideration—let alone serious, good faith consideration" of race-neutral alternatives).

128. The "least restrictive means" test is a form of a common test used in constitutional cases known as the "narrowly tailored" test, which instructs courts to evaluate whether a proposed regulation or law is carefully crafted to achieve its goals. See Burk v. Augusta-Richmond County, 365 F.3d 1247, 1255 (11th Cir. 2004) (noting that law could be written to meet least restrictive means test where "government ... tailor[s] its regulation more closely to fit ... conduct likely to threaten the harms it fears.").

129. For example, the Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit found that a grooming restriction that required all male prisoners to maintain their hair no longer than three inches was not the least restrictive means of ensuring prison security when other prisons did not impose such restrictions. In Warsoldier v. Woodford, the court noted that "other prison systems, including the Federal Bureau of Prisons, do not have such hair length policies, or, if they do, provide religious exemptions." Warsoldier v. Woodford, 418 F.3d 989, 999 (9th Cir. 2005). The court also noted that the Department of Corrections had failed to explain why it did not impose the same grooming restriction on female prisoners at its women's prisons. Warsoldier v. Woodford, 418 F.3d 989, 1000 (9th Cir. 2005).

130. See, e.g., Washington v. Klem, 497 F.3d 272, 285 (3d Cir. 2007) (finding that prison's limitation on the number of books allowed in cell was not the least restrictive means to ensure safety because, in part, other prisons

'evidence of policies at one prison is not conclusive proof that the same policies would work at another institution.'"[131]

3. Examples of Common Challenges to Prison Restrictions

This section provides examples of common challenges to prison restrictions, including restrictions on attending religious services or worship areas, receiving visits from religious advisors, sending and receiving religious mail, changing one's name or diet for religious reasons, refusing to receive medical treatment for religious reasons, and wearing special religious attire. It describes how courts have applied the Turner test to examine First Amendment Free Exercise claims as well as how courts have applied, or might in the future apply, the RLUIPA standards outlined above.

Because RLUIPA generally provides more protection to your religious freedom than the First Amendment Free Exercise Clause,[132] you should think of the discussion of the Free Exercise Clause as protecting your basic rights to freely exercise your religion in prison. At times, RLUIPA will provide you with more rights than the First Amendment. Also, because the law in this area is constantly changing, be sure to check for new RLUIPA cases that support your particular claim.

(a) Restrictions on Attending Religious Services, Group Worship, and Receiving Visits from Religious Advisors

(i) First Amendment Free Exercise Clause

Under the Free Exercise Clause, prisons must provide you with a reasonable opportunity to worship in accordance with your conscience.[133] This right to worship applies even if there is only a minority of prisoners who observe the religion in question.[134] However, courts have long held that this right may be restricted in certain instances.

For example, courts have held that prison officials may limit or prohibit religious group services when such services would pose a threat to prison security.[135] For example, in Green v. McKaskle,[136] a federal court of appeals examined a warden's order limiting a prisoner's right to attend services at a Baptist church. The court determined that the order was constitutional, even though the prisoner was occasionally prevented from permitted a greater number of books); Fowler v. Crawford, 534 F.3d 931, 942 (8th Cir. 2008) (noting that policies of other prisons are "relevant" but not dispositive of the "least restrictive means" inquiry).

---

131. Fowler v. Crawford, 534 F.3d 931, 941 (8th Cir. 2008) (quoting Spratt v. R.I. Dept. of Corr., 482 F.3d 33, 41 n.11 (1st Cir. 2007) (emphasis added).

132. See Shakur v. Schriro, 514 F.3d 878, 888 (9th Cir. 2008) ("RLUIPA ... mandates a stricter standard of review for prison regulations that burden the free exercise of religion than the reasonableness test [used to review regulations under the 1st Amendment]"); see also Smith v. Allen, 502 F.3d 1255, 1266 (11th Cir. 2007) (noting that RLUIPA affords more "protection from government-imposed burdens" than the 1st Amendment standards); DeSimone v. Bartow, 08-C-638, 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 64419, at *11 (E.D. Wis. Aug. 12, 2008) (unpublished) ("RLUIPA provides more expansive protection [than the 1st Amendment], prohibiting institutions that receive federal funding from substantially burdening an inmate's exercise of religion, even by a rule of general applicability, unless that burden is the least restrictive means of furthering a compelling governmental interest.").

133. See Cruz v. Beto, 405 U.S. 319, 322 n.2, 92 S. Ct. 1079, 1081 n.2, 31 L. Ed. 2d 263, 368 n.2 (1972); see also Johnson v. Moore, 948 F.2d 517, 520 (9th Cir. 1991) (holding that the failure to provide a Unitarian Universalist chaplain for a prisoner did not violate the 1st Amendment, reasoning that "the Constitution does not necessarily require prisons to provide each inmate with the spiritual counselor of his choice," but that "[p]risons need only provide inmates with a reasonable opportunity to worship in accord with their conscience" (quotations and citations omitted)).

134. See Cruz v. Beto, 405 U.S. 319, 322, 92 S. Ct. 1079, 1081, 31 L. Ed. 2d 263, 268 (1972) (noting that a prisoner must be given "a reasonable opportunity of pursuing his faith comparable to the opportunity afforded fellow prisoners who adhere to conventional religious precepts").

135. See Brown v. Johnson, 743 F.2d 408, 412 (6th Cir. 1984) (holding that a blanket ban against religious services by a church that ministered to homosexual persons did not violate the 1st Amendment because the ban was reasonably related to the prison's interest in maintaining internal security and reducing prison violence); see also Johnson v. Collins, 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 47844, at *14–15 (N.D. Ohio May 2, 2009) (unpublished) (granting summary judgment for prison officials where a prisoner alleged a violation of his right to freely exercise his religious beliefs when he was denied permission to maintain his dreadlocks in accordance with Rastafarianism principles, noting that "substantial deference is given to prison officials in terms of their discretion to impose regulations" and that "prison officials need only demonstrate potential danger, not actual danger.") (citations omitted)).

136. Green v. McKaskle, 788 F.2d 1116 (5th Cir. 1986).

attending the services and was denied access to additional services. The court said that this limitation was allowed because "a reasonable opportunity to practice his religion" was afforded.[137]

Similarly, in Thomas v. Gunter,[138] a federal court of appeals held prison officials could deny a Native American prisoner daily access to the prison sweat lodge for prayer. Applying Turner, the court held the denial was reasonably related to a legitimate prison interest in security. The sweat lodge was near a truck delivery entrance in use during weekday afternoons, and the court accepted the prison's argument that frequent use of the sweat lodge created a security risk. The court noted that daily access to the sweat lodge would also have interfered with scheduled educational and vocational activities.[139]

Courts have also held prison officials may attend prisoner religious group services, provided their presence is reasonable and consistent with prison security measures and does not unreasonably restrict the manner in which the services are conducted.[140] Prison officials may also regulate the time, place, and sometimes the manner in which religious services are conducted, provided the restrictions are rationally related to legitimate prison goals.[141] Similarly, courts have held that prison officials may limit or prohibit visits by religious advisors and counselors when such visits would undermine prison security, prison administration, or both.[142] The time, length, and manner of these visits are also subject to reasonable regulation by prison officials.

For example, in Ha'min v. Montgomery County Sheriff's,[143] a prisoner sued law enforcement officials alleging violations of his First Amendment right to freely exercise his religion. Friday Muslim prayer services were not regularly conducted during the period of the prisoner's incarceration, despite being authorized by prison regulations. He was further not allowed to conduct the Muslim service for himself as a result of a rule that only volunteer religious leaders from outside could perform such services, regardless of the religion. Since the prisoner could keep his Holy Quran in his cell and pray, he had alternative means to exercise his religion. In light of this, the court held that the prisoner's First Amendment rights were not violated.[144]

Note that although your right to attend services or receive visits from ministers may be restricted, you do not have to be a presently affiliated or professed member of a religion to attend such services and receive visits from ministers of that faith. You may also receive visits from the clergy of your choice even if you were not a member of that faith prior to incarceration.[145] Instead, you may simply be thinking about joining the religion and want to attend services or talk to a minister in order to learn about the religion. But, a religious advisor may examine the sincerity of your belief and restrict your access to religious services of that particular faith.[146]

Finally, although prisons must provide a reasonable opportunity to prisoners whose religious practices are observed by a minority of prisoners,[147] many courts have held that the accommodation a prison must make for

---

137. Green v. McKaskle, 788 F.2d 1116, 1126 (5th Cir. 1986).

138. Thomas v. Gunter, 103 F.3d 700 (8th Cir. 1997).

139. Thomas v. Gunter, 103 F.3d 700, 703 (8th Cir. 1997).

140. See Butler-Bey v. Frey, 811 F.2d 449, 452 (8th Cir. 1987) (holding, in part, that a prison regulation requiring a guard to be present at religious meetings did not violate the 1st Amendment where the regulation applied to all prison group meetings, both secular and non-secular).

141. See O'Lone v. Estate of Shabazz, 482 U.S. 342, 358, 107 S. Ct. 2400, 2409, 96 L. Ed. 2d 282, 296 (1987) ("[I]f a regulation merely restricts the time, place, or manner in which prisoners may exercise a right, a prison regulation will be invalidated only if there is no reasonable justification for official action.").

142. See Brown v. Johnson, 743 F.2d 408, 412 (6th Cir. 1984) (affirming that prison authorities can restrict visits by officials of a church that ministers to the spiritual and religious needs of homosexuals because "a strong correlation existed between inmate homosexuality and prison violence").

143. Ha'min v. Montgomery County Sheriff's, 440 F. Supp. 2d 715 (M.D. Tenn. 2006).

144. Ha'min v. Montgomery County Sheriff's, 440 F. Supp. 2d 715, 718–19 (M.D. Tenn. 2006) (finding that the government showed a "valid, rational connection between the jail's action in not providing a regular Friday Muslim service and the legitimate governmental interest" and that plaintiff had an "alternative means of exercising his right to the free exercise of religion").

145. See Pell v. Procunier, 417 U.S. 817, 824–25, 94 S. Ct. 2800, 2805, 41 L. Ed. 2d 495, 503 (1974) (allowing restricted visits from "members of their families, the clergy, their attorneys, and friends of prior acquaintance" as long as "such visits will aid in the rehabilitation of the inmate").

146. See Montano v. Hedgepeth, 120 F.3d 844, 850–51 (8th Cir. 1997) (allowing a prison chaplain to deny participation in Protestant services to a Messianic Jew).

147. See, e.g., Koger v. Bryan, 523 F.3d 789, 799 (7th Cir. 2008) ("We have long held that '[t]he rights of inmates belonging to minority or non-traditional religions must be respected to the same degree as the rights of those belonging to larger and more traditional denominations.'") (quoting Al-Alamin v. Gramley, 926 F.2d 680, 686 (7th Cir. 1991)).

a particular religion is proportional to the number of believers of that particular faith.[148] For example, in Cruz v. Beto,[149] a Buddhist prisoner alleged that prison officials violated his constitutional rights when they prohibited him from conducting Buddhist services in the prison chapel, offering religious materials to other prisoners, and corresponding with his religious advisor. The U.S. Supreme Court reversed the decision of the federal court of appeals, which had dismissed the prisoner's claims. The Court held that the same constitutional standard must be applied to all limitations on religious practices and that there must be equal treatment of different religions.[150] However, the Court also stated that prisons were not required to provide every religion with identical facilities and accommodate each equally.[151]

(ii) RLUIPA

Under RLUIPA, a prison may regulate your access to religious services and/or worship areas, provided that, if the regulation imposes a substantial burden on your religious exercise, it is (1) the least restrictive means possible, and (2) furthers a compelling government interest.[152] However, if a court determines that a regulation does not impose a substantial burden or that the activity you are pursuing is not a religious exercise, it will dismiss your challenge and uphold the requirement.[153]

Keep in mind, however, that a court's determination of whether a rule imposes a substantial burden on your right to religious worship will depend on the specific facts of your case. For example, in at least two instances, the Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit has found that a policy requiring volunteers to attend prisoner religious group meetings did not impose a substantial burden, when the prisoners were able to engage in other means of worship. Likewise, in Baranowski v. Hart,[154] the court found that a volunteer requirement did not impose a substantial burden on Jewish prisoners who wanted more meetings on Sabbaths and other Jewish holy days than their volunteer could attend. In a more recent case, however, the same Court of Appeals concluded that a volunteer requirement could impose a substantial burden, in a case where there was evidence that no new volunteers would be available to provide group religious worship, the prison applied the volunteer requirement differently for different religious groups, and the prisoner did not have access to alternative means of worship.[155]

If you are able to show there is a substantial burden on your religious exercise, the government will need to demonstrate that the restriction on group worship or religious services is the least restrictive means to further the compelling government interest.[156] Although the court will require the prison to provide some evidence

148. See Cruz v. Beto, 405 U.S. 319, 322 n.2, 92 S. Ct. 1079, 1082 n.2, 31 L. Ed. 2d 263, 268 n.2 (1972) ("[The Court does not suggest] that every religious sect or group within a prison—however few in number—must have identical facilities or personnel ... nor must a chaplain, priest, or minister be provided without regard to the extent of the demand."); see also Jones v. Bradley, 590 F.2d 294, 296 (9th Cir. 1979) (citing Cruz) (holding that prison's refusal to provide use of chapel to prisoner, a pastor of the Universal Life Church, did not violate the 1st Amendment).

149. Cruz v. Beto, 405 U.S. 319, 92 S. Ct. 1079, 31 L. Ed. 2d 263 (1972).

150. Cruz v. Beto, 405 U.S. 319, 322, 92 S. Ct. 1079, 1081–82, 31 L. Ed. 2d 263, 268 (1972).

151. Cruz v. Beto, 405 U.S. 319, 322 n.2, 92 S. Ct. 1079, 1082 n.2, 31 L. Ed. 2d 263, 268 n.2 (1972) ("We do not suggest, of course, that every religious sect or group within a prison—however few in number—must have identical facilities or personnel. A special chapel or place of worship need not be provided for every faith regardless of size."). This case is still good law in New York, but is not accepted in every state. See, e.g., Allah v. Menel, 844 F. Supp. 1056, 1063 (E.D. Pa. 1994) ("[T]he state must do more than simply offer conclusory statements that a limitation on religious freedom is required for security, health or safety in order to establish that its interests are of the 'highest order.'").

152. 42 U.S.C. §§ 2000cc-1(a)(1)–(2) (2006).

153. See Part C(2) above. For example, the Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit has dismissed at least two RLUIPA challenges based on a finding that a prison policy that required an outside volunteer to attend prisoner group religious meetings did not impose a substantial burden on the prisoners' religious exercise. See Adkins v. Kaspar, 393 F.3d 559, 571 (5th Cir. 2004); Baranowski v. Hart, 486 F.3d 112 (5th Cir. 2007).

154. Baranowski v. Hart, 486 F.3d 112 (5th Cir. 2007).

155. Mayfield v. Tex. Dept. of Corr., 529 F.3d 599, 614–15 (5th Cir. 2008) (finding that summary judgment was inappropriate when there was evidence that no new volunteers would be available, the prisoner did not have alternative means of worship, and prison officials were unevenly applying the requirement).

156. Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act of 2000 (RLUIPA), 42 U.S.C. § 2000cc-1(a) (2006). See Koger v. Bryan, 523 F.3d 789, 796 (7th Cir. 2008) ("Once the plaintiff establishes this prima facie case, the defendants 'bear the burden of persuasion on any [other] element of the claim,' namely, whether their practice 'is the least restrictive means of furthering a compelling governmental interest.'").

showing that the policy meets this standard, the Supreme Court has told courts to give "due deference to the experience and expertise of prison and jail administrators" while interpreting RLUIPA.[157]

Thus, for example, in Murphy v. Missouri Department of Corrections,[158] the Eighth Circuit Court of Appeals found the prison had not met its burden when the only reason it gave for denying a prisoner the right to group worship was that the prisoner was a racist whose religion limited participation to Anglo-Saxons. In contrast, the Eighth Circuit Court of Appeals found the prison had met its burden in a case involving a Native American prisoner who had been denied access to a sweat lodge.[159] There, the prison provided the court with evidence that it had suggested alternative religious means to the prisoner. In that case, officials had offered the prisoner an outdoor area where he could smoke a ceremonial pipe, suggested a medicine wheel, and sought to locate a volunteer to oversee a Native American group.[160] Based in part on this evidence, the court concluded that the ban on accessing the sweat lodge was the least restrictive means to furthering the prison's interest in security.

These cases suggest that if you can show that the prison denied your request for group worship or attendance of religious services, and did not offer you any alternative to your preferred means of worship, you may have a better chance of defeating the government's arguments that the restriction is the least restrictive means towards furthering a compelling interest.

(b) Mail Censorship

(i) First Amendment Free Exercise Clause

Under the First Amendment Free Exercise Clause, a prison may censor the religious mail that you receive or send, depending on the purpose the censorship serves. For a summary of the Supreme Court's decisions on prisoners' use of the postal system, including receipt of religious materials and correspondence about religious materials, see Chapter 19 of the JLM, "Your Right to Communicate with the Outside World."

In general, prison officials may censor incoming religious mail in any manner reasonably related to the legitimate needs of prison administration.[161] To determine whether the censorship is appropriate, courts apply the Turner test. Under this test, courts have allowed prison officials to withhold mail that advocates racial violence and hatred, even if the mail contains religious content or is from a religious organization. For example, in Chriceol v. Phillips,[162] the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals allowed a Louisiana prison to withhold mail that the Aryan Nation and its affiliate church, the Church of Jesus Christ Christian, had sent to prisoners. The court explained that the mail encouraged racial violence and hatred, and that the "purpose of the rule [was] to eliminate potential threats to the security or order of the facility," which "clearly ... is a legitimate interest."[163]

Similarly, in Shabazz v. Parsons,[164] the Tenth Circuit Court of Appeals applied the Turner test and held that Oklahoma prison officials had a rational basis for denying a prisoner access to an entire issue of a religious magazine, which officials determined would create a danger of violence based on racial, religious, and national hatred.[165] Furthermore, the court denied the prisoner's claim that merely deleting the offending portions of the magazine was a good alternative since doing so would be very expensive and would "prevent the prisoner from obtaining meaningful administrative review."[166]

Prison officials may also regulate outgoing mail, provided that the regulation is "generally necessary" to protect one or more legitimate governmental interests.[167] Note that it may be easier for you to successfully challenge a restriction on outgoing mail, as the Supreme Court has recognized that outgoing correspondence

157. Cutter v. Wilkinson, 544 U.S. 709, 723, 125 S. Ct. 2113, 2123, 161 L. Ed. 2d 1020, 1035 (2005).

158. Murphy v. Mo. Dept. of Corr., 372 F.3d 979, 986 (8th Cir. 2004).

159. Folwer v. Crawford, 534 F.3d 931 (8th Cir. 2008).

160. Folwer v. Crawford, 534 F.3d 931, 939–40 (8th Cir. 2008).

161. See Thornburgh v. Abbott, 490 U.S. 401, 404, 109 S. Ct. 1874, 1877, 104 L. Ed. 2d 459, 467 (1989) (applying the Turner standard to determine whether regulations censoring incoming mail are constitutional).

162. Chriceol v. Phillips, 169 F.3d 313 (5th Cir. 1999).

163. Chriceol v. Phillips, 169 F.3d 313, 316 (5th Cir. 1999); see also Murphy v. Missouri, 814 F.2d 1252, 1256–57 (8th Cir. 1987) (finding that a complete ban on Aryan Nation materials is too restrictive, but that a mail policy restricting materials that advocate violence or racial inflammation is valid).

164. Shabazz v. Parsons, 127 F.3d 1246 (10th Cir. 1997).

165. Shabazz v. Parsons, 127 F.3d 1246, 1249 (10th Cir. 1997).

166. Shabazz v. Parsons, 127 F.3d 1246, 1249 (10th Cir. 1997).

167. See Thornburgh v. Abbott, 490 U.S. 401, 412, 109 S. Ct. 1874, 1881, 104 L. Ed. 2d 459, 472 (1989) (the regulation of restricting outgoing mail must closely fit the interest it is supposed to serve).

that includes "grievances or contains inflammatory racial views cannot reasonably be expected to present a danger to the community inside the prison."[168]

Note also that although prisons can censor mail if there are legitimate prison interests at stake, indiscriminate censorship, or an absolute ban on correspondence with a religious advisor is unconstitutional. See Chapter 19 of the JLM, "Your Right to Communicate with the Outside World."

(ii) RLUIPA

Under RLUIPA, a prison may censor the religious mail you receive or send, provided that if the censorship substantially burdens your religious exercise, it (1) furthers a compelling government interest (2) by the least restrictive means.[169] Though the Supreme Court has noted no reason exists to believe "that RLUIPA would not be applied ... with a particular sensitivity to security concerns,"[170] the Court further acknowledged that "[l]awmakers supporting RLUIPA were mindful of the urgency of discipline, order, safety, and security in penal institutions" and anticipated that "courts would apply the Act's standard with due deference to prison administrators' experience and expertise."[171] Thus, whether courts are likely to reach different outcomes under a RLUIPA standard than they would under a Free Exercise standard is unclear.

(c) Shaving, Haircuts, and Grooming Restrictions

(i) First Amendment Free Exercise Clause

A prison may restrict how you choose to wear your hair or beard, even if this choice is part of your religious practice. To determine whether a prison grooming restriction is acceptable under the Free Exercise Clause, a court will apply the Turner "reasonably related" standard. Under this test, a court will balance the importance of the religious practice in question against the prison's interests for discipline, order, identification, and hygiene.[172] If the prison grooming requirement does not reasonably relate to a legitimate penological interest, the requirement will fail.

Although all courts apply the same test, the results of cases have differed. Some courts have recognized the rights of prisoners to grow beards or wear their hair in accordance with their religious beliefs.[173] For example, the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit upheld a Rastafarian prisoner's right to avoid getting an initial haircut when first received as a prisoner in a New York prison.[174]

Other courts, however, have been less willing to recognize these types of religious practices. For example, in May v. Baldwin,[175] the Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals affirmed a prison regulation requiring a Rastafarian prisoner to unbraid his dreadlocks during searches of his hair. The court accepted the prison's argument that, in order to maintain prison security, the prison needed to search for contraband, and that unbraiding and hair inspection was the least restrictive means available.[176]

Likewise, in Fromer v. Scully,[177] the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit upheld a New York Department of Correctional Services (DOCS) directive forbidding prisoners from wearing beards longer than

---

168. Thornburgh v. Abbott, 490 U.S. 401, 411–12, 109 S. Ct. 1874, 1881, 104 L. Ed. 2d 459, 472 (1989).

169. 42 U.S.C. §§ 2000cc-1(a)(1)–(2) (2006).

170. Cutter v. Wilkinson, 544 U.S. 709, 722–23, 125 S. Ct. 2113, 2123, 161 L. Ed. 2d 1020, 1035 (2004).

171. Cutter v. Wilkinson, 544 U.S. 709, 723, 125 S. Ct. 2113, 2123, 161 L. Ed. 2d 1035 (2004).

172. See Hines v. S.C. Dept. of Corr., 148 F.3d 353, 358 (4th Cir. 1998) (upholding a grooming policy that all male prisoners keep their hair short and faces shaven in order to "suppress contraband, limit gang activity, maintain discipline and security, and prevent prisoners from quickly changing their appearance"); see also Zargary v. City of New York, 607 F. Supp. 2d 609, 613 (S.D.N.Y. 2009) (holding that orthodox Jewish woman could be required to briefly remove her headscarf to further the government's compelling interest in identification of prisoners).

173. See, e.g., Teterud v. Burns, 522 F.2d 357, 359 (8th Cir. 1975) (Native American); Moskowitz v. Wilkinson, 432 F. Supp. 947, 950 (D. Conn. 1977) (Orthodox Jew).

174. Benjamin v. Coughlin, 905 F.2d 571, 577 (2d Cir. 1990) (finding the legitimate penological goal of obtaining an initial identification photograph could be accomplished by pulling back prisoner's hair rather than cutting it off).

175. May v. Baldwin, 109 F.3d 557 (9th Cir. 1997).

176. May v. Baldwin, 109 F.3d 557, 564 (9th Cir. 1997). The court analyzed the regulation under the strict scrutiny of RFRA which is a harder test to satisfy than Turner. Therefore, this grooming regulation would probably pass the Turner test as well, for claims brought exclusively under the 1st Amendment. Also note that the RFRA strict standard was overturned by the Supreme Court a few months after this decision, but was re-implemented in 2000 with The Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act of 2000 ("RLUIPA").

177. Fromer v. Scully, 874 F.2d 69 (2d Cir. 1989).

one inch. The Fromer court "recognized a 'valid, rational connection' between beard restrictions and a legitimate penological interest in inmate identification," emphasizing that the plaintiff had the burden of proving that the prison's concerns were irrational.[178] Explaining its decision to defer to the judgment of the prison administrators, the court noted that "[i]t is certainly not irrational to believe that a full beard, which may well extend for significant lengths sideways from the cheeks as well as downwards from the chin, may impede identification more than a one-inch beard."[179]

(ii) RLUIPA

Under RLUIPA, even if a grooming requirement substantially burdens your religious exercise, a prison may restrict how you choose to style your hair or beard if it (1) furthers a compelling governmental interest (2) by the least restrictive means.[180] These dual requirements may make it easier for you to challenge prison regulations regarding shaving, haircuts, and grooming under RLUIPA than under the First Amendment.

For example, in Fluellen v. Goord,[181] a prisoner brought a successful RLUIPA challenge against a DOCS policy prohibiting all non-Rastafarian prisoners from wearing dreadlocks. The prisoner, a member of the Nation of Islam, argued his refusal to cut his dreadlocks was based upon a specific verse of the Quran. In response, DOCS asserted that the Nation of Islam does not mandate dreadlocks, that the prisoner's interpretation of the Quran was incorrect, and that allowing the prisoner to wear dreadlocks potentially threatened security.

In considering these arguments, the district court in Fluellen rejected DOCS's assertion, explaining that it is not for the courts to question the importance of particular religious beliefs or practices, nor is it proper for judges to determine the accuracy of a plaintiff's interpretation of his religion's teachings.[182] While the court acknowledged that prison safety and security constituted a compelling government interest under RLUIPA, it found that the fact that DOCS permitted Rastafarians to wear dreadlocks meant that dreadlocks do "not impose an insurmountable threat to DOCS' security, safety or sanitation."[183] The court further noted that "DOCS does not appear to have any concerns that permitting this particular plaintiff to wear dreadlocks would threaten DOCS' security, safety or sanitation,"[184] and therefore held that the prisoner could not be forced to cut his dreadlocks, nor could he be punished if he refused to do so.[185]

Similarly, in Smith v. Ozmint,[186] the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals reviewed an RLUIPA claim brought by a Rastafarian challenging a prison policy that forced him to shave his dreadlocks.[187] The court reversed a grant of summary judgment for the prison on the grounds that the prison had not met its burden of proving its compelling interest, nor did the prison show that its policy was the least restrictive means of furthering its interest.[188]

But, other courts have reached different conclusions, finding that prison grooming requirements do not violate RLUIPA.[189] For example, in Fegans v. Norris, the Eighth Circuit Court of Appeals found that a prison

---

178. Fromer v. Scully, 874 F.2d 69, 74 (2d Cir. 1989) (citations omitted).

179. Fromer v. Scully, 874 F.2d 69, 74 (2d Cir. 1989).

180. Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act of 2000 (RLUIPA), 42 U.S.C. § 2000cc-1(a) (2006).

181. Fluellen v. Goord, No. 06-CV-602E(Sr), 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 95374 (W.D.N.Y. Mar. 12, 2007) (unpublished).

182. Fluellen v. Goord, No. 06-CV-602E(Sr), 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 95374, at * 16 (W.D.N.Y. Mar. 12, 2007) (unpublished) (citing McEachin v. McGuinnis, 357 F.3d 197, 201 (2d Cir. 2004)).

183. Fluellen v. Goord, No. 06-CV-602E(Sr), 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 95374, at *19 (W.D.N.Y. Mar. 12, 2007) (unpublished).

184. Fluellen v. Goord, No. 06-CV-602E(Sr), 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 95374, at *19–20 (W.D.N.Y. Mar. 12, 2007) (unpublished).

185. Fluellen v. Goord, No. 06-CV-602E(Sr), 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 95374, at *24 (W.D.N.Y. Mar. 12, 2007) (unpublished); see also Warsoldier v. Woodford, 418 F.3d 989, 1002 (9th Cir. 2005) (holding that a Native American prisoner at a minimum-security prison, whose faith taught that hair should only be cut upon the death of a close relative, could not be punished for violating a rule prohibiting prisoners from having hair longer than three inches without a showing by the prison that the policy constituted the least restrictive way of promoting safety).

186. Smith v. Ozmint, 578 F.3d 246 (4th Cir. 2009).

187. Smith v. Ozmint, 578 F.3d 246 (4th Cir. 2009).

188. Smith v. Ozmint, 578 F.3d 246, 254 (4th Cir. 2009).

189. See e.g., Fegans v. Norris, 537 F.3d 897 (8th Cir. 2008); see also Logan v. Ark. Dept. of Corr., No. 5:07CV00252, 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 61809, at *5–8 (E.D. Ark. July 28, 2008) (unpublished) (finding that the prisoner had failed to state a claim because the grooming policies imposed by the Arkansas DOCS did not violate RLUIPA policy prohibiting male prisoners from wearing hair below the collar and from wearing beards did not violate RLUIPA, even though the department of corrections did not impose the same requirement on women.[190] The court found that the grooming requirements were the least restrictive means to furthering prison safety and security. Specifically, the court noted that prisoners had used their hair to conceal contraband, and to change their appearance after escaping.[191] The court further concluded that there was no less restrictive means to preventing these risks, as "longer hair created a greater opportunity for inmates to conceal contraband, and because correctional officers are placed at risk of assault if required to search through the long hair of individual inmates."[192] Although the court recognized that the prison did not impose the same requirement in the women's barracks, the court noted that the women were housed in a single unit and thus had less opportunity to conceal contraband.[193]

(d) Name Restrictions

(i) First Amendment Free Exercise

Under the First Amendment Free Exercise Clause, a prison may refuse to recognize your choice of a religious name, provided that the refusal is "reasonably and substantially justified by considerations of prison discipline and order."[194] If you have legally changed your name, courts are more likely to recognize your right to be called by your new name.[195]

For example, in Malik v. Brown,[196] a federal court of appeals recognized that a prisoner has a clear constitutional interest in using his religious name, at least in addition to his committed name. While the court did not require the prison to revise its filing system after the prisoner changed his name, the court at least recognized the prisoner's right to include his religious name on outgoing mail.[197]

Note that although courts may be willing to recognize a religious name, courts are unlikely to question the way in which prison officials choose to organize their administrative prison records.[198]

(ii) RLUIPA

Under RLUIPA, a prison may refuse to recognize your choice of a religious name, provided that if the refusal substantially burdens your religious exercise, it (1) furthers a compelling governmental interest and (2) uses the least restrictive means.[199]

Some courts have expressed reluctance to find that a refusal to recognize a name is a substantial burden on your religious exercise.[200] Therefore, it may be difficult for you to show that the refusal to recognize your because they were the least restrictive means of addressing concerns about inmate health and hygiene, opportunities for disguises, and concealment of contraband).

---

190. Fegans v. Norris, 537 F.3d 897 (8th Cir. 2008).

191. Fegans v. Norris, 537 F.3d 897 (8th Cir. 2008).

192. Fegans v. Norris, 537 F.3d 897, 903 (8th Cir. 2008). Applying a similar analysis to the beard restriction, the court concluded that the prison had a compelling interest in restricting prisoners from wearing an uncut beard, as a beard could create a better guise for an escapee and allow for contraband. Fegans v. Norris, 537 F.3d 897, 906 (8th Cir. 2008).

193. Fegans v. Norris, 537 F.3d 897, 904 (8th Cir. 2008).

194. Barrett v. Virginia, 689 F.2d 498, 503 (4th Cir. 1982) (holding that a Virginia statute that places a flat ban on the recognition of religious name changes was unreasonable given that prisoners were already known by several names, and the addition of newly adopted religious names into existing records would not threaten the "reliability and efficiency of correctional records") (quoting Sweet v. S.C. Dept. of Corr., 529 F.2d 854, 863 (4th Cir. 1975)).

195. See Salahuddin v. Coughlin, 591 F. Supp. 353, 359 (S.D.N.Y. 1984) (upholding prison policy that recognizes statutory court-ordered name changes but not common law name changes, in light of speedy and easily proven statutory name changes and "legitimate [state] interest in avoiding confusion and simplifying record-keeping"). But see Barrett v. Commonwealth of Virginia, 689 F.2d 498, 503 (4th Cir. 1982) (finding that adding a newly adopted religious name to prison records would not be overly burdensome or disruptive to record-keeping procedures).

196. Malik v. Brown, 71 F.3d 724, 727 (9th Cir. 1995).

197. Malik v. Brown, 71 F.3d 724, 728–29 (9th Cir. 1995) (finding minimal burden on the prison and "no legitimate penological interest in preventing use of the religious name with the committed name on outgoing mail").

198. See e.g., Barrett v. Virginia, 689 F.2d 498, 503 (4th Cir. 1982) (holding that while the prison must recognize a legally adopted religious name and add it to the prisoner's file, it does not have to reorder the files according to the new name).

199. Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act of 2000 (RLUIPA), 42 U.S.C. § 2000cc-1(a) (2006).

200. See Amun v. Culliver, No. 04-0131-BH-M, 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 75949, at *1 (S.D. Ala. Oct. 18, 2006) (unpublished) (holding that prison's refusal to add prisoner's religious name to visitor list, prisoner location list, and prison correspondence list was not a "substantial burden" on prisoner's exercise of religious beliefs).

name violates RLUIPA. Remember that under RLUIPA, the government can impose rules that burden your religious exercise; it is only barred from adopting rules that substantially burden your religious exercise.

In order to show that the refusal to recognize your name constitutes a substantial burden, you should try to provide the court with concrete examples of the obstacles that having an unchanged name presents. For example, if an unchanged name will exclude you from participating in religious ceremonies, subject you to harsh treatment or exclusion by your co-believers, or make it so that you cannot "rise through the ranks" of your religion, the court may be more willing to find that the restriction constitutes a substantial burden.[201]

If the court determines that not allowing your name change does significantly burden your religious exercise, the government would then be required to show that not allowing you to change your name served a "compelling governmental interest" and that it did so by the "least restrictive means."[202] As noted above, prison safety and security are compelling governmental interests.[203] Accordingly, if the prison claims that not allowing your name changes is the least restrictive way of maintaining safety and security, the court may uphold the prison's refusal to grant your name-change request.[204]

If you can show that other prisoners in your prison or in similar prisons were permitted to change their names, you may be able to demonstrate that not permitting you to change your name for religious reasons is not the least restrictive means by which the prison can maintain order. [205]

(e) Special Diet Restrictions

(i) First Amendment Free Exercise Clause

Under the Free Exercise Clause, a prison can refuse to accommodate your request for a special diet, provided that the restriction is rationally connected to legitimate penological goals. To determine whether a prison may refuse to accommodate your request for a special diet, a court will apply the Turner test.[206] Under this test, the court will first determine whether your special diet request is based on sincerely held religious beliefs. The court may also examine whether or not your special diet is absolutely required by your religion.[207] It will then look to whether the prison's denial of that request is rationally connected to any legitimate prison

---

201. Two federal district court cases suggest that these factors may have supported a conclusion that a refusal to recognize a changed name constitutes a substantial burden. See Scott v. California Supreme Court, No. CIV S-04-2586 LKK GGH P, 2008 WL 2788346, at *10 (E.D. Cal. July 17, 2008) (unpublished); see also Ashanti v. Cal. Dept. of Corr., No. CIV S-03-0474, 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 10612, at *53-54 (E.D. Cal. Feb. 15, 2007) (unpublished).

202. Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act of 2000 (RLUIPA), 42 U.S.C. §§ 2000cc-1(a)(1)–(2) (2006).

203. Fawaad v. Jones, 81 F.3d 1084, 1087 (11th Cir. 1996) ("[M]aintaining security in a prison constitutes a compelling governmental interest. The control of contraband into and out of the prison is a fundamental part of maintaining prison security, and the requirement of dual names on incoming and outgoing mail is the least restrictive means of satisfying that compelling interest). See also Fegans v. Norris, 537 F.3d 897, 902 (8th Cir. 2008) (holding that deterrence of crime and institutional security are valid penological interests, and noting that "context matters" in the application of this "compelling governmental interest" standard, and that RLUIPA does not "elevate accommodation of religious observances over an institution's need to maintain order and safety.").

204. See, e.g., Fawaad v. Jones, 81 F.3d 1084, 1087 (11th Cir. 1996) (holding that a prison may require a prisoner to use both his chosen name and the name under which he was committed on incoming and outgoing mail). Although this case was decided under RFRA, the holding would similarly apply to cases brought under RLUIPA.

205. See, e.g., Fluellen v. Goord, No. 06-CV-602E(Sr), 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 95374, at *19–20 (W.D.N.Y. Mar. 12, 2007) (unpublished) (explaining that the fact that a prison allowed some prisoners to wear dreadlocks indicated that refusing to allow others to wear dreadlocks was not the least restrictive means to achieving compelling government interests).

206. See generally DeHart v. Horn, 227 F.3d 47 (3d Cir. 2000) (holding that where a prison regulation limits an prisoner's ability to engage in a particular religious practice, the second prong of Turner requires an examination of whether there are other means available to the prisoner for expressing his religious beliefs. If the prison affords the prisoner alternative means of expressing his religious beliefs, that fact tends to support the conclusion that the regulation at issue is reasonable).

207. See Spies v. Voinovich, 173 F.3d 398, 407 (6th Cir. 1999) (holding plaintiff was not entitled to a strict vegan diet because it was not required by Zen Buddhism and because a vegetarian diet, which the prison already provided, sufficed); see also Dawson v. Burnette, 631 F. Supp. 2d 878,894 (W.D. Mich. 2009).

However, the Third Circuit Court of Appeals has refused to follow this analysis of considering whether a religion requires a practice or diet, finding the judiciary ill equipped to determine the truth and significance of religious beliefs and practices. Instead, it strictly applied the Turner test. See DeHart v. Horn, 227 F.3d 47, 56–57 n.6 (3d Cir. 2000); see also McEachin v. McGuinnis, 357 F.3d 197, 203 (2d Cir. 2004) (stating that "a religious practice [need not] be mandated by a religion" to receive 1st Amendment protection) (citing Levitan v. Ashcroft, 281 F.3d 1313, 1319 (D.C. Cir. 2002)).

concerns. If so, the court will balance the reasonableness of the refusal with the prison's legitimate interests, looking to effects on the prison community, use of resources, and alternative means of satisfying the meal request.[208]

Although courts may look into the costs of accommodating prisoners' dietary requirements, budgetary considerations alone cannot excuse a prison from respecting your First Amendment rights. In other words, your religious dietary habits will be accommodated where prison officials can do so reasonably without jeopardizing security, or causing significant expense or administrative burden.[209]

(ii) RLUIPA

Under RLUIPA, a prison can refuse to accommodate your request for a special diet, provided that if the refusal substantially burdens your religious exercise, the refusal (1) furthers a compelling interest and (2) uses the least restrictive means. [210]

In order for your special diet to be protected, you will first need to show your special diet is a religious exercise, one that is based on sincerely held religious beliefs and practices and not simply a concern for your bodily health.[211] Remember that your beliefs do not need to be affiliated with any organized religion to constitute religious beliefs, and you do not need to show the religion absolutely requires you to follow a special diet.[212]

One way that you may try to prove that a diet is a religious exercise is to submit paperwork from your religious organization stating that adherents to the religion often choose to follow special dietary restrictions. For example, in Koger v. Bryan,[213] the Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals found that a prisoner who submitted paperwork from his religious organization, stating that individual members of the faith "may, from time to time, include dietary restrictions as part of his or her personal regimen of spiritual discipline," had established that his dietary request was "squarely within the definition of religious exercise set forth by RLUIPA."[214]

When determining whether your religious beliefs are sincerely held, courts have also looked to the length of time that you asked to have your request for a special diet accommodated. For example, in Koger, the court pointed to the long time that the prisoner had asked to have his request for a non-meat diet accommodated; the prisoner had first filed a request nearly eight years before the case reached the court of appeals.[215] The court also noted that the fact that the prisoner had remained committed to his original religious affiliation throughout this time—rather than changing to another religion that required non-meat diets—indicated that his religious belief was sincerely held.[216]

---

208. See DeHart v. Horn, 227 F.3d 47, 49–52 (3d Cir. 2000) (balancing the Turner factors and holding that although there is a legitimate penological interest in having an efficient food system and avoiding prisoner jealousy, accommodating the Buddhist prisoner's request for a cup of soy milk with each meal was not administratively prohibitive and not unreasonable in light of these penological interests, but that on remand the district court was required to examine whether there were other means available to prisoner for expressing his religious beliefs); see also Williams v. Morton, 343 F.3d 212, 217–18 (3d Cir. 2003) (holding that the denial of Muslim prisoner's request for Halal meals with meat, rather than prison-provided vegetarian meals, was valid in light of legitimate prison interests in "simplified food service, prison security, and budgetary constraints"). But see McEachern v. McGuinnis, 357 F.3d 197, 203–04 (2d Cir. 2004) (holding that prisoner who claimed that he was subjected to a disciplinary diet of food "loaf" during Ramadan, when Muslims are required to break their fast each day with Halal food, stated a claim).

209. See Makin v. Colo. Dept. of Corr., 183 F.3d 1205, 1211–14 (10th Cir. 1999) (holding prison's failure to accommodate meal requirements during the holy month of Ramadan violated Muslim prisoner's 1st Amendment rights); Ashelman v. Wawrzaszek, 111 F.3d 674, 677 (9th Cir. 1997) (holding providing Orthodox Jews with a frozen kosher dinner supplemented with non-kosher meals violated their right to free exercise, since reasonable alternatives existed).

210. Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act of 2000 (RLUIPA), 42 U.S.C. §§ 2000cc-1(a)(1)–(2) (2006).

211. See Koger v. Bryan, 523 F.3d 789, 797 (7th Cir. 2008) (hypothesizing that if a prisoner's desire for a non-meat diet "was rooted solely in concerns for his bodily health, it would not be protected by RLUIPA"); see also Wisconsin v. Yoder, 406 U.S. 205, 215, 92 S. Ct. 1526, 1533, 32 L. Ed. 2d 15, 25 (1972) (holding that where fundamental claims of religious freedom are at stake, we must searchingly examine the interests that the State seeks to promote and the impediment to those objectives that would flow from recognizing the claim).

212. Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act of 2000 (RLUIPA), 42 U.S.C. § 2000cc-5(7)(A) (2006).

213. Koger v. Bryan, 523 F.3d 789, 797 (7th Cir. 2008).

214. Koger v. Bryan, 523 F.3d 789, 797 (7th Cir. 2008).

215. Koger v. Bryan, 523 F.3d 789, 797 (7th Cir. 2008).

216. Koger v. Bryan, 523 F.3d 789, 797 (7th Cir. 2008).

Once you show you are seeking accommodation of a religious exercise based on sincerely held beliefs, you must then show the refusal to provide the diet substantially burdens this religious exercise.[217] At least one court has found that repeated refusal to accommodate a request for a special diet some members of a religion follow constitutes a substantial burden, even if the religion does not actually require the diet.[218]

If you are able to prove that by not providing your requested diet, the prison substantially burdens your religious exercise, the prison must then show that its reason for not fulfilling your request is based on a compelling government interest and not permitting the diet is the "least restrictive means" of accomplishing these goals.

To date, courts have recognized orderly administration of a prison dietary system as a valid concern of prison officials.[219] In Jova v. Smith,[220] the Second Circuit Court of Appeals seemed to assume that such administrative interests could be compelling.[221] The plaintiffs had requested a vegan diet, specific foods on individual days of the week, and preparation of the food by Tulukeesh adherents.[222] Whether the government's interest is compelling perhaps depends on the prison's ability to meet your religious dietary needs. This idea is also supported by Jova v. Smith because the court reversed the district court's grant of summary judgment on the grounds that the prison had not demonstrated that providing a vegan diet was too burdensome.[223] Generally, the orderly administration of a prison dietary system is not a compelling interest.[224] Moreover, if the prison already serves meals that could satisfy your request for a special diet, the court may be more likely to find the prison did not meet its burden of showing the refusal is based on a compelling government interest.[225]

(f) Special Attire

(i) First Amendment Free Exercise Clause

Under the Free Exercise Clause, a prison may prevent you from wearing certain attire required by your religion, like prayer hats or head coverings, provided there is a reasonable relationship between the regulation and a legitimate prison interest.[226] Many courts have held the right to wear head coverings must be weighed against the state's security concern that weapons and drugs can be concealed under a hat.[227]

For example, a New York court held that a prison could prohibit prisoners from wearing Rastafarian "crowns" (loose fitting headgear worn over dreadlocks) in some or all areas of the prison, given the legitimate security interests of the prison, even though Jewish and Muslim prisoners could wear their respective religious headgear (that are smaller and more closely fitted) throughout the prison.[228] The court determined that the prison had a legitimate security interest in the different treatment because Rastafarian crowns are large and

---

217. See Muhammad v. Warithu-Deen Umar, 98 F. Supp. 2d 337, 341 (W.D.N.Y. 2000) (finding that prison's refusal to provide Muslim prisoner with a kosher cold alternative meal rather than the religious alternative meal was not a substantial burden on prisoner's religious exercise).

218. Koger v. Bryan, 523 F.3d 789, 798 (7th Cir. 2008).

219. See, e.g., Resnick v. Adams, 348 F.3d 763, 769 (9th Cir. 2003) ("The legitimate governmental interest at stake here is the orderly administration of a program that allows federal prisons to accommodate the religious dietary needs of thousands of prisoners.") (citations omitted); DeHart v. Horn, 227 F.3d 47, 52 (3d Cir. 2000) (agreeing with prison officials that "a simplified and efficient food service" is a legitimate penological interest).

220. Jova v. Smith, 582 F.3d 410, 417 (2d Cir. 2009).

221. Jova v. Smith, 582 F.3d 410, 417 (2d Cir. 2009).

222. Jova v. Smith, 582 F.3d 410, 417 (2d Cir. 2009).

223. Jova v. Smith, 582 F.3d 410, 417 (2d Cir. 2009).

224. Koger v. Bryan, 523 F.3d 789, 800 (7th Cir. 2008) ("[N]o appellate court has ever found these [legitimate concerns for orderly administration of a prison dietary system] to be compelling interests.").

225. Koger v. Bryan, 523 F.3d 789, 798 (7th Cir. 2008).

226. See Davis v. Clinton, 74 F. App'x 452, 455 (6th Cir. 2003) (upholding prison policy prohibiting Muslim prisoner from wearing religious garb every day due to the policy's reasonable relationship to valid security concerns).

227. See, e.g., Boles v. Neet, 486 F.3d 1177 (10th Cir. Colo. 2007) (denying prison warden's motion to dismiss action for violation of 1st Amendment for prohibiting the wearing of a yarmulke while in transport between prison and hospital); Young v. Lane, 922 F.2d 370 (7th Cir. 1991) (same with Jewish prisoners and yarmulkes); Standing Deer v. Carlson, 831 F.2d 1525 (9th Cir. 1987) (same with Native Americans and religious headbands).

228. Benjamin v. Coughlin, 905 F.2d 571, 578–79 (2d Cir. 1990) (holding that restricting wearing of Rastafarian crowns did not violate the 1st Amendment or Equal Protection); Bunny v. Coughlin, 187 A.D.2d 119, 122, 593 N.Y.S.2d 354, 357 (3d Dept. 1993) (holding that wearing of Rastafarian crown was properly denied).

shapeless enough to conceal weapons and contraband, as compared to the smaller, closely fitting head coverings worn by members of other religions.[229]

(ii) RLUIPA

Under RLUIPA, you will first need to show that the prison has substantially burdened your religious exercise by not permitting you to wear your religious attire.[230] If you make such a showing, the court will then determine whether the restriction furthers compelling governmental interests by the least restrictive means available. Because prison safety and security are considered compelling governmental interests, the court will then need to determine whether the challenged regulations are the least restrictive means of accomplishing the safety and security goals. Ultimately, the outcome may be similar to raising a First Amendment challenge, where objects that threaten security are banned while those that do not are permitted.

As with other RLUIPA claims, if you can show that prison officials allow other prisoners to wear the religious attire you wish to wear, you may be able to convince the court that the restriction is not the least restrictive means. For example, in Clarke v. Scribner,[231] a federal district court found that a prisoner had put forward a valid claim under RLUIPA when the prisoner argued that a prison official had refused the prisoner access to the dining hall unless the plaintiff removed his head covering. Significantly, the prisoner had claimed that non-Muslim prisoners were allowed to wear their religious attire in the hall.

(g) Medical Tests

(i) First Amendment Free Exercise Clause

Under the Free Exercise Clause, a prison may refuse to accommodate your request not to receive medical procedures, such as the tuberculosis skin test, based on religious objections. To determine whether an injunction is appropriate, a court will apply the Turner standard.[232] In most cases, courts have upheld mandatory tuberculosis testing policies as reasonably related to legitimate objectives of prison administration.[233]

Because medical testing and vaccination requirements affect the wellbeing of the entire prison population and not just the rights of an individual prisoner, courts apply an analysis that is somewhat different from the one applied to other limitations of prisoners' rights. Some courts give significant weight to the fact that vaccination and medical testing requirements are general, do not burden or support one religion over any others, and are rationally related to maintaining the health and safety of the prison population and officials.[234]

Many courts have also upheld a state statute that required a prisoner to provide a DNA sample against a religious challenge. For example, in Shaffer v. Saffle,[235] an Oklahoma statute required individuals convicted of certain offenses (sex-related crimes, violent crimes, and other crimes where biological evidence was recovered) to provide a DNA sample for a state DNA Offender Database for the purpose of identifying and prosecuting criminals. A prisoner challenged the statute, contending that it would force him "to submit to a practice that will require him to deny his faith and condemn him to eternal damnation."[236] The court held that the prisoner's First Amendment Free Exercise Clause had not been violated because the statute was a neutral, generally applicable law that did not discriminate against him based on his religious beliefs.

---

229. Benjamin v. Coughlin, 905 F.2d 571, 579 (2d Cir. 1990); Bunny v. Coughlin, 187 A.D.2d 119, 123, 593 N.Y.S.2d 354, 357 (3d Dept. 1993).

230. Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act, 42 U.S.C. §§ 2000cc-1(a)(1)–(2) (2006).

231. Clarke v. Scribner, No. CIV S-05-00702 ALA P., 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 69836, at *6 (E.D. Cal. Sept. 12, 2007) (unpublished).

232. For more information on the Turner standard, see Part C(1)(c) of this Chapter.

233. See, e.g., Ballard v. Woodard, 641 F. Supp. 432, 437 (W.D.N.C. 1986) (holding that the free religious exercise rights of a Muslim prisoner were not violated when he was subjected to tuberculosis testing during the holy month of Ramadan since the state had a "paramount interest in maintaining the health of its prison population").

234. See generally Ballard v. Woodard, 641 F. Supp. 432 (W.D.N.C. 1986) (holding that the free religious exercise rights of a Muslim prisoner were not violated when he was subjected to tuberculosis testing during the holy month of Ramadan since the state had a "paramount interest in maintaining the health of its prison population"); see also McCormick v. Stalder, 105 F.3d 1059 (5th Cir. 1997) (holding that prison officials could constitutionally quarantine a prisoner who tested positive for tuberculosis and force him to undergo treatment).

235. Shaffer v. Saffle, 148 F.3d 1180 (10th Cir. 1998).

236. Shaffer v. Saffle, 148 F.3d 1180, 1181 (10th Cir. 1998).

(ii) RLUIPA

Under RLUIPA, a prison may refuse to accommodate your request not to receive medical procedures, provided that, if such a refusal constitutes a substantial burden on your religious exercise, it (1) furthers a compelling government interest (2) by the least restrictive means.[237]

As in other RLUIPA cases, you must prove that the medical testing or vaccination requirement substantially burdens your religious exercise.[238] The prison must then prove that the regulation furthers a compelling government interest by the least restrictive means.[239] Because most medical procedures potentially affect the entire prison population's health, and not just the individual prisoner's rights, the court will likely conclude the procedure protects the health of the prison population and thus furthers a compelling government interest.[240] Your best chance of successfully challenging a medical testing or vaccination requirement may be that the specific medical procedures is not the least restrictive means of testing you. For example, in Jolly v. Coughlin a Rastafarian prisoner was placed in medical keeplock for refusing to take a tuberculosis test.[241] The court held that while the government's interest in preventing the spread of tuberculosis is compelling, keeping the prisoner in medical keeplock violated RFRA because even if the prisoner had tested positive for latent tuberculosis and refused to take the medication, he would have been placed back in the general population.[242] Results like Jolly, however, are fact-specific, and your chance of successfully challenging a medical testing or inoculation requirement under RLUIPA, as under the First Amendment Free Exercise Clause, is probably minimal.[243]

D. Your Rights Under State Statutes

In addition to federal law, many states have laws ensuring prisoners' rights to practice their religion. This Part specifically reviews relevant New York statutes that are different from what is explained in the rest of this Chapter. These statutes provide remedies to state prisoners in state court that are not exclusive of the remedies available in federal court. In other words, you may sue under a state statute, a federal statute, and/or the U.S. Constitution. Make sure that you check for the most recent version of the law in your state before you file a claim.

1. New York

Section 610(1) of the New York Corrections Law declares that you are entitled to the "free exercise and enjoyment of religious profession and worship, without discrimination or preference."[244] Subdivision (3) of this law provides that the rules and regulations of correctional institutions must allow religious services, spiritual advice, and private support from recognized clergy members.[245] But, the law also authorizes correctional institutions to reasonably restrict this right if necessary for proper institutional management.[246]

---

237. Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act, 42 U.S.C. §§ 2000cc-1(a)(1)–(2) (2006).

238. Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act, 42 U.S.C. §§ 2000cc-1(a)(1)–(2) (2006). See also Jolly v. Coughlin, 76 F.3d 468, 476 (2d Cir. 1996) (stating that a substantial burden exists when the state puts substantial pressure on a prisoner to modify his behavior and to violate his beliefs).

239. Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act, 42 U.S.C. §§ 2000cc-1(a)(1)–(2) (2006).

240. See Johnson v. Sherman, CIV S-04-2255 LKK EFB P, 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 24098, at *10–11 (E.D. Cal. Mar. 30, 2007) (unpublished) (finding that prison established a compelling governmental interest in protecting prisoners and correctional staff from tuberculosis).

241. Jolly v. Coughlin, 76 F.3d 468, 471 (2d Cir. 1996).

242. Jolly v. Coughlin, 76 F.3d 468, 477 (2d Cir. 1996).

243. See Johnson v. Sherman, No. CIV S-04-2255 LKK EFB P, 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 24098, at *12 (E.D. Cal. Mar. 30, 2007) (unpublished) (denying injunction to Rastafarian prisoner challenging prison's requirement that he undergo a tuberculin skin test to test for latent tuberculosis because "[t]he tuberculosis skin test is the only medically accepted test available to discover latent tuberculosis in California's prisons."); see also Soder v. Williamson, No. 4:07-CV-1851, 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 68513, at *14–17 (M.D. Pa. Aug. 7, 2008) (unpublished) (finding no grounds for an RLUIPA violation where prison officials had tested a prisoner for tuberculosis using a chest X-ray—the method that the prisoner requested—and observing that the state has a particularly "clear and compelling interest in detecting" highly contagious and potentially dangerous diseases).

244. N.Y. Corr. Law § 610(1) (McKinney 2008).

245. N.Y. Corr. Law § 610(3) (McKinney 2008). See generally Brown v. McGinnis, 10 N.Y.2d 531, 536, 180 N.E.2d 791, 793, 225 N.Y.S.2d 497, 501 (1962) (holding that Muslim prisoner has right to spiritual advice from clergymen of his religion under § 610).

246. N.Y. Corr. Law § 610(3) (McKinney 2008); See also Brown v. McGinnis, 10 N.Y.2d 531, 535–36, 180 N.E.2d

A New York court applying this statute has required the redrafting of the Commissioner of Correction's rules and regulations to allow for the admission of clergy into a prison for purposes of conducting religious services.[247] However, this allowance is subject to reasonable limitation by the Commissioner of the Department of Correctional Services (DOCS) and by wardens for purposes of prison security or other legitimate prison interests.[248] Note that courts have also interpreted Section 610(1) to require the presence of a "non-inmate spiritual leader" at all religious congregations in prison, and the non-inmate spiritual leader must be registered and approved pursuant to prison directives.[249] You should read Section 610 carefully, along with the cases cited in the corresponding Notes of Decisions, which can be found in the same volume of McKinney's Consolidated Laws as the statute, just after the statute's text.

In addition to Section 610, you may also bring claims under the New York State Constitution. In determining the legality of a restriction limiting your right to free exercise of religion under the New York State Constitution, courts will balance the "importance of the right asserted and the extent of the infringement ... against the institutional needs and objectives being promoted."[250] In general, New York courts follow the same analysis as claims brought under the U.S. Constitution. Therefore, if you believe a New York law or DOCS directive interferes with your right to free exercise of religion, you should be prepared to make an argument using the constitutional analysis provided earlier in this Chapter.

Although New York state courts follow the same general constitutional analysis as federal courts, there are some differences that you should be aware of when evaluating whether you have a viable claim.

For example, New York courts and DOCS have adopted a specific rule concerning initial haircuts and shaves for purposes of obtaining identification photographs.[251] Under this rule, a prison may not require all prisoners to have their haircut upon admission, as there are less intrusive alternatives available that do not increase any administrative burden (for example, tying one's hair back).[252] An initial haircut requirement is therefore an unconstitutional violation of religious rights under New York law. But, a prison can still require prisoners to undergo an initial shave, since there are "no less intrusive alternatives for photographing the underlying facial features."[253] Note, however, that DOCS seems to recognize computer imaging as a viable alternative to the initial shave requirement.[254]

791, 793, 225 N.Y.S.2d 497, 500 (1962) (stating that the freedom to exercise religion is not absolute because the law allows for these rights to be reasonably curtailed when necessary to manage the prison and maintain discipline).

247. See SaMarion v. McGinnis, 55 Misc. 2d 59, 61, 284 N.Y.S.2d 504, 507–08 (Sup. Ct. Erie County 1967) (requiring the redrafting of paragraphs 3, 7, 16, & 17 of § 610 of the Corrections Law to permit the admission of clergy for religious ministry after Black Muslims alleged denial of their right to practice their religion).

248. SaMarion v. McGinnis, 55 Misc. 2d 59, 61, 284 N.Y.S.2d 504, 508 (Sup. Ct. Erie County 1967) (requiring the redrafting of the Corrections Law to permit the admission of clergy, but allowing reasonable limitation by the Commissioner and Wardens for the purposes of prison security).

249. State of New York, Department of Correctional Services, Directive No. 4750 IV-A-4 (2004), available at http://www.docs.state.ny.us/Directives/4750.pdf (last visited February 27, 2010) (dealing with "Volunteer Services Programs," and including guidelines for "religious volunteer and spiritual advisor"); State of New York, Department of Correctional Services, Directive 4202 F-2-a-(3) (2009), available at http://www.docs.state.ny.us/Directives/4202.pdf (last visited February 27, 2010) (providing that, with specific authorization of the facility Superintendent, prisoners "shall be permitted to observe their congregational worship services when led by employee chaplains or outside religious volunteers, and to attend religious study, meetings, classes, study groups, or congregational worship of their respective religious faiths.").

250. Lucas v. Scully, 71 N.Y.2d 399, 406, 521 N.E.2d 1070, 1073, 526 N.Y.S.2d 927, 930 (1988).

251. See State of New York, Department of Correctional Services, Directive 4914 (2001) available at, http://www.docs.state.ny.us/Directives/4914.pdf (last visited February 27, 2010) (discussing "Inmate Grooming Standards").

252. See People v. Lewis, 115 A.D.2d 597, 598, 496 N.Y.S.2d 258, 260 (2d Dept. 1985), aff'd, 68 N.Y.2d 923, 502 N.E.2d 988, 510 N.Y.S.2d 73 (1986) ("[T]he identification objective would be fully achieved by pulling respondent's locks back tightly behind the head for a photograph so they could not be seen … the asserted objectives of a haircut can be achieved through alternatives that impinge less drastically on respondent's First Amendment rights than directing him to cut his hair.").

253. See People v. Lewis, 115 A.D.2d 597, 598, 496 N.Y.S.2d 258, 260 (2d Dept. 1985), aff'd, 68 N.Y.2d 923, 502 N.E.2d 988, 510 N.Y.S.2d 73 (1986); see also Phillips v. Coughlin, 586 F. Supp. 1281, 1285 (S.D.N.Y. 1984) (denying Rastafarian's claim for damages after an initial shave pursuant to Directive 4914, since a single shave is the "simplest, quickest and most comfortable method" of satisfying the security need for a clean-shaven identification photograph).

254. See Helbrans v. Coombe, 890 F. Supp. 227, 230 (S.D.N.Y. 1995) (noting that DOCS and prisoner reached an agreement in which DOCS allowed a Jewish prisoner to pay for a computer-generated photograph that displayed his image without his beard as an alternative to the initial shave requirement) .

DOCS has also adopted specific rules for the post-admission shaving of facial hair. Under this rule, although prisoners cannot grow facial hair longer than one inch from the face, there is a religious exemption for the one-inch requirement for those whose religious tenets prohibit the cutting of facial hair.[255]

Likewise, DOCS has adopted specific dietary rules. Prisoners in New York prisons may avoid eating foods forbidden by their religious beliefs, in which case the prison must provide them with a nutritionally adequate substitute diet.[256] For example, prisons must provide Muslim and Jewish prisoners with a pork-free diet.[257] DOCS policy also provides Muslim, Buddhist, and Orthodox Jewish prisoners special meals during certain holidays.[258] Despite these provisions, there are limitations to the religious meals and ceremonies a prisoner can demand. For example, a court held a Jewish prisoner could not insist on preparing his meals himself, nor could he require that only a Jewish or Muslim cook prepare them. Since the prison provided the prisoner with pork-free meals, it did not have to meet his other preparation demands for valid budgetary reasons.[259]

E. Faith-Based Rehabilitation Programs

In the past few years, there has been an increase in the number of faith-based rehabilitation programs within state prison facilities, many initiated by volunteer evangelical Christian organizations (the Prison Fellowship Ministries in particular).[260] What makes these faith-based programs different from other religious-based organizations within the prison is their implementation by the state and the "special treatment" participating prisoners seem to receive.

These faith-based programs raise serious constitutional questions. While the Supreme Court has not yet decided the constitutionality of these faith-based rehabilitation programs, several state and federal courts have done so.[261] In Americans United for Separation of Church and State v. Prison Fellowship Ministries,[262] an Iowa federal district court held the challenged faith-based program violated the Establishment Clause, which is explained above in section B of this Chapter.[263]

Much of the court's decision in that case, however, turned on the fact that the program was state funded, conducted in a state prison by a private religious organization, and all instruction (with the exception of one subject) was presented from the viewpoint of Evangelical Christianity.[264] It is unclear how a similar case would come out if the program were privately funded, or if the program was less religiously oriented.

Courts generally treat faith-based prison addiction treatment programs differently (primarily Alcoholics Anonymous and Narcotics Anonymous, which "are rooted ... in a regard for a 'higher power'").[265] Rather than holding that these programs violate the Establishment Clause, courts tend to say simply prisoners cannot be required to participate in faith-based programs,[266] and some go so far as requiring secular alternatives.[267]

---

255. See State of New York, Department of Correctional Services, Directive 4914 III-B-1 (2001).

256. See State of New York, Department of Correctional Services, Directive 4202(P) (2008). But see Bunny v. Coughlin, 187 A.D.2d 119, 123, 593 N.Y.S.2d 354, 357 (3d Dept. 1993) (holding that a Rastafarian prisoner was not entitled to dietary restrictions because the prison did not have the resources to accommodate him).

257. See State of New York, Department of Correctional Services, Directive 4202(P) (2008); see also Majid v. Leonardo, 172 A.D.2d 914, 568 N.Y.S.2d 200, 201 (3d Dept. 1991) (finding that Halal meals for Muslim prisoners are not required given budgetary constraints and staff resources and because pork-free meals are already provided).

258. See Benjamin v. Coughlin, 905 F.2d 571, 579–80 (2d Cir. 1990) (noting the provision of special meals).

259. Malik v. Coughlin, 158 A.D.2d 833, 834, 551 N.Y.S.2d 418, 419 (3d Dept. 1990).

260. See Daniel Brook, When God Goes to Prison, Legal Affairs, May–June, 2003 at 22; Samantha M. Shapiro, Jails for Jesus, Mother Jones, Nov.–Dec., 2003 at 54.

261. See, e.g., Americans United for Separation of Church and State v. Prison Fellowship Ministries, 432 F. Supp. 2d 862, 934 (S.D. Iowa 2006) (holding that a faith-based prison program violated prisoners' Establishment Clause rights under the 1st Amendment and the Iowa Constitution), affirmed in part, reversed on other grounds, 509 F.3d 406 (8th Cir. 2007); Williams v. Huff, 52 S.W.3d 171, 192 (Tex. 2001) (holding that a faith-based prison program violated prisoners' Establishment Clause rights under the 1st Amendment).

262. Americans United for Separation of Church and State v. Prison Fellowship Ministries, 432 F. Supp. 2d 862 (S.D. Iowa 2006), affirmed in part, reversed on other grounds, 509 F.3d 406 (8th Cir. 2007).

263. Americans United for Separation of Church and State v. Prison Fellowship Ministries, 432 F. Supp. 2d 862, 933 (S.D. Iowa 2006), affirmed in part, reversed on other grounds, 509 F.3d 406 (8th Cir. 2007).

264. Americans United for Separation of Church and State v. Prison Fellowship Ministries, 432 F. Supp. 2d 862, 918–21 (S.D. Iowa 2006), affirmed in part, reversed on other grounds, 509 F.3d 406 (8th Cir. 2007).

265. Inouye v. Kemna, 504 F.3d 705, 710 (9th Cir. 2007).

266. See, e.g., Kerr v. Farrey, 95 F.3d 472, 478–80 (7th Cir. 1996) (holding that prisoner could not be required to participate in Narcotics Anonymous, nor could he have his security classification raised for refusing to do so); Turner v. Hickman, 342 F. Supp. 2d 887, 895–98 (E.D. Cal. 2004) (holding that requiring prisoner to participate in Narcotics

F. Conclusion

The previous Parts indicate that the law is not always clear concerning your right to religious freedom. This lack of clarity is due to the difficulty of weighing the strongly opposed interests involved. On one side lies your constitutional and statutory right to freely exercise your religion, combined with the prohibition against state establishment of religion. On the other side is the prison system's desire to maintain safety and order in prisons. To bring a claim concerning any of your religious rights in prison, you must be mindful of the following criteria that courts examine.

To bring a free exercise of religion claim under RLUIPA or RFRA, you must first allege that you fall under RLUIPA or RFRA's jurisdiction. In the RLUIPA context, the easiest way to do so is to plead that RLUIPA applies to you because your prison or prison system receives federal funds. Recall that for federal prisoners to bring a RFRA claim, you must simply allege that your rights were either violated while you were a federal prisoner, or violated by an agent of the federal government acting in his or her official capacity.

After making this jurisdictional showing, you must then convince the court that your religious exercise has been substantially burdened. If you succeed, the court will then require the government to show that the burden upon your religious exercise furthers a compelling governmental interest by the least restrictive means. While this is the government's burden, you will want to argue that the interest is not compelling, the means used are not the least restrictive, or both.

To bring a free exercise claim under the First Amendment of the Constitution, you must first convince the court that your religion is authentic and that your beliefs are sincere. The court will then apply the Turner test to determine (1) whether there is a rational connection between the prison regulation and the governmental interest claimed to justify it, (2) whether there are other ways of exercising your right despite the regulation, (3) if allowing you to exercise your right will cause a "ripple effect" on others in the prison and on the allocation of prison resources, and (4) whether there is an easier way for the prison to meet the regulation's goal without limiting your right in this way. Remember that unlike in the RLUIPA or RFRA context, you have the burden of proving the fourth element under the Turner test.

If you feel that your prison has violated the Establishment Clause, you must convince the court that the prison's regulations fail the Lemon test and the Lee coercion rule. Remember that the courts are recognizing both tests until the Supreme Court clarifies which test is proper. Therefore, you should try to show that the prison regulation you are challenging fails both tests.

Anonymous in order to be eligible for parole violated the Establishment Clause).

267. See, e.g., Warner v. Orange County Dept. of Probation, 115 F.3d 1068, 1081 (2d Cir. 1997) (holding forced attendance at Alcoholics Anonymous as a probation condition violated the Establishment Clause and requiring county to make a non-religious treatment alternative available).

APPENDIX A

LIST OF RELIGIOUS ORGANIZATIONS

Below is a list of organizations that might be able to assist you in practicing your religion in prison. Most of these organizations do not provide legal assistance, and unless otherwise stated, probably do not have an outreach program specifically for prisoners. The JLM makes no endorsement or recommendation of any of the following organizations or religions, nor guarantees they will be able to help you.

Antiochian Orthodox Christian Orthodox Christian Prison Ministry
P.O. Box 468
Fleetwood, PA 19522
(610) 777-1552

Armenian Apostolic
Armenian Church of America, Eastern Diocese
630 Second Ave.
New York, NY 10016
(212) 686-0710; FAX: (212) 252-0681

Bahá'í
National Spiritual Assembly of the Bahá'ís of the United States
536 Sheridan Road
Wilmette, IL 60091
(847) 733-3400

Buddhist
Tu An Zen Temple
4310 W. 5th St.
Santa Ana, CA 92703
(714) 265-2357
Vietnamese and Chinese speakers available.

Byzantine Catholic
Byzantine Catholic Church
Most Rev. Archbishop Basil Schott
66 Riverview Ave.
Pittsburgh, PA 15214-2253
(412) 231-4000; FAX: (412) 231-1697

Chinese Catholic
Ascension Chinese Catholic Church
4605 Jetty Lane
Houston, TX 77072
(281) 575-8855; FAX: (281) 575-6940

Croatian Catholic
Croatian Church of St. Cyril & Methodius
502 W. 41st St.
New York, NY 10036
(212) 563-3395; FAX: (212) 868-1203

Roman Catholic (including Spanish and French-Speaking)
Catholic League for Religious and Civil Rights
450 Seventh Ave.
New York, NY 10123
(212) 371-3191; FAX: (212) 371-3394
This group does not provide legal assistance. But, it will advocate informally on your behalf by contacting your prison warden if you are Roman Catholic and prevented in some way from practicing your religion.

Asociación Nacional de Sacerdotes
Hispanos en USA
(The National Association of Hispanic Priests of the USA)
2472 Bolsover, Suite 442
Houston, TX 77005
(713) 528-6517; FAX: (713) 528-6379

Coptic Christian
St. Mark's Coptic Orthodox Church
1600 S. Robertson Blvd.
Los Angeles, CA 90035
(310) 275-3050

Greek Orthodox Greek Orthodox Church
Archdiocese of America
8 E. 79th St.
New York, NY 10075
(212) 570-3500; FAX: (212) 570-3569

Hindu
Hinduism Today
Kauai's Hindu Monastery
107 Kaholalele Rd.
Kapaa, HI 96746-9304
(808) 822-3012; FAX: (808) 822-4351
Subscriptions are available to Hinduism Today.

Hindu Temple Society of Southern California
1600 Las Virgenes Canyon Rd.
Calabasas, CA 91302
(818) 880-5552; FAX: (818) 880-5583

Islamic Islamic Society of North America
P.O. Box 38
Plainfield, IN 46168
(317) 839-8157; FAX: (317) 839-1840

Jainist
Federation of Jain Associations in North America (JAINA) JAINA Headquarters
43-11 Ithaca Street
Elmhurst, NY 11373
(718) 606-2885

Jewish
Aleph Institute
Executive Director of Legal Affairs
9540 Collins Ave.
Surfside, FL 33154
(305) 864-5553; FAX (305) 864-5675
This organization serves the needs of Jews of all backgrounds who are in institutional environments, including the military, hospitals, and prisons. Volunteers conduct prison visits, particularly in conjunction with religious holidays. It provides religious education, legal advocacy on behalf of religious rights, and assistance to prisoners' families.

Native American/Indigenous
See Appendix IV of the JLM for a list of several organizations that work with Native Americans and address some Native American religious concerns.

Serbian Orthodox
Saint Steven's Serbian Orthodox Cathedral
1621 W. Garvey Ave.
Alhambra, CA 91803
(626) 284-9100; FAX: (626) 281-5045

Shi'a Muslim
Shi'a Ithna Asheri Jamaat of New York
48-67 58th St.
Woodside, NY 11377
(718) 507-7680

Miscellaneous/ Interdenominational
Prison Ashram Project
Human Kindness Foundation
P.O. Box 61619
Durham, NC 27715
(919) 383-5160 FAX: (919) 383-5140

A JAILHOUSE LAWYER'S MANUAL

Chapter 28: Rights of Prisoners with Disabilities

Columbia Human Rights Law Review

Ninth Edition 2011

Legal Disclaimer

A Jailhouse Lawyer's Manual is written and updated by members of the Columbia Human Rights Law Review. The law prohibits us from providing any legal advice to prisoners. This information is not intended as legal advice or representation nor should you consider or rely upon it as such. Neither the JLM nor any information contained herein is intended to or shall constitute a contract between the JLM and any reader, and the JLM does not guarantee the accuracy of the information contained herein. Additionally, your use of the JLM should not be construed as creating an attorney-client relationship with the JLM staff or anyone at Columbia Law School. Finally, while we have attempted to provide information that is up-to-date and useful, because the law changes frequently, we cannot guarantee that all information is current.

CHAPTER 28

RIGHTS OF PRISONERS WITH DISABILITIES*

A. Introduction

This Chapter explains the protections and legal rights available to prisoners with disabilities. As a prisoner with one or more disabilities—whether physical, mental, or both—you have legal rights based in the U.S. Constitution, federal civil rights laws, and some state laws. These laws forbid discrimination against you because of your disability.

Part A of this Chapter summarizes the laws protecting prisoners with disabilities. Part B of this Chapter explains the two major federal laws against disability discrimination: (1) Section 504 of the Rehabilitation Act of 1973 ("Section 504")[1] and (2) Title II of the Americans with Disabilities Act ("ADA," "Title II," or "ADA Title II").[2] Part B of this Chapter also explains what you need to prove in a legal claim under the ADA.[3] Your rights are mostly the same under Section 504 and Title II,[4] so you probably should seek relief under both statutes.[5] Part C of this Chapter explains how to enforce your rights under both Section 504 and Title II. It explains what a court can and cannot order, taking into account some new restrictions.

If because you have a disability you either (1) are not receiving the services you need, or (2) are being discriminated against, you may have a constitutional claim (in addition to Section 504 and Title II claims). For example, the way prison officials treat disabled prisoners—particularly in denying them medical care—can violate the Eighth Amendment's prohibition against "cruel and unusual punishment."[6] As a prisoner with disabilities, you also have important constitutional rights to medical care. This Chapter does not talk about your constitutional rights. To learn more about your constitutional rights, including your right to adequate medical care, you should read these chapters of JLM: Chapter 23: "Your Right to Adequate Medical Care"; Chapter 26: "Infectious Diseases: AIDS, Hepatitis, and Tuberculosis in Prison"; and Chapter 29: "Special Issues for Prisoners with Mental Illness." Other chapters that are especially useful for all prisoners include: Chapter 4, "How to Find a Lawyer"; Chapter 14, "The Prison Litigation Reform Act"[7]; Chapter 15,

---

* This Chapter was revised by Zahava Blumenthal with the help of Prof. Betsy Ginsburg at the New York University School of Law. It is based on previous versions by Amy E. Lowenstein and Robert Lougy. Special thanks to Lowenstein, now of Disability Advocates, Inc., and James Harrington of the Texas Civil Rights Project.

1. Rehabilitation Act of 1973, 29 U.S.C. § 794 (2006).

2. Americans with Disabilities Act, 42 U.S.C. §§ 12101–213 (2006).

3. The ADA contains many sections, called "titles." Title II of the ADA is the most important ADA section for your claims. It protects you from disability discrimination by state and local government entities, including prisons and jails. Americans with Disabilities Act, 42 U.S.C. §§ 12131–34 (2006). It provides that "no qualified individual with a disability shall, by reason of such disability, be excluded from participation in or be denied the benefits of the services, programs, or activities of a public entity, or be subjected to discrimination by any such entity." Americans with Disabilities Act, 42 U.S.C. §12132 (2006).

4. Americans with Disabilities Act, 42 U.S.C. § 12133 (2006) (stating that the "remedies, procedures, and rights set forth in § 794a of Title 29 shall be the remedies, procedures, and rights this subchapter provides to any person alleging discrimination on the basis of disability in violation of" Title II of the ADA).

5. Part B(1), below, explains the details of when you would seek relief under only one of these laws. Generally, you cannot not sue the federal government under the ADA. If you are in a privately run prison, you most likely can sue under Title II of the ADA, but you may also want to sue under Title III of the ADA.

6. See, e.g., Allah v. Goord, 405 F. Supp. 2d 265, 275–76 (S.D.N.Y. 2005) (holding that a paraplegic prisoner stated an 8th Amendment claim in alleging that, while he was in his wheelchair, his wheelchair had been strapped into a vehicle too loosely, and thus he had been injured when the vehicle stopped suddenly); see also Lawson v. Dallas County, 286 F.3d 257, 263–64 (5th Cir. 2002) (holding that a prison's failure to provide a paraplegic prisoner with rehabilitation therapy, adequate toilet facilities, and a bed with an adequate mattress was medical neglect and inhumane treatment that violated the prisoner's 8th Amendment rights); LaFaut v. Smith, 834 F.2d 389, 392–94 (4th Cir. 1987) (holding that not offering prescribed rehabilitation therapy and adequate toilet facilities violated the 8th Amendment); Miller v. King, 384 F.3d 1248, 1261–62 (11th Cir. 2004) (holding that allegations by a wheelchair-using paraplegic that he was denied wheelchair repairs, physical therapy, medical consultations, leg braces and orthopedic shoes, wheelchair-accessible showers and toilets, opportunity to bathe, urinary catheters, and assistance in using the toilet raised a material factual issue under the 8th Amendment), vacated and superseded on other grounds, 449 F.3d 1149 (11th Cir. 2006).

7. This Chapter is particularly relevant; it discusses restrictions on prisoners' lawsuits that could affect your § 504 or ADA claim.

"Inmate Grievance Procedures"; and Chapter 16, "Using 42 U.S.C. § 1983 and 28 U.S.C. § 1331 to Obtain Relief from Violations of Federal Law."

Although your protections under Section 504 and the ADA have been weakened by the courts recently, they are still important civil rights and antidiscrimination laws. Using these laws, prisoners with disabilities have won important victories in many circuits, through both individual and class action suits. This Chapter will explain how you, as a prisoner with a disability, can use these laws to protect your rights while incarcerated.

B. Section 504 of the Rehabilitation Act, and the Americans with Disabilities Act

1. Introduction

If you are a prisoner in a state or local facility and have one or more disabilities, Section 504 and Title II are two different laws that protect you in similar ways. Section 504 was enacted by Congress in 1973. It applies both to the federal government and to state and local entities that receive federal funding. In 1990, Congress passed the ADA, which expanded and strengthened Section 504's protections.[8] The language of Section 504 is very similar to the language of Title II; courts read them as prohibiting the same basic forms of discrimination.[9] You should start researching your claim by reading the two laws carefully, because most cases focus on how to interpret the laws. Since these two laws offer you similar protections, much of the discussion of the ADA in this Chapter will apply to Section 504, and vice versa.

If you are a prisoner in a federal prison, or a non-citizen detainee in a federal detention center, you can file suit only under Section 504. You cannot use the ADA because the ADA cannot be used to sue the federal government.[10] Also, if you sue a federal agency under Section 504, you can ask only for an injunction, not

---

8. In some areas of the law, the ADA provides much broader protections for the disabled than § 504 does. For instance, the ADA specifically requires places like stores, restaurants, and banks to accommodate (make adaptations for) persons with disabilities. The ADA also provides persons with disabilities protection against employment discrimination because of their disabilities. But for prisons, jails, and state and local government entities, the ADA and § 504 give basically the same protections.

9. Recently, Congress passed the ADA Amendments Act of 2008 (which went into effect on January 1, 2009) because it was upset that the courts were interpreting the definition of disability differently under the ADA than under § 504. The ADA Amendments Act states, "Congress expected that the definition of disability under the ADA would be interpreted consistently with how courts had applied the definition of a handicapped individual under the Rehabilitation Act of 1973" and that, in particular, courts have "interpreted the term 'substantially limits' to require a greater degree of limitation than was intended by Congress" (ADA Amendments Act of 2008, Pub. L. No. 110-325, § 2(a)(3), (7), 122 Stat. 3554) (2008). Hopefully, the ADA will now provide protection for more people with disabilities because it will be easier to meet the qualifications for having a disability. Also, you may be more likely to win under the ADA if you win under § 504, since the two laws will become more similar to each other. Because this statute is so new (and the JLM is being published so soon after it goes into effect), you should be sure to look for recent cases in which it comes up. It is important to figure out how courts now treat the definition of disabled, as well as how the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (which defines, in its regulations, many of the terms you will use in your ADA suit) changes its definition of "substantially limits."

10. The ADA defines "public entity" as as "(A) any State or local government; (B) any department, agency, special purpose district, or other instrumentality of a State or States or local government." 42 U.S.C. § 12131(1)(B) (2006). This definition does not include agencies of the federal government. See Cellular Phone Taskforce v. FCC, 217 F.3d 72, 73 (2d Cir. 2000) (noting that the ADA does not apply to the federal government); Disability Rights Section, U.S. Dept. of Justice, Americans with Disabilities Act: Title II Technical Assistance Manual, II-1.2000, available at http://www.ada.gov/taman2.html (last visited Oct. 31, 2009).

You can get English and Spanish Department of Justice (DOJ) printed materials on the ADA for free by contacting the DOJ by mail or phone. Publications are available in standard print, large print, audiotape, Braille, and computer disk. To order by mail, write to:

U.S. Department of Justice
Civil Rights Division
950 Pennsylvania Ave., N.W.
Disability Rights Section -- NYA
Washington, D.C. 20530.

In your letter, include the name of the publication you want. To order by phone, call the ADA Information Line at (800) 514-0301 (voice) or (800) 514-0383 (TTY). At these numbers, you can hear recorded information and order publications twenty-four hours a day. You can reach someone who can answer specific questions about the ADA, in English or Spanish, if you call on weekdays between 9:30 a.m. and 5:30 p.m. (except on Thursdays, when the hours are 12:30 p.m. to 5:30 p.m.).

money damages.[11] (An injunction is a court order requiring the prison or agency to correct the violation.)

Even if you are a prisoner in a privately operated prison, you should probably bring suit under Title II. According to DOJ regulations (proposed in 2008, to be available in the Federal Register), Title II applies to a public (nongovernmental) entity when it is used by a government entity:

> In essence, the private builder or contractor that operates the correctional facility does so at the direction of the state government, unless the private entity elects to use the facility for something other than incarceration, in which case title III may apply. For that reason, the proposed Sec. 35.152(a) makes it clear that this section's requirements will apply to prisons operated by public entities directly or through contractual or other relationships.[12]

However, if you are being held in a privately run prison, you should be sure to look for recent cases to see how the DOJ's proposed regulation has been treated by the courts. You may also want to sue under Title III[13] (which applies to public accommodations), in case Title II arguments are rejected. Title II and Title III are very similar. However, under Title III, you must show that the private prison is a "public accommodation"[14] rather than a "public entity." Private prisons and other public accommodations sued under Title III have different legal defenses than do state and local governments sued under Title II.[15] And individuals suing under Title III can seek only injunctive relief, not monetary damages.[16] Although there are minor differences between Title II and Title III, this discussion of Title II and Section 504 generally will apply to your Title III claim as well. But you should still read Title III cases.

(a) Section 504 of the 1973 Rehabilitation Act

Section 504 of the 1973 Rehabilitation Act states:

> No otherwise qualified individual with a disability … shall, solely by reason of her or his disability, be excluded from the participation in, be denied the benefits of, or be subjected to discrimination under any program or activity receiving Federal financial assistance or under any program or activity conducted by any [Federal] Executive agency.[17]

Section 504 guarantees that anyone qualified to participate in a program, service, or activity will have meaningful access to it when it is offered by a state or local recipient of federal funds.[18] Under Section 504, a "program or activity" is defined broadly to include "all of the operations" of a state or local government.[19]

---

11. Lane v. Pena, 518 U.S. 187, 200, 116 S. Ct. 2092, 2100, 135 L. Ed. 2d 486, 497–98 (1996) (holding that Congress did not waive the federal government's immunity against monetary damages for violations of the Rehabilitation Act).

12. Nondiscrimination on the Basis of Disability in State and Local Government Services, 73 Fed. Reg. 117 (proposed May 30, 2008) (to be codified at 28 C.F.R. 35) (2009).

13. 42 U.S.C. §§ 12181–89 (2006).

14. 42 U.S.C. § 12181(7) (2006) (defining "public accommodation").

15. Instead of defending itself by arguing that accommodating your disability would create a "fundamental alteration," a private prison can defend itself by arguing that correcting the problem is not "readily achievable." See Part B(4)(b)(i), below, to learn more about the fundamental alteration defense. "The term 'readily achievable' means easily accomplishable, and able to be carried out without much difficulty or expense. In determining whether an action is readily achievable, factors to be considered include: (A) the nature and cost of the action needed under this chapter; (B) the overall financial resources of the facility or facilities involved in the action; the number of persons employed at such facility; the effect on expenses and resources, or the impact otherwise of such action upon the operation of the facility; (C) the overall financial resources of the covered entity; the overall size of the business of a covered entity with respect to the number of its employees; the number, type, and location of its facilities; and (D) the type of operation or operations of the covered entity, including the composition, structure, and functions of the workforce of such entity; the geographic separateness, administrative or fiscal relationship of the facility or facilities in question to the covered entity." 42 U.S.C. § 12181(9) (2006). See also 42 U.S.C. §§ 12182(b)(2)(A)(iv)–(v) (2006).

16. 42 U.S.C. § 12188(a) (2006).

17. Rehabilitation Act of 1973, 29 U.S.C. § 794(a) (Supp. 2007).

18. Alexander v. Choate, 469 U.S. 287, 301, 105 S. Ct. 712, 720, 83 L. Ed. 2d 661, 672 (1985) (noting that § 504 requires state and local governments receiving federal aid to provide "meaningful access to the benefit" they offer).

19. Rehabilitation Act of 1973, 29 U.S.C. § 794(b)(1)(A)–(B) (2006 & Supp. 2007) (defining program or activity as

Thus, Section 504 applies not only to federal facilities, but also to any state, county, or city prison or jail that receives federal financial assistance, either directly or through a state or local government.[20] It includes almost every state prison and many jails.[21]

(b) Title II of the Americans with Disabilities Act

A major ADA goal is to end disability discrimination by public and private actors.[22] The ADA has three main sections (called "Titles"), only one of which applies to state and local entities. If you pursue an ADA claim against a state prison or county jail, you will file under Title II, which applies to all state and local governments. The antidiscrimination protections provided by Title II and Section 504 are very similar, but the ADA has stronger regulations. Title II provides:

[N]o qualified individual with a disability shall, by reason of such disability, be excluded from participation in or be denied the benefits of the services, programs, or activities of a public entity, or be subjected to discrimination by any such entity.[23]

The ADA defines many of the terms in the above paragraph, including: "qualified individual with a disability,"[24] "disability,"[25] and "public entity."[26] However, the statute does not define the key phrase "services, programs, or activities." It is important that you understand how courts have interpreted and applied both the defined and the undefined terms to claims made by prisoners with disabilities. Parts B(3)–(5) of this Chapter will discuss these terms.

(c) Necessary Elements of Your Title II and Your Section 504 Claims

You must include several basic elements in your Title II/Section 504 complaint. If you do not, the court will dismiss your lawsuit. Fortunately, most of the elements are the same for both statutes, so a well-pleaded complaint[27] under one statute will probably meet the requirements of the other, as well.

"all of the operations of a department, agency, special purpose district, or other instrumentality of a State or a local government; or the entity of such State or local government that distributes such assistance and each such department or agency (and each other State or local government entity) to which the assistance is extended, in the case of assistance to a State or local government").

20. Rehabilitation Act of 1973, 29 U.S.C. § 794(b) (2006 & Supp. 2007); Bellamy v. Roadway Exp., Inc., 668 F. Supp. 615, 618 (N.D. Ohio 1987) (noting that "the term 'federal financial assistance' has been very broadly construed to encompass assistance of any kind, direct or indirect"); Jim C. v. United States, 235 F.3d 1079, 1081 (8th Cir. 2000) (noting that acceptance of funds by one state agency does not constitute a waiver by the entire state, which would make the whole state subject to suit).

21. But see Nolley v. County of Erie, 776 F. Supp. 715, 742–43 (W.D.N.Y. 1991) (holding that a jail that received money in exchange for housing federal prisoners was not receiving federal financial assistance, but was instead receiving money in exchange for performing a service for the federal government), rev'd, 798 F. Supp. 123 (W.D.N.Y. 1992) (reversed only as to the awarding of punitive damages); see also Jarno v. Lewis, 256 F. Supp. 2d 499, 504 & n.3 (E.D. Va.) (holding that since the federal government merely hired the INS to operate a jail, and did not offer the INS any financial aid beyond payment for operating that jail, the INS was not a government actor; although this plaintiff was not suing under § 504, the court made clear in a footnote that it interpreted "federal financial assistance" in the same way as it would under § 504 because the Rehabilitation Act, including § 504, was modeled after the law under which the plaintiff was suing).

22. Americans with Disabilities Act, 42 U.S.C. § 12101(b)(1) (2006) (stating that one of the goals of the ADA is to "provide a clear and comprehensive national mandate for the elimination of discrimination against individuals with disabilities"). The ADA also prohibits discrimination against you because of your association with a person with a disability. 28 C.F.R. § 35.130(g) (2008); Niece v. Fitzner, 922 F. Supp. 1208, 1216 (E.D. Mich. 1995) (finding a possible ADA violation when prison officials refused to make accommodations for prisoner to communicate with his deaf fiancée).

23. Americans with Disabilities Act, 42 U.S.C. § 12132 (2006).

24. Americans with Disabilities Act, 42 U.S.C. § 12131(2) (2006) (defining "qualified individual with a disability" as anyone "with a disability who, with or without reasonable modifications to rules, policies, or practices, the removal of architectural, communication, or transportation barriers, or the provision of auxiliary aids and services, meets the essential eligibility requirements for the receipt of services or the participation in programs or activities provided by a public entity").

25. Americans with Disabilities Act, 42 U.S.C. §§ 12102(2)(A)–(C) (2006) (defining "disability" as "a physical or mental impairment that substantially limits one or more of [a person's] ... major life activities ... ; a record of such impairment; or being regarded as having such an impairment").

26. Americans with Disabilities Act, 42 U.S.C. §§ 12131(1)(A)–(B) (2006) (defining "public entity" as "any State or local government" or "any department, agency, special purpose district, or other instrumentality of a State or States or local government").

27. A well-pleaded complaint is a complaint that sufficiently sets forth a claim for relief. Black's Law Dictionary (8th ed. 2004) (definition of "well-pleaded complaint"). A court can throw out your complaint if it is not well-pleaded. A

To state a Title II claim, your complaint must say that:

(1) You are an individual with a disability;
(2) You are "qualified to participate in or receive the benefit of" the particular service, program, or activity at the prison or jail that discriminated against you;
(3) You were excluded from participation in or denied the benefits of the service, program, or activity at your prison or jail, or you were discriminated against in some other way; and
(4) This exclusion, denial of benefits, or discrimination was because of your disability.[28]

A claim under Section 504 has one additional requirement. Section 504 covers all federal facilities, but only those state and local facilities that receive federal funding. So your complaint must state that the facility receives federal funding.[29]

Your Section 504 complaint must say that:

(1) You are an individual with a disability;
(2) You are "otherwise qualified" for the program, activity, or service from which you were excluded;
(3) You were denied benefits or discriminated against solely because of your disability; and
(4) The program, activity, prison, or jail receives federal financial assistance.[30]

Of course, you should make sure to list the four facts listed above. But your complaint should also include other information, both to make your situation clear and to get the judge to sympathize with the problems you face in prison. You should (1) discuss your disability in detail, (2) explain the accommodations you need, and (3) describe the discrimination you have experienced. You should also mention any other facts you think are relevant and will make your argument stronger.

If your claim is about physical access within a prison or jail, your Section 504 claim should point out that the prison or jail is in violation of a statute that has been the law for more than thirty years. By pointing this out, you will be showing that the prison or jail has little basis for arguing that it did not know it had to be accessible to individuals with disabilities.

Many of the terms above will be explained later in detail. For now, know that the ADA and Section 504 are antidiscrimination laws, so your complaint should be clear as to how prison staff have discriminated against you because of your disability. The rest of Part B of this Chapter shows how courts have interpreted the ADA and Section 504 in the prison context.

2. What is Discrimination under the ADA?

The ADA regulations describe certain categories of action by public entities that are considered "discrimination" under the ADA. The categories are broad, and they clarify what the ADA prohibits. Keeping in mind the main goals of the ADA—(1) preventing discrimination, (2) integrating people with disabilities into the mainstream, and (3) providing strong and consistent enforceable standards addressing disability discrimination[31]—can help you understand why particular actions are considered discrimination. The following paragraphs discuss types of actions that constitute discrimination under the ADA.

According to the ADA, it is discrimination for public entities to deny an otherwise qualified person with a disability "the opportunity to participate in or benefit from" a program or service solely because of his well-pleaded complaint must meet the requirements of Rule 8(a) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure (F.R.C.P.). According to F.R.C.P. 8(a): "A pleading that states a claim for relief must contain: (1) a short and plain statement of the grounds for the court's jurisdiction, unless the court already has jurisdiction and the claim needs no new jurisdictional support; (2) a short and plain statement of the claim showing that the pleader is entitled to relief; and (3) a demand for the relief sought, which may include relief in the alternative or different types of relief." For a case in which the court addresses the meaning of "well-pleaded complaint," see, e.g., Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 127 S. Ct. 1955, 1965 (U.S. 2007).

---

28. See, e.g., Thompson v. Davis, 295 F.3d 890, 895 (9th Cir. 2002) (discussing the requirements for an ADA Title II claim).

29. See, e.g., Thomas v. Nakatani, 309 F.3d 1203 (9th Cir. 2002) (affirming the dismissal of a § 504 claim because it did not allege that the state agency received federal funds); Hamilton v. Illinois Cent. R.R., 894 F. Supp. 1014, 1017 (D. Miss. 1995) (dismissing a § 504 claim because the plaintiff failed to allege that the private facility received federal funds). When you file your complaint, you probably will not know whether the jail or prison receives federal funding. (This is something that you should learn during discovery.) When you are giving the court documents about something you believe, but do not know, to be true, you should begin your statement with the phrase, "Upon information and belief." For example, in your § 504 complaint, you could say, "Upon information and belief, [the jail or prison you are suing] receives federal funding."

30. Doe v. Pfrommer, 148 F. 3d 73, 82 (2d Cir. 1998) (describing the essential elements of a § 504 claim).

31. Americans with Disabilities Act, 42 U.S.C. § 12101(a)(8), (b)(1)–(2) (2006).

disability.[32] For instance, if you meet the requirements for participating in a vocational program, the prison cannot exclude you from the program just because of your disability.[33]

According to the ADA, it is discrimination for public entities, like prisons and jails, to offer individuals with disabilities any benefits or services that are worse than those offered to individuals without disabilities.[34] For instance, the ADA prohibits the prison from providing only one therapy session per week to a paraplegic prisoner, while providing two therapy sessions per week to prisoners without this disability (if the disability is the reason for providing fewer sessions). Similarly, if a prison offers GED classes for individuals with hearing disabilities, it cannot offer them a lower-quality program than it offers to individuals without hearing disabilities. (However, the ADA does not prohibit the prison from canceling both programs.)

According to the ADA, a prison can only provide "different or separate aids, benefits, or services" to individuals with disabilities if the programs must be separate to be effective.[35] In addition, the prison cannot exclude individuals with disabilities from other programs just because special programs are available for persons with disabilities.[36]

According to the ADA, a public entity discriminates if it provides "significant assistance to an agency, organization, or person that discriminates on the basis of disability in providing any aid, benefit, or service to beneficiaries of the public entity's program."[37] So if a state or local government provides "significant assistance" to a prison—including a private prison—that discriminates on the basis of disability, then the state or local government can be in violation of the ADA. If you are in a private prison, this type of claim will help you sue the state or local entity that contracts with the prison.

According to the ADA, it is discrimination for public entities to use criteria or methods of administration that defeat or substantially impair the accomplishment of the objectives of the public entity's program with respect to people with disabilities.[38] In other words, a prison cannot run its programs in a way that keeps prisoners with disabilities from being able to participate, even if disabled prisoners are not explicitly excluded. For instance, if a visually impaired prisoner could not enroll in a business class because the print on the enrollment application was too small for him to read, this would be discrimination. The prison would have to provide the prisoner with a way to enroll in the business class.

Although the ADA regulations prohibit these forms of discrimination in prisons, not all of the above categories have come up in prisoner lawsuits. So you may have to argue by analogy to discrimination cases in other areas, like employment.

3. What is a Disability under the ADA and Section 504?

Under both the ADA and Section 504, you have a disability if: (1) a physical or mental impairment substantially limits one or more of your major life activities; (2) you have a record of such an impairment; or (3) you are regarded as having such an impairment.[39] If you satisfy any of these tests, you are considered an individual with a disability under the ADA and Section 504. If you currently have a disability, such as an

---

32. 28 C.F.R. § 35.130(b)(1)(i) (2007).

33. See, e.g., Montez v. Romer, 32 F. Supp. 2d 1235, 1237 (D. Colo. 1999) (noting prisoners' claim that they could not participate in vocational training because the prison did not accommodate their disabilities).

34. 28 C.F.R. § 35.130(b)(1)(ii) (2009).

35. 28 C.F.R. § 35.130(b)(1)(iv) (2009). See also 28 C.F.R. pt. 35, app. A, at 568 (2009), which explains that the DOJ "recognizes that promoting integration of individuals with disabilities into the mainstream of society is an important objective of the ADA and agrees that, in most instances, separate programs for individuals with disabilities will not be permitted").

36. 28 C.F.R. § 35.130(b)(2) (2009).

37. 28 C.F.R. § 35.130(b)(1)(v) (2009).

38. 28 C.F.R. § 35.130(b)(3)(ii) (2009).

39. Rehabilitation Act of 1973, 29 U.S.C. § 705(20)(B) (2006 & Supp. 2007); Americans with Disabilities Act, 42 U.S.C. § 12102(2) (2006). Most of the cases establishing which disabilities qualify for ADA antidiscrimination protection have been employment discrimination suits. Those employment discrimination suits may be useful to your case even though you are suing as a prisoner and not as an employee. Many people have brought ADA prisoner discrimination suits that rely on the outcomes of ADA employment discrimination suits. This is because the right of a disabled person to be free from discrimination is a right that he can enforce in many situations, including when he is an employee, and when he is a prisoner. See, e.g., Carter v. Taylor, 540 F. Supp. 2d 522, 528 (D. Del. 2008) (citing Toyota Motor Mfg. Inc. v. Williams, 534 U.S. 184, 199, 122 S. Ct. 681, 692, 151 L. Ed. 2d 615, 632 (2002)) (applying the "case-by-case manner" standard from Williams, an ADA employment discrimination suit, to a prisoner's ADA disability claim); Smith v. Masterson, 538 F. Supp. 2d 653, 657 (S.D.N.Y. 2008) (adopting for a prisoner's suit the "major life activity" requirement from an employment suit, Colwell v. Suffolk County Police Dept., 158 F.3d 635, 641 (2d Cir. 1998)).

uncorrectable hearing impairment, you would be disabled under the first test. Under the second test, you might be considered disabled if, for example, you once had cancer that substantially limited your ability to care for yourself, but the cancer is now in remission.[40] Finally, you may have a claim under the third test if prison officials discriminate against you because they believe you have a mental impairment that substantially limits your ability to learn when, in fact, you do not have a mental impairment, or you have an impairment but it does not substantially limit your ability to learn.[41]

The definition of disability has two parts. First, the disability at issue must be a physical or mental impairment. The meaning of "physical or mental impairment" is explored in Subsection (a) below. Second, the impairment must substantially limit one or more major life activities. The meanings of "substantially limits" and "major life activity" are discussed in Subsection (b).

(a) What is a "Physical or Mental Impairment"?

The ADA implementing regulations (rules spelling out the details of the law), from the U.S. Department of Justice ("DOJ"), define a "physical or mental impairment" to include a wide range of physical and mental conditions.[42] The regulations also list specific things that qualify as physical or mental impairments. The phrase "physical or mental impairment" includes, but is not limited to, contagious and non-contagious diseases and conditions such as: orthopedic, visual, speech, and hearing impairments; cerebral palsy, epilepsy, muscular dystrophy, multiple sclerosis, cancer, heart disease, and diabetes; mental retardation, emotional illness, and specific learning disabilities; HIV (whether symptomatic or asymptomatic) and tuberculosis; and drug addiction and alcoholism.[43] This list is not exhaustive. Diseases and conditions not included above may be considered physical or mental impairments if they meet the definition of impairment, which can be found at footnote 42.

If you are HIV-positive, you should note that the definition of physical impairment includes asymptomatic HIV (testing positive, but not showing symptoms).[44] For example, if you are asymptomatic HIV-positive and the prison denies you trustee status because you have HIV, you may have Title II and Section 504 claims.[45]

Drug addiction is also considered an impairment, but not if you are currently addicted. If you have stopped using drugs, and have completed or are participating in a drug rehabilitation program, the prison cannot discriminate against you on the basis of your past drug addiction.[46] However, the laws and regulations do not prohibit discrimination based on current illegal use of drugs.[47]

---

40. See, e.g., EEOC v. R.J. Gallagher Co., 181 F.3d 645, 655–56 (5th Cir. 1999) (noting that a man with a record of cancer may have a disability under the ADA if the cancer or treatment substantially limited him in one or more major life activities). But see Shaw v. Greenwich Anesthesiology Assocs., 137 F. Supp. 2d 48, 58 (D. Conn. 2001) (rejecting the Fifth Circuit's analysis and requiring that the plaintiff suffer from a disability currently).

41. Milholland v. Sumner County Bd. of Education, 569 F.3d 562, 566–67 (6th Cir. 2009) (reading the 2008 ADA Amendments as expanding the Act's reach to include cases where "[an] individual establishes that he or she has been subjected to an action prohibited under this chapter because of an actual or perceived physical or mental impairment whether or not the impairment limits or is perceived to limit a major life activity") (emphasis added).

42. 28 C.F.R. § 35.104(1)(i) (2007) (defining "physical or mental impairment" as "any physiological disorder or condition, cosmetic disfigurement, or anatomical loss affecting one or more of the following body systems: neurological, musculoskeletal, special sense organs, respiratory (including speech organs), cardiovascular, reproductive, digestive, genitourinary, hemic and lymphatic, skin, and endocrine … [or] [a]ny mental or psychological disorder such as mental retardation, organic brain syndrome, emotional or mental illness, and specific learning disabilities").

43. 28 C.F.R. § 35.104(1)(ii) (2007).

44. 28 C.F.R. § 35.104(1)(ii) (2007); see Bragdon v. Abbott, 524 U.S. 624, 637–41, 118 S. Ct. 2196, 2204–07, 141 L. Ed. 2d 540, 556–59 (1998) (holding that (1) under the ADA, HIV infection is a physical impairment "from the moment of infection," and (2) in this case, an asymptomatic HIV-positive woman was disabled under the ADA).

45. Harris v. Thigpen, 941 F.2d 1495, 1524 (11th Cir. 1991) (holding that HIV-positive status is a disability under § 504 because the correctional system treated HIV-positive people as if they were disabled); Dean v. Knowles, 912 F. Supp. 519, 522 (S.D. Fla. 1996) (allowing an asymptomatic HIV-positive prisoner to go forward with a discrimination suit against prison officials who denied him trustee status).

46. 28 C.F.R. §§ 35.131(a)(2)(i)–(iii) (2007) ("A public entity shall not discriminate on the basis of illegal use of drugs against an individual who is not engaging in current illegal use of drugs and who (i) Has successfully completed a supervised drug rehabilitation program or has otherwise been rehabilitated successfully; (ii) Is participating in a supervised rehabilitation program; or (iii) Is erroneously regarded as engaging in such use").

47. 28 C.F.R. § 35.131(a)(1) (2007) ("this part does not prohibit discrimination against an individual based on that individual's current illegal use of drugs"). § 504 contains similar language. Rehabilitation Act of 1973, 29 U.S.C. § 705(20)(C)(i) (1999 & Supp. 2007). "Current illegal use of drugs" is defined as the illegal use of drugs "recent[] enough to justify a reasonable belief that a person's drug use is current or that continuing use is a real and ongoing problem." 28

Other conditions and diseases that courts have found could be physical or mental impairments include: asthma,[48] deafness and other hearing impairments,[49] quadriplegia,[50] paraplegia,[51] amputations or artificial limbs,[52] certain stomach and digestive problems,[53] blindness or other vision impairments,[54] degenerative disk condition,[55] and other disabilities.[56] In many of the below cases (dealing with possible impairments), either the court did not decide whether the individual was disabled, or even decided that the plaintiff was not disabled. These cases simply give examples of the types of impairments courts have said could qualify as disabilities—as long as the claims were backed up with facts, and the impairment substantially limited the individual in a major life activity. (What it means to be substantially limited in a major life activity is discussed in Subsection (b) below.)

Being gay, lesbian, bisexual, or transgender is not a "physical or mental impairment" under the ADA.[57] (For information on special issues for gay, lesbian, bisexual, transgender, and transsexual prisoners, see Chapter 30 of the JLM.) Furthermore, the ADA regulations explicitly exclude certain "conditions"—including "transvestism, transsexualism," "sexual behavior disorders," and "gender identity disorders not resulting from physical impairments"[58]—from the definition of "physical or mental impairment" or

---

C.F.R. § 35.104(4) (2007). According to the regulation, "[t]he term 'individual with a disability' does not include an individual who is currently engaging in the illegal use of drugs, when the public entity acts on the basis of such use." 28 C.F.R. § 35.104 (2007).

48. See, e.g., Wesley v. Vaughn, No. 99-1228, 1999 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 18098, at *14 (E.D. Pa. Nov. 18, 1999) (unpublished) (letting a prisoner with asthma go forward with his ADA claim that his prison's practice of locking shower doors at the end of the shower period discriminated against people with respiratory disabilities); McIntyre v. Robinson, 126 F. Supp. 2d 394, 408 (D. Md. 2000) (finding that although asthma can be considered a disability in the prison context, it is especially subject to case-by-case analysis because it is an easily controlled ailment).

49. See, e.g., Duffy v. Riveland, 98 F.3d 447, 454–55 (9th Cir. 1996) (finding that a deaf prisoner was disabled under the ADA and § 504, and allowing him to go forward with claim against prison for failure to provide a qualified interpreter in prison disciplinary and classification hearings); Calloway v. Glassboro Dept. of Police, 89 F. Supp. 2d 543, 546 (D.N.J. 2000) (finding that a deaf arrestee could go forward with her ADA and § 504 case for failure to provide a qualified interpreter during questioning at the police station); Niece v. Fitzner, 922 F. Supp. 1208, 1217 (E.D. Mich. 1996) (recommending that a prisoner be allowed to proceed with his case against the department of corrections for failure to provide a Telecommunications Device for the Deaf ("TDD"), which would allow him to communicate with his deaf girlfriend over the phone); Clarkson v. Coughlin, 898 F. Supp. 1019, 1036–38 (S.D.N.Y. 1995) (finding that a prison's failure to accommodate hearing-impaired prisoners violated the ADA and § 504).

50. See, e.g., Love v. Westville Corr. Ctr., 103 F.3d 558, 560 (7th Cir. 1996) (affirming judgment of damages for a quadriplegic who was denied access to prison programs based on his disability).

51. See, e.g., Pierce v. County of Orange, 526 F.3d 1190, 1214–22 (9th Cir. 2008) (finding that a prisoner with paraplegia could go forward with his ADA claim).

52. See, e.g., Schmidt v. Odell, 64 F. Supp. 2d 1014, 1032 (D. Kan. 1999) (finding that a double amputee could proceed with his ADA and § 504 claims that he was denied the benefit of some basic jail services because of his disability); Kaufman v. Carter, 952 F. Supp. 520, 533 (W.D. Mich. 1996) (refusing to issue summary judgment against a double amputee because of conditions alleged in his complaint); Outlaw v. City of Dothan, No. CV-92-A-1219-S, 1993 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 21063 (M.D. Ala. Apr. 27, 1993) (unpublished) (noting that the defendant did not disagree that a prisoner with an artificial leg was a "qualified individual with a disability").

53. See, e.g., Scott v. Garcia, 370 F. Supp. 2d 1056, 1074–75 (S.D. Cal. 2005) (holding that eating is a major life activity, and a plaintiff with stomach and digestive problems raised a material factual issue under the ADA when he submitted evidence that he was denied access to the prison meal service by not being given enough time to eat or the option to eat smaller, more frequent meals).

54. See, e.g., Williams v. Ill. Dept. of Corr., No. 97 C 3475, 1999 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 18190, at *15 (N.D. Ill. Nov. 16, 1999) (unpublished) (holding that the defendant's extreme myopia constituted a disability where the defendant agreed that the condition was disabling); Armstrong v. Davis, 275 F.3d 849, 857–58 (9th Cir. 2001) (finding that a parole board provided inadequate accommodations for the visually impaired during the parole process, and that this constituted a valid part of an ADA claim).

55. See, e.g., Saunders v. Horn, 960 F. Supp. 893, 901 (E.D. Pa. 1997) (finding that a prisoner with degenerative disk disorder stated a claim under § 504 and the ADA).

56. See, e.g., Raines v. State of Florida, 983 F. Supp. 1362, 1372–74 (N.D. Fla. 1997) (holding that a prison policy withholding benefits of the Incentive Gain Time program from prisoners who are physically or mentally unable to perform work may be an ADA violation); Armstrong v. Wilson, 942 F. Supp. 1252, 1254 (N.D. Cal. 1996) (finding that a certified class [for a class action lawsuit] of prisoners with mobility, hearing, vision, kidney, and learning disabilities stated a claim under the ADA), aff'd, 124 F.3d 1019 (9th Cir. 1997).

57. 28 C.F.R. §§ 35.104(1)(iii), (5)(i) (2007).

58. 28 C.F.R. § 35.104(5)(i) (2007).

"disability."[59] If you file a complaint in federal court alleging that one of these conditions or identities is a disability, the court will almost certainly dismiss your case.[60] However, one of these conditions or identities may be considered a disability under state law. So you should consult statutes and case law for the state in which you live.

(b) When is an Impairment a Disability?

To be considered disabled under the ADA and Section 504, it is not enough for you to have a physical or mental impairment. The impairment has to substantially limit you in at least one major life activity.[61] The decision whether an impairment substantially limits a major life activity is made on a case-by-case basis. In other words, the court will look at how an impairment limits you, and not at how an impairment usually limits a person.[62] If you have an impairment that limits different people in different ways, you must show that your particular limitation is substantial.[63]

The impairment does not have to be current. If you are discriminated against because you have a record of an impairment, that is considered discrimination under the ADA.[64] A record of an impairment is when you have a history of having an impairment that substantially limits a major life activity, or when you have been misclassified as having an impairment that substantially limits a major life activity.[65] In addition, even if you have no history of the impairment, you are disabled under the ADA if you are "regarded as having such an impairment."[66] You will be "regarded as having such an impairment" if you are discriminated against because of an actual or perceived disability, whether or not that disability limits or is perceived to limit you in a major life activity. [67]

Under the ADA Amendments Act of 2008, Congress has tried to make clear what it means by "substantially limits." The Act says that an impairment can count as a disability even if it (1) only substantially limits you in one major life activity; or (2) is episodic or in remission, if it would substantially limit you in at least one major life activity when it were active.[68]

When you start doing legal research to help you argue that your impairment counts as a disability, you will probably find that most of the cases discussing the term "substantially limits" have been about employment discrimination, which falls under a different ADA section: Title I.[69] Right now, the regulations for Title I define "substantially limits" as making you "[u]nable to perform a major life activity that the average person in the general population can perform," or being "[s]ignificantly restricted as to the condition, manner or duration under which … the average person in the general population can perform that same major life activity."[70] But because the ADA Amendments Act of 2008 is so new, you should be sure to look for very recent cases, as well as updates to the ADA regulations.

---

59. 28 C.F.R. § 35.104 (2007).

60. See Chapter 14 of the JLM, "The Prison Litigation Reform Act," for a discussion of the "three strikes rule" and other negative consequences of filing a suit that is dismissed.

61. Rehabilitation Act of 1973, 29 U.S.C. § 705(20)(B) (Supp. 2007); Americans with Disabilities Act, 42 U.S.C. § 12102(2) (2006); 28 C.F.R. § 35.104 (2007).

62. Albertson's, Inc. v. Kirkingburg, 527 U.S. 555, 566, 119 S. Ct. 2162, 2169, 144 L. Ed. 2d 518, 530 (1999) (noting that there is a "statutory obligation to determine the existence of disabilities on a case-by-case basis").

63. Toyota Motor Mfg. Inc. v. Williams, 534 U.S. 184, 199, 122 S. Ct. 681, 692, 151 L. Ed. 2d 615, 632 (2002) (stating that an "individualized assessment of the effect of an impairment is particularly necessary when the impairment is one whose symptoms vary widely from person to person"); Albertson's, Inc. v. Kirkingburg, 527 U.S. 555, 566, 119 S. Ct. 2162, 2169, 144 L. Ed. 2d 518, 530–31 (1999) (noting that some impairments may limit people's major life activities in different ways and to different degrees).

64. 28 C.F.R. § 35.104 (2007) ("[D]isability means ... a physical or mental impairment that substantially limits one or more of the major life activities ... [or] a record of such impairment.").

65. 28 C.F.R. § 35.104 (2007) ("[T]he phrase has a record of such an impairment means has a history of, or has been misclassified as having, a mental or physical impairment that substantially limits one or more major life activities.").

66. 28 C.F.R. § 35.104 (2007).

67. ADA Amendments Act of 2008, Pub. L. No. 110-325, § 3, 122 Stat. 3553, 3555.

68. ADA Amendments Act of 2008, Pub. L. No. 110-325, § 3, 122 Stat. 3553, 3556.

69. Americans with Disabilities Act, 42 U.S.C. §§ 12111–17 (2006) (Title I of the ADA, covering discrimination in private employment).

70. 29 C.F.R. § 1630.2(j)(i)–(ii) (2007); see also Bartlett v. New York State Bd. of Law Examiners, 226 F.3d 69, 74–75 (2d Cir. 2000) (noting that the proper test is whether the plaintiff is "substantially limited in the major life activity of reading by her slow reading speed, or by any other 'conditions, manner, or duration' that limits her reading 'in comparison to most people'").

Since the passage of the ADA Amendments Act of 2008, you still have to show that you are substantially limited in a major life activity.[71] However, you do not have to show that you are substantially limited even when (1) your impairment is in its corrected state (for example, wearing glasses), or (2) you have taken steps to reduce the impact of your impairment (for example, taking blood pressure medication).[72]

In Toyota Motor Manufacturing, Inc. v. Williams, the Supreme Court defined "major life activities" as "those activities that are of central importance to [most people's] daily li[ves]."[73] Under the ADA Amendments Act of 2008, major life activities "include, but are not limited to, caring for oneself, performing manual tasks, seeing, hearing, eating, sleeping, walking, standing, lifting, bending, speaking, breathing, learning, reading, concentrating, thinking, communicating, and working."[74] For example, if you have vision problems and cannot read regular-size print, or require Braille materials, then your condition limits the major life activity of seeing. Courts have found other important activities, such as eating[75] and reproduction,[76] to be major life activities.

Note that the ADA Amendments Act includes "working" as a major life activity. Previously, the Supreme Court had questioned whether "working" was a major life activity, at least in employment discrimination cases.[77] The pre-2008 test for whether you were substantially limited in your ability to work required that you be limited in performing a "class of jobs" that made use of your skills, not just a "single, particular job."[78]

---

71. ADA Amendments Act of 2008, Pub. L. No. 110-325, § 3, 122 Stat. 3553, 3555 (stating that "disability" involves "a physical or mental impairment that substantially limits one or more major life activities") (emphasis added).

72. ADA Amendments Act of 2008, Pub. L. No. 110-325, § 3, 122 Stat. 3553, 3556 ("The determination of whether an impairment substantially limits a major life activity shall be made without regard to the ameliorative effects of mitigating measures."). Before the passage of this Act, courts often considered mitigating measures. See Sutton v. United Air Lines, Inc., 527 U.S. 471, 482, 119 S. Ct. 2139, 2146, 144 L. Ed. 2d 450, 462 (1999) (holding that courts must take into account the negative and positive effects of mitigating or corrective measures in determining whether a person has a disability that substantially limits a major life activity under the ADA); Murphy v. United Parcel Serv., 527 U.S. 516, 520–21, 119 S. Ct. 2133, 2137, 144 L. Ed. 2d 484, 489–90 (1999) (noting that determinations of whether a person has a disability under the ADA are made with respect to mitigating and corrective measures). Those cases have been overruled by statute; you are likely to see them in your legal research, but they are no longer binding. Be sure to look for recent (post-2010 cases) for support of your position.

73. Toyota Motor Mfg., Inc. v. Williams, 534 U.S. 184, 197, 122 S. Ct. 681, 691, 151 L. Ed. 2d 615, 631 (2002) (holding that, to be considered substantially limited in performing manual tasks, an "individual must have an impairment that prevents or severely restricts the individual from doing activities that are of central importance to most people's daily lives"). Additionally, the impact of the impairment must be permanent or long-term. Toyota Motor Mfg., Inc. v. Williams, 534 U.S. 184, 198, 122 S. Ct. 681, 691, 151 L. Ed. 2d 615, 631 (2002). But Congress has used the ADA Amendments Act of 2008 to criticize the Supreme Court on this point. The new law rejects the Court's ruling "that the terms 'substantially' and 'major' … need to be interpreted strictly to create a demanding standard for qualifying as disabled," and that to be substantially limited in performing a major life activity under the ADA 'an individual must have an impairment that prevents or severely restricts the individual from doing activities that are of central importance to most people's daily lives. ADA Amendments Act of 2008, Pub. L. No. 110-325, § 2(b)(4), 122 Stat. 3553, 3554. In other words, now that Congress has stepped in to protect the rights of people with disabilities, you might not have to meet the Toyota standard to win in court. Because the Act is so new, you should study recent cases (from 2010 and later) to see what courts now expect you to show.

74. ADA Amendments Act of 2008, Pub. L. No. 110-325, § 3, 122 Stat. 3553, 3555.

75. Scott v. Garcia, 370 F. Supp. 2d 1056, 1074 (S.D. Cal. 2005) (holding that eating is a major life activity, and that a plaintiff with stomach and digestive problems must show that his dietary restrictions are serious enough to constitute a disability).

76. Bragdon v. Abbott, 524 U.S. 624, 637–42, 118 S. Ct. 2196, 2204–07, 141 L. Ed. 2d 540, 556–59 (1998) (holding that an asymptomatic HIV-positive woman had a disability because her HIV infection substantially limited her ability to reproduce, but refusing to decide whether HIV infection is always a disability under the ADA); Colwell v. Suffolk County Police Dept., 158 F.3d 635, 642 (2d Cir. 1998) (noting that to determine whether a particular activity is a "major life activity," the proper question is whether "that activity is a significant one within the contemplation of the ADA, rather than whether that activity is important to a particular plaintiff").

77. Sutton v. United Air Lines, Inc., 527 U.S. 471, 492, 119 S. Ct. 2139, 2151, 144 L. Ed. 2d 450, 468–69 (1999) (noting that "there may be some conceptual difficulty in defining 'major life activities' to include work").

78. 29 C.F.R. § 1630.2(j)(3)(i) (2007) ("With respect to the major life activity of working ... substantially limits means significantly restricted in the ability to perform either a class of jobs or a broad range of jobs in various classes as compared to the average person having comparable training, skills and abilities. The inability to perform a single, particular job does not constitute a substantial limitation in the major life activity of working.") (emphasis in original); see also Murphy v. United Parcel Serv., 527 U.S. 516, 523–25, 119 S. Ct. 2133, 2138–39, 144 L. Ed. 2d 484, 491–92 (1999) (stating that while the plaintiff's high blood pressure prevented him from obtaining the health certification he needed to perform one specific type of job, he had not shown that he was disqualified from "a class of jobs utilizing his skills," and so he had not shown that he was disabled) .

The test for working may remain the same, or it may change as a result of the ADA Amendments Act. Be sure to look for post-2008 cases to see how the courts treat "working" as a major life activity.

In the prison context, the "substantially limits" and "major life activities" requirements are not usually a focus in ADA and Section 504 cases. If you sue the prison or prison officials, alleging discrimination on the basis of your disability, the case likely will focus on whether you are (1) a "qualified individual with a disability," and (2) whether you were "excluded from participation in or … denied the benefits of the services, programs, or activities" of the prison, or discriminated against by the prison.[79] The next two Sections discuss how courts have interpreted these two parts of a disability discrimination claim in the prison context.

4. Who is a Qualified Individual under the ADA and Section 504?

Not everybody who has a disability under the ADA and Section 504 is protected from discrimination. The ADA and Section 504 prohibit discrimination based on your disability only if you are a "qualified individual with a disability" (emphasis added).[80] The ADA defines the phrase "qualified individual with a disability" as:

> an individual with a disability who, with or without reasonable modifications to rules, policies, or practices, the removal of architectural, communication, or transportation barriers, or the provision of auxiliary aids and services, meets the essential eligibility requirements for the receipt of services or the participation in programs or activities provided by a public entity.[81]

So in addition to having a disability, you also must be eligible to participate in or benefit from a particular program, service, or activity. If you decide to file suit under either the ADA or Section 504, your complaint must include: (1) generally what your disability is, and (2) that you are a "qualified individual with a disability" within the meaning of the ADA and Section 504. In its answer to your complaint, the prison might say that even if you have a disability, you are not a "qualified individual." If the prison convinces the court that you are not a qualified individual, the court will dismiss your case.

The fact that you are a prisoner does not mean you are *dis*qualified from programs or services. In Pennsylvania Department of Corrections v. Yeskey, the Supreme Court firmly established that a prisoner is not excluded from being a qualified individual with a disability just because he is in prison.[82] In Yeskey, the Department of Corrections argued that the words "eligibility" and "participation" "imply voluntariness on the part of" a person, and therefore, "qualified individuals" could never include "prisoners who are being held against their will."[83] The Supreme Court rejected this argument, finding that (1) the ADA does not require voluntariness, and (2) even if it did, some activities and services in prisons (such as use of the law library) are voluntary.[84] So prisoners are covered by the ADA and Section 504 if they can meet the definition of disability discussed in Section B(3), above, and can show that they are "qualified individuals."

The definition of "qualified individual" has several parts, each of which the prison might use to try to defeat your case. Below, Subsection (a) explains what it means generally to be a "qualified individual with a disability." Subsection (b) describes the meaning of "reasonable modifications" and the factors courts consider when deciding what is reasonable. Subsection (c) discusses auxiliary aids and services. Subsection (d) addresses the removal of barriers.

(a) Who is a "Qualified Individual with a Disability?"

To be a "qualified individual with a disability," you must meet "the essential eligibility requirements for … participation in programs or activities."[85] For example, if prisoners convicted of a certain offense are

---

79. Americans with Disabilities Act, 42 U.S.C. § 12132 (2006); see also Rehabilitation Act of 1973, 29 U.S.C. § 794(a) (Supp. 2007).

80. Americans with Disabilities Act, 42 U.S.C. § 12132 (2006); Rehabilitation Act of 1973, 29 U.S.C. § 794(a) (Supp. 2007).

81. Americans with Disabilities Act, 42 U.S.C. § 12131(2) (2006) (defining "qualified individual with a disability") (emphasis added).

82. Pa. Dept. of Corr. v. Yeskey, 524 U.S. 206, 210–11, 118 S. Ct. 1952, 1955, 141 L. Ed. 2d 215, 219–20 (1998) (holding that state prisoners are protected by the ADA).

83. Pa. Dept. of Corr. v. Yeskey, 524 U.S. 206, 211, 118 S. Ct. 1952, 1955, 141 L. Ed. 2d 215, 220 (1998).

84. Pa. Dept. of Corr. v. Yeskey, 524 U.S. 206, 211, 118 S. Ct. 1952, 1955, 141 L. Ed. 2d 215, 220 (1998).

85. Americans with Disabilities Act, 42 U.S.C. § 12131(2) (2006).

not allowed to participate in work release, then a person with a disability who is convicted of that offense is not "qualified" for that program.

There are some situations in which you will not be considered a "qualified individual" even if you meet program or activity requirements. You are not a "qualified individual" if the prison can show that, because of your disability, your participation makes you a "direct threat to the health or safety of others."[86] The appendix to the DOJ's Title II regulations defines "direct threat" as "a significant risk to the health or safety of others that cannot be eliminated by a modification of policies, practices, or procedures, or by the provision of auxiliary aids or services."[87]

If prison officials are trying to decide whether someone with a disability poses a direct threat, they must determine "the nature, duration, and severity of the risk; the probability that the potential injury will actually occur; and whether reasonable modifications of policies, practices, or procedures will" reduce or eliminate the risk.[88] (The meaning of "reasonable modifications" is discussed in Subsection (b), below.) In making this determination, prison officials must use "reasonable judgment that relies on current medical evidence or on the best available objective evidence."[89] The prison may not rely on "generalizations or stereotypes about the effects of a disability"—instead, it must assess the particular individual with the disability.[90]

Courts use the direct threat analysis in Title II and Section 504 cases even though the direct threat language is not clearly stated in the laws.[91] The direct threat argument is a defense the prison may raise. Because the argument is a defense, the prison will have the burden of showing that you are a direct threat.[92] If the court accepts the prison's defense that you are a direct threat, you will not be considered a "qualified individual."

The direct threat defense to discrimination often comes up for people with infectious diseases, especially HIV. Several courts have decided that HIV-positive prisoners, although they are "individuals with a disability," are not "qualified" for various prison programs or activities.[93]

For example, in Onishea v. Hopper, the Eleventh Circuit rejected constitutional and Section 504 claims of prisoners who were not allowed to participate in prison recreational, religious, and educational programs because they were HIV-positive.[94] These prisoners could participate only in a limited number of programs, which were separate from the programs available to the general population.[95] The lower court had ruled that the HIV-positive prisoners were not "otherwise qualified" to participate in programs with the general population because of the possibility of high-risk behaviors like violence, intravenous drug use, and sex.[96] The Eleventh Circuit agreed, finding that the risk of HIV transmission is "significant" because of the severe consequences of HIV infection, even if the probability of transmission is low.[97]

---

86. 28 C.F.R. pt. 35, app. A, at 553 (2007) (analyzing the ADA Title II regulations).

87. 28 C.F.R. pt. 35, app. A, at 553 (2007).

88. 28 C.F.R. pt. 35, app. A, at 553 (2007).

89. 28 C.F.R. pt. 35, app. A, at 553 (2007).

90. 28 C.F.R. pt. 35, app. A, at 553 (2007).

91. See, e.g., Doe v. County of Centre, 242 F.3d 437, 447 (3d Cir. 2001) (explaining the "direct threat" analysis in an ADA Title II and § 504 case); Dadian v. Vill. of Wilmette, 269 F.3d 831, 840 n.6 (7th Cir. 2001) (stating that whether an individual is "otherwise qualified" depends on whether he poses a threat to the safety of others that cannot be reduced by reasonable accommodation); Bay Area Addiction Research & Treatment, Inc. v. City of Antioch, 179 F.3d 725, 735 (9th Cir. 1999) (holding that a person who poses a direct threat or "significant risk" to others is not a qualified individual under Title II).

92. Dadian v. Vill. of Wilmette, 269 F.3d 831, 840 (7th Cir. 2001) (holding that the burden of showing a direct threat due to a disability is on the party that claims there is a direct threat).

93. See Chapter 26 of the JLM, "Infectious Diseases: AIDS, Hepatitis, and Tuberculosis in Prison," for additional information on the rights of HIV-positive prisoners.

94. Onishea v. Hopper, 171 F.3d 1289, 1296–97 (11th Cir. 1999) (reading § 504's definition of "individual with a disability" as not including a person "who has a currently contagious disease or infection and who, by reason of such disease or infection, would constitute a direct threat to the health or safety of other individuals"). The Onishea court relied on 29 U.S.C. § 705(20)(D) (2006), a section of the Rehabilitation Act that excludes from employment protection people who are a direct threat to others because they have a currently contagious disease or infection.

95. Onishea v. Hopper, 171 F.3d 1289, 1292–93 (11th Cir. 1999).

96. Onishea v. Hopper, 171 F.3d 1289, 1293, 1295 (11th Cir. 1999).

97. Onishea v. Hopper, 171 F.3d 1289, 1299 (11th Cir. 1999) (holding that "when transmitting a disease inevitably entails death, the evidence supports a finding of 'significant risk' if it shows both (1) that a certain event can occur and (2) that according to reliable medical opinion the event can transmit the disease …. [E]vidence of actual transmission of the fatal disease in the relevant context is not necessary to a finding of significant risk").

The Onishea opinion allows a prison to disqualify HIV-positive prisoners from participating in many programs, and significantly reduces Section 504 and Title II protections for these prisoners.[98] The Onishea court claimed to require judges to make program-by-program decisions about whether HIV-positive prisoners were qualified to participate.[99] But the ruling has had the effect of preventing HIV-positive prisoners from participating in most programs with the general population.

Other courts have looked at specific programs to decide whether HIV-positive prisoners are qualified. In Bullock v. Gomez, the court allowed an HIV-positive prisoner, excluded from the conjugal visit program along with his HIV-positive wife, to bring an ADA claim because there were disputed facts as to whether he was otherwise qualified for the program.[100] In Doe v. Coughlin, the court looked at specific program requirements before deciding that an HIV-positive prisoner was not qualified for the family reunion program because the program required applicants to be free of communicable diseases.[101]

Looking at disability discrimination cases brought by HIV-positive prisoners in your circuit will give you an idea of how a court is likely to look at your discrimination claim. Also, for more information on segregation (separation) of HIV-positive prisoners from the general population, and other issues of special interest to HIV-positive prisoners, see Chapter 26 of the JLM, "Infectious Diseases: AIDS, Hepatitis, and Tuberculosis in Prison."

5. Your Right to "Reasonable Modifications" of Prison Policy under the ADA

The ADA requires state and local entities to make "reasonable modifications" to policies, rules, and practices so that people with disabilities can participate in public programs and services.[102] A reasonable modification should allow you, as a person with a disability, to take part in a program or activity, or gain access to a facility. Reasonable modifications may be simple—for example, creating an exception to the rule forbidding prisoners from storing food in their cells, so that a diabetic person can keep his "blood sugar at an appropriate level."[103] Other modifications are more complicated.

Whether a modification is considered "reasonable" will depend on the specific circumstances and the modification you are asking for. To decide what is a "reasonable modification," courts weigh the needs of prisoners with disabilities against the structural, financial, and administrative concerns of the prison. In particular, courts look at: (1) whether the modification will "fundamentally alter" a program or activity,[104] (2) the cost of the modification, and (3) the burden the modification would have on administration of the prison.[105] Some courts also look at (4) penological concerns, such as safety.[106]

The defendant prison has the burden of showing that a modification would "result in a fundamental alteration in the nature of a service, program, or activity or in undue [extreme] financial and administrative burdens."[107] But you have to be prepared for the prison to make these kinds of arguments. Even if the prison

---

98. Onishea v. Hopper, 171 F.3d 1289, 1305 (11th Cir. 1999) (Barkett, J., dissenting). A dissenting opinion is an opinion, written by a judge on the court, that disagrees with the court's decision. A dissenting opinion is not controlling law, but it may suggest arguments other courts will make in future rulings.

99. Onishea v. Hopper, 171 F.3d 1289, 1293 (11th Cir. 1999).

100. Bullock v. Gomez, 929 F. Supp. 1299, 1305 (C.D. Cal. 1996) (finding that the prison's reasons for excluding the prisoner from the conjugal visit program—transmission of tuberculosis and other strains of HIV—might not be justified, given that evidence showed low risk of transmission). The court allowed the prisoner's case to go forward, but the final outcome is unknown.

101. Doe v. Coughlin, 71 N.Y.2d 48, 61, 518 N.E.2d 536, 544, 523 N.Y.S.2d 782, 790 (1987).

102. Americans with Disabilities Act, 42 U.S.C. § 12131(2) (2006).

103. This example was taken from the Disability Rights Section, U.S. Dept. of Justice, Commonly Asked Questions about the Americans with Disabilities Act and Law Enforcement (2003), available at http://www.ada.gov/q%26a_law.htm (last visited March 10, 2010). Contact information for the DOJ can be found at footnote 10.

104. 28 C.F.R. §§ 35.130(b)(7), 35.150(a)(3), 35.164 (2007).

105. 28 C.F.R. §§ 35.150(a)(3), 35.164 (2007).

106. See, e.g., Randolph v. Rodgers, 170 F.3d 850, 859 (8th Cir. 1999) (noting that the prison could present evidence that providing an interpreter for a deaf prisoner at disciplinary hearings created safety and security concerns); Love v. Westville Corr. Ctr, 103 F.3d 558, 561 (7th Cir. 1996) (noting that the prison could justify its refusal to make reasonable accommodations because of the overall demands of running a prison).

107. See 28 C.F.R. § 35.130(b)(7) (2007) (defining the general application of fundamental alteration defense); 28 C.F.R. § 35.150(a)(3) (2007) (defining the fundamental alteration and undue burden defenses for existing facilities); 28 C.F.R. § 35.164 (2007) (defining the fundamental alteration and undue burden defense to providing effective communication). Furthermore, the "decision that compliance would result in such alteration or burdens must be made by the head of a public entity or his or her designee after considering all resources available for use in the funding and operation of the service, program, or activity and must be accompanied by a written statement of the reasons for succeeds in showing that changes would fundamentally alter a program, or cause an undue financial or administrative burden, it must still "take any other action" that would "ensure that individuals with disabilities receive the benefits or services provided" by the prison.[108] This means they are supposed to come up with other ways for you to get the benefits offered. The following Subsections describe the fundamental alteration defense, the undue burden defense, and the penological interests defense to prisoners' ADA and Section 504 claims.

(a) Modifications are Not Reasonable if They Result in a Fundamental Alteration to the Prison's Programs, Services, or Activities

A prison does not have to make modifications to a service, program, or activity if doing so would "fundamentally alter the nature of the service, program, or activity."[109] A fundamental alteration has to be so big that something essential is lost. This allows prisons to balance the rights of disabled prisoners against the integrity of its services, programs, and activities.[110] If you are seeking a change that would make it difficult for the prison to provide the particular service, program, or activity to other prisoners, this could be considered a fundamental alteration that the prison does not have to provide.[111]

(b) Modifications are Not Reasonable if They Cause Undue Financial or Administrative Burden

Prisons also do not have to make modifications that would result in "undue financial and administrative burdens."[112] For example, in Onishea v. Hopper, discussed above, the court found that hiring additional guards to prevent high-risk behavior (so that HIV-positive prisoners could participate in programs with the general population) would not be a "reasonable accommodation," because it would be too expensive, causing undue financial burden.[113] In Spurlock v. Simmons, the court said it would be an undue burden on prison officials if a deaf prisoner were allowed unlimited access to a TDD (a telephone for people with hearing disabilities), since prison staff had to unlock the office containing the TDD every time the prisoner needed to make a call.[114]

The DOJ seems to have thought that the undue burden test would be hard for the prison to pass—-that it would apply only in "the most unusual cases."[115] Recent courts (as in Onishea and Spurlock) may be allowing defendant prisons to pass the test in situations the DOJ would not consider unusual.

---

reaching that conclusion." 28 C.F.R. §§ 35.150(a)(3), 35.164 (2007).

108. 28 C.F.R. §§ 35.150(a)(3), 35.164 (2007).

109. 28 C.F.R. §§ 35.130(b)(7), 35.150(a)(3), 35.164 (2007).

110. See Galusha v. N.Y. State Dept. of Envtl. Conservation, 27 F. Supp. 2d 117, 123 (N.D.N.Y. 1998) (noting that the Supreme Court struck this balance in Alexander v. Choate, 469 U.S. 287, 300, 105 S. Ct. 712, 720, 83 L. Ed. 2d 661, 671 (1985)).

111. See Olmstead v. L.C. ex rel. Zimring, 527 U.S. 581, 604, 119 S. Ct. 2176, 2189, 144 L. Ed. 2d 540, 560 (1999) ("[s]ensibly construed, the fundamental-alteration component of the reasonable-modifications regulation would allow the State to show that, in the allocation of available resources, immediate relief for the plaintiffs would be inequitable, given the responsibility the State has undertaken for the care and treatment of a large and diverse population of persons with mental disabilities"). See also Raines v. Florida, 983 F.Supp 3d 1362, 1372 (N.D. Fla. 1997) (rejecting the prison's defense that allowing disabled prisoners into the work portion of the Incentive Gain Time program would fundamentally alter the program's incentives).

112. 28 C.F.R. §§ 35.150(a)(3), 35.164 (2007).

113. Onishea v. Hopper, 171 F.3d 1289, 1303–04 (11th Cir. 1999).

114. Spurlock v. Simmons, 88 F. Supp. 2d 1189, 1196 (D. Kan. 2000) (holding that a deaf prisoner had "meaningful access" to TDD when he was allowed to use it at least twice a week, and more frequently if he had a legitimate reason).

115. 28 C.F.R. pt. 35, app. A, at 564 (2007) (discussing 28 C.F.R. § 35.150 and noting that "Congress intended the 'undue burden' standard in Title II to be significantly higher than the 'readily achievable' standard in Title III" and that "the program access requirement of Title II should enable individuals with disabilities to participate in and benefit from the services, programs, or activities of public entities in all but the most unusual cases"); see also Disability Rights Section, U.S. Dept. of Justice, Commonly Asked Questions about the Americans with Disabilities Act and Law Enforcement, Question 22 (2003), available at http://www.ada.gov/q%26a_law.htm (last visited Nov. 7, 2009) (noting that new jails and prisons "must be made fully accessible to, and usable by, individuals with disabilities"; that there is "no undue burden limitation for new construction;"; and that "if an agency alters an existing facility for any reason—including reasons unrelated to accessibility—the altered areas must be made accessible to individuals with disabilities"). Contact information for the DOJ can be found at footnote 10.

(c) Modifications are Not Reasonable if they impact Overall Institutional Concerns (Penological Interests)

The ADA regulations only mention fundamental alterations and undue burdens as arguments prisons can use to avoid making modifications for prisoners with disabilities. However, courts have permitted prisons to make a third argument to avoid making those modifications: "overall institutional requirements," such as "[s]ecurity concerns, safety concerns and administrative" needs.[116] In considering these institutional requirements, some courts strongly presume that prison policies are acceptable.[117] (This is called "deference to prison management.") In jurisdictions that use this approach, you will have to overcome this strong presumption that the prison's concerns are legitimate.[118]

(d) If You have Diabetes: The Turner Test in ADA and Section 504 Claims

Circuit courts have used the Turner v. Safley[119] test in ADA and Section 504 cases to decide when a prison policy can legally discriminate against prisoners with disabilities. Under this test, prison policies are acceptable if they are "reasonably related to legitimate penological interests," meaning that the policies make sense and are related to a valid prison concern or goal.[120] Some courts have used this test to decide what is a "reasonable" modification under the ADA for prisoners with disabilities.[121]

The Turner test is usually used to decide prisoners' constitutional claims, not statutory claims like the ADA and Section 504. Some experts believe the Turner test is inappropriate in ADA cases.[122] It is better for prisoners when courts do not use Turner, because the ADA and Section 504 require defendants to make any reasonable accommodations for prisoners' disabilities. Also, "reasonable" accommodations or modifications

---

116. Love v. Westville Corr. Ctr., 103 F.3d 558, 561 (7th Cir. 1996) (noting that the prison could have attempted to justify its refusal to make reasonable accommodations because of the overall needs of running a prison); Miller v. King, 384 F.3d 1248, 1266 (11th Cir. 2004) ("courts must be mindful of the necessary balance between the ADA's worthy goal of integration and a prison's unique need for security, safety, and other penological concerns"), vacated and superseded on other grounds, 449 F.3d 1149 (11th Cir. 2006).

117. Gates v. Rowland, 39 F.3d 1439, 1448 (9th Cir. 1994) (noting that separation of powers, especially with regard to state penal systems, favors judicial deference to prison authorities).

118. Armstrong v. Davis, 275 F.3d 849, 874 (9th Cir. 2001) (noting that the prisoner has the burden of refuting the defense that there were legitimate penological interests behind prison action); see also Gates v. Rowland, 39 F.3d 1439, 1447 (9th Cir. 1994).

119. Turner v. Safley, 482 U.S. 78, 89–91, 107 S. Ct. 2254, 2261–62, 96 L. Ed. 2d 64, 79–80 (1987) (establishing a reasonableness test for courts to apply to prisoners' constitutional challenges to prison regulations).

120. Turner v. Safley, 482 U.S. 78, 89–91, 107 S. Ct. 2254, 2261–62, 96 L. Ed. 2d 64, 79–80 (1987). In Turner, the Supreme Court identified four factors used to determine the "reasonableness" of a challenged prison regulation: (1) whether there is a " 'valid rational connection' between the prison regulation and the legitimate governmental interest put forward to justify it"; (2) whether there are other ways a prisoner could exercise the right at issue; (3) "the impact [that] accommodation … will have on guards and other inmates, and on the allocation of prison resources generally"; and (4) whether there are "ready alternatives" to the regulation. The Turner test generally is used when prisoners claim that their constitutional rights have been violated. For further discussion of the Turner test, see Chapter 16 of the JLM, "Using 42 U.S.C. § 1983 and § 1331 to Obtain Relief from Violations of Federal Law."

121. See, e.g., Thompson v. Davis, 295 F.3d 890, 894 n.4 (9th Cir. 2002) (noting that a prison might be able to give legitimate penological justifications for considering certain disabilities in parole decisions, particularly when the disability is a history of substance abuse); Randolph v. Rodgers, 170 F.3d 850, 859 (8th Cir. 1999) (noting that a prison should be allowed to present evidence that providing an interpreter for a deaf prisoner at disciplinary hearings created security concerns); Onishea v. Hopper, 171 F.3d 1289, 1300 (11th Cir. 1999) (allowing the use of a test almost identical to the Turner test, despite explicitly stating that the Turner test "does not, by its terms, apply to" the ADA); Crawford v. Ind. Dept. of Corr., 115 F.3d 481, 487 (7th Cir. 1997) (noting that what is "reasonable" or an "undue" burden is different in the prison context and that security concerns are relevant to whether accommodations for disabled prisoners are "feasible"); Gates v. Rowland, 39 F.3d 1439, 1447–48 (9th Cir. 1994) (applying the Turner test to uphold a policy of excluding HIV-positive prisoners from food service assignments); Kaufman v. Carter, 952 F. Supp. 520, 532 (W.D. Mich. 1996) (finding it sensible that prisoners' ADA rights are limited by "legitimate penological interests").

122. See Christopher J. Burke, Note, Winning the Battle, Losing the War?: Judicial Scrutiny of Prisoners' Statutory Claims Under the Americans with Disabilities Act, 98 Mich. L. Rev. 482, 495–98 (1999) (arguing that (1) Turner's rationale regarding the restrictions on constitutional rights are not applicable to statutory rights, because statutes represent congressional determinations of policy and resource allocation; (2) statutory rights allow Congress to provide guidance to prison administrators and allow flexibility and modification if the statute is unworkable; and (3) legislation like the ADA provides much detail to courts and prison administrators, whereas constitutional rights necessarily are dependent on judicial determinations).

under the ADA often include expensive physical renovations or other expenditures.[123] In comparison, the Turner v. Safley reasonableness standard prescribes only "de minimis [minor] cost" solutions. (So a prison would have to make more accommodations for you under the ADA and Section 504, and fewer and cheaper accommodations under Turner.) However, some courts have held that the ADA/Section 504 standard must be interpreted consistently with the Turner standard,[124] or at least may be influenced by the Turner standard.[125]

Gates v. Rowland[126] is an early case in which a court applied the Turner test to a prisoner's Section 504 claim. In Gates, HIV-positive prisoners sued under Section 504 to be allowed to work as food preparers and servers in a prison food service program. The prison argued that it was justified in excluding the prisoners based solely on their HIV status because other prisoners "frequently have irrational suspicions or phobias" about people with HIV, and these suspicions or phobias cannot be reversed by educating prisoners about HIV.[127] Prison officials claimed that allowing HIV-positive prisoners to serve food could lead to violence against HIV-positive food workers and the prison staff.[128]

The Gates court concluded that the Turner test was the correct test for deciding prisoners' rights under Section 504, even though the Turner test normally is used only for prisoners' constitutional claims.[129] Under the Turner test, the court upheld the policy discriminating against HIV-positive prisoners, stating that the prison had a "reasonable basis for [the] restriction based on legitimate penological concerns."[130]

Courts that follow the Gates approach often—but not always—uphold challenged discriminatory conduct.[131] In your complaint, be sure to provide the court with appropriate language from the ADA, Section 504, and the regulations for these laws. The ADA and Section 504 (as written by Congress) and the ADA regulations (as implemented by the DOJ) generally protect your rights as a prisoner with disabilities more than many courts recognize. You should emphasize the extent to which the laws and regulations plainly protect your rights.[132]

(e) If Your Claim Involves Architectural Barriers at the Prison

If your complaint is about physical access within your prison, keep in mind that the ADA implementing regulations do not allow the undue burden defense for facilities built or significantly altered after January 26, 1992.[133] Such facilities are considered "new construction." For example, if you are housed in a cellblock built or significantly altered since 1992, and you cannot use your wheelchair to get into the bathroom because the doorway is too narrow, the prison cannot say, "It would cost too much to enlarge the doorway." If you are in, or need to access, a unit, cellblock, or compound created or significantly altered after 1992—even 123. But see Olmstead v. L.C. by Zimring, 527 U.S. 581, 607, 119 S. Ct. 2176, 2190, 144 L. Ed. 2d 540, 562 (1999) (holding that a state's ADA obligations are determined "taking into account the resources available to the State").

---

124. Gates v. Rowland, 39 F.3d 1439, 1446–47 (9th Cir. 1994) (holding the Turner standard applicable under the ADA). Contra (decided exactly the opposite in) Amos v. Md. Dept. of Public Safety & Corr. Servs., 178 F.3d 212, 220 (4th Cir. 1999) (rejecting application of Turner as inconsistent with Yeskey), dismissed as settled, 205 F.3d 687 (4th Cir. 2000).

125. Onishea v. Hopper, 171 F.3d 1289, 1300–01 (11th Cir. 1999) (en banc) (holding that the Turner standard can be "properly considered" when applying the ADA).

126. Gates v. Rowland, 39 F.3d 1439 (9th Cir. 1994).

127. Gates v. Rowland, 39 F.3d 1439, 1448 (9th Cir. 1994).

128. Gates v. Rowland, 39 F.3d 1439, 1447–48 (9th Cir. 1994).

129. Gates v. Rowland, 39 F.3d 1439, 1447 (9th Cir. 1994).

130. Gates v. Rowland, 39 F.3d 1439, 1448 (9th Cir. 1994).

131. See, e.g., Chisolm v. McManimon, 275 F.3d 315, 327 (3d Cir. 2001) (refusing to decide whether the Turner test is appropriate in ADA and § 504 claims, but noting that the prison's mention of "security" concerns, without evidence that these security concerns were real, would not be enough under the Turner test even if the test were used); Armstrong v. Davis, 275 F.3d 849, 874 (9th Cir. 2001) (finding that the state failed to meet its burden under the Turner test by not presenting "any justification, rational or not," for its parole hearing policies that discriminated against prisoners and parolees with hearing and vision impairments, and learning and developmental disabilities).

132. See Chevron U.S.A., Inc. v. Natural Res. Def. Council, 467 U.S. 837, 843–44, 104 S. Ct. 2778, 2782, 81 L. Ed. 2d 694, 703 (1984) (holding that when Congress gives authority to an agency to interpret a law through regulations, the regulations have "controlling weight unless they are arbitrary, capricious," or are clearly contrary to the law as written by Congress).

133. 28 C.F.R. § 35.151(a)–(b) (2007) ("Each facility or part of a facility altered by, on behalf of, or for the use of a public entity in a manner that affects or could affect the usability of the facility or part of the facility shall, to the maximum extent feasible, be altered in such manner that the altered portion of the facility is readily accessible to and usable by individuals with disabilities, if the alteration was commenced after January 26, 1992").

if the rest of the prison was built before 1992—and your complaint is about your ability to physically access those parts of the facility, your complaint should (1) cite to the regulations and (2) state that significant changes have been made since 1992.

If you have a disability that restricts your movement or requires that you use a cane, wheelchair, or other device, many courts have said prisons must make reasonable accommodations for your disability. Some courts have found that the ADA does not create any right for a prisoner to be housed at a specific prison.[134] But at least one court has found that if there is a specific unit for treatment of prisoners with particular disabilities, it is a violation of the ADA and Section 504 to transfer of eligible prisoners out of, or to refuse to transfer eligible prisoners into, that unit—even for disciplinary, safety, medical, or mental health reasons—unless the prison can provide the treatment at other facilities.[135]

Even if no special unit exists for prisoners with disabilities, prisons and jails must make reasonable accommodations for prisoners with mobility impairments. Courts have found that using bathroom facilities is a basic prison activity, and that prisons violate the ADA and Section 504 if they do not provide prisoners with disabilities with things like shower chairs, handrails, guard rails, and shower hoses.[136] An architectural barrier that restricts access or creates risks of injury to prisoners with disabilities also violates the ADA.[137] In your complaint, make sure to describe any barriers carefully and in detail; do more than just state that they exist.[138]

(f) Provision of Auxiliary Aids and Services

The ADA and Section 504 also require your prison or jail to provide you with auxiliary (extra) aids or services to help you, as a prisoner with a disability, participate in the programs and activities of the prison or jail. As with modifications, the prison or jail only has to provide these aids or services if they are reasonable. Examples of aids and services for hearing-impaired people include:

> (A) qualified interpreters or other effective methods of making aurally delivered materials available to individuals with hearing impairments; (B) qualified readers, taped texts, or other effective methods of making visually

---

134. Garrett v. Angelone, 940 F. Supp. 933, 942 (W.D. Va. 1996), aff'd, 107 F.3d 865 (4th Cir. 1997) (finding that "inmates have no constitutional right to be housed in any particular prison or housing unit").

135. Clarkson v. Coughlin, 898 F. Supp. 1019, 1050–51 (S.D.N.Y. 1995).

136. See, e.g., United States v. Georgia, 546 U.S. 151, 157, 126 S. Ct. 877, 881 ("[I]t is quite plausible that the alleged deliberate refusal of prison officials to accommodate Goodman's disability-related needs in such fundamentals as mobility, hygiene, medical care, and virtually all other prison programs constituted 'exclu[sion] from participation in or ... den[ial of] the benefits of' the prison's services, programs, or activities.'"); Pierce v. County of Orange, 526 F.3d 1190, 1196 (9th Cir. 2008) (holding that "because of physical barriers that deny disabled inmates access to certain prison facilities (bathrooms, showers, exercise and other common areas), and because of disparate programs and services offered to disabled versus non-disabled inmates, the County is in violation of the ADA"); Kiman v. N.H. Dept. of Corrs., 451 F.3d 274, 286–87 (1st Cir. 2006) (holding that denial of access to a shower chair (as well as other necessary accommodations) to a prisoner with disabilities raised an issue of material fact regarding defendant's failure to provide the prisoner with reasonable accommodations as required by the ADA); Grant v. Schuman, No. 96-3760, 1998 U.S. App. LEXIS 16852, at *7–8 (7th Cir. July 16, 1998) (unpublished) (allowing a prisoner with paralysis and nerve pain to proceed with an ADA claim regarding lack of handrails in toilet and shower areas); Cotton v. Sheahan, No. 02 C 0824, 2002 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 20539, at *9 (N.D. Ill. Oct. 23, 2002) (unpublished) (allowing prisoner who used wheelchair to bring the claim that he was denied access to a shower); Schmidt v. Odell, 64 F. Supp. 2d 1014, 1032–33 (D. Kan. 1999) (noting a possible ADA violation even though the prisoner was able to use most of the services, because doing so required exceptional and painful exertion against his doctor's orders); Cooper v. Weltner, No. 97-3105-JTM, 1999 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 17292, at *19–20 (D. Kan. Oct. 27, 1999) (unpublished) (allowing a prisoner who used a wheelchair to bring an ADA claim that the prison discriminated against him by failing to provide assistive devices for the shower); Kaufman v. Carter, 952 F. Supp. 520, 532–33 (W.D. Mich. 1996) (allowing a bilateral amputee prisoner to go forward with his claim that the jail violated the ADA by failing to provide an accessible shower and toilet); Outlaw v. City of Dothan, No. CV-92-A-1219-S, 1993 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 21063, at *11–12 (M.D. Ala. Apr. 27, 1993) (unpublished) (holding that the ADA required the city jail to make its showers accessible to and usable by disabled prisoners).

137. See, e.g., Montez v. Romer, 32 F. Supp. 2d 1235, 1243 (D. Colo. 1999) (allowing prisoners to go forward with an ADA and § 504 suit claiming that physical barriers in the prison created safety risks).

138. See, e.g., Barr v. Abrams, 810 F.2d 358, 363 (2d Cir. 1987) ("complaints relying on the civil rights statutes are insufficient unless they contain some specific allegations of fact indicating a deprivation of rights, instead of litany of general conclusions that shock but have no meaning"); Carrasquillo v. City of New York, 324 F. Supp. 2d 428, 443 (S.D.N.Y. 2004) (dismissing the suit because the prisoner's claim did not allege that he was prevented from accessing the law library and infirmary).

> delivered materials available to individuals with visual impairments; (C) acquisition or modification of equipment or devices; and (D) other similar services and actions.[139]

Examples of aids and services for people with visual impairments include: "[q]ualified readers, taped texts, audio recordings, Brailled materials, [and] large print materials."[140] Other aids and services might include providing a prisoner who is an amputee with a wheelchair, shower seat, and similar assistive devices.[141]

If you meet all of the eligibility requirements for a program, but cannot participate without an aid, services such as those mentioned above, or other devices or services, then the ADA requires the prison to provide those aids and services that will allow you to participate. However, as with modifications, a prison may justify not providing aids and services by saying the request is not reasonable, and then using the undue burden defense, or even the Turner test, to justify its action or lack of action.

Prisoners with hearing impairments have been particularly successful with ADA and Section 504 claims (arguing that prisons discriminated by failing to provide auxiliary aids and services to help them communicate). Courts have found that prisons violated the ADA and Section 504 by failing to provide qualified interpreters during reception and classification, counseling sessions, administrative and disciplinary hearings, and medical treatment and diagnosis.[142] Some courts also have found that a lack of interpreters in such settings violates prisoners' constitutional due process, Eighth Amendment, and privacy rights.[143] The term qualified interpreter is defined as "an interpreter who is able to interpret effectively, accurately, and impartially both receptively and expressively, using any necessary specialized vocabulary."[144] So a prison guard who knows only basic sign language is not a qualified interpreter, because he is neither impartial nor able to interpret effectively. Also, someone who knows Signed English is not a qualified interpreter for a hearing-impaired prisoner who communicates in American Sign Language, and vice versa.[145]

Access to interpreters is not the only service that hearing-impaired prisoners have demanded successfully under the ADA and Section 504. The ADA also requires that public entities (1) provide persons with disabilities the opportunity to request the auxiliary aids and services of their choice, and (2) give "primary consideration to the requests of the individual with disabilities."[146] The regulations require the prison to notify persons with disabilities of their ADA protections,[147] and to have a grievance process for

---

139. ADA Amendments Act of 2008, Pub. L. No. 110-325, § 4, 122 Stat. 3553, 3556.

140. 28 C.F.R. § 35.104 (2009).

141. See Schmidt v. Odell, 64 F. Supp. 2d. 1014, 1031–33 (D. Kan. 1999) (allowing a double amputee prisoner to go forward with his ADA and § 504 suit against a county jail that delayed in providing him with a shower chair and refused to transfer him to a jail that had enough space for him to use a wheelchair).

142. Clarkson v. Coughlin, 898 F. Supp. 1019, 1034–35 (S.D.N.Y. 1995) (holding that not providing hearing-impaired prisoners with qualified interpreters and other assistive devices for numerous programs, services, and activities violates the ADA and § 504); Bonner v. Ariz. Dept. of Corr., 714 F. Supp. 420, 423 (D. Ariz. 1989) (holding that not providing a deaf, mute, and vision-impaired prisoner with a qualified interpreter for prison counseling, medical treatment, and disciplinary and administrative hearings violates § 504 unless the prison can prove that the prisoner could communicate effectively without a qualified interpreter); see also Duffy v. Riveland, 98 F.3d 447, 453–56 (9th Cir. 1996) (allowing a deaf prisoner to go forward with his claim that the prison failed to provide him with a qualified interpreter for classification and disciplinary hearings, in violation of the ADA and § 504).

143. Clarkson v. Coughlin, 898 F. Supp. 1019, 1033, 1042 (S.D.N.Y. 1995) (holding that, by failing to provide qualified interpreters or other assistive devices necessary for medical and mental health treatment, the Department of Corrections and prison officials violated deaf prisoners' 14th Amendment substantive due process right and constitutional right to privacy, and the 8th Amendment's ban on cruel and unusual punishment).

144. 28 C.F.R. § 35.104 (2007).

145. Clarkson v. Coughlin, 898 F. Supp. 1019, 1026–27, (S.D.N.Y. 1995) (indicating that an interpreter who uses Signed English is not qualified to interpret for a prisoner who uses American Sign Language).

146. 28 C.F.R. § 35.160(b)(2) (2007); see Disability Rights Section, U.S. Dept. of Justice, Technical Assistance Manual, Title II, ADA, available at http://www.ada.gov/taman2.html (last visited March 10, 2010) (stating that the individual's preferences should be considered when deciding what aids to provide for him).

147. 28 C.F.R. § 35.106 (2007) (describing the requirement that public entities notify people with disabilities of their rights under the ADA); see also 28 C.F.R. § 35.163(a) (2007) ("[a] public entity shall ensure that interested persons, including persons with impaired vision or hearing, can obtain information as to the existence and location of accessible services, activities, and facilities").

people who believe the prison has failed to make programs and services accessible to disabled individuals.[148] In Clarkson v. Coughlin, the court held that the prison violated the ADA and Section 504 by failing to provide various adaptations for the deaf, including TDDs, closed-caption decoders for televisions, and fire alarms that alert people visually.[149] Other courts have held that failure to provide TDD for the deaf fiancée of a prisoner may be a violation of the ADA.[150]

6. What are "Services, Programs, or Activities?"

Under both the ADA and Section 504, if reasonable modifications to services, programs, or activities would allow you to participate, prison authorities cannot exclude you from participating because of your disability. Almost everything you do in prison—from your work assignment to your use of the recreation yard to your use of the library to your visitation privileges—is a program or service offered by the prison.[151] Prisoners with disabilities have argued that prisons and jails must accommodate their needs in the use of the following programs: boot camp,[152] conjugal visitation programs,[153] libraries and law libraries,[154] educational programs,[155] vocational training,[156] job opportunities,[157] the commissary and dispensary,[158] transition programs,[159] dining halls,[160] visitation,[161] telephone calls,[162] church services,[163] eligibility for

148. 28 C.F.R. § 35.107(b) (2007) ("[A] public entity that employs 50 or more persons shall adopt and publish grievance procedures providing for prompt and equitable resolution of complaints alleging any action that would be prohibited by this part.").

149. Clarkson v. Coughlin, 898 F. Supp. 1019, 1047 (S.D.N.Y. 1995). But see Spurlock v. Simmons, 88 F. Supp. 2d 1189, 1196 (D. Kan. 2000) (holding that providing a deaf prisoner with only limited telephone access, while permitting other prisoners unlimited access, did not violate the ADA because the deaf prisoner's request was unreasonable). Clarkson also held that deaf female prisoners were discriminated against on the basis of their sex because New York had a special prison unit that could accommodate many of the needs of deaf and hearing-impaired male prisoners, but did not have a similar unit for female prisoners. Clarkson v. Coughlin, 898 F. Supp. 1019, 1051 (S.D.N.Y. 1995).

150. Niece v. Fitzner, 922 F. Supp. 1208, 1216 (E.D. Mich. 1996) (finding a possible ADA violation in prison officials' refusal to provide accommodations for a prisoner to communicate with his deaf fiancée).

151. See Pa. Dept. of Corr. v. Yeskey, 524 U.S. 206, 210, 118 S. Ct. 1952, 1955, 141 L. Ed. 2d 215, 219 (1998) (stating that "[m]odern prisons provide inmates with many recreational 'activities,' medical 'services,' and educational and vocational 'programs,' all of which at least theoretically 'benefit' the prisoners").

152. See, e.g., Pa. Dept. of Corr. v. Yeskey, 524 U.S. 206, 210, 118 S. Ct. 1952, 1955, 141 L. Ed. 2d 215, 219 (1998) (noting that the prison's motivational boot camp for first-time offenders is a program).

153. See, e.g., Bullock v. Gomez, 929 F. Supp. 1299, 1303–04 (C.D. Cal. 1996) (noting that the prisoner was able to show that he was excluded from the conjugal visit program, although the issue of whether he was "otherwise qualified" was not yet resolved).

154. See, e.g., Love v. Westville Corr. Ctr, 103 F.3d 558, 558–59 (7th Cir. 1996) (upholding the decision that a quadriplegic prisoner's ADA rights had been violated when he was denied access to prison libraries).

155. See, e.g., Crawford v. Ind. Dept. of Corr., 115 F.3d 481, 483 (7th Cir. 1997) ("[T]here is no doubt that an educational program is a program."). While Crawford recognizes educational programs as programs, some courts have held that the ADA does not require a prison to implement a specific type of rehabilitation or education program that is not already available. Garrett v. Angelone, 940 F. Supp. 933, 942 (W.D. Va. 1996), aff'd, 107 F.3d 865 (4th Cir. 1997).

156. See, e.g., Montez v. Romer, 32 F. Supp. 2d 1235, 1237 (D. Colo. 1999) (noting that prisoners argue that they were unable to participate in vocational training because the prison did not accommodate their disabilities).

157. See, e.g., Montez v. Romer, 32 F. Supp. 2d 1235, 1237 (D. Colo. 1999) (noting that prisoners argue that they were excluded from employment programs because of their disabilities); Love v. Westville Corr. Ctr., 103 F.3d 558, 560 (7th Cir. 1996) (upholding the decision that a quadriplegic prisoner's rights under the ADA had been violated when he was denied access to "work programs").

158. See, e.g., Love v. Westville Corr. Ctr., 103 F.3d 558, 558–59 (7th Cir. 1996) (upholding the decision that a quadriplegic prisoner's ADA rights had been violated when he was denied access to the prison commissary); Kiman v. N.H. Dept. of Corr., 451 F.3d 274, 286–87 (1st Cir. 2006) (finding that access to medication is one of the "services, programs, or activities" covered by the ADA).

159. See, e.g., Love v. Westville Corr. Ctr., 103 F.3d 558, 558–59 (7th Cir. 1996) (upholding the decision that a quadriplegic prisoner's rights under the ADA were violated when he was denied access to transition programs).

160. See, e.g., Crawford v. Ind. Dept. of Corr., 115 F.3d 481, 483 (7th Cir. 1997) (noting that use of the dining hall is an activity under the ADA); Rainey v. County of Delaware, No. CIV.A.00-548, 2000 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 10700, at *5 (E.D. Pa. Aug. 1, 2000) (unpublished) (permitting the claim that a disabled prisoner was given insufficient time to travel to the dining hall, thereby depriving him of food).

161. See, e.g., Love v. Westville Corr. Ctr., 103 F.3d 558, 558–59 (7th Cir. 1996) (upholding a decision that a quadriplegic prisoner's ADA rights were violated when he was denied access to "visitation facilities that were open to the general inmate population"); Love v. Westville Correctional Ctr., 103 F.3d 558, 558–59 (7th Cir. 1996) (allowing a prisoner who used a wheelchair to bring the claim that being housed in an infirmary unit cut off his access to many trustee status,[164] substance abuse classes,[165] access to reading materials and television,[166] college classes,[167] and access to medical care.[168] At least one court has determined that granting parole is an "activity," and thus the actions of the parole board must comply with the ADA.[169] Even disciplinary measures (such as shackling) have been challenged as violating the ADA and Constitution when, although they are applied to all prisoners, they have a disparate impact on prisoners with disabilities.[170] Prison disciplinary hearings are also subject to the ADA.[171]

Because programs and services vary from prison to prison, the ADA and Section 504 define programs and activities very broadly. Rarely have courts dismissed a suit because the activity in question did not qualify as a program.[172] If you have a disability, are qualified for the activity or program (even if it is not listed above), and the prison refuses to allow you to participate, you may have a claim under the ADA and Section 504.

7. State Accessibility Laws and Regulations

Many states have accessibility and anti-disability discrimination statutes similar to the ADA. If you live in a state with a law that provides such protection, you should sue under state law, as well. Most states require public and government facilities to be physically accessible to people with disabilities.[173] Some states prison facilities, including visitation rooms).

---

162. Clarkson v. Coughlin, 898 F. Supp. 1019, 1032–33 (S.D.N.Y. 1995) (granting summary judgment under the ADA where deaf prisoners were denied amplified headsets or telephone communication devices for the deaf).

163. See, e.g., Love v. Westville Corr. Ctr., 103 F.3d 558, 558–59 (7th Cir. 1996) (upholding a decision that a quadriplegic prisoner's ADA rights were violated when he was denied access to church services).

164. See, e.g., Dean v. Knowles, 912 F. Supp. 519, 522 (S.D. Fla. 1996) (allowing an asymptomatic HIV-positive prisoner to bring a discrimination suit against prison officials who denied him trustee status).

165. See, e.g., Love v. Westville Corr. Ctr., 103 F.3d 558, 558–59 (7th Cir. 1996) (upholding a decision that a quadriplegic prisoner's ADA rights were violated when he was denied access to substance abuse programs); Clarkson v. Coughlin, 898 F. Supp. 1019, 1032–33 (S.D.N.Y. 1995) (granting summary judgment under the ADA where deaf prisoners were denied access to substance abuse programs).

166. See, e.g., Walker v. Snyder, 213 F.3d 344, 345 (7th Cir. 2000) (stating that the district court had found an ADA violation in the prison's failure to provide books on tape); overruled on other grounds, 324 F.3d 906 (7th Cir. 2003); Clarkson v. Coughlin, 898 F. Supp. 1019, 1032–33 (S.D.N.Y. 1995) (granting summary judgment under the ADA where deaf prisoners were denied a closed-caption decoder for televisions).

167. See, e.g., Love v. Westville Corr. Ctr., 103 F.3d 558, 558–59 (7th Cir. 1996) (upholding the decision that a quadriplegic prisoner's ADA rights were violated when he was denied access to prison educational programs).

168. Most courts have held that the ADA does not provide a cause of action for inappropriate medical care. See, e.g., Moore v. Prison Health Servs., Inc., 24 F. Supp. 2d 1164, 1168 (D. Kan. 1998) (holding that a claim of inadequate medical care is not appropriate under the ADA), aff'd, 201 F.3d 448 (10th Cir. 1999). However, courts have upheld claims alleging discriminatory access to medical care because of the prisoner's disability. See, e.g., Roop v. Squadrito, 70 F. Supp. 2d 868, 877 (N.D. Ind. 1999) (allowing an inmate to go forward with ADA claim that, among other things, the prison did not dispense his medication properly because of his HIV); McNally v. Prison Health Servs., 46 F. Supp. 2d 49 (D. Me. 1999) reh'g denied, 52 F. Supp. 2d 147, 148 (D. Me. 1999) (allowing a prisoner to go forward with his claim that the prison violated the ADA by refusing to administer HIV medication because of his HIV status). The 8th Amendment may provide an alternative cause of action for inappropriate or inadequate medical care. See, e.g., Clarkson v. Coughlin, 898 F. Supp. 1019, 1032–33 (S.D.N.Y. 1995) (holding that failure to provide sign language interpreters prevented deaf prisoners from receiving adequate medical care, in violation of their due process and 8th Amendment rights).

169. Thompson v. Davis, 295 F.3d 890, 898–99 (9th Cir. 2002) (holding that parole proceedings are subject to the ADA's requirements).

170. Armstrong v. Davis, 275 F.3d 849, 859 (9th Cir. 2001) (affirming the district court's injunction ordering a prison to stop shackling, during parole hearings, prisoners with hearing impairments or who used sign language).

171. Duffy v. Riveland, 98 F.3d 447, 455 (9th Cir. 1996) (holding that prison disciplinary hearings are subject to the ADA's requirements).

172. But see Aswegan v. Bruhl, 113 F.3d 109, 110 (8th Cir. 1997) (holding that cable television is not a "service, program or activity" within the meaning of the ADA), aff'd, Armstrong v. Wilson, 124 F.3d 1019 (9th Cir. 1997).

173. See, e.g., Ala. Code §§ 21-4-1 to 4 (2008); Alaska Stat. § 35.10.015 (2006); Ariz. Rev. Stat. Ann. §§ 41-1492.0 to 1492.05. (2008); Cal. Civ. Code § 54 (2007); Conn. Gen. Stat. Ann. § 46a-7 (2004); Del. Code Ann. tit. 16 § 9502 (2003); Fla. Stat. § 255.21 (2007), §§ 553.501 to 553.513 (2007); Ga. Code Ann. §§ 30-3-2 to 5 (2007); Haw. Rev. Stat. Ann. § 103-50 (2006); Kan. Stat. Ann. §§ 58-1303 to 1304 (2006); Ky. Rev. Stat. Ann. § 198B.260 (2007); La. Rev. Stat. Ann. §§ 40:1731 to 1736 (2008); Me. Rev. Stat. Ann. Tit. 5, § 4591 (2002 & Supp. 2007); Mass. Gen. Laws ch. 22, § 13A (2003); Mo. Ann. Stat. § 8.620 (2008); Mont. Code Ann. § 50-60-201 (2008); N.J. Stat. Ann. § 52:32-4 (2001 & Supp. 2008); N.M. Stat. § 28-7-3 (2008); N.Y. Pub. Bldgs. § 51 (2007); N.C. Gen. Stat. § 168-2 (2007); N.D. Cent. Code. §§ 48-01.2–24 (2007); Ohio. Rev. Code. Ann. § 3781.111 (2006); Okla. Stat. tit. 61, § 11 (2008); Or. Rev. Stat. §§ 447.210–280 (2007); Pa. Stat.

have laws that clearly require state services or programs to provide modifications or accommodations for people with disabilities.[174] When researching state laws to see if they apply to you—if they cover the type of discrimination you are encountering—be sure to (1) read the statutory language carefully, and (2) review cases interpreting the statute. Some state laws have broader definitions of "disability" than the ADA does. Also, the constitutional challenges to the ADA (discussed at the beginning of this Chapter) do not apply to state accessibility statutes.

C. Enforcing Your Rights under the ADA and Section 504

This Part discusses other issues you should consider when deciding whether to file a claim. These issues are (1) finding an attorney; (2) filing a complaint with the DOJ instead of in court; (3) the damages you can ask for; and (4) whether you can also sue under your state's antidiscrimination laws.

Before deciding to file a lawsuit under the ADA, Section 504, or any other civil rights statute, you should read Chapter 14 of the JLM, about the Prison Litigation Reform Act ("PLRA"). If you fail to follow the PLRA's requirements, you may lose your good time credit and/or your right to bring future claims without paying the full filing fee. Make sure your attorney also knows about the PLRA; many attorneys do not.

1. Finding an Attorney

There are not enough lawyers willing and able to represent prisoners, in part because most prisoner lawsuits do not pay lawyers well. But the ADA and Section 504 do allow the recovery of attorney's fees[175]: attorneys (and plaintiffs who are representing themselves) can ask for attorney's fees from defendants after winning a case. Courts have found that the PLRA rule that limits recovery of attorney's fees in prisoner lawsuits[176] does not apply to ADA or Section 504 claims.[177] Even if you do not have a lawyer, you should ask for compensation for lawyer's fees under the ADA and Section 504. You are also entitled to recover your court or in pauperis fees.

If you decide to sue under the ADA and Section 504, you should contact lawyers or disability rights groups in the area to see if they can assist you. You also might want to contact your state's Protection & Advocacy ("P&A") organization for advice and/or representation. P&As, which are usually non-profits, advocate on behalf of persons with disabilities, including those in criminal and civil institutions.[178] Your

---

Ann. tit. 35, § 7210.102 (2008); R.I. Gen. Laws § 37-8-15 (2007); S.C. Code Ann. §§ 10-5-210 to 330 (2007); S.D. Codified Laws § 5-14-12 (2004); Tenn. Code Ann. §§ 68-120-201 to 205 (2006); Tex. Gov't Code Ann. §§ 469.001 to 469.003 (2004); Utah Code Ann. §§ 26-29-1 to 4 (2007); Vt. Stat. Ann. tit. 20, §§ 2900–2907 (2007); Wash. Rev. Code §§ 70.92.100–170 (2007); Wis. Stat. Ann. § 101.13 (2004).

A number of states have laws that simply require equal rights: people with disabilities have full and free use of facilities. See, e.g., Ark. Code Ann. § 20-14-303 (2005); Colo. Rev. Stat. § 24-34-601 (2008); Iowa Code § 216C.3 (2007); Md. Code Ann. Human Servs. § 7-704 (2007); Mich. Comp. Laws. § 37.1102 (2008); Minn. Stat. § 363A.11 (2008); Neb. Rev. Stat. § 20-127 (2007); Nev. Rev. Stat. § 233.010 (2007); N.H. Rev. Stat. Ann. § 167-C:2 (2007); Va. Code Ann. § 51.5–44 (2006); Wyo. Stat. Ann. § 35-13-201 (2007).

174. See, e.g., Conn. Gen. Stat. § 46a-7 (2008); Fla Stat. § 110.215 (2008); 775 Ill. Comp. Stat. 5/5-101, 102 (2001 & Supp. 2008); La. Rev. Stat. Ann. §§ 46-2252 to 2254 (2008); Md. Code. Ann. Human Servs. §§ 7-127 to 132 (2007); N.C. Gen. Stat. § 168A-7 (2007); Or. Rev. Stat. § 410.060 (2007); R.I. Gen. Laws § 42-87-2 (2007); S.C. Code Ann. § 43-33-520 (2007); S.D. Codified Laws § 20-13-23.7 (2004); Tex. Hum. Res. Code Ann. §§ 22.010–.011 (Vernon 2001); Utah Code Ann. § 62A-5-102 (2006); Va. Code Ann. § 51.5-40 (2005).

175. 29 U.S.C. § 794a(b) (2006) ("[i]n any action or proceeding to enforce or charge a violation of [the Rehabilitation Act] ..., the court, in its discretion, may allow the prevailing party ... reasonable attorney's fee as part of the costs"); Americans with Disabilities Act, 42 U.S.C. § 12205 (2006) ("In any action or administrative proceeding commenced pursuant to this Chapter, the court or agency, in its discretion, may allow the prevailing party ... a reasonable attorney's fee, including litigation expenses, and costs."); see also 28 C.F.R. pt. 35, app. A., at 572 (2007) (discussing 28 U.S.C. § 35.175 and specifying that "attorneys fees" include "litigation expenses and costs," including "items such as expert witness fees, travel expenses, etc.").

176. Prison Litigation Reform Act, 42 U.S.C. § 1997e(d) (2006) (discussing attorney's fees in prisoner suits).

177. Armstrong v. Davis, 318 F.3d 965, 974 (9th Cir. 2003) (holding that the PLRA restrictions on attorney's fees do not apply to claims brought under the ADA or § 504 because the two laws have their own attorney's fees provisions); Beckford v. Irvin, 60 F. Supp. 2d 85, 88 (W.D.N.Y. 1999) (holding that the PLRA's restrictions on attorneys fees do not apply to prisoners' ADA claims).

178. Protection and Advocacy of Individual Rights (PAIR), 29 U.S.C. § 794e(a)(1) (Supp. 2007) (supporting "a system in each State to protect the legal and human rights of individuals with disabilities"); Protection and Advocacy for Individuals with Mental Illness ("PAIMI"), 42 U.S.C. §§ 10803, 10805 (2006) (requiring that each state establish systems "designed to protect and advocate the rights of individuals with mental illness and investigate incidents of abuse and neglect of individuals with mental illness," and noting that the systems "shall have the authority to ... pursue

P&A may help you by providing information, referrals, or advice; helping you file your complaint; or even representing you. To find the P&A in your area, contact:

The National Disability Rights Network
900 Second St., NE, Suite 211
Washington, D.C. 20002
Tel. (202) 408-9514

2. Filing a Complaint

If you believe you have been discriminated against because of your disability, you can file a complaint with the DOJ[179] and/or bring a lawsuit in court.[180] Neither Title II nor Section 504 requires you to file with the DOJ, but the PLRA may require you to file with the DOJ before you sue in court. In New York, prior to the 2005 Rosario v. Goord decision, several federal courts had held that prisoners must file a complaint with the DOJ before filing a complaint in federal court, because the PLRA requires prisoners to exhaust all administrative remedies.[181] However, in a 2005 decision by the Second Circuit Court of Appeals, the New York Department of Correctional Services ("DOCS") said it would stop requiring prisoners to file their ADA claims with the DOJ before bringing suits in federal court.[182] Since most courts have not decided whether the PLRA's administrative exhaustion requirement demands that prisoners first file with the DOJ, you probably should do it anyway, to avoid having your ADA or Section 504 lawsuit dismissed. For more information on the PLRA, see Chapter 14 of the JLM, "The Prison Litigation Reform Act."

3. Filing a Claim with the DOJ

Starting from the date of the discrimination you experienced, you have 180 days to file a complaint with the DOJ.[183] The DOJ will either investigate the complaint,[184] or, if you include a Section 504 claim and the DOJ thinks another agency can investigate better, the DOJ will refer your complaint to that other agency.[185] If the agency or DOJ finds a violation of your rights, it will try to negotiate with the prison to get the prison to comply with the law.[186] If the prison does not comply, the agency will refer your case to the U.S. Attorney General's office.[187] The Attorney General can sue the prison, but he does not have to—and, in most cases, he will not.

To file a disability discrimination complaint, contact the DOJ and ask for a "Title II of the Americans with Disabilities Act Section 504 of the Rehabilitation Act of 1973 Discrimination Complaint Form."[188] The contact information for the DOJ is: administrative, legal, and other appropriate remedies to ensure the protection of individuals with mental illness who are receiving care or treatment in the State"); Protection and Advocacy for Persons with Developmental Disabilities ("PADD"), 42 U.S.C. § 15043 (2006) (listing the system's requirements).

---

179. 28 C.F.R. § 35.170(a) (2007).

180. 28 C.F.R. § 35.172(b) (2007).

181. See, e.g., Porter v. Nussle, 534 U.S. 516, 532, 122 S. Ct. 983, 992, 152 L Ed. 2d 12, 26 (2002) (holding that the PLRA requires prisoners to exhaust all administrative remedies before filing an ADA claim); Burgess v. Garvin, No. 01-Civ. 10994, 2004 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 14419, at *3, *9 (S.D.N.Y. Aug. 19, 2003) (unpublished) (holding that the PLRA requires prisoners to exhaust all administrative remedies, including DOJ remedies, before filing an ADA claim: "The plain language of [the PLRA] requires the prisoner to exhaust 'such administrative remedies as are available.' It is not limited to administrative redress within the prison system in which the prisoner is being held, or to administrative remedies provided by any particular sovereign"), reconsideration granted on other grounds by 2004 WL 527053 (S.D.N.Y. Mar. 16, 2004); William G. v. Pataki, 2005 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 16716, at *4 (S.D.N.Y. Aug. 12, 2005) (unpublished) ("[t]he DOJ remedies, to the extent that they are available to Plaintiffs, must be exhausted pursuant to the plain language of the PLRA").

182. Rosario v. Goord, 400 F.3d 108, 109 (2d Cir. 2005) (per curiam) (stating that DOCS does not intend to challenge lawsuits on the ground that administrative remedies have not been exhausted because complaints were not first filed with the DOJ). But see William G. v. Pataki, 2005 WL 1949509, at *4 (S.D.N.Y. Aug. 12, 2005) (where a court, post-Rosario, applied the DOJ exhaustion requirement to a proposed class action on behalf of parole detainees with disabilities housed in New York city jails, and where defendants were not DOCS but the State of New York and the New York State Division of Parole and Offices of Mental Health and of Alcohol and Substance Abuse Services).

183. 28 C.F.R. § 35.170(a)–(b) (2007).

184. 28 C.F.R. § 35.172(a) (2007).

185. 28 C.F.R. § 35.171(a)(2)(ii) (2007).

186. 28 C.F.R. § 35.173(a)(2) (2007).

187. 28 C.F.R. § 35.174 (2007).

188. Form DOJ - ADA-II OMB No. 1190-0009 (exp. 4-30-07), Title II of the Americans with Disabilities Act § 504

U.S. Department of Justice
950 Pennsylvania Ave., NW
Disability Rights Section - NYAV
Washington, D.C. 20530
Tel. (800) 514-0301
TTY (800) 514-0383

If you do not have time to request a form, send a letter to the DOJ that includes the following:

(1) Your name, full address, and telephone number;
(2) The name of the institution that discriminated against you (e.g., the prison);
(3) The address and phone number of the institution that discriminated against you;
(4) The date(s) that you encountered the discrimination (and whether the discrimination is ongoing);
(5) A description of the acts of discrimination, including the names of any individuals who discriminated against you;
(6) Whether you have filed a complaint or formal grievance, and, if you have, what the status is of your complaint or grievance;
(7) Whether you have complained to any other agencies (such as a state human rights commission or another bureau of the Department of Justice) or filed with a court about the discrimination (and if you have complained or filed, give the names and addresses of the agencies or courts and the date you filed the other claim);
(8) Whether you plan to file with another agency or court, and, if you plan to file, the address of the agency or court (even if you say you do not plan to file with any other agency or court, you can change your mind and file later on); and
(9) Your signature and the date.[189]

4. Filing a Lawsuit

As mentioned above, the ADA and Section 504 do not require that you file with the DOJ, although, because of the PLRA, you may have to file with the DOJ. If you are in a jurisdiction that does not require you to file first with the DOJ, you may go directly to court. If you do file with the DOJ, you can bring a lawsuit even if the DOJ does not find a violation of your rights. The statute of limitations (deadline) for filing a lawsuit under Title II and Section 504 depends on your state. Because neither law has its own statute of limitations, most federal courts use the statute of limitations for personal injury claims in the state.[190] Other federal courts use the statute of limitations for the most similar state law.[191] Note that some of these deadlines[192] are fairly long (six years in Minnesota),[193] while others are very short (180 days in North Carolina).[194] of the Rehabilitation Act of 1973 Discrimination Complaint Form, available at http://www.ada.gov/t2cmpfrm.htm (last visited March 10, 2010).

---

189. Form DOJ - ADA-II OMB No. 1190-0009 (exp. 4-30-07), Title II of the Americans with Disabilities Act § 504 of the Rehabilitation Act of 1973 Discrimination Complaint Form, available at http://www.acdl.com/pdfs/Title%20II%20Complaint%20Form.pdf .

190. See, e.g., Everett v. Cobb County Sch. Dist., 138 F.3d 1407, 1409 (11th Cir. 1998) (holding that Georgia's two-year personal injury statute of limitations applies to ADA and § 504 claims since Georgia has no law "identical to the Rehabilitation Act").

191. Wilson v. Garcia, 471 U.S. 261, 266–67, 105 S. Ct. 1938, 1942, 85 L. Ed. 2d 254 (1985) (applying the "settled practice" of using the statute of limitations from an analogous state law when the federal law provided no statute of limitations); see also Wolsky v. Med. Coll. of Hampton Rds., 1 F.3d 222, 223-24 (4th Cir. 1993) (holding that the statute of limitations for the most similar state statute should be applied to Rehabilitation Act suits).

192. In New York, three years. Noel v. Cornell Univ. Med. Coll., 853 F. Supp. 93, 94 (S.D.N.Y. 1994). In California, one year, although the issue remains to be definitively settled. Pickern v. Holiday Quality Foods, Inc., 293 F.3d 1133, 1137 at n.1 (9th Cir. 2002). In Illinois, two years. Winfrey v. City of Chicago, 957 F.Supp. 1014, 1023 (N.D. Ill., 1997). In Georgia, two years. Everett v. Cobb Co. Sch. Dist., 138 F.3d 1407, 1409 (11th Cir. 1998). In Texas, two years. Hickey v. Irving Ind. Sch. Dist., 976 F.2d 980, 982 (5th Cir. 1992). In Pennsylvania, two years. Disabled in Action of Penn. v. Se. Penn. Transp. Co., 539 F.3d 199, 208 (3d Cir. 2008). In Louisiana, one year. Joseph v. Port of New Orleans, No. CIV. A. 99-1622, 2002 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 4133, 2002 WL 342424, at *4912 (E.D. La., 2002) (unpublished).

193. Faibisch v. Univ. of Minn., 304 F.3d 797, 802 (8th Cir. 2002) (holding that Minnesota's six-year personal injury statute of limitations applies to Rehabilitation Act suits).

194. McCullough v. Branch Banking & Trust Co., 35 F.3d 127, 132 (4th Cir. 1994) (holding that the statute of limitations for Rehabilitation Act claims is determined by the most similar state law; in North Carolina, the most similar state law was a state antidiscrimination law with a deadline of 180 days, so the deadline for filing a § 504 complaint

5. What Kind of Damages Can You Seek Against a State

What you can win in court depends on the facts of your case, and on whether you sue under Title II or Section 504. You should carefully consider what you want the court to do before you file your suit.

(a) Money Damages

Courts are divided over whether you can sue a state for money damages under the ADA and Section 504. This is because they are split as to states' Eleventh Amendment immunity (also known as sovereign immunity).

Under the Eleventh Amendment, states (but not federal and local government) have what is called immunity.[195] This means individuals cannot sue them for money in federal court—unless Congress creates an exception. (You can always sue states for injunctive relief.) It is true that both the ADA and Section 504 apply to state prisoners.[196] But it is not clear whether states have waived their immunity, so that you can sue them for money damages under those laws.

States do not want to have to pay money when they lose lawsuits. So they argue that, in enacting the ADA and Section 504, Congress did not have the authority to create an Eleventh Amendment exception to sovereign immunity. Therefore, states argue, people bringing claims under the ADA and Section 504 should not be able to win money damages against the states. Once courts decide that states cannot be sued for money damages, individuals suing states can only receive injunctive relief,[197] discussed in subsection (a), above.

(i) Sovereign Immunity and the ADA

The Supreme Court has taken the middle road between allowing and not allowing state prisons to be sued for money damages under Title II of the ADA. Recently, in Tennessee v. Lane, the Supreme Court held that states may be sued for money damages for violations of Title II, at least when the violations relate to court access for a disabled person.[198] (Prior to Lane, most federal courts had held that states could not be sued for money damages at all.[199]) Then, in United States v. Georgia, the Supreme Court held that prisoners became 180 days). The McCullough court noted that it was following its decision in Wolsky v. Medical College of Hampton Rds., 1 F.3d 222, 223-24 (4th Cir. 1993), where the court found that, because (1) Virginia had its own act protecting disabled individuals, and (2) that act had the same purpose as the federal Rehabilitation Act, the Virginia Act was the most analogous statute, and its one-year statute of limitations should be used (rather than the statute of limitations for personal injury suits). McCullough v. Branch Banking & Trust Co., 53 F.3d 127, 130 (4th Cir. 1994).

---

195. Bd. of Trs. of the Univ. of Ala. v. Garrett, 531 U.S. 356, 3639, 121 S. Ct. 955, 9625, 148 L. Ed. 2d 866, 87780 (2001).

196. Pa. Dept. of Corr. v. Yeskey, 524 U.S. 206, 213, 118 S. Ct. 1952, 1956, 141 L. Ed. 2d 215, 221 (1998) (holding that Title II of the ADA applies to prisoners in state prisons); Harris v. Thigpen, 941 F.2d 1495, 1522 n.41 (11th Cir. 1991) (ruling that § 504 applies to prisoners in state prisons because state prisons receive money from the federal government); Bonner v. Lewis, 857 F.2d 559, 562 (9th Cir. 1988) (ruling that § 504 applies to state correctional institutions that receive federal funding).

197. United States v. Georgia, 546 U.S. 151, 159, 126 S. Ct. 877, 882, 163 L. Ed. 2d 650, 660 (2006); Miller v. King, 384 F.3d 1248, 1263–67 (11th Cir. 2004), vacated and superseded on other grounds, 449 F.3d 1149 (11th Cir. 2006).

198. Tennessee v. Lane, 541 U.S. 509, 531, 124 S. Ct. 1978, 1993, 158 L. Ed. 2d 820, 842 (2004).

199. Prior to Lane, the First, Fourth, Fifth, Seventh, Eighth, and Tenth Circuit Courts of Appeals ruled that individuals may not receive money damages under Title II. See Kiman v. N.H. Dept. of Corr., No.01-134-B, 2001 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 21894 (D.N.H. Dec. 19, 2001) (unpublished) (agreeing with the Second, Fifth, and Tenth Circuits that, under Garrett, the 11th Amendment deprives courts of jurisdictions to hear Title II claims against states), aff'd, 332 F.3d 29 (1st Cir. 2003) (en banc), vacated, 541 U.S. 1059, 124 S. Ct. 2387, 158 L. Ed. 2d 961 (2004); Wessel v. Glendening, 306 F.3d 203, 215 (4th Cir. 2002) (holding that "[a]lthough Congress properly and clearly expressed its intent to [abrogate state sovereign immunity], it acted on the basis of an inadequate record and imposed a remedy that is neither congruent nor proportional to the problem it identified"), overruled by Constantine v. Rectors & Visitors of George Mason Univ., 441 F.3d 474 (4th Cir. 2005); Reickenbacker v. Foster, 274 F.3d 974, 983 (5th Cir. 2001) (holding that Title II and § 504 are not proportional and congruent responses to legislative findings of unconstitutional discrimination by the States against the disabled), overruled by Pace v. Bogalusa City Sch. Bd., 403 F.3d 272, 277 n.14 (5th Cir. 2005); Thompson v. Colorado, 278 F.3d 1020, 1034 (10th Cir. 2001) (holding that Title II cannot be found to be a proportional and congruent response to constitutional violations if Congress has not identified a history and pattern of unconstitutional discrimination by the states); Walker v. Snyder, 213 F.3d 344, 347 (7th Cir. 2000) (holding that, like Title I, Title II is barred by the 11th Amendment), overruled by Bruggeman v. Blagojevich, 324 F.3d 906, 912–13 (7th Cir. 2003); Alsbrook v. City of Maumelle, 184 F.3d 999, 1002 (8th Cir. 1999) (finding that Title II is not a valid exercise of Congress' power under § 5 of the 14th Amendment, and so Arkansas retains its 11th Amendment immunity). The Second Circuit has ruled that individuals may not receive money damages under Title II of the ADA unless they can show that the state may sue states for money damages under Title II, at least in situations where the alleged misconduct actually violates the parts of the Constitution that apply to the states.[200] (In that case, the plaintiff alleged Eighth Amendment violations;[201] however, the ruling is broad, and applies to more than just the Eighth Amendment.) The court did not say whether the Eleventh Amendment waiver also applies to ADA violations that do not involve constitutional violations.[202]

So the current rule is that prisoners may sue states for money damages under Title II when a state prison system (1) violates any of the rights that are part of the Fourteenth Amendment and (2) violates Title II.[203] (The Fourteenth Amendment includes most of the rights in the first eight amendments to the Constitution.) It appears that, after Lane and Georgia, lower courts will take a case-by-case approach, considering the particular circumstances, in determining whether the plaintiff can sue the state for money damages.[204] And, of course, some courts will be more likely than others to permit money damages.[205]

If you are considering bringing a disability discrimination claim under Title II, you should look at how the decisions in Lane and Georgia have been analyzed and interpreted by other courts, disability rights organizations, and academics. See Chapter 2 of the JLM for information on performing legal research.

(ii) Sovereign Immunity and Section 504

Courts are divided over whether states are protected by sovereign immunity under Section 504. Most Courts of Appeals that have addressed this issue have held that you can seek monetary damages under Section 504.[206] But the Second Circuit has held that you might not be able to get monetary damages from acted with "discriminatory animus or ill will" toward the disabled. Garcia v. S.U.N.Y. Health Sciences Ctr. of Brooklyn, 280 F.3d 98, 111 (2d Cir. 2001). The Sixth Circuit has allowed money damages against the state under Title II only if the discrimination amounted to a violation of an individual's due process rights under the 14th Amendment. Lane v. Tennessee, 315 F.3d 680, 682 (6th Cir. 2003) (holding that "it was reasonable for Congress to conclude that it needed to enact [the ADA] to prevent states from unduly burdening" rights protected by the 14th Amendment), aff'd, 541 U.S. 509, 124 S. Ct. 1978, 158 L. Ed. 2d 820 (2004). Only the Ninth Circuit has held that individuals may sue the state for money damages under Title II. Hason v. Med. Bd. of Cal., 279 F.3d 1167, 1171 (9th Cir. 2002) (holding that Congress validly abrogated states' 11th Amendment immunity when enacting Title II).

---

200. United States v. Georgia, 546 U.S. 151, 159, 126 S. Ct. 877, 882, 163 L. Ed. 2d 650, 660 (2006).

201. United States v. Georgia, 546 U.S. 151, 160–61, 126 S. Ct. 877, 883, 163 L. Ed. 2d 650, 661 (2006) (Stevens, J., concurring).

202. United States v. Georgia, 546 U.S. 151, 159, 126 S. Ct. 877, 882, 163 L. Ed. 2d 650, 660 (2006); Miller v. King, 384 F.3d 1248, 1263–67 (11th Cir. 2004), vacated and superseded on other grounds, 449 F.3d 1149 (11th Cir. 2006).

203. United States v. Georgia, 546 U.S. 151, 159, 126 S. Ct. 877, 882, 163 L. Ed. 2d 650, 660 (2006).

204. See United States v. Georgia, 546 U.S. 151, 159, 126 S. Ct. 877, 882, 163 L. Ed. 2d 650, 660 (2006). In United States v. Georgia, the Supreme Court held that lower courts were in the best position to determine (1) which aspects of the State's alleged conduct violated Title II of the ADA, and (2) to what extent such conduct also violated the 14th Amendment. Additionally, the Supreme Court held that when lower courts find that the State's conduct violated Title II but did not violate the 14th Amendment, lower courts should determine whether Congress intended that people should still have a right to sue the states for money damages.

Since United States v. Georgia, a number of courts have allowed prisoners to sue for monetary damages when they establish both that (1) the state prison system violated Title II of the ADA, and (2) the actions of the state prison system violated prisoners' 14th Amendment rights. Degrafinreid v. Ricks, 417 F. Supp. 2d 403, 409 (S.D.N.Y. 2006) (ruling that a prisoner could bring a claim for money damages against his prison system for confiscating and destroying his hearing aid; the prison's actions might have violated the prisoner's 8th Amendment right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment). However, when a State's actions violate Title II but not the Constitution, courts have been hesitant to allow the prisoner to sue for monetary damages. See, e.g., Miller v. King, 384 F.3d 1248, 1264–65 (11th Cir. 2004), vacated and superseded on other grounds, 449 F.3d 1149 (11th Cir. 2006) (holding that Title II damages suits may only be brought where a "fundamental right" is affected, and so the prisoner could not bring a Title II damages suit against state); Flakes v. Franks, 322 F. Supp. 2d 981, 983 (W.D. Wisc. 2004) (noting that it was not clear whether the prisoner's Title II claim for money damages would be proper).

205. See, e.g., Phiffer v. Columbia River Corr. Inst., 384 F.3d 791, 792–93 (9th Cir. 2004) (upholding a prior decision permitting a prisoner to bring a Title II claim for damages against the state); see also Carasquillo v. City of New York, 324 F. Supp. 2d 428, 442 (S.D.N.Y. 2004) (noting that Lane permits Title II claims for money damages against state and local governments, but dismissing the claim on other grounds).

206. See Garrett v. Univ. of Ala., 344 F.3d 1288, 1293 (11th Cir. 2003) (explaining that states waive their 11th Amendment immunity to § 504 suits when they receive federal funds); A.W. v. Jersey City Pub. Sch., 341 F.3d 234, 238 (3d Cir. 2003) (stating that Congress clearly required states to waive their immunity if states accepted federal funding); Doe v. Nebraska, 345 F.3d 593, 604 (8th Cir. 2003) (holding that the state clearly waived its immunity in accepting federal funds); Miranda B. v. Kitzhaber, 328 F.3d 1181, 1186 (9th Cir. 2003) (stating that "it is clear that a state waives its immunity from suit under the Rehabilitation Act by accepting federal funds"); Carten v. Kent State Univ., 282 F.3d states under Section 504, since states only agreed to be sued for money damages under Title II, and not Section 504.[207]

Overall, though, the arguments supporting Section 504 sovereign immunity are weak. This is because so many state agencies receive federal funding, and Congress only offers them federal funding in exchange for complying with Section 504—and thus waiving their state's sovereign immunity. And so even Second Circuit courts would find that, in reality, most states have waived their sovereign immunity under Section 504, and can be sued for money damages. Nevertheless, in some courts, you may not be able to get money damages against a state under Section 504.[208]

(iii) Some Practical Tips

Generally, it is easier to receive money damages—to convince the court that the state has waived its sovereign immunity—under Section 504 than under the ADA. However, this area of the law is changing. If you plan to file a Title II or Section 504 lawsuit, you should research this issue thoroughly to determine current law in your circuit. See Chapter 2 of the JLM, "Introduction to Legal Research," for help determining what is "current law." (Although Shepardizing cases is a good place to start, you should do additional research to make sure you are using up-to-date laws.)

If you find that you live in a federal circuit that prohibits money damages in such suits, you still can file a lawsuit against the state. However, you will be able to receive only injunctive and/or declaratory relief, and not money damages.[209] And even if you are able to sue for money damages, you cannot receive punitive damages under Title II or Section 504.[210]

You should probably cite both the ADA and Section 504 when filing your claim (so long as both of those laws apply to you). Then, if the Supreme Court ever rules that Congress exceeded its power in enacting one of those laws, your claim for money damages still will be viable against a state prison if (1) it includes claims against the law that is still in effect, and (2) you are in a jurisdiction that allows suits for money damages under the law that is still in effect.

(b) Injunctive Relief

Even when you cannot sue the state for money damages, you can ask for injunctive relief.[211] (Injunctive relief is when the court orders the prison to take certain actions—for example, to provide interpreters to hearing-impaired prisoners during disciplinary hearings[212]; or not to take certain actions—for example, to

---

391, 398 (6th Cir. 2002) (finding, as it did in an earlier case, that the state "unambiguously waived Eleventh Amendment immunity against Rehabilitation Act claims when it agreed to accept federal funds pursuant to" a federal act requiring states that accept such funds to waive their immunity); see also Pace v. Bogalusa City Sch. Bd., 403 F.3d 272, 289 (5th Cir. 2005) (en banc) (holding that, by accepting federal financial assistance, the state could be sued under § 504, which required that states waive their immunity from § 504 lawsuits if they received federal funds).

207. Garcia v. State Univ. of N.Y. Health Scis. Ctr. of Brooklyn, 280 F.3d 98, 114 (2d Cir. 2001) (overruled on other grounds by Castells v. Fisher, 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 30188 (E.D.N.Y. 2007)). Garcia does not say that the state can never be sued for money damages under § 504, but it requires that the state have known it could be sued for money damages by accepting federal financial assistance. It is not clear at what point courts will find that states knew they could be sued. See Press v. S.U.N.Y. at Stony Brook, 388 F. Supp. 2d 127, 132 (E.D.N.Y. 2005) (discussing subsequent treatment of Garcia). As such, if you are in the Second Circuit, you may want to include a claim for money damages under § 504. But keep in mind the "three strikes" provision of the PLRA (see Chapter 14 of the JLM, "The Prison Litigation Reform Act," to learn more about the PLRA).

208. See, e.g., Howard v. Bureau of Prisons, Civil Action No. 3:05-CV-1372, 2008 WL 318387, at *5.

209. Remember that in lawsuits against the federal government, you can seek only injunctive relief (a court-ordered act or prohibition) and declaratory relief (the judge's determination of each party's rights). You cannot get money damages.

210. Barnes v. Gorman, 536 U.S. 181, 189, 122 S. Ct. 2097, 2102–03, 153 L. Ed. 2d 230, 238–39 (2002) (stating that "punitive damages may not be awarded … in suits brought under § 202 of the ADA and § 504 of the Rehabilitation Act").

211. See, e.g., Randolph v. Rodgers, 253 F.3d 342, 345 (8th Cir. 2001) (noting that a "private party may seek prospective injunctive relief in federal court against a state official, even if the state is otherwise protected by Eleventh Amendment immunity") (Eleventh Amendment immunity, discussed in subsection (b), below, can prevent you from getting money damages from states). When you sue a state official, in his official capacity, for injunctive relief, it is called an Ex parte Young suit. Ex parte Young is the Supreme Court case allowing state officials to be sued for injunctive relief even when the state cannot not be sued in federal court. Ex parte Young, 209 U.S. 123, 28 S. Ct. 441, 52 L. Ed. 714 (1908).

212. Duffy v. Riveland, 98 F.3d 447, 454–55 (9th Cir. 1996) (holding that a deaf prisoner was disabled, could make a claim under § 504, and might be entitled to a certified interpreter at disciplinary hearings).

stop excluding prisoners with HIV from certain programs.[213]) If you are seeking injunctive relief, you must make your claim for an injunction against individual prison officials in their official capacities.[214] Under the ADA and Section 504, you cannot sue individual officials in their individual capacities. For example, if you sue Prison Warden John Smith, you will be suing him as The Warden (who represents the state), not as Mr. John Smith (who just represents himself). Although the state will be providing the injunctive relief the court orders, the law requires you to request the injunctive relief from specific officials. (If you are suing a county, however, you can ask for injunctive relief directly from the county or the county jail.)

6. Filing an ADA or Section 504 Claim Against a County, City, or Town

The Eleventh Amendment/sovereign immunity challenges to the ADA and Section 504 do not apply to local entities like counties, cities, and towns.[215] So you can ask for money damages (as well as injunctive relief) if you sue a county, city, or town for violating your rights under these laws. Also, if you are in a private prison that receives federal financial assistance, you can sue the prison for money damages and injunctive relief under Section 504. But punitive damages are never available under Title II or Section 504.[216]

7. Filing in State or Federal Court

Most suits about the rights of prisoners with disabilities have been brought in federal court. However, in recent years, the Supreme Court has weakened the protections of the ADA (and federal courts have followed the Supreme Court). So state courts may be an appealing alternative. As explained above, state laws (1) can incorporate or expand ADA protections, and (2) do not have the constitutional weaknesses of the ADA and Section 504. If you are in a state where federal case law has limited your ability to sue the state, you should research the possibility of filing in state court and using state law. You should make sure to find out how your state's courts have dealt with prisoner suits brought after the decisions in Lane and Georgia (discussed in subsection (c), above), which dealt with Eleventh Amendment/sovereign immunity.

D. Conclusion

If you are a prisoner with a physical or mental disability, Section 504 and the ADA (and maybe state law as well) guarantee you certain rights and protections. To realize your protections under these laws, you must meet the elements of the two laws. You may be able to hire an attorney to assist you with your complaint, because both Section 504 and the ADA allow you to recover attorney's fees. Although you might not be able to recover money damages, you may be able to change the practices that are denying you a particular prison service, program, or activity. Before filing your complaint, make sure to refer to Chapter 14 of the JLM for information about the PLRA (which may impose additional requirements before filing a lawsuit). Also, if you claim a violation of a state statute, make sure you meet your state's statute of limitations.

---

213. See Chapter 16 of the JLM, "Using 42 U.S.C. § 1983 and 28 U.S.C. § 1331 to Obtain Relief from Violations of Federal Law," which discusses the different types of relief and remedies available in a lawsuit.

214. Henrietta D. v. Bloomberg, 331 F.3d 261, 287–88 (2d Cir. 2003) (distinguishing between individual and official capacity, and explaining that defenses that apply to individuals do not apply to entities); Bruggeman v. Blagojevich, 324 F.3d 906, 912–13 (7th Cir. 2003) (explaining that Ex Parte Young permits state officials (and not just states) to be sued in their official capacities for injunctive relief); Miranda B. v. Kitzhaber, 328 F.3d 1181, 1187–88 (9th Cir. 2003) (finding "no difference between declaring that a named officer in her official capacity represents the 'State' for purposes of the Fourteenth Amendment, and declaring that the same officer represents a 'public entity' under Title II," and "holding that Title II's statutory language does not prohibit Miranda B.'s injunctive action against state officials in their official capacities"); Carten v. Kent State Univ., 282 F.3d 391, 395–96 (6th Cir. 2002) (affirming that Ex Parte Young creates "an exception to Eleventh Amendment immunity for claims for injunctive relief against individual state officials in their official capacities," so that the plaintiff chose his defendant correctly in this suit); Randolph v. Rodgers, 253 F.3d 342, 345 (8th Cir. 2001) (affirming lower court's ruling that prison officials could be sued in their official capacities despite 11th Amendment immunity); see also Bd. of Trs. of the Univ. of Ala. v. Garrett, 531 U.S. 356, 374 n.9, 121 S. Ct. 955, 968 n.9, 148 L. Ed. 2d 866, 884 n.9 (2001) (noting that its decision that states may not be sued for money damages under ADA Title I does not prevent a person from bringing a claim for injunctive relief).

215. Bd. of Trs. of the Univ. of Ala. v. Garrett, 531 U.S. 356, 369, 121 S. Ct. 955, 965, 148 L. Ed. 2d 866, 880 (2001) (noting that "the Eleventh Amendment does not extend its immunity to units of local government," so local entities are "subject to private claims for damages under the ADA").

216. Barnes v. Gorman, 536 U.S. 181, 189, 122 S. Ct. 2097, 2103, 153 L. Ed. 2d 230, 239 (2002) (stating that, "[b]ecause punitive damages may not be awarded in private suits brought under Title VI of the 1964 Civil Rights Act, it follows that they may not be awarded in suits brought under § 202 of the ADA and § 504 of the Rehabilitation Act").

A JAILHOUSE LAWYER'S MANUAL

Chapter 29: Special Issues for Prisoners with Mental Illness

Columbia Human Rights Law Review

Ninth Edition 2011

Legal Disclaimer

A Jailhouse Lawyer's Manual is written and updated by members of the Columbia Human Rights Law Review. The law prohibits us from providing any legal advice to prisoners. This information is not intended as legal advice or representation nor should you consider or rely upon it as such. Neither the JLM nor any information contained herein is intended to or shall constitute a contract between the JLM and any reader, and the JLM does not guarantee the accuracy of the information contained herein. Additionally, your use of the JLM should not be construed as creating an attorney-client relationship with the JLM staff or anyone at Columbia Law School. Finally, while we have attempted to provide information that is up-to-date and useful, because the law changes frequently, we cannot guarantee that all information is current.

CHAPTER 29

SPECIAL ISSUES FOR PRISONERS WITH MENTAL ILLNESS*

A. Introduction

This Chapter will explain your rights as a prisoner with a mental illness. Part A discusses basic information you will need in order to understand how the law applies to prisoners with a mental illness (including the definitions of important terms such as "mental illness" and "treatment"). Part B explains your right to receive treatment for a mental illness. Part C explains how and when you can refuse unwanted treatment and transfers, as well as the consequences of transfer for hospitalization. Part D details conditions of confinement, and how they intersect with mental health issues. Part E outlines considerations for pretrial detainees with mental illness. Part F describes resources available to you as a prisoner.

For more information on topics that might be important to prisoners with mental illness, see Chapter 23 of the JLM, "Your Right to Adequate Medical Care," and Chapter 28, "Rights of Prisoners with Disabilities." You should also read Part E of Chapter 23 to learn more about your right to medical privacy.

In addition, if you decide to pursue any claim based on your rights in federal court, you must read JLM, Chapter 14, "The Prison Litigation Reform Act." Failure to follow the requirements of the Prison Litigation Reform Act can lead to loss of your good-time credits, loss of your right to bring future claims in federal court without immediately paying the full filing fee, or other negative consequences. Also, if you plan to bring a federal constitutional challenge, you should read Chapter 16, "Using 42 U.S.C. § 1983 and 28 U.S.C. § 1331 to Obtain Relief From Violations of Federal Law." "Section 1983" (42 U.S.C. § 1983) is the law that allows you to sue when your constitutional rights are violated. Though this manual is intended to help you file your own lawsuit, keep in mind that it is always useful, if possible, to get assistance with your claims from a family member, friend, fellow prisoner, or lawyer. For advice on how to find a lawyer to help with your civil claims against the prison, please see Part C of Chapter 4 of the JLM, "How to Find a Lawyer."

1. Defining "Mental Illness" and "Treatment"

(a) What Is Mental Illness?

This Chapter is written for prisoners with behavioral or psychological illnesses and diagnosable symptoms or risks. You might have heard people use the terms mental illness, serious mental illness, major mental illness, mental disorder, mental abnormality, mental sickness, serious and persistent mental illness, or mentally retarded. People (including courts and legislatures) use the terms as if they mean the same thing, but they do not. Many people say "mentally ill prisoners" or "prisoners with a mental illness" when they are referring to different groups of people, such as those who are not guilty by reason of insanity ("NGIs"), those incompetent to stand trial, or those with developmental disabilities (low intellectual function that usually starts at childhood). When you read this Chapter, pay close attention to the way different terms are used to mean different things. The differences between different terms are important for you and your lawsuit.

There are many kinds of "mental illness," but some common types include Bipolar Disorder, Borderline Personality Disorder, Major Depression, Obsessive-Compulsive Disorder ("OCD"), Panic Disorder, Post-Traumatic Stress Disorder ("PTSD"), and Schizophrenia. Others include Dissociative Disorders, Dual Diagnosis or MICA (Mentally Ill and Chemically Addicted—mental illness with substance abuse), Eating Disorders, Schizoaffective Disorder, Tourette's Syndrome, and Attention-Deficit/Hyperactivity Disorder.[1] This Chapter will not discuss the separate issues of NGIs, sexual offenders, prisoners with developmental disabilities or prisoners with gender identity issues. For a discussion of matters related to sex offenders, see Chapter 32 of the JLM, "Special Considerations for Sex Offenders."

Many state laws define mental illness to include only behavioral or psychological problems with noticeable symptoms. According to the American Psychiatric Association ("APA"), a person has a mental

---

* This Chapter was revised by Katharine Skolnick, based in part on a previous version by Jennifer Moore. Special thanks to Heather Barr, John Boston, Sarah Kerr, and Amy Lowenstein for their valuable contributions.

1. See Nat'l Alliance on Mental Illness, About Mental Illness: By Illness, http://www.nami.org/Template.cfm?Section=By_Illness (last visited Jan. 31, 2010).

disorder if he suffers from (1) a behavioral or psychological pattern or series of symptoms, and (2) a present symptom, disability, or significantly increased risk of suffering death, pain, disability, or an important loss of freedom.[2] This definition of mental disorders does not cover psychological responses to particular events (like the death of a loved one) or behavior like sexual offenses.[3] Mental illnesses may last for varying periods of time. Some last for a short period and then disappear; others are ongoing. Although courts have recognized that immediate psychological trauma (sudden, serious stress) also deserves mental health treatment,[4] generally "serious" mental illnesses last longer, affect behavior, and have noticeable symptoms or risks.

To fit within most state law definitions of mental disorder, prisoners must show (1) a behavioral or psychological problem; (2) an accompanying symptom; and (3) a diagnosis of mental illness by a professional.[5] For instance, in New York, "mental illness" means having "a mental disease or mental condition which is [expressed as] … a disorder or disturbance in behavior, feeling, thinking, or judgment to such an extent that the person afflicted requires care and treatment."[6] Like the APA approach, some state laws specifically exclude sexual offenses, substance abuse, and mental retardation from the definition of mental illness.[7]

(b) What the Law and This Chapter Mean by "Treatment"

The definition of "treatment" under the law generally includes three steps: (1) diagnosis (a finding by a doctor or mental health specialist that there is a mental illness), (2) intervention (a decision to treat the illness with therapy, drugs, or other care), and (3) planning (developing a method to relieve suffering or find a cure).[8]

Whether a particular medical action qualifies as "treatment" depends on whether it is medically necessary and whether it will substantially help or cure your medical condition. Medical necessity usually involves a serious medical need, which "could well result in the deprivation of life itself" if untreated.[9] The test to determine whether treatment is "necessary" is not whether a prisoner suffers from mental illness but rather whether that mental illness "requires care and treatment."[10]

The law assumes that doctors are best able to make medical choices to treat mental illness. Therefore, whether something is appropriate treatment is a decision that judges and lawmakers leave to medical professionals. Just because a prisoner or a judge prefers a particular course of action to treat mental illness

---

2. Am. Psychiatric Ass'n, Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders at xxi (4th ed. 1994).

3. See, e.g., Kansas v. Crane, 534 U.S. 407, 412–13, 122 S. Ct. 867, 870, 151 L. Ed. 2d 856, 862 (2002) (requiring the state to distinguish between dangerous sexual offenders with a mental illness who require commitment and "ordinary" criminals); Seling v. Young, 531 U.S. 250, 253, 121 S. Ct. 727, 730, 148 L. Ed. 2d 734, 740 (2001) (distinguishing for civil commitment purposes between sexually dangerous individuals and sexually violent offenders who have a mental disorder).

4. See Carnell v. Grimm, 872 F. Supp. 746, 755–56 (D. Haw. 1994) (holding that "an officer who has reason to believe someone has been raped and then fails to seek medical and psychological treatment for the victim after taking her into custody manifests deliberate indifference to a serious medical need" (emphasis added)), appeal dismissed in part, aff'd in part, 74 F.3d 977, 979 (9th Cir. 1996) (finding that the 8th Amendment prohibition of cruel and unusual punishment, which includes denying medical and psychological care, applies to pretrial detainees).

5. See, e.g., Tex. Health & Safety Code Ann. § 571.003(14) (Vernon 2003 & Supp. 2007) ("[I]llness, disease, or condition, other than epilepsy, senility, alcoholism, or mental deficiency, that: (A) substantially impairs a person's thought, perception of reality, emotional process, or judgment; or (B) grossly impairs behavior as demonstrated by recent disturbed behavior.").

6. N.Y. Correct. Law § 400(6) (McKinney 2003). Additionally, the private settlement agreement in the case Disability Advocates, Inc. v. New York State Office of Mental Health, No. 1:02-cv-04002 (S.D.N.Y. 2007) includes a definition of "serious mental illness" that provides a heightened level of care for prisoners in Special Housing Units and keeplock. The heightened level of care is required to begin after several different programs and facilities, including the residential mental health unit, are constructed. After the settlement, New York passed a statute defining "serious mental illness" for prisoners who are in disciplinary segregated confinement in a way that closely resembles the settlement agreement's definition. The effective date of this part of the new statute is no later than July 1, 2011 and might be earlier based on when new residential mental health units are completed. See Press Release, Governor Spitzer Signs Legislation to Enhance the Care and Treatment of Prisoners With Serious Mental Illness (Jan. 31, 2010), available at http://www.ny.gov/governor/press/0129082.html.

7. See, e.g., Ala. Code § 22-52-1.1(1) (LexisNexis 2006) (stating that mental illness "excludes the primary diagnosis of epilepsy, mental retardation, substance abuse, including alcoholism, or a developmental disability").

8. Fred Cohen, The Mentally Disordered Inmate and the Law 6-4 (1998).

9. Fitzke v. Shappell, 468 F.2d 1072, 1076 (6th Cir. 1972) (quoting McCollum v. Mayfield, 130 F. Supp. 112, 115 (N.D. Cal. 1955)).

10. See, e.g., U.S. ex rel. Schuster v. Herold, 410 F.2d 1071, 1084 (2d Cir. 1969).

does not mean that this is a necessary course of treatment under the law.[11] In New York, the Commissioner of the Department of Correctional Services, in cooperation with the commissioner of mental health (the head of the department that handles mental illness issues), is responsible for establishing programs in correctional facilities for the treatment other than hospitalization. Although programs need only be as the Commissioner of the Department of Correctional Services "deem[s] appropriate" for treatment of prisoners with mental illness, the law does require that "[i]nmates with serious mental illness shall receive therapy and programming in settings that are appropriate to their clinical needs while maintaining the safety and security of the facility.[12] Although adequate medical and health services must always be provided,[13] states require different levels of psychiatric care, as not all types of care are necessary for treatment.[14]

You do not have a right to decide your treatment plan,[15] although you do have the right to mental health care that meets standards of the medical profession,[16] the right to information about your treatment's risks and alternatives, and a limited right to refuse treatment (see Part C of this Chapter). Once a decision to treat your mental illness has been made, you cannot specify which care alternatives (such as medication, counseling, or therapy) you should receive.[17] You may, however, be able to protect yourself against unfair medical treatment by challenging the necessity of a certain treatment.

2. Understanding Treatment Facilities

There are three basic types of psychiatric care that are used to treat prisoners:[18]

(1) Acute (or crisis) care, which is twenty-four hour care for prisoners whose symptoms of psychosis, suicide risk, or dangerousness justify intensive care and forced medication;
(2) Sub-acute (or intermediate) care, usually outside of a hospital for prisoners suffering from severe and chronic conditions that require intensive case management, psychosocial interventions (treatment that is both social and psychological), crisis management, and psychopharmacology (drugs that affect the mind) in a safe and contained environment; and
(3) Outpatient care, which is provided in the general population for prisoners who can function relatively normally. It can—but does not have to—include medication, psychotherapy, supportive counseling, and other interventions.

The most common type of care prisoners receive is outpatient care. If you require more intensive care, you may be treated in a hospital within the prison system or at an off-site hospital set up specifically to treat people with mental illnesses. The severity of mental illness, the types and availability of facilities, and the doctor's medical diagnosis will all factor into your placement.

The Division of Forensic Services at the New York State Office of Mental Health ("OMH") runs the New York psychiatric facility system. There are four forensic psychiatric care centers. One of them, Central New 11. See Bowring v. Godwin, 551 F.2d 44, 47–48 (4th Cir. 1977) ("We disavow any attempt to second-guess the propriety or adequacy of a particular course of treatment."); see also Russell v. Sheffer, 528 F.2d 318, 319 (4th Cir. 1975) (stating choices in medical care must be capable of characterization as cruel and unusual punishment before they will be considered "mistreatment").

---

12. N.Y. Correct. Law § 401 (McKinney 2003).

13. Estelle v. Gamble, 429 U.S. 97, 103–04, 97 S. Ct. 285, 290–91, 50 L. Ed. 2d 251, 259–60 (1976) (citing Spicer v. Williamson, 191 N.C. 487, 490, 132 S.E. 291, 293 (1926)) ("It is but just that the public be required to care for the prisoner, who cannot by reason of the deprivation of his liberty, care for himself.").

14. See, e.g., Ariz. Rev. Stat. Ann. § 31-201.01(B) (2002) ("In addition to the medical and health services to be provided pursuant to [this statute], the director may ... provide to prisoners psychiatric care and treatment." (emphasis added)).

15. See Barrett v. Coplan, 292 F. Supp. 2d 281, 285–86 (2003) (noting the right to adequate medical care "does not mean that an inmate is entitled to the care of his or her choice, simply that the care must meet minimal standards of adequacy"); see also Estelle v. Gamble, 429 U.S. 97, 107–08, 97 S. Ct. 285, 292–93, 50 L. Ed. 2d 251, 262 (1976) (rejecting a prisoner's mistreatment claim that more should have been done in the way of diagnosis and treatment, and that there were better options not pursued).

16. Barrett v. Coplan, 292 F. Supp. 2d 281, 285 (2003).

17. See, e.g., Barrett v. Coplan, 292 F. Supp. 2d 281, 285–86 (2003) (noting the right to adequate medical care "does not mean that an inmate is entitled to the care of his or her choice, simply that the care must meet minimal standards of adequacy"); see also Estelle v. Gamble, 429 U.S. 97, 107, 97 S. Ct. 285, 293, 50 L. Ed. 2d 251, 262 (1976) (rejecting a prisoner's claim of mistreatment based on the number of care options that were not pursued).

18. These general definitions are taken from Human Rights Watch, Ill Equipped: U.S. Prisons and Offenders with Mental Illness 136 (2003), available at http://www.hrw.org/reports/2003/usa1003/usa1003.pdf (last visited Jan. 31, 2010).

York Psychiatric Center, is both a regional forensic unit and the inpatient psychiatric hospital that services all prisoners in the state prisons and operates the many "satellite mental health units" and "mental health units" located within New York State prisons.[19] You should note that administrative segregation, such as solitary confinement or disciplinary segregated confinement in "special housing units" ("SHUs") or "keeplock," is not a treatment facility. Many mental health experts, advocates, and clinicians believe that these forms of isolated confinement make mental health conditions worse, and courts have recognized the harm they cause. For more information on isolation and mental health, please see Part D(1) of this Chapter.

(a) Treatment Facility Admissions in New York

In New York, whenever the doctor of a prison, jail, or other correctional institution believes you need hospitalization because of mental illness, the doctor must tell the facility superintendent, who will then apply to a judge for a commitment order. The judge will require two other doctors to examine you.[20] In New York City, the two doctors may examine you in your prison or you may be transferred to a county hospital for examination.[21] The doctors must certify (agree) that you have a mental illness and are in need of care or treatment for you to be hospitalized,[22] but first they must consider other treatment alternatives.[23] They must also consult your previous doctor if they know that you have been treated for mental illness in the past and if it is possible to do so.[24]

If the two doctors certify you need to be hospitalized to treat a mental illness, the prison superintendent will apply to a judge for permission to commit you.[25] You should receive notice of any court order and have some chance to challenge it.[26] In addition, your wife, husband, father, mother, or nearest relative must also receive notice of the decision to commit you; if you have no known relatives within the state, that notice must be given to any known friend of yours.[27] If you decide to challenge the decision, you have a right to know what the hospital's placement procedure is. You also have the right to counsel, a hearing, an independent medical opinion, and judicial review with a right to a jury trial.[28] However, you do not have a right to a hearing in an emergency, during which two doctors certify that your mental illness is likely to result in serious harm to you or to other prisoners.[29] In that case, you are still entitled to notice, counsel, an independent medical opinion, a hearing, and the right to a jury trial, but only after you arrive at a hospital.[30]

B. Your Right to Receive Treatment

This Part explains two doctrines (rules) that relate to your right to psychiatric medical care. Section 1 of this Part discusses your right to adequate medical care. This includes whether the prison must provide psychiatric care, and whether that care is adequate. Section 1 also mentions special considerations for prisoners with substance-related disorders and what medical treatment they should receive. Section 2 addresses your rights if psychiatric medical care is delayed or denied, instead of simply being inadequate.

---

19. The New York Office of Mental Health's forensic facilities include Mid-Hudson Forensic Psychiatric Center, Kirby Forensic Psychiatric Center, Rochester Regional Forensic Unit located within Rochester Psychiatric Center, and Central New York Psychiatric Center and Northeast Regional Forensic Unit located within Central New York Psychiatric Center. Within State correctional facilities, OMH operates 19 satellite mental health units with crisis beds. Bureau of Forensic Services & Criminal Procedures, http://www.omh.state.ny.us/omhweb/forensic/BFS.htm (last visited Jan. 31, 2010).

20. N.Y. Correct. Law § 402(1) (McKinney 2003).

21. N.Y. Correct. Law § 402(2) (McKinney 2003).

22. See generally N.Y. Mental Hyg. Law §§ 9.01–9.63 (McKinney 2006); see U.S. ex rel. Schuster v. Herold, 410 F.2d 1071, 1073 (2d Cir. 1969) (suggesting that to be found in need of care and treatment through inpatient hospitalization, you must be found—after proper procedures—to be so mentally ill that you pose a danger to self or others).

23. N.Y. Correct. Law § 402(1) (McKinney 2003).

24. N.Y. Correct. Law § 402(1) (McKinney 2003).

25. N.Y. Correct. Law § 402(3) (McKinney 2003).

26. N.Y. Correct. Law § 402(3) (McKinney 2003).

27. N.Y. Correct. Law § 402(3) (McKinney 2003).

28. N.Y. Correct. Law § 402(3) (McKinney 2003).

29. N.Y. Correct. Law § 402(9) (McKinney 2003).

30. N.Y. Correct. Law § 402(9) (McKinney 2003).

1. What to do if the Psychiatric Medical Care you Receive is Inadequate

You have a right to adequate medical care and treatment. Under the Eighth Amendment of the Constitution,[31] the government has an obligation to provide medical care to those people whom it is punishing by incarceration.[32] This right includes the regular medical care that is necessary to maintain your health and safety. Many states also have state statutes requiring prisons to provide medical care to prisoners.[33] For more information about this general right, read Chapter 23 of the JLM, "Your Right to Adequate Medical Care."

(a) Your Right to Adequate Psychiatric Care

Mental health care is governed by the same deliberate indifference/serious needs analysis as physical health care. Most federal circuits have held the right to adequate medical care specifically includes any psychiatric care that is necessary to maintain your health and safety.[34] In Bowring v. Godwin, an important early decision, the Fourth Circuit explicitly extended the right to medical care to mental illness treatment, noting that there is "no underlying distinction between the right [of a prisoner] to medical care for physical ills and its psychological or psychiatric counterpart."[35]

The Bowring court developed a three-part test to determine whether psychiatric care is necessary for a prisoner. Under the test, a prisoner who suffers from a mental illness is likely to have a right to mental health treatment if a health care provider determines that:

(1) the prisoner's symptoms are evidence of a serious disease or injury;
(2) that disease or injury is curable, or can be substantially improved; and
(3) the likelihood of harm to the prisoner (in terms of safety and health, including mental health) is substantial if treatment is delayed or denied.[36]

However, the right to psychiatric treatment is still subject to reasonable medical costs and a reasonable length of time for treatment.[37] Therefore, psychiatric treatment will be given to the prisoner on the basis of what is necessary, not what is desirable.[38]

---

31. U.S. Const. amend. VIII ("Excessive bail shall not be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted." (emphasis added)).

32. Estelle v. Gamble, 429 U.S. 97, 103–04, 97 S. Ct. 285, 290–91, 50 L. Ed. 2d 251, 259–60 (1976) (holding that the 8th Amendment prohibits denying needed medical care).

33. See, e.g., Ariz. Rev. Stat. Ann. § 31-201.01(D) (2002); Ga. Code Ann. § 42-5-2 (1997 & Supp. 2006).

34. See Bowring v. Godwin, 551 F.2d 44, 47 (4th Cir. 1977) (finding prisoner entitled to psychiatric treatment where a doctor has concluded that the prisoner has a serious disease that might be curable, and where delay might cause potential harm); Clark-Murphy v. Foreback, 439 F.3d 280, 292 (6th Cir. 2006) (holding that a prisoner's right to mental health care, not just physical medical care, is clearly established under the 8th Amendment); Riddle v. Mondragon, 83 F.3d 1197, 1202 (10th Cir. 1996) ("The states have a constitutional duty to provide necessary medical care to their inmates, including psychological or psychiatric care."); Woodall v. Foti, 648 F.2d 268, 272 (5th Cir. 1981) ("In balancing the needs of the prisoner against the burden on the penal system, the district court should be mindful that the essential test is one of medical necessity and not one simply of desirability."); Doty v. County of Lassen, 37 F.3d 540, 546 (9th Cir. 1994) ("[W]e now hold that the requirements for mental health care are the same as those for physical health care needs."); Torraco v. Maloney, 923 F.2d 231, 234 (1st Cir. 1991) ("The extension of the Eighth Amendment's protection from physical health needs, as presented in Estelle [v. Gamble], to mental health needs is appropriate because, as courts have noted, there is 'no underlying distinction between the right to medical care for physical ills and its psychological or psychiatric counterpart.'" (internal quotation marks omitted)); Langley v. Coughlin, 888 F.2d 252, 254 (2d Cir. 1989) ("We think it plain that from the legal standpoint psychiatric or mental health care is an integral part of medical care. It thus falls within the requirement of Estelle v. Gamble ... that it must be provided to prisoners."); Gates v. Cook, 376 F.3d 323, 343 (5th Cir. 2004) ("[M]ental health needs are no less serious than physical needs."); Inmates of Allegheny County Jail v. Pierce, 612 F.2d 754, 763 (3d Cir. 1979) (holding that prisoners with serious mental illness have a right to adequate treatment, and that psychiatric or psychological treatment should be held to the same standard as medical treatment for physical ills).

35. Bowring v. Godwin, 551 F.2d 44, 47 (4th Cir. 1977).

36. Bowring v. Godwin, 551 F.2d 44, 47–48 (4th Cir. 1977).

37. Bowring v. Godwin, 551 F.2d 44, 47–48 (4th Cir. 1977) (stating that the right to treatment is limited by reasonable cost and time, and that the test is what is medically necessary, not what is "merely desirable"). But see Kosilek v. Maloney, 221 F. Supp. 2d 156, 161 (D. Mass. 2002) (noting that it is not permissible to deny a prisoner adequate medical care just because the treatment is costly).

38. Bowring v. Godwin, 551 F.2d 44, 47–48 (4th Cir. 1977).

You should note that the Bowring test is the law only in the Fourth Circuit. Other courts are likely to consider using the standard in similar cases,[39] especially because no court has issued a disagreeing opinion. However, the only courts that must apply the test are federal courts in the Fourth Circuit. You should still cite to Bowring if you are bringing a case in another federal jurisdiction, because the court in your circuit might find it persuasive. For more information on what you may cite in your jurisdiction, see Chapter 2 of the JLM, "Introduction to Legal Research."

(b) Your Right to Treatment for Substance Abuse

The American Psychiatric Association incorporates in its definition of mental illness "substance-related disorders," which include illnesses like substance use, abuse, and withdrawal.[40] The law, however, does not always consider such diseases as rising to the level of seriousness[41] needed to require prison authorities to provide medical care to treat them.[42] But, many courts have found that prisoners have the right to treatment for substance abuse in certain circumstances. The sections below describe these situations.

(i) You Have No Right to Drug and Alcohol Rehabilitation in Prison

As a general rule, you have no right to rehabilitation while in prison.[43] Individual states or corrections departments may decide that rehabilitation is an important goal and may implement programs to achieve that aim, but the Constitution does not require them to do so. One application of this rule is that there is no right to narcotics or alcohol treatment programs in prison.[44] However, courts have at times ordered prisons to implement drug and alcohol treatment programs where their denial would otherwise lead to conditions that were so bad that they violated prisoners' rights to medical care; prisoners often raise these issues successfully in the context of broader claims about unconstitutional conditions of confinement.[45] Additionally, at least one court has found that prisoners should be "free to attempt rehabilitation or the cultivation of new socially acceptable and useful skills and habits."[46] It might be possible to argue that failure to receive drug treatment violates that freedom.

---

39. See Riddle v. Mondragon, 83 F.3d 1197, 1202 (10th Cir. 1996) (citing the Bowring test).

40. Am. Psychiatric Ass'n, Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders at 176 (4th ed. 1994).

41. A prisoner having a "serious medical need" triggers an analysis under Estelle v. Gamble, 429 U.S. 97, 104, 97 S. Ct. 285, 291, 50 L. Ed. 2d 251, 260 (1976), which provides that deliberate indifference to that serious medical need violates the 8th Amendment's ban on cruel and unusual punishment. Cases like Bowring v. Godwin, 551 F.2d 44, 47 (4th Cir. 1977), have extended this rule requiring treatment to the psychiatric context, but only where the prisoner has an illness that might be curable and where delay might cause harm. For more information on your rights when necessary treatment has been denied or delayed, please see Part B(2) of this Chapter, "Denied or Delayed Treatment."

42. See, e.g., Pace v. Fauver, 479 F. Supp. 456, 458–59 (D.N.J. 1979) ("The Court does not regard plaintiffs' desire to establish and operate an alcoholic rehabilitation program within ... [p]rison as a serious medical need for purposes of Eighth Amendment and § 1983 analysis."), aff'd, 649 F.2d 860 (3d Cir. 1981). But see Marshall v. US, 414 U.S. 417, 433 n.3, 94 S. Ct. 700, 709 n.3, 38 L. Ed. 2d 618, 629 n.3 (1974) (Marshall, J., dissenting) (citing Senate Report characterizing drug addiction as a disease); State v. Sevelin, 554 N.W.2d 521, 524, 204 Wis. 2d 127, 134 (Wis. Ct. App. 1996) ("The unambiguous meaning of 'medical care' includes treatment of all diseases. Alcoholism is a disease.")

43. Marshall v. United States, 414 U.S. 417, 421–22, 94 S. Ct. 700, 704, 38 L. Ed. 2d 618, 623 (1974) (finding no "fundamental right" to rehabilitation from narcotics addiction after conviction of a crime and confinement in a penal institution rather than in a civil facility); see also Hutto v. Finney, 437 U.S. 678, 686 n.8, 98 S. Ct. 2565, 2571 n.8, 57 L. Ed. 2d 522, 531 n.8 (1978) ("[T]he Constitution does not require that every aspect of prison discipline serve a rehabilitative purpose."); Grubbs v. Bradley, 552 F. Supp. 1052, 1124 (M.D. Tenn. 1982) (lack of rehabilitative programs does not violate the Constitution).

44. See, e.g., Pace v. Fauver, 479 F. Supp. 456, 460 (D.N.J. 1979) (holding that prison authorities and not the court should decide whether to provide alcoholism treatment to prisoners), aff'd, 649 F.2d 860 (3d Cir. 1981).

45. See, e.g., Palmigiano v. Garrahy, 443 F. Supp. 956, 989 (D.R.I. 1977) (ordering prison to establish drug and alcohol treatment program conforming to public health standards); Alberti v. Sheriff of Harris County, 406 F. Supp. 649, 677 (S.D. Tex. 1975) (requiring prison to establish treatment program for prisoners suffering from alcoholism and drug abuse in consultation with trained specialist); Barnes v. Gov't of Virgin Islands, 415 F. Supp. 1218, 1235 (D.V.I. 1976) (ordering prison to introduce drug and alcohol rehabilitation program); see also Laaman v. Helgemoe, 437 F. Supp. 269, 316–17 (D.N.H. 1977) (finding prisons have a duty to provide opportunities to overcome incarceration's degenerative aspects).

46. Laaman v. Helgemoe, 437 F. Supp. 269, 316–17 (D.N.H 1977) (creating an affirmative right to rehabilitation programs where their absence causes significant deterioration).

There is also no right to methadone or to the establishment of methadone maintenance programs in prison.[47] On the other hand, a few courts have found that you do have the right to ongoing drug treatment from programs in which you already participate.[48] This right extends primarily to pretrial detainees unable to post bail.[49] Since such individuals have not yet been found guilty and are instead in jail because they cannot afford to post bail or have been determined to be a flight risk or danger to the community, they cannot be punished beyond detention and the necessary restraint of liberty that it entails.[50] Forced rehabilitation is seen as a punishment, as is the pain suffered when methadone is discontinued. For more information on your right to treatment as a pretrial detainee, please see Part E(1) of this Chapter.

(ii) Your Right to Avoid Deterioration (Getting More Sick) While Incarcerated

Many courts have held that even if you do not have an absolute constitutional right to treatment for certain illnesses like substance abuse, you do have a right to avoid having your illness get worse while you are in prison.[51] Though some courts have not found a right to avoid getting more sick while incarcerated, several have at least found that where conditions are "so bad that serious physical or psychological deterioration is inevitable," you can state an Eighth Amendment claim of cruel and unusual punishment.[52]

So, if your drug or alcohol addiction is likely to worsen your condition, you might be able to claim failure to receive adequate treatment violates your right to avoid deterioration while in prison. Even though different federal circuits have established differing rules as to the extent of that right, at a minimum, if your deterioration results from the State's intent to cause harm,[53] you can claim the State violated your rights.

(iii) Your Right to Care for Withdrawal from Drugs and Alcohol

Another exception to the general rule that prisons do not need to provide medical care for substance-related disorders is that prisons do need to provide care for withdrawal, which can be excessively painful and dangerous, and is therefore considered a serious medical condition.[54] Because of the seriousness of withdrawal symptoms, you are entitled to treatment.[55] Most of the cases have arisen in the context of 47. See, e.g., Norris v. Frame, 585 F.2d 1183, 1188 (3d Cir. 1978) ("There is no constitutional right to methadone ...."); Hines v. Anderson, 439 F. Supp. 12, 17 (D. Minn. 1977) (finding even though prisons cannot take away prescriptions without doctor's approval, they are not required to administer methadone as part of a maintenance program).

---

48. See Norris v. Frame, 585 F.2d 1183, 1189 (3d Cir. 1978) (finding interference with pretrial detainee's status as recipient of methadone infringed his rights); Cudnik v. Kreiger, 392 F. Supp. 305, 312–13 (N.D. Ohio 1974) (holding that it violates due process to deny pretrial detainees methadone that they are already receiving as part of drug treatment).

49. Cudnik v. Kreiger, 392 F. Supp. 305, 312 (N.D. Ohio 1974) (holding that it violates due process to deny pretrial detainees methadone that they are already receiving as part of drug treatment).

50. See Cudnik v. Kreiger, 392 F. Supp. 305, 311 (N.D. Ohio 1974) (explaining that since pretrial detainees are considered innocent in the eyes of the law, they should be entitled to all liberties they would have were they not imprisoned, except that which is necessarily lost through detention).

51. Battle v. Anderson, 564 F.2d 388, 403 (10th Cir. 1977) ("We believe that while an inmate does not have a federal constitutional right to rehabilitation, he is entitled to be confined in an environment which does not result in his degeneration or which threatens his mental and physical well-being."); Ramos v. Lamm, 639 F.2d 559, 566 (10th Cir. 1980) (extending the right to avoid deterioration established in Battle to medical care context); Laaman v. Helgemoe, 437 F. Supp. 269, 316 (D.N.H 1977) (holding prisoners have an interest in avoiding physical and mental deterioration). But see Reddin v. Israel, 561 F.2d 715, 718 (7th Cir. 1977) ("[T]he state need not avoid conduct which may result in detrimental psychological effects unless the state acts in a torturous or barbarous manner or with a wanton intent to inflict pain.").

52. Grubbs v. Bradley, 552 F. Supp. 1052, 1124 (M.D. Tenn. 1982).

53. See Reddin v. Israel, 561 F.2d 715, 718 (7th Cir. 1977) ("[T]he state need not avoid conduct which may result in detrimental psychological effects unless the state acts in a torturous or barbarous manner or with a wanton intent to inflict pain.").

54. See, e.g., Kelley v. County of Wayne, 325 F. Supp. 2d 788, 791 (E.D. Mich. 2004) ("Heroin withdrawal is a serious medical condition."); Morrison v. Washington County, 700 F.2d 678, 681 (11th Cir. 1983) (concluding delirium tremens is a severe form of alcohol withdrawal that should be monitored because of the risk of death).

55. Liscio v. Warren, 901 F.2d 274, 276 (2d Cir. 1990) (finding that failing to examine pretrial detainee for three days as his health visibly declined because of alcohol withdrawal could constitute deliberate indifference); Pedraza v. Meyer, 919 F.2d 317, 319–20 (5th Cir. 1990) (finding that pretrial detainee who had not received treatment for his heroin withdrawal symptoms could have stated a claim of deliberate indifference to serious medical needs); State ex rel. Walker v. Fayette County, 599 F.2d 573, 576 (3d Cir. 1979) (per curiam) (where pretrial detainee had informed jail that he was addicted to heroin, failure to treat him for withdrawal could show deliberate indifference).

pretrial detainees going through withdrawal just after arrest, but the courts have not explicitly limited the right to treatment to pretrial detainees; if a convicted prisoner is experiencing a serious medical need due to withdrawal, he should receive treatment.

2. What to do if Treatment is Denied or Delayed

The above Subsection discussed situations in which a prisoner claims that the medical care he received is inadequate. This Subsection instead focuses on your rights when needed treatment has been deliberately (purposely) denied or delayed.[56] Although courts do not like second-guessing doctors' decisions,[57] a prison official who denies or delays treatment knowing that you need that treatment might be violating your constitutional right to be free of "cruel and unusual punishment" under the Eighth Amendment.[58] A court that finds this deliberate denial or delay will intervene to help you.

(a) You Must Satisfy the Deliberate Indifference Standard

To state a successful claim for denial or delay of treatment, you must show that prison officials acted with "deliberate indifference" to your medical or mental health needs.[59] The Supreme Court has decided that a prison official shows deliberate indifference when he "knows of and disregards an excessive risk to inmate health or safety."[60] For example, a prisoner might submit evidence that prison officials "refused to treat him, ignored his complaints, intentionally treated him incorrectly, or engaged in any similar conduct that would clearly evince a wanton disregard for any serious medical needs."[61]

A prison official can be deliberately indifferent by: (1) taking action (doing something); or (2) refusing to act (not doing something).[62] An example of an act showing deliberate indifference might be knowingly stopping hormone treatments for a prisoner with Gender Identity Disorder. An example of a deliberate omission might be refusing to provide a prisoner with essential medication.

Although the deliberate indifference standard has developed in the context of serious medical care, it also applies to medically necessary treatment for mental illnesses.[63] Therefore, deliberate indifference to the serious mental health needs of a prisoner violates the Eighth Amendment just as much as deliberate indifference to physical medical needs.[64]

---

56. See, e.g., Pinon v. Wisconsin, 368 F. Supp. 608, 610 (E.D. Wis. 1973) (explaining that courts usually refuse to second-guess whether a prisoner's treatment is adequate, but that the situation is different where the prisoner alleges that the facility has completely denied him treatment). See Part B(3) of Chapter 23 of the JLM, "Your Right to Adequate Medical Care," for more information on delayed or denied medical treatment.

57. See, e.g., Varnado v. Lynaugh, 920 F.2d 320, 321 (5th Cir. 1991) (finding prisoner's disagreement with medical treatment did not rise to the level of violating his rights); Smith v. Marcantonio, 910 F.2d 500, 502 (8th Cir. 1990) (granting doctor immunity where prisoner disagreed with the doctor-ordered treatment).

58. Estelle v. Gamble, 429 U.S. 97, 104, 97 S. Ct. 285, 291, 50 L. Ed. 2d 251, 260 (1976) (citing Gregg v. Georgia, 428 U.S. 153, 173, 96 S. Ct. 2909, 2925, 49 L. Ed. 2d 859, 875 (1976)) ("We therefore conclude that deliberate indifference to serious medical needs of prisoners constitutes the 'unnecessary and wanton infliction of pain ... proscribed by the Eighth Amendment.").

59. Estelle v. Gamble, 429 U.S. 97, 106, 97 S. Ct. 285, 292, 50 L. Ed. 2d 251, 261 (1976) ("[A] prisoner must allege acts or omissions sufficiently harmful to evidence deliberate indifference to serious medical needs.").

60. Farmer v. Brennan, 511 U.S. 825, 837, 114 S. Ct. 1970, 1979, 128 L. Ed. 2d 811, 825 (1994) (finding a violation only if an official knows of facts that demonstrate excessive risk to a prisoner's health and actually draws an inference of risk based on those facts, but then disregards that risk).

61. Johnson v. Treen, 759 F.2d 1236, 1238 (5th Cir. 1985) (refusing to hold for plaintiff where he did not present this evidence).

62. Estelle v. Gamble, 429 U.S. 97, 106, 97 S. Ct. 285, 292, 50 L. Ed. 2d 251, 261 (1976) ("In order to state a cognizable claim [of deliberate indifference], a prisoner must allege acts or omissions sufficiently harmful to evidence deliberate indifference to serious medical needs." (emphasis added)).

63. See Torraco v. Maloney, 923 F.2d 231, 234 (1st Cir. 1991) (reiterating that there is no underlying distinction between medical care for physical and psychological ills); Belcher v. City of Foley, 30 F.3d 1390, 1396 (11th Cir. 1994) (the right to treatment "encompasses a right to psychiatric and mental health care").

64. See, e.g., Gibson v. County of Washoe, 290 F.3d 1175, 1187 (9th Cir. 2002) ("Th[e] duty to provide medical care encompasses detainees' psychiatric needs."); Partridge v. Two Unknown Police Officers, 791 F.2d 1182, 1187 (5th Cir. 1986) ("A serious medical need may exist for psychological or psychiatric treatment, just as it may exist for physical ills.").

Many deliberate indifference claims about inadequate prison mental health care are based on the facility's lack of adequate and qualified mental health staff.[65] Several courts have concluded that the lack of an on-site psychiatrist in a large prison is unconstitutional.[66] The failure to train correctional staff to work with prisoners with mental illness can also constitute deliberate indifference.[67]

Among the deficiencies in prison mental health care that courts have held actionable are the lack of or inadequate mental health screening on intake,[68] the failure to follow up with prisoners who have known or suspected mental disorders,[69] the failure to hospitalize prisoners whose conditions cannot adequately be treated in prison,[70] gross departures from professional standards in treatment,[71] and the failure to separate prisoners with severe mental illness from those without mental illness.[72] (Mixing prisoners with mental

---

65. Greason v. Kemp, 891 F.2d 829, 837–40 (11th Cir. 1990) (prison clinic director, prison system mental health director, and prison warden could be found deliberately indifferent based on their knowing toleration of a "clearly inadequate" mental health staff); Waldrop v. Evans, 871 F.2d 1030, 1036 (11th Cir. 1989) (doctor's failure to refer a suicidal prisoner to a psychiatrist could constitute deliberate indifference); Cabrales v. County of L.A., 864 F.2d 1454, 1461 (9th Cir. 1988) (deliberate indifference was established where mental health staff could only spend "minutes per month" with disturbed prisoners), vacated, 490 U.S. 1087, 109 S. Ct. 2425, 104 L. Ed. 2d 982 (1989), reinstated, 886 F.2d 235, 236 (9th Cir. 1989); Inmates of Occoquan v. Barry, 717 F. Supp. 854, 868 (D.D.C. 1989) ("woefully short" mental health staffing supported a finding of unconstitutionality), rev'd in part sub nom. Brogsdale v. Barry, 926 F.2d 1184, 1191 (D.C. Cir. 1991) (finding qualified immunity protected mayor and correctional officials from liability, since they could not reasonably have known their conduct in permitting overcrowding violated prisoners' rights); Tillery v. Owens, 719 F. Supp. 1256, 1302–03 (W.D. Pa. 1989) ("gross staffing deficiencies" and lack of mental health training of nurses supported finding of deliberate indifference), aff'd, 907 F.2d 418 (3d Cir. 1990); Langley v. Coughlin, 715 F. Supp. 522, 539–40 (S.D.N.Y. 1989), appeal dismissed, 888 F.2d 252 (2d Cir. 1989) (use of untrained or unqualified personnel with inadequate supervision by psychiatrist supported constitutional claims); Inmates of Allegheny County Jail v. Peirce, 487 F. Supp. 638, 643 (W.D. Pa. 1980) (systemic deficiencies in mental health staffing can be held to constitute deliberate indifference); Ruiz v. Estelle, 503 F. Supp. 1265, 1339 (S.D. Tex. 1980) (setting forth six components of a minimally adequate mental health treatment program), aff'd in part and rev'd in part on other grounds, 679 F.2d 1115 (5th Cir. 1982), amended in part and vacated in part on other grounds, 688 F.2d 266 (5th Cir. 1982).

66. Balla v. Idaho State Bd. of Corr., 595 F. Supp. 1558, 1577 (D. Idaho 1984) ("There must be at least the equivalent of one full-time psychiatrist to provide treatment to those inmates capable of deriving benefit and to establish written procedures whereby inmates are analyzed and their progress monitored.").

67. Langley v. Coughlin, 709 F. Supp. 482, 483–85 (S.D.N.Y. 1989) (finding deliberate indifference where, among other reasons, officers lacked proper training); Kendrick v. Bland, 541 F. Supp. 21, 25–26 (W.D. Ky. 1981) (incidents arising from failure to adequately train staff constituted cruel and unusual punishment); see also Sharpe v. City of Lewisburg, 677 F. Supp. 1362, 1367–68 (M.D. Tenn. 1988) (upholding jury verdict based on city and county's failure to train police to deal with mentally disturbed individuals).

68. Ruiz v. Estelle, 503 F. Supp. 1265, 1339 (S.D. Tex. 1980), aff'd in part and rev'd in part on other grounds, 679 F.2d 1115 (5th Cir. 1982), amended in part and vacated in part on other grounds, 688 F.2d 266 (5th Cir. 1982); Inmates of Occoquan v. Barry, 717 F. Supp. 854, 868 (D.D.C. 1989), rev'd in part sub nom. Brogsdale v. Barry, 926 F.2d 1184, 1191 (D.C. Cir. 1991) (finding qualified immunity protected mayor and correctional officials from liability, since they could not reasonably have known their conduct in permitting overcrowding violated prisoners' rights); Balla v. Idaho State Bd. of Corr., 595 F. Supp. 1558, 1577 (D. Idaho 1984) (adopting the Ruiz v. Estelle elements of minimally adequate care, which include screening on intake); Inmates of Allegheny County Jail v. Peirce, 487 F. Supp. 638, 642–44 (W.D. Pa. 1980); Pugh v. Locke, 406 F. Supp. 318, 324 (M.D. Ala. 1976), aff'd in part and modified sub nom. Newman v. Alabama, 559 F.2d 283 (5th Cir. 1977), rev'd in part sub nom. Alabama v. Pugh, 438 U.S. 781, 98 S. Ct. 3057; 57 L. Ed. 2d 1114 (1978).

69. Clark-Murphy v. Foreback, 439 F.3d 280, 289–92 (6th Cir. 2006) (holding certain staff members were not entitled to qualified immunity for failing to get psychiatric assistance for an obviously psychotic prisoner); Terry ex rel. Terry v. Hill, 232 F. Supp. 2d 934, 943–44 (E.D. Ark. 2002) (holding lengthy delays in transferring detainees with mental illness to mental hospital were unconstitutional); Arnold ex rel. H.B. v. Lewis, 803 F. Supp. 246, 257 (D. Ariz. 1992) (finding 8th Amendment violation in part because of the lack of an adequate system for referring prisoners with behavioral problems to psychiatric staff).

70. Arnold ex rel. H.B. v. Lewis, 803 F. Supp. 246, 257–58 (D. Ariz. 1992) (holding that prison officials' actions constituted deliberate indifference to serious medical needs which violated the Eighth Amendment).

71. Smith v. Jenkins, 919 F.2d 90, 93 (8th Cir. 1990) (care that "so deviated from professional standards that it amounted to deliberate indifference" would violate the Constitution); Greason v. Kemp, 891 F.2d 829, 835 (11th Cir. 1990) ("grossly inadequate psychiatric care" can be deliberate indifference); Waldrop v. Evans, 871 F.2d 1030, 1033–35 (11th Cir. 1989) ("grossly incompetent or inadequate care"—here, that prisoner's medication was discontinued abruptly and without reason—can constitute deliberate indifference); Langley v. Coughlin, 715 F. Supp. 522, 540–41 (S.D.N.Y. 1989) ("consistent and repeated failures ... over an extended period of time" could establish deliberate indifference).

72. Cortes-Quinones v. Jimenez-Nettleship, 842 F.2d 556, 560–61 (1st Cir. 1988) (transferring a prisoner with mental illness to general population in a crowded jail with no psychiatric facilities constituted deliberate indifference); illness with those who do not have mental illnesses might violate the rights of both groups.[73]) Courts have also held that housing prisoners with mental illness under conditions of extreme isolation is unconstitutional.[74] Another recurring situation is stopping psychiatric medications without reason, often with disastrous results.[75]

Also remember that the deliberate indifference standard applies to a significant denial or delay[76] of adequate medical care. If you feel that you have been denied mental health treatment, or if you feel that it has been unnecessarily delayed, and you wish to claim deliberate indifference, you must:

(1) state facts that are sufficient to allege a serious medical need for which medical care has not been provided; and
(2) assert that a prison official must have been aware of the need for medical care, or at least of facts which might have led the official to believe there was a need for medical care.[77]

Inmates of Occoquan v. Barry, 717 F. Supp. 854, 868 (D.D.C. 1989) (prisoners with mental health problems must be placed in a separate facility and not in the administrative/punitive segregation area), rev'd in part sub nom. Brogsdale v. Barry, 926 F.2d 1184, 1191 (D.C. Cir. 1991) (finding qualified immunity protected mayor and correctional officials from liability); Langley v. Coughlin, 709 F. Supp. 482, 484–85 (S.D.N.Y. 1989) (placement of prisoners with mental illness in punitive segregation resulted in conditions that might violate the 8th Amendment), appeal dismissed, 888 F.2d 252 (2d Cir. 1989); Tillery v. Owens, 719 F. Supp. 1256, 1303–04 (W.D. Pa. 1989) (Constitution requires separate unit for those with severe mental illness, i.e., those who will not take their medication regularly, maintain normal hygienic practices, accept dietary restrictions, or report symptoms of illness), aff'd, 907 F.2d 418 (3d Cir. 1990); Finney v. Mabry, 534 F. Supp. 1026, 1036–37 (E.D. Ark. 1982) (Constitution requires separate facility for the "most severely mentally disturbed" prisoners); Inmates of Allegheny County Jail v. Peirce, 487 F. Supp. 638, 644 (W.D. Pa. 1980) (jail must establish a separate area for prisoners who "are seriously disturbed and require observation, protection, or restricted confinement"); see also Morales Feliciano v. Hernandez Colon, 697 F. Supp. 37, 48 (D.P.R. 1988) (prisoners with mental illness may not be housed in a jail for more than 24 hours), aff'd on other grounds sub nom. Morales-Feliciano v. Parole Bd. of P.R., 887 F.2d 1 (1st Cir. 1989); Delgado v. Cady, 576 F. Supp. 1446, 1452, 1456 (E.D. Wis. 1983) (upholding the housing of psychotic prisoners in segregation unit and finding unconstitutional the coerced double celling of suicidal prisoners with other prisoners: "[I]t is cruel and unusual punishment to force an inmate to share a cell with a suicidal person solely to act as a prophylactic agent. It is the duty of the staff and not the inmates to provide surveillance over suicidal inmates.").

73. DeMallory v. Cullen, 855 F.2d 442, 444–46 (7th Cir. 1988) (the allegation of a prisoner without mental illness that he was knowingly housed in a high-security unit with prisoners with mental illness, who caused filthy and dangerous conditions, stated an 8th Amendment claim against prison officials); Nolley v. County of Erie, 776 F. Supp. 715, 738 (W.D.N.Y. 1991) (finding that the automatic segregation of an HIV-positive prisoner with prisoners with mental illness violated the prisoner's due process rights because of "the stigma associated with being involuntarily placed in [the segregated ward, which was] known to house inmates who were ... psychologically unstable [in addition to HIV-positive, because] both of these classifications could have engendered serious adverse consequences for her" therefore, her confinement "was qualitatively different from the punishment normally suffered by a person convicted of a crime."), rev'd in part on other grounds, 798 F. Supp. 123 (W.D.N.Y. 1992); Tillery v. Owens, 719 F. Supp. 1256, 1303 (W.D. Pa. 1989) (citing increased tension for prisoners without mental illness and danger of retaliation against those with mental illness), aff'd, 907 F.2d 418 (3d Cir. 1990); Langley v. Coughlin, 709 F. Supp. 482, 484–85 (S.D.N.Y. 1989), appeal dismissed, 888 F.2d 252 (2d Cir. 1989); Langley v. Coughlin, 715 F. Supp. 522, 543–44 (S.D.N.Y. 1988); see Hassine v. Jeffes, 846 F.2d 169, 178 n.5 (3d Cir. 1988) (holding prisoners could seek relief from the consequences of other prisoners' failure to receive adequate mental health services).

74. Jones'El v. Berge, 164 F. Supp. 2d 1096, 1125–26 (W.D. Wis. 2001) (granting preliminary injunction requiring removal of prisoners with serious mental illness from "supermax" prison, where inmates spend all but four hours per week in their cells); Madrid v. Gomez, 889 F. Supp. 1146, 1265–66 (N.D. Cal. 1995) (holding keeping prisoners with mental illness or those at a high risk for suffering injury to mental health in Pelican Bay isolation unit unconstitutional), rev'd in part on other grounds, 190 F.3d 990 (9th Cir. 1999). But see Scarver v. Litscher, 434 F.3d 972, 976–77 (7th Cir. 2006) (holding that prison officials who were not shown to have known that keeping a psychotic prisoner under conditions of extreme isolation and heat would aggravate his mental illness could not be found deliberately indifferent).

75. See Greason v. Kemp, 891 F.2d 829, 831–33 (11th Cir. 1990) (prisoner killed himself); Waldrop v. Evans, 871 F.2d 1030, 1032 (11th Cir. 1989) (prisoner blinded and castrated himself). Cf. Wakefield v. Thompson, 177 F.3d 1160, 1164 (9th Cir. 1999) (holding 8th Amendment requires prison officials to provide prisoners with mental illness with a supply of medication upon release). But see Campbell v. Sikes, 169 F.3d 1353, 1367–68 (11th Cir. 1999) (holding discontinuation of medication by doctor who misdiagnosed a prisoner, having not obtained her medical records but having read a summary, was not deliberate indifference).

76. See, e.g., Monmouth County Corr. Inst. Inmates v. Lanzaro, 834 F.2d 326, 346–47 (3d Cir. 1987) (holding that prison officials are deliberately indifferent if they delay care "in order to make [you] suffer," or if they "erect arbitrary and burdensome procedures that result in interminable delays" to care) (internal citations omitted).

77. Farmer v. Brennan, 511 U.S. 825, 845–46, 114 S. Ct. 1970, 1983–84, 128 L. Ed. 2d 811, 831–32 (1994).

A court will find you suffered deliberate indifference if you are able to show both of these requirements. To further explain these elements, we examine each part of a deliberate indifference claim in more detail.

(i) You Must Show Serious Medical Need

The first part of your deliberate indifference claim must include facts that show you had a serious medical need for which you did not receive treatment. A medical need is "serious" when there is a substantial risk that you will suffer serious harm if you do not receive adequate treatment.[78] Courts have also defined a "serious medical need" as one that a doctor has diagnosed as requiring treatment or one that is so obvious that a non-doctor could easily recognize the need.[79] For example, where a prisoner has attempted suicide, the court has found a serious medical need.[80]

(ii) You Must Show Actual Knowledge of Your Serious Medical Need

For the second part of your deliberate indifference claim, you must show prison officials actually knew you needed mental health care but still failed to treat you.[81] In Farmer v. Brennan, the Supreme Court explained a prison official "knows" of a risk when he is not only aware of facts that would lead to the conclusion that the prisoner faces a substantial risk of serious harm but also actually comes to that conclusion.[82] In other words, this part of the deliberate indifference test is subjective (from the point of view of that particular prison official); he must actually believe you will suffer some serious harm before a court will find he had knowledge of the risk.[83] But, if the risk is so obvious, a jury can assume the prison official knew of the risk. For example, the Farmer Court noted that if a plaintiff shows the risk of prisoner attacks was "longstanding, pervasive, well-documented, or expressly noted by prison officials in the past, and the circumstances suggest that the defendant-official being sued had been exposed to information concerning the risk and thus 'must have known' about it," that could be enough to show actual knowledge of the risk.[84]

(b) What Does Not Count as Deliberate Indifference?

Courts will refuse to find deliberate indifference in some situations. The deliberate indifference standard is meant to address "unnecessary and wanton infliction of pain."[85] Acts or omissions that are not purposeful, or where the prison officials had no reason to know you might suffer serious harm, will not satisfy the standard.[86] A complaint alleging inadequate psychiatric care because officials did not pursue treatment the prisoner would have chosen will not meet the deliberate indifference standard.[87] This is because prison officials have the right to exercise discretion in deciding what treatment is adequate for a serious medical

78. Harrison v. Barkley, 219 F.3d 132, 136 (2d Cir. 2000).

79. See, e.g., Gaudreault v. Municipality of Salem, Mass., 923 F.2d 203 (1st Cir. 1990).

80. See e.g., Perez v. Oakland County, 466 F.3d 416, 423–25 (6th Cir. 2006) (finding that the prisoner's suicide attempts raised a genuine issue as to whether the treating doctor had been deliberately indifferent to a serious medical need); Sanville v. McCaughtry, 266 F.3d 724, 733 (7th Cir. 2001) (holding that the "serious need" element was met where the prisoner suffered from a mental illness that led him to commit suicide, and finding that mental illness more generally poses a serious medical need).

81. Farmer v. Brennan, 511 U.S. 825, 837, 114 S. Ct. 1970, 1979, 128 L. Ed. 2d 811, 825 (1994) ("[A] prison official cannot be found liable under the Eighth Amendment … unless the official knows of and disregards an excessive risk to inmate health or safety.").

82. Farmer v. Brennan, 511 U.S. 825, 838, 114 S. Ct. 1970, 1979, 128 L. Ed. 2d 811, 825 (1994). ("[A]n official's failure to alleviate a significant risk that he should have perceived but did not, while no cause for commendation, cannot under our cases be condemned as the infliction of punishment").

83. Farmer v. Brennan, 511 U.S. 825, 837, 114 S. Ct. 1970, 1979, 128 L. Ed. 2d 811, 825 (1994) ("[T]he official must both be aware of facts from which the inference could be drawn that a substantial risk of serious harm exists, and he must also draw the inference.").

84. Farmer v. Brennan, 511 U.S. 825, 842, 114 S. Ct. 1970, 1981–82, 128 L. Ed. 2d 811, 829 (1994) ("[A] factfinder may conclude that a prison official knew of a substantial risk from the very fact that the risk was obvious.").

85. Estelle v. Gamble, 429 U.S. 97, 104, 97 S. Ct. 285, 291, 50 L. Ed. 2d 251, 260 (1976) (quoting Gregg v. Georgia, 428 U.S. 153, 173, 96 S. Ct. 2909, 2925, 49 L. Ed. 2d 859, 875 (1976)).

86. Estelle v. Gamble, 429 U.S. 97, 105, 97 S. Ct. 285, 291, 50 L. Ed. 2d 251, 260 (1976) ("An accident, although it may produce added anguish, is not on that basis alone to be characterized as wanton infliction of unnecessary pain.").

87. See United States v. DeCologero, 821 F.2d 39, 42 (1st Cir. 1987) ("[T]hough it is plain that an inmate deserves adequate medical care, he cannot insist that his institutional host provide him with the most sophisticated care that money can buy.").

need. In view of this discretion, courts will not find deliberate indifference when prison officials were merely negligent,[88] made a mistake, or had a difference of opinion regarding adequate medical care.[89]

Similarly, a complaint based on malpractice (improper or negligent treatment by a doctor) or misdiagnosis (a medical mistake) will not meet the high deliberate indifference standard.[90] Thus, "a complaint that a doctor has been negligent in diagnosing or treating a medical condition does not state a valid claim of medical mistreatment under the Eighth Amendment."[91] You may instead be able to file a medical malpractice claim alleging negligence. See JLM, Chapter 17, "The State's Duty to Protect You and Your Property: Tort Actions," for more information about negligence and how to file a tort claim.

(c) How to Bring a Deliberate Indifference Claim Under Section 1983

If you think your case does meet the standard for deliberate indifference, you may bring a claim of deliberate indifference to your personal health and well-being under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 ("Section 1983"). You can use Section 1983 to sue cities and local governments for constitutional violations, including, for instance, the government body controlling the institution where the violation took place.[92] For detailed information on bringing a claim under this law, please read Chapter 16 of the JLM, "Using 42 U.S.C. § 1983 and 28 U.S.C. § 1331 to Obtain Relief from Violations of Federal Law." If you plan to file your suit in federal court, you should also read Chapter 14 of the JLM, "The Prison Litigation Reform Act."

You can also use Section 1983 to challenge inadequate prison medical care as an Eighth Amendment violation.[93] To prove inadequacy, you must show: (1) you have a mental health need that is serious enough that denial of treatment violates the Constitution; and (2) the prison was "deliberately indifferent" to this serious mental health need.[94] You must show the policy or custom at the prison directly caused the constitutional violation.

In the context of a mental health complaint, you should keep a few things in mind. First, if you believe you suffer from a mental illness and want medical treatment, you should tell prison officials. If you are afraid you will hurt yourself or other people, you should tell prison officials that too. Prison officials can only be held accountable under the deliberate indifference standard if they have actual knowledge of, or some other reason to believe, that you have a mental illness that requires treatment.[95]

C. What to do if you Receive Unwanted Treatment

While the previous Parts of this Chapter focused on your right to receive medical treatment for your mental illness, this Part discusses treatment that you do not want. You should also look at Part C(5)(a) and (E)(1) of Chapter 23 of the JLM, "Your Right to Adequate Medical Care."

1. You Have the Right to Informed Consent

You have a right to receive enough information about a potential medical treatment to make a reasonable decision whether to try the treatment.[96] After you learn about the treatment, you can choose

---

88. Farmer v. Brennan, 511 U.S. 825, 835, 114 S. Ct. 1970, 1978, 128 L. Ed. 2d 811, 824 (1994) ("[D]eliberate indifference entails something more than mere negligence, [but] the cases are also clear that it is satisfied by something less than acts or omissions for the very purpose of causing harm or with knowledge that harm will result.").

89. See Banuelos v. McFarland, 41 F.3d 232, 235 (5th Cir. 1995) (finding that, except in exceptional circumstances, a prisoner's disagreement with his medical treatment is not enough for a deliberate indifference claim).

90. See, e.g., Domino v. Tex. Dept. of Crim. Justice, 239 F.3d 752, 756 (5th Cir. 2001) ("It is indisputable that an incorrect diagnosis by prison medical personnel does not suffice to state a claim for deliberate indifference."); United States ex rel. Hyde v. McGinnis, 429 F.2d 864, 867 (2d Cir. 1970) (finding that the "faulty judgment on the part of the prison doctor in choosing to administer one form of the same medication instead of another" is not deliberate indifference).

91. Estelle v. Gamble, 429 U.S. 97, 106, 97 S. Ct. 285, 292, 50 L. Ed. 2d 251, 261 (1976).

92. See Monell v. Dept. of Soc. Servs., 436 U.S. 658, 694–95, 98 S. Ct. 2018, 2037–38, 56 L. Ed. 2d 611, 638 (1978).

93. Gil v. Vogilano, 131 F.Supp.2d 486 (S.D.N.Y. 2001).

94. Farmer v. Brennan, 511 U.S. 825, 834, 114 S. Ct. 1970, 1977, 128 L. Ed. 2d 811, 823 (1994).

95. R.T. V. Gross, 298 F.Supp.2d 289, 297-99 (N.D.N.Y. 2003) (finding that prison official who did not believe an inmate's symptoms were serious could not be deliberately indifferent).

96. Pabon v. Wright, 459 F.3d 241, 246 (2d Cir. 2006) (holding that since prisoners have a right to refuse treatment, they have a right to get enough information about the treatment "to make an informed decision" whether to accept or refuse it). To prove that officials violated this right, you must show: (1) government officials did not tell you enough about the treatment for you to make an informed decision, (2) because you couldn't make an informed decision, you were given treatment that you would have refused if you had been informed, and (3) the prison officials acted with deliberate whether or not to give permission for the doctor to treat you.[97] This right is known as "informed consent," and it means that you have the right to learn about all treatment options and the risks associated with each option before you allow mental health doctors or other caregivers to treat you. Informed consent is a way of making sure that you understand, before you start the treatment, what a treatment includes, and what effects it may have on you.[98] Informed consent is an important part of your right to refuse treatment.[99] If you do not give your consent, you are refusing treatment; however, informed consent does have some limits. If you pose a danger to yourself or others, the doctor may be able to treat you in a manner that the doctor believes will immediately help and benefit you.[100]

Doctors have a duty to obtain informed consent from patients, including prisoners,[101] before treating them. A doctor must almost always inform you of options and risks when there is penetration of the body (such as with a scalpel, needle, or pill).[102] Also, when the direct side effects of treatment are painful or serious, your informed consent is usually required.[103] Some states specifically require by law that doctors consider alternative forms of care,[104] and inform you of the procedures and risks associated with each. You should research what the law is in your state.

You should carefully consider whether or not to give your consent to receive treatment. State law varies as to whether informed consent for one treatment will extend to all risks associated with a particular procedure or any additional procedures that a doctor believes will help you. In New York, if you have not consented to a previous treatment, doctors cannot imply consent to a separate course of treatment, even in an emergency.[105] The rule in California is that consent to a previous treatment does not mean consent to another course of treatment; there, a court held that a prisoner who consented to shock treatment did not necessarily consent to administration of drugs that produced nightmares.[106] indifference to your right to your right to be informed. Pabon v. Wright, 459 F.3d 241, 246 (2d Cir. 2006).

---

97. See In re Ingram, 689 P.2d 1363, 1368, 102 Wash. 2d 827, 836 (1984) (en banc) (finding a person has a right to choose one medical treatment over another, or to refuse treatment, even if the treatment she refuses is more likely to cure her); Schloendorff v. Society of N.Y. Hospital 211 N.Y. 125, 130 105 N.E. 92, 93 (1914) ("Every human being of adult years and sound mind has a right to determine what shall be done with his own body; and a surgeon who performs an operation without his patient's consent commits an assault."), superseded by statute on other grounds; Superintendent of Belchertown State Sch. v. Saikewicz, 373 Mass. 728, 738–39, 370 N.E.2d 417, 424 (1977) (finding that both the constitution and other laws protect a person from "nonconsensual invasion of his bodily integrity").

98. Zebarth v. Swedish Hosp. Med. Ctr., 499 P.2d 1, 8, 81 Wash. 2d 12, 23 (1972) (en banc) (defining "informed consent" as enough information to let a patient decide his treatment "by reasonably balancing the probable risks against the probable benefits."); see Clarkson v. Coughlin, 898 F. Supp. 1019, 1048 (S.D.N.Y. 1995) (referring to New York's statutory definition of informed consent, which requires the medical professional to tell the patient about "such alternatives [to the treatment or medication in question] and the reasonably foreseeable risks and benefits involved as a reasonable [medical or dental] ... practitioner under similar circumstances would have disclosed in a manner permitting the patient to make a knowledgeable evaluation") (citing N.Y. Pub. Health Law § 2805-d(1) (McKinney 1993)).

99. Pabon v. Wright, 459 F.3d 241, 246 (2d Cir. 2006) (holding prisoner's constitutionally protected liberty interest in refusing medical care encompasses a right to receive information that would enable a reasonable person to decide).

100. See Washington v. Harper, 494 U.S. 210, 225–26, 110 S. Ct. 1028, 1039, 108 L. Ed. 2d 178, 201 (1990) (holding that in order to protect other prisoners, a prison can give anti-psychotic medication against a prisoner's will).

101. See U.S. ex rel. Schuster v. Herold, 410 F.2d 1071, 1084 (2d Cir. 1969) (finding a constitutional violation of prisoner's rights where he received different procedural treatment than civilians receive).

102. See Cruzan v. Dir., Mo. Dept. of Health, 497 U.S. 261, 269, 110 S. Ct. 2841, 2846, 111 L. Ed. 2d 224, 236 (1990) ("[T]his notion of bodily integrity has been embodied in the requirement that informed consent is generally required for medical treatment."); See also N.Y. Pub. Health Law § 2805-d(1) (McKinney 2007). informed consent is generally required for medical treatment."); N.Y. Pub. Health Law § 2805-d (McKinney 2007).

103. See, e.g., Clites v. State, 322 N.W.2d 917, 922–23 (Iowa Ct. App. 1982) (en banc) (rejecting administration of "major tranquilizers" to patient with a mental illness without consent where the medical industry standard required written consent from patient or guardian).

104. N.Y. Correct. Law §§ 402(2) (McKinney 2007) (Stating that before committing an imate, a doctor must "consider alternative forms of care and treatment available"); see also Cobbs v. Grant, 502 P.2d 1, 9–10, 8 Cal. 3d 229, 242–43 (1972) (finding doctors must reasonably disclose alternatives to a proposed treatment plan and the risks of any treatment).

105. In re Storar, 52 N.Y.2d 363, 376, 420 N.E.2d 64, 70, 438 N.Y.S.2d 266, 272 (1981), superseded by statute on other grounds.

106. Mackey v. Procunier, 477 F.2d 877, 877–79 (9th Cir. 1973).

2. Medication Over Prisoner's Objection

Medication is one form of treatment. Prisoners have a limited right to refuse antipsychotic or psychotropic drugs.[107] Such medications help cure certain symptoms of mental illness but also alter a person's perception, emotions, or behavior. For example, psychotropic drugs can have serious side effects, such as nightmares and muscle tics (sudden movements). The law provides protection against undue administration of such serious drugs by giving prisoners the right to refuse treatments that interfere to a great degree with the body. However, this right is not absolute—there are some circumstances when medication can be administered, even over your objection.[108]

(a) Your Right to Refuse Medication Under the Due Process Clause

Under the Due Process Clause of the United States Constitution, "no State shall … deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law."[109] Some deprivations are so important that the Constitution requires states to establish processes to ensure that you are not deprived unfairly. For example, in Vitek v. Jones,[110] the Supreme Court found that characterizing a prisoner as mentally ill and moving him to a psychiatric hospital were such serious ("grievous") losses that the State was required to have procedural protections in place to make sure that the loss was fair.[111] These losses included the harm to the prisoner's reputation and the change in conditions of confinement.[112]

Similarly, before the State can force you to take medication, it must have procedural protections in place to make sure you are not receiving the medication randomly or unfairly. You must receive procedures, including notice and a hearing, before you can be involuntarily medicated.[113] A decision to treat you with drugs triggers procedural due process protections because drugs can produce serious and irreversible side effects[114] that represent a significant State intrusion into your body.[115]

---

107. Washington v. Harper, 494 U.S. 210, 221–22, 110 S. Ct. 1028, 1036–37, 108 L. Ed. 2d 178, 197–98 (1990) (holding antipsychotic drugs can be administered only if "a mental disorder exists which is likely to cause harm if not treated" and if one psychiatrist has prescribed and another reviewed the treatment); Cruzan v. Dir., Mo. Dept. of Health, 497 U.S. 261, 278, 110 S. Ct. 2841, 2851, 111 L. Ed. 2d 224, 242 (1990) ("[P]risoners possess 'a significant liberty interest in avoiding the unwanted administration of antipsychotic drugs under the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.'") (quoting Washington v. Harper, 494 U.S. 210, 221–22, 110 S. Ct. 1028, 1036, 108 L. Ed. 2d 178, 198 (1990)).

108. Washington v. Harper, 494 U.S. 210, 227, 110 S. Ct. 1028, 1039–40, 108 L. Ed. 2d 178, 201–02 (1990) (holding that "given the requirements of the prison environment, the Due Process Clause permits the State to treat a prison inmate who has a serious mental illness with antipsychotic drugs against his will, if the inmate is dangerous to himself or others and the treatment is in the inmate's medical interest") OK. The government may also medicate criminal defendants to make them competent to stand trial for certain serious charges, as long as the treatment is medically appropriate, unlikely to have serious side effects, and necessary "significantly to further important governmental trial-related interests." Sell v. United States, 539 U.S. 166, 179, 123 S. Ct. 2174, 2184–2185 , 156 L. Ed. 2d 197, 211 (2003); See United States v. Baldovinos, 434 F.3d 233, 241–42 (4th Cir. 2006) (finding that involuntarily medicating a mentally ill defendant was not in his best interests but was solely done to make him competent to stand trial, but upholding the conviction based on the federal plain error rule after finding that the mistake did not seriously affect the fairness, integrity, or public reputation of the judicial proceedings), cert. denied, 546 U.S. 1203, 126 S. Ct. 1407, 164 L. Ed. 2d 107 (2006).

109. U.S. Const. amend. XIV, § 1.

110. Vitek v. Jones, 445 U.S. 480, 487–90, 100 S. Ct. 1254, 1261–62, 63 L. Ed. 2d 552, 561–63 (1980).

111. Vitek v. Jones, 445 U.S. 480, 488, 100 S. Ct. 1254, 1261, 63 L. Ed. 2d 552, 561 (1980).

112. Vitek v. Jones, 445 U.S. 480, 488, 100 S. Ct. 1254, 1261, 63 L. Ed. 2d 552, 561 (1980).

113. Washington v. Harper, 494 U.S. 210, 221–22, 110 S. Ct. 1028, 1036–37, 108 L. Ed. 2d 178, 198 (1990); see, e.g., Mills v. Rogers, 457 U.S. 291, 299 n.16, 102 S. Ct. 2442, 2448 n.16, 73 L. Ed. 2d 16, 23 n.16 (1982) (noting that involuntary administration of psychotropic drugs bears on liberty interests), cert. denied, 484 U.S. 1010, 108 S. Ct. 709, 98 L. Ed. 2d 660 (1988).

114. Washington v. Harper, 494 U.S. 210, 229–30, 110 S. Ct. 1028, 1041, 108 L. Ed. 2d 178, 203–04 (1990) (describing the side effects of antipsychotic drugs, including severe spasms and neurological dysfunction); see Nat'l Alliance on Mental Illness, About Medications, http://www.nami.org/template.cfm?section=About_Medications (last visited March 10, 2010); Nat'l Inst. of Mental Health, U.S. Dept. of Health & Human Servs., Medications, (2002), available at http://www.nimh.nih.gov/health/publications/medications/medications.pdf. To order National Institute of Mental Health publications, call (301) 443-4513 or (866) 615-6464 (toll-free), or (301) 443-8431 (TTY), or write to the National Institute of Mental Health, Office of Communications, 6001 Executive Blvd., Room 8184, MSC 9663, Bethesda, MD 20892-9663.

115. Youngberg v. Romeo, 457 U.S. 307, 316, 102 S. Ct. 2452, 2458, 73 L. Ed. 2d 28, 37 (1982) ("[Liberty] from bodily

(b) Your Right to Refuse Medication Based on State Law

Your right to refuse medication may come not only from the Constitution, but also from state laws that specifically require procedural protections (such as notice and a hearing) before you can be forcibly medicated.[116] If your state has such a law, it must follow the procedures set out by the law.[117] If the State wishes to avoid the process that is laid out by state law, it must have a rational reason for doing so, or the avoidance will be considered a due process violation. In other words, the State must show that it has legitimate reasons, reasonably related to its interests, before it may take away an expectation that was granted through its own law.

Unless the State can show both that a prisoner has a mental illness and is dangerous,[118] or that a state rule has so many protections that it is unlikely that the prisoner will receive medication unfairly,[119] it cannot force a prisoner to take medication without some procedural protections.

(c) Your Right to Refuse Medication Under the Eighth Amendment

In some circumstances, you also have a right to refuse medication under the Eighth Amendment, which prohibits cruel and unusual punishment.[120] Administration of drugs as a means of punishment (rather than as treatment) is unconstitutional.[121]

Forcible treatment with psychotropic medication that causes pain or fright can constitute cruel and unusual punishment, violating the Eighth Amendment.[122] The district court in Souder v. McGuire cited cases in the Eighth and Ninth Circuits[123] that held that treating prisoners with drugs without consent may raise Eighth Amendment claims. In those cases, the courts found that drugs causing pain or fright could invade the body and mental processes to an unconstitutional degree.

While some courts have emphasized that an allegation that you were given a particular kind of medicine is not enough to prove that giving you the drug was cruel and unusual (and thus a violation of the Eighth Amendment),[124] the Supreme Court has held that states may not avoid the obligations of the Eighth Amendment just by calling a medical act a "treatment."[125] restraint always has been recognized as the core of the liberty protected by the Due Process Clause from arbitrary governmental action.") (quoting Greenholtz v. Neb. Penal Inmates, 442 U.S. 1, 18, 99 S. Ct. 2100, 2109, 60 L. Ed. 2d 668, 682–83 (1979)); Washington v. Harper, 494 U.S. 210, 229, 110 S. Ct. 1028, 1041, 108 L. Ed. 2d 178, 203 (1990) ("The forcible injection of medication into a nonconsenting person's body represents a substantial interference with that person's liberty.").

---

116. See, e.g., Wash. Rev. Code Ann. § 71.05.215(1) (West 2008 & Supp. 2009) ("Right to Refuse Antipsychotic Medication").

117. Washington v. Harper, 494 U.S. 210, 221, 110 S. Ct. 1028, 1036, 108 L. Ed. 2d 178, 198 (1990) (finding that a Washington state policy requiring a finding of mental illness and dangerousness before a prisoner can be forcibly medicated with antipsychotic drugs "creates a justifiable expectation on the part of the inmate that the drugs will not be administered unless those conditions exist"); Vitek v. Jones, 445 U.S. 480, 488, 100 S. Ct. 1254, 1261, 63 L. Ed. 2d 552, 561–62 (1980) ("We have repeatedly held that state statutes may create liberty interests that are entitled to the procedural protections of the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.").

118. Washington v. Harper, 494 U.S. 210, 232–33, 110 S. Ct. 1028, 1042–43, 108 L. Ed. 2d 178, 204–05 (1990) (finding that a state policy was consistent with Due Process because review of medical treatment required asking (1) whether the prisoner had a mental illness, and (2) whether the mental illness made the prisoner a danger to himself or to others, and it required constant monitoring of drug dosage).

119. Washington v. Harper, 494 U.S. 210, 222, 235, 110 S. Ct. 1028, 1037, 1044, 108 L. Ed. 2d 178, 198, 207 (1990) (upholding a state policy that required psychiatric evaluation, notice, and hearing for a prisoner before forcible medication); see also Lappe v. Loeffelholz, 815 F.2d 1173, 1176 (8th Cir. 1987) (finding that prisoner's constitutional rights were not violated by a treatment transfer where he had access to written notice, an adversarial hearing with an independent decision maker, and legal counsel).

120. U.S. Const. amend. VIII.

121. Washington v. Harper, 494 U.S. 210, 241, 110 S. Ct. 1028, 1047, 108 L. Ed. 2d 178, 211 (1990) ("Forced administration of antipsychotic medication may not be used as a form of punishment.").

122. Souder v. McGuire, 423 F. Supp. 830, 831–32 (M.D. Pa. 1976) ("[I]nvoluntary administration of drugs which have a painful or frightening effect can amount to cruel and unusual punishment, in violation of the Eighth Amendment.").

123. Knecht v. Gillman, 488 F.2d 1136, 1140 (8th Cir. 1973) (holding that a drug that caused prisoners to vomit for 15 minutes to an hour "can only be regarded as cruel and unusual unless the treatment is being administered to a patient who knowingly and intelligently has consented to it"); Mackey v. Procunier, 477 F.2d 877, 878 (9th Cir. 1973) (finding that "serious constitutional questions respecting cruel and unusual punishment or impermissible tinkering with the mental processes" could be raised where a prisoner who had consented to shock treatment was given extra drugs, without his consent, that caused fright and nightmares).

124. See, e.g., Gittlemacker v. Prasse, 428 F.2d 1, 6 (3d Cir. 1970) ("It is only where an inmate's complaint of

(d) Limitations on Your Right to Refuse Medication

The right to refuse medication does not mean that the State can never medicate you against your will. Instead, it means that the State must provide a process (such as a hearing) that reduces the chance that the decision to medicate you will be random or arbitrary.

One important limitation on a prisoner's right to refuse medication is danger or emergency. Prisons may administer psychotropic drugs over a prisoner's objection if the prisoner poses a danger to himself or others. Receiving medication against your will is called "medication over objection." In Washington v. Harper,[126] the Supreme Court upheld a state policy allowing treating a prisoner without consent if a licensed psychiatrist found that the prisoner suffered from a mental disorder, and the prisoner was "gravely disabled"[127] or posed a "likelihood of serious harm"[128] to himself or others. Therefore, situations in which a prisoner presents a danger to himself or the general prison population are an exception to the right to refuse treatment. A good example is a Kansas prisoner who objected to psychotropic medication but was not allowed to refuse treatment because he had previously destroyed his prison cell and started fights with other prisoners.[129]

There are a few other limitations on a prisoner's right to refuse treatment. A prisoner may receive medication over objection despite objections or religious beliefs if the State can prove that its interests are legitimate.[130] Also, the State may give drugs to a prisoner over his objections if the court feels that enough procedural protections are in place to ensure that the decision to treat with drugs was reasonable.[131] You should also note that, in some cases, if a doctor finds that medication is necessary and in the prisoner's medical interest, then the State does not have to grant a prisoner's request to stop taking the drugs so that he can prove he can do without them.[132]

A determination of whether the right to refuse is limited in any given case "must be defined in the context of the inmate's confinement."[133] This means that the court will review your current prison conditions, the threat of danger that you pose to yourself or others, and the procedures that the State has in place to protect you from an unfair decision to treat you with drugs.[134]

(e) How Do Courts Decide Whether State Interests Are Legitimate?

To determine whether or not the State may rightfully force a prisoner to take medication due to a situation of danger or emergency, courts apply what is called the Turner v. Safley rational basis test. With this test, the court tries to see if the State's decision to treat a non-consenting prisoner with psychotropic improper or inadequate medical treatment depicts conduct so cruel or unusual as to approach a violation of the Eighth Amendment's prohibition of such punishment that a colorable constitutional claim is presented.").

---

125. See Trop v. Dulles, 356 U.S. 86, 95, 78 S. Ct. 590, 595, 2 L. Ed. 2d 630, 639 (1958) (finding that substance—not a label—determines the meaning of a statute).

126. Washington v. Harper, 494 U.S. 210, 110 S. Ct. 1028, 108 L. Ed. 2d 178 (1990).

127. Wash. Rev. Code Ann. § 71.05.020(17) (West 2008 & Supp. 2009) (defining that term as a condition resulting from a mental disorder where there is a danger of serious physical harm from inability to provide for one's "essential human needs" like health or safety, or where there is a severe decrease in function evidenced by repeated and increasing loss of control over actions).

128. Wash. Rev. Code Ann. § 71.05.020(23) (West 2008 & Supp. 2009) (defining the term as a substantial risk that a person will physically harm himself, others, or property of others evidenced by threats or suicide attempts or actual harm to himself, others, or property).

129. Sconiers v. Jarvis, 458 F. Supp. 37, 38–39 (D. Kan. 1978).

130. Smith v. Baker, 326 F. Supp. 787, 787–88 (W.D. Mo. 1970) (denying relief to a prisoner who objected to administration of drugs "against [his] will and religious belief"), aff'd, 442 F.2d 928 (8th Cir. 1971).

131. See, e.g., Lappe v. Loeffelholz, 815 F.2d 1173, 1176 (8th Cir. 1987) (finding that prisoner's constitutional rights were not violated by a treatment transfer where he had written notice, an adversarial hearing with an independent decision maker, and legal counsel).

132. See, e.g., Sullivan v. Flannagan, 8 F.3d 591, 592 (7th Cir. 1993) (finding the Illinois Department of Corrections, which had forced prisoner to take mind-altering drugs against his will for five years after he was determined to be a danger to others, was not constitutionally required to give him a chance to stop taking the drugs to prove he didn't need them).

133. Washington v. Harper, 494 U.S. 210, 222, 110 S. Ct. 1028, 1037, 108 L. Ed. 2d 178, 198 (1990).

134. See Washington v. Harper, 494 U.S. 210, 222, 110 S. Ct. 1028, 1037, 108 L. Ed. 2d 178, 198 (1990) (holding that certain procedures, such as having different psychiatrists prescribe and review medication, ensure "that the treatment in question will be ordered only if it is in the prisoner's medical interests, given the legitimate needs of his institutional confinement").

drugs is "reasonably related to legitimate penological interests."[135] Legitimate State interests include the health and safety of the public, the prisoner, and the general prison population. The rational basis test presumes that State interests are legitimate. This means that a court will consider the State's choice to medicate a prisoner reasonable unless it does not serve one or more of these legitimate State goals.

There are some common arguments that prisoners use to counter the presumption that the State's actions are the result of a legitimate interest. One challenge to medication over objection is that the decision to medicate is unfair or arbitrary (random or not supported by a reason).[136] In such cases, courts consider a competing risk that the determination of danger will be incorrect and may cause harm to the prisoner's reputation.[137] In order to avoid mistakes in determining if there is a danger, taking the drugs must be in the prisoner's medical interest and can only be for treatment purposes.[138]

In addition, states must provide certain procedural safeguards to ensure that the decision to medicate is not arbitrary or erroneous. Common safeguards include (1) an administrative hearing before an independent decision maker (someone not involved in the prisoner's treatment but who may come from within the institution);[139] (2) written notice;[140] (3) the right to be present at an adversary hearing;[141] and (4) the right to present and cross-examine witnesses.[142] While the State may provide a lawyer to represent the prisoner in administrative hearings, providing a non-attorney adviser may satisfy due process.[143]

3. Challenging Transfers for Treatment

(a) What Is a Treatment Transfer?

Many treatments are available for prisoners and sometimes these treatments must be administered at a site outside of the prison, requiring that the prisoner be transferred from his present location in order to be treated. A prisoner may submit to the transfer or voluntarily agree to various forms of treatment including medication, counseling, therapy, or commitment to a psychiatric center. Or, in some cases, the prisoner may be treated involuntarily. This Section explains when the prison can and cannot transfer you for treatment if you refuse to consent to the transfer.

Prisoners who suffer from a mental illness may be treated at one of several possible locations. For more detail on these facilities, please see Part A(2) above. Transferring you to a facility that has a significantly different quality than the general conditions of prison confinement might violate your constitutional rights.

(b) Procedural Safeguards Under the Due Process Clause

Lawful imprisonment may take away some of your rights, but you still have a right to basic protections.[144] In certain circumstances, basic procedures must be in place to protect against unfair actions on the part of the State. For more on procedural due process, see Chapter 18 of the JLM, "Your Rights at Prison Disciplinary Hearings," and Chapter 23, "Your Right to Adequate Medical Care." A hearing and written notice are two common examples of procedures that might be required, often before a prisoner can be involuntarily committed to a psychiatric hospital.[145]

---

135. Washington v. Harper, 494 U.S. 210, 223, 110 S. Ct. 1028, 1037, 108 L. Ed. 2d 178, 199 (1990) (citing Turner v. Safley, 482 U.S. 78, 89, 107 S. Ct. 2254, 2261, 96 L. Ed. 2d 64, 79 (1987), superseded by statute on other grounds).

136. See, e.g., Washington v. Harper, 494 U.S. 210, 217, 110 S. Ct. 1028, 1034, 108 L. Ed. 2d 178, 195 (1990) (challenging as arbitrary a decision allowing treatment with antipsychotic drugs against the will of a prisoner with mental illness without a judicial hearing).

137. Vitek v. Jones, 445 U.S. 480, 494, 100 S. Ct. 1254, 1264, 63 L. Ed. 2d 552, 565–66 (1980) (finding that characterization of mental illness, transfer, and treatment had "stigmatizing consequences").

138. Washington v. Harper, 494 U.S. 210, 227, 110 S. Ct. 1028, 1040, 108 L. Ed. 2d 178, 202 (1990).

139. Vitek v. Jones, 445 U.S. 480, 494–96, 100 S. Ct. 1254, 1264–65, 63 L. Ed. 2d 552, 566–67 (1980).

140. Vitek v. Jones, 445 U.S. 480, 494–96, 100 S. Ct. 1254, 1264–65, 63 L. Ed. 2d 552, 566–67 (1980).

141. Vitek v. Jones, 445 U.S. 480, 494–96, 100 S. Ct. 1254, 1264–65, 63 L. Ed. 2d 552, 566–67 (1980).

142. Vitek v. Jones, 445 U.S. 480, 494–96, 100 S. Ct. 1254, 1264–65, 63 L. Ed. 2d 552, 566–67 (1980).

143. Washington v. Harper, 494 U.S. 210, 236, 110 S. Ct. 1028, 1044, 108 L. Ed. 2d 178, 207 (1990).

144. Wolff v. McDonnell, 418 U.S. 539, 555, 94 S. Ct. 2963, 2974, 41 L. Ed. 2d 935, 950 (1974) ("[T]hough his rights may be diminished by the needs and exigencies of the institutional environment, a prisoner is not wholly stripped of constitutional protections when he is imprisoned for crime.").

145. Vitek v. Jones, 445 U.S. 480, 495–96, 100 S. Ct. 1254, 1265, 63 L. Ed. 2d 552, 566–67 (1980); see, e.g., Washington v. Harper, 494 U.S. 210, 235, 110 S. Ct. 1028, 1044, 108 L. Ed. 2d 178, 207 (1990) (reviewing a Washington state policy which required a hearing and notice of that hearing). See also Superintendent, Mass. Corr. Inst. at Walpole v.

Prison to hospital transfers might mean a significant change in living conditions and type of confinement. A determination of mental illness by a doctor and subsequent transfer does not automatically mean that a prisoner has a mental illness for the purposes of other laws in the state.[146] Still, there is a chance that the prisoner might suffer harm to his reputation. When the risk of harm is high, your constitutional right to due process might be triggered.

In addition, if the State tries to avoid the requirements imposed by its own laws, then a law giving you the right to procedures before transfer will also trigger due process protections. Where state regulations require a finding of mental illness before transfer, the State creates an "objective expectation" in the prisoner that there will be a procedure to determine whether or not a mental illness exists.[147] Without such procedures, the prisoner could suffer a due process violation. In sum, due process protection may be required because of the risk of harm (physical or reputational) to you from a particular state act or because the State gave you an expectation through the law it created that some particular act would be followed. The due process protection to which you are entitled is the same, no matter how your liberty interest is implicated.[148]

In Vitek v. Jones, the Supreme Court found that a Nebraska statute requiring a finding of mental illness before transfer to an outside mental facility created an expectation among prisoners that transfer would occur only if they were found to have mental illness.[149]

Under Vitek, the State must adequately protect your liberty interests (if it has created them through state law) in the transfer process by providing:

(1) Written notice that the prison is considering your transfer;
(2) A hearing;
(3) An opportunity to present witness testimony and cross-examine state witnesses at the hearing;
(4) An independent decision maker;
(5) A written statement by the decision maker stating the reasons and evidence relied on for your transfer;
(6) Legal assistance from the State if you cannot afford your own; and
(7) Effective and timely notice of rights (1) through (6).[150]

All of these protections are triggered if your liberty interests are implicated and there is a chance that you will suffer a serious loss. Failure to provide them violates your rights.

(i) Are Your Liberty Interests Implicated?

Courts determine whether the State can deprive you of a liberty interest by balancing the interests of the State (for example, prison safety) with your liberty interest in freedom from random deprivations (for example, the right to agree or disagree to medication). If the interest of the prisoner is found to be stronger

---

Hill, 472 U.S. 445, 454, 105 S. Ct. 2768, 2773, 86 L. Ed. 2d 356, 364 (1985) (noting that when a prisoner is entitled to due process, Wolff v. McDonnell, 418 U.S. 539, 94 S. Ct. 2963, 41 L. Ed. 2d 935 (1974) requires that the inmate receive "(1) advance written notice of the disciplinary charges; (2) an opportunity, when consistent with institutional safety and correctional goals, to call witnesses and present documentary evidence in his defense; and (3) a written statement by the factfinder of the evidence relied on and the reasons for the disciplinary action.").

146. See In re Will of Stephani, 250 A.D. 253, 254–57, 294 N.Y.S. 624, 624 (3d Dept. 1937) (finding that a prisoner who had died while confined in a mental hospital was not necessarily incompetent to write his will, even though the New York Surrogate's Court Act required that to be valid, someone writing his will "at the time of executing it, was in all respects [mentally] competent to make a will, and not under any restraint").

147. Vitek v. Jones, 445 U.S. 480, 489–90, 100 S. Ct. 1254, 1262, 63 L. Ed. 2d 552, 562–63 (1980) (holding that the prisoner had a state-created liberty interest because Nebraska law created an objective expectation that a prisoner would not be transferred unless he suffered from a mental disease or defect that could not be adequately treated in the prison).

148. See Washington v. Harper, 494 U.S. 210, 222, 110 S. Ct. 1028, 1037, 108 L. Ed. 2d 178, 198 (1990) (holding the Due Process Clause gives a person no greater right than that recognized under state laws that create a liberty interest).

149. Vitek v. Jones, 445 U.S. 480, 489–90, 100 S. Ct. 1254, 1262, 63 L. Ed. 2d 552, 562–63 (1980).

150. Vitek v. Jones, 445 U.S. 480, 494–95, 100 S. Ct. 1254, 1264–65, 63 L. Ed. 2d 552, 566 (1980). However, you may not be entitled to all of these procedures. In Shakur v. Selsky, 391 F.3d 106, 119 (2d Cir. 2004), the Court held that "regardless of state procedural guarantees, the only process due an inmate is that minimal process guaranteed by the Constitution, as outlined in" Wolff v. McDonnell, 418 U.S. 539, 94 S. Ct. 2963, 41 L. Ed. 2d 935 (1974) (emphasis in original). As explained above in note 146, the minimal process may be limited to (1) advance written notice; (2) an opportunity for you to call witnesses and present documentary evidence in your defense; and (3) a written document from the fact-finder explaining the reasons for your transfer and the evidence relied on.

than the interest of the State, then the individual is entitled to due process protections.[151] Whether or not a prisoner has a state-created liberty interest depends on whether the loss the prisoner faces is serious.

Liberty interests are limited; prisoners are entitled to freedom from restraint only to the extent that restraint cannot exceed the conviction sentence in an unexpected manner.[152] This is true unless there is an "atypical and significant hardship on the inmate in relation to the ordinary incidents of prison life."[153] So, for due process to apply, you must have both a liberty interest and a deprivation of that liberty that imposes a significant and atypical (unusual) hardship. Only if both of these factors are present are you entitled to due process protections[154] like written notice and a hearing. Transfer from one prison to another within the State's system does not necessarily create a liberty interest.[155]

The Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution prohibits states from denying any person equal protection of the laws. In other words, state laws must treat each person in the same manner as others in similar conditions and circumstances. In the context of mental health, the equal protection rights of prisoners who are being committed entitle them to substantially the same procedures as those available to free persons subjected to an involuntary commitment proceeding.[156] In United States ex rel. Schuster v. Herold, the Second Circuit found that a New York prisoner who was transferred from prison to an institution for the criminally insane was deprived of equal protection because there was an unlawful difference between procedural protections given to civilians facing involuntary commitment and those given to prisoners.[157] Therefore, to determine the procedural protections that apply in your state, you should 151. Mathews v. Eldridge, 424 U.S. 319, 334–35, 96 S. Ct. 893, 902–03, 47 L. Ed. 2d 18, 33 (1976) (developing a three-part balancing test to determine whether state-provided procedural protections are sufficient).

---

152. Sandin v. Connor, 515 U.S. 472, 483–84, 115 S. Ct. 2293, 2300, 132 L. Ed. 2d 418, 429–30 (1995) (recognizing that while states may create liberty interests, these interests are generally limited to freedom from restraint that is significant and atypical rather than expected), overruled on other grounds by Cray v. Carey, 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 43286 (E.D. Cal. June 26, 2006) (unpublished).

153. Sandin v. Connor, 515 U.S. 472, 484–45, 115 S. Ct. 2293, 2300–01, 132 L. Ed. 2d 418, 430–31 (1995) (finding that holding a prisoner in a segregated housing unit for 30 days "though concededly punitive, does not present a dramatic departure from the basic conditions of [prisoner's] indeterminate sentence"), overruled on other grounds by Cray v. Carey, 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 43286 (E.D. Cal. June 26, 2006) (unpublished).

154. Frazier v. Coughlin, 81 F.3d 313, 317 (2d Cir. 1996) ("To prevail, [the prisoner] must establish both that the confinement or restraint creates an 'atypical and significant hardship' under Sandin, and that the state has granted its inmates, by regulation or by statute, a protected liberty interest in remaining free from that confinement or restraint."). See also Palmer v. Richards, 364 F.3d 60, 64 (2d Cir. 2004) ("Factors relevant to determining whether the plaintiff endured an 'atypical and significant hardship' include 'the extent to which the conditions of the disciplinary segregation differ from other routine prison conditions' and 'the duration of the disciplinary segregation imposed compared to discretionary confinement.'" (quoting Wright v. Caughlin, 132 F.3d 133, 136 (2d Cir. 1998)).

155. See Montanye v. Haymes, 427 U.S. 236, 242, 96 S. Ct. 2543, 2547, 49 L. Ed. 2d 466, 471 (1976) (holding that "no Due Process Clause liberty interest of a duly convicted prison inmate is infringed when he is transferred from one prison to another within the State, whether with or without a hearing, absent some right or justifiable expectation rooted in state law that he will not be transferred except for misbehavior or upon the occurrence of other specified events"); Meachum v. Fano, 427 U.S. 215, 225, 96 S. Ct. 2532, 2538, 49 L. Ed. 2d 451, 459 (1976) (finding mere transfer of prisoner from one prison to another within the state's system does not implicate prisoner's liberty interests and does not violate due process). But see Wilkinson v. Austin, 545 U.S. 209, 223–24, 125 S. Ct. 2384, 2394-95, 162 L. Ed. 2d 174, 190-91 (2005) (noting that Ohio's Supermax facility "imposes an atypical and significant hardship under any plausible baseline" and thus prisoners have a liberty interest in not being confined in the facility).

156. U.S. ex rel. Schuster v. Herold, 410 F.2d 1071, 1073 (2d Cir. 1969) ("[W]e believe that before a prisoner may be transferred to a state institution for insane criminals, he must be afforded substantially the same procedural safeguards as are provided in civil commitment proceedings ...."); see also Souder v. McGuire, 516 F.2d 820, 821–22 (3d Cir. 1975) (finding that "serious equal protection and due process issues" were raised regarding the constitutionality of a Pennsylvania mental health statute that gave the warden a choice whether or not to adopt certain procedures for the commitment of people already in a correctional facility even though the same procedures were mandatory for the involuntary commitment of "non-confined," civilian adults); Evans v. Paderick, 443 F. Supp. 583, 585 (E.D. Va. 1977) (rejecting defendant's argument that a Virginia civil commitment procedure was not required when the person to be committed is a state prisoner); People v. Arendes, 86 Misc. 2d 468, 470, 382 N.Y.S.2d 684, 686 (Sup. Ct. Queens County 1976) ("[W]here the issue in the first instance is mental illness itself or dangerousness, there is no valid ground to distinguish between a civilian and a prisoner since the issues have no connection to the circumstance of incarceration and the same psychiatric criteria will apply to all people to determine mental illness."); cf. Baxstrom v. Herold, 383 U.S. 107, 110, 86 S. Ct. 760, 762, 15 L. Ed. 2d 620, 623 (1966) (holding that a New York state prisoner was denied equal protection of the laws by the statutory procedure that allowed him to be civilly committed at the expiration of his sentence without jury review available to all other civilly committed people in New York).

157. U.S. ex rel. Schuster v. Herold, 410 F.2d 1071, 1073 (2d Cir. 1969).

review civil commitment laws in addition to laws that govern corrections facilities. We discuss procedural protections and treatment transfers later in this Chapter.

(ii) What is a Serious Loss?

Courts might consider transfers to be a serious loss because of three factors: (1) there is a high risk of stigma associated with a declaration of mental illness; (2) there is an actual change in the type of confinement; and (3) there is actual behavior modification treatment.[158] As with challenges to medication over objection, these changes require that the State provide procedural protections.

The test courts apply to determine if a loss is serious examines whether the loss is "significant and atypical."[159] Significant and atypical state actions are those actions not similar to prison conditions or those that substantially alter the environment, duration, or degree of the prison condition. For example, a prisoner who was placed in segregated confinement did not suffer a serious loss that implicated a liberty interest because the segregation was of the same duration and degree as that of his normal prison conditions.[160]

More specifically, under the Vitek standard, "significant and atypical" means that the loss suffered by the prisoner is different than the loss already suffered as a result of prison confinement.[161] So, the loss to the prisoner in Vitek was "serious" enough to require due process protections because he had reasonably developed an "objective expectation" based on the state law[162] and the risk that mistaken mental illness could damage the prisoner's reputation was great.[163] In another case, a loss of good-time credits was significant because such a loss of credits meant that there was a change in the length of the prison term.[164] Finally, confinement in a psychiatric prison unit might be far more restrictive than prison, and therefore might be considered a serious loss, implicating a liberty interest.[165]

(iii) When Due Process Procedures Are Not Required For Transfer

The protections discussed in the previous Subsection might not be necessary if the transfer is voluntary or on an emergency basis. Additionally, the Due Process Clause does not protect every change in your conditions of confinement, even if that change has a negative impact on you.[166] This is true even if the prisoner has a reasonable expectation that state actions will produce a particular result. In some jurisdictions, the law says that the State may not need to have procedures in place for you to participate in

---

158. Vitek v. Jones, 445 U.S. 480, 488, 100 S. Ct. 1254, 1261, 63 L. Ed. 2d 552, 561 (1980).

159. Sandin v. Conner, 515 U.S. 472, 486, 115 S. Ct. 2293, 2301, 132 L. Ed. 2d 418, 431 (1995) (holding that disciplinary segregation of a prisoner "did not present the type of atypical, significant deprivation" of a state-created liberty interest after comparing conditions inside and outside of disciplinary segregation in the prison and finding that the placement "did not work a major disruption in his environment"), overruled on other grounds by Cray v. Carey, 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 43286 (E.D. Cal. June 26, 2006) (unpublished). See also Tellier v. Fields, 280 F.3d 69, 80 (2d Cir. 2000) (finding that as a factual matter, "a confinement of 514 days under conditions that differ markedly from those in the general population" may be 'atypical and significant.'").

160. Sandin v. Conner, 515 U.S. 472, 486, 115 S. Ct. 2293, 2301, 132 L. Ed. 2d 418, 431 (1995) (finding segregated confinement that "mirrored" prison conditions was not significant and atypical), overruled on other grounds by Cray v. Carey, 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 43286 (E.D. Cal. June 26, 2006) (unpublished); see also Frazier v. Coughlin, 81 F.3d 313, 317–18 (2d Cir. 1996) (finding no significant deprivation of a liberty interest to prisoner who failed to show that confinement conditions in a SHU were "dramatically different" from basic prison conditions). But see Tellier v. Fields, 280 F.3d 69 (2d Cir. 2000) (holding that an extended confinement in the SHU may amount to a deprivation of a liberty interest).

161. Vitek v. Jones, 445 U.S. 480, 493, 100 S. Ct. 1254, 1264, 63 L. Ed. 2d 552, 565 (1980) (finding "transfer of a prisoner to a mental hospital is [not] within the range of confinement justified by imposition of a prison sentence").

162. Vitek v. Jones, 445 U.S. 480, 489–90, 100 S. Ct. 1254, 1261–62, 63 L. Ed. 2d 552, 562–63 (1980).

163. Vitek v. Jones, 445 U.S. 480, 495, 100 S. Ct. 1254, 1265, 63 L. Ed. 2d 552, 566 (1980).

164. Wolff v. McDonnell, 418 U.S. 539, 557, 94 S. Ct. 2963, 2975, 41 L. Ed. 2d 935, 951 (1974) (holding that a state law allowing a reduction in sentence for good time, and providing that such credit would only be forfeited for serious misbehavior, created a recognizable liberty interest).

165. U.S. ex rel. Schuster v. Herold, 410 F.2d 1071, 1078 (2d Cir. 1969) ("Not only did the transfer effectively eliminate the possibility of [the prisoner's] parole, but it significantly increased the restraints upon him, exposed him to extraordinary hardships, and caused him to suffer indignities, frustrations and dangers, both physical and psychological, [that] he would not be required to endure in a typical prison setting.").

166. Meachum v. Fano, 427 U.S. 215, 224, 96 S. Ct. 2532, 2538, 49 L. Ed. 2d 451, 459 (1976) ("[W]e cannot agree that any change in the conditions of confinement having a substantial adverse impact on the prisoner involved is sufficient to invoke the protections of the Due Process Clause.").

clinical evaluations[167] (you are not considered to be under the same great hardship in this case as with commitment). In a few states, procedural protections do not have to occur before transfer, but may instead occur promptly after physical transfer.[168]

As with challenges to medication over objection, there are limits to a transfer challenge. Transfer to a mental health facility without a hearing is generally not a due process violation when a prisoner poses an immediate threat to himself or the general population.[169] These transfers are called emergency commitments. However, a hearing must be held as soon as possible after commitment.[170]

If it is determined you will be transferred to a psychiatric hospital or unit, you cannot challenge a transfer back to prison after treatment because no liberty interest existed.[171] For example, in Washington, D.C., prisoners may be moved, with the superintendent's certification, from psychiatric hospitals back to prisons after being restored to health.[172] In New York, administrative transfers from a state hospital to a prison do not violate due process because they are not considered to be punishment.[173] You should check the laws in your state to determine the necessary steps the state must take to transfer you back to prison.

4. If You Are Transferred to a Hospital or Other Treatment Facility

If you are transferred or committed to a psychiatric facility, you maintain many of the same rights you had in prison, including the right to treatment and the right to adequate medical care. Similarly, if you are confined in a hospital or treatment facility prior to serving your criminal sentence in prison, you may be entitled to have your time spent there count toward your sentence.

(a) How Long Will I Be Held?

Generally, the duration of commitment is left to the judgment of clinical mental health staff and prison officials, but it cannot be longer than your criminal sentence unless you are first granted significant due process protections.[174] Under New York State law, for example, the psychiatric hospital director may apply for a new commitment after your sentence expires.[175] If this happens in a state where there are requirements set up for a civil commitment proceeding, your criminal sentence is not relevant to any post-sentence confinement, and the State must provide the same procedural safeguards before committing or holding you for psychiatric care that it would if you were a non-prisoner.[176] This means that if the State determines you need further commitment and treatment after your prison sentence has ended, you will be treated as a non-prisoner. If the psychiatric hospital director successfully extends commitment past your term sentence, you have the right to another hearing before a jury to determine whether commitment to a civilian mental health facility is appropriate.[177]

(b) What Happens to My Good-Time Credits?

In some states, a prisoner may lose the opportunity to earn good-time credits after a mental illness determination and hospitalization.[178] The reasoning that many courts give for this policy is that the goals of

---

167. See Trapnell v. Ralston, 819 F.2d 182, 184–85 (8th Cir. 1987) (finding there was no need for a pre-transfer hearing where the transfer was temporary and for evaluation purposes only); United States v. Jones, 811 F.2d 444, 448 (8th Cir. 1987) (finding "a temporary transfer for a psychological evaluation places no more of an imposition on a prisoner than does a transfer for administrative reasons," and transfers for administrative reasons do not require pre-transfer hearings).

168. Baugh v. Woodward, 808 F.2d 333, 336 (4th Cir. 1987).

169. See, e.g., Mignone v. Vincent, 411 F. Supp. 1386, 1389 (S.D.N.Y. 1976).

170. See, e.g., Mignone v. Vincent, 411 F. Supp. 1386, 1389 (S.D.N.Y. 1976).

171. Jackson v. Fair, 846 F.2d 811, 815 (1st Cir. 1988) (holding that as the prisoner did not have a liberty interest in remaining at a psychiatric hospital, no hearing was required before returning the prisoner to prison).

172. D.C. Code Ann. § 24-503(b) (LexisNexis 2005).

173. Cruz v. Ward, 558 F.2d 658, 660 (2d Cir. 1977).

174. Baxstrom v. Herold, 383 U.S. 107, 110, 86 S. Ct. 760, 762, 15 L. Ed. 2d 620, 623 (1966) (holding that a New York prisoner "was further denied equal protection of the laws by his civil commitment to an institution maintained by the Department of Correction beyond the expiration of his prison term without a judicial determination that he is dangerously mentally ill such as that afforded to all so committed except those, like [the prisoner], nearing the expiration of a penal sentence").

175. N.Y. Correct. Law § 402(10) (McKinney 2003).

176. Baxstrom v. Herold, 383 U.S. 107, 110, 86 S. Ct. 760, 762, 15 L. Ed. 2d 620, 623 (1966).

177. N.Y. Correct. Law § 402(11) (McKinney 2003).

178. See, e.g., Urban v. Settle, 298 F.2d 592, 593 (8th Cir. 1962) (finding that a prisoner who has "been removed to a hospitalization differ from the goals of imprisonment. Hospitalization is meant to treat prisoners with mental illness,[179] while incarceration is intended to punish and also rehabilitate.[180] However, the Eighth Circuit found that there is a difference between meritorious credits (credits that are given at the State's discretion) and statutory good-time credits (credits that a state statute specifically grants for particular behavior). Unlike discretionary credits, statutory credits come from state laws. Therefore, a loss of statutory credits based on a mental health assessment could violate your constitutional right to equal protection under the Fourteenth Amendment, which prohibits states from applying the law differently to different citizens in the same condition and circumstances.[181]

Even if the law in your jurisdiction does not permit you to continue to earn credits while you are hospitalized, your existing credits may be held in abeyance (paused) during treatment, meaning that all good-time credits that would have been credited are restored when you are transferred back to prison.[182] However, if you have existing credits, in many jurisdictions they will not apply until you are restored to health; in other words, you are not entitled to early release if you are still hospitalized on your early release date.[183] Other states, in contrast, do permit you to receive good-time credits even while in the hospital. For example, the Connecticut Supreme Court has found that the language of Connecticut's statute orders the corrections commissioner to apply earned good-time credit to any prisoner's sentence,[184] in keeping with the idea that the law should treat equally prisoners with mental illness confined in hospitals and those incarcerated in prisons.[185] Since the law varies according to the statutes of each jurisdiction, you should check the law in your state, or the United States Code if you are in federal prison, to determine what happens to your credits during transfer to a hospital.

(c) Can I Receive Credit for Pre-Sentence Confinement in a Hospital or Treatment Program?

Though the law varies significantly by state regarding whether you can receive custody or conduct credits for time spent and good behavior in institutions other than prisons, there are a few general rules you can use to determine if you are entitled to custody credit.[186] First, if the facility you are in before you receive hospital for defective delinquents" under federal law to determine mental competency is not entitled to receive further good time for conditional release purposes until, in the judgment of the superintendent of the hospital, he has become "restored to sanity or health"); Bush v. Ciccone, 325 F. Supp. 699, 701 (W.D. Mo. 1971) (holding under the express provisions of 18 U.S.C. § 4241, credit for good time is suspended as to a prisoner who has been found by a Board of Examiners to be insane or of unsound mind). But see Sawyer v. Sigler, 320 F. Supp. 690, 699 (D. Neb. 1970) (distinguishing between meritorious good time, which is permissive and may be withheld, and statutory good time, which cannot be denied without violating the Equal Protection Clause of the 14th Amendment if the withholding does not result from the prisoner's misconduct), aff'd, 445 F.2d 818 (8th Cir. 1971). The federal law that these cases mention has changed several times, so you should proceed with care, researching the current case and statutory law. If you are in state custody, you should check your state's statutes.

---

179. See, e.g., People v. Callahan, 50 Cal. Rptr. 3d 677, 683, 144 Cal. App. 4th 678, 687 (Cal. Ct. App. 2006) (finding that where a prisoner was confined pretrial to treat him to restore his competency to stand trial, he could not later recover credit for that time).

180. People v. Smith, 175 Cal. Rptr. 54, 56, 120 Cal. App. 3d 817, 822–23 (Cal. Ct. App. 1981) ("The purposes of the provision for 'good time' credits ... are [to encourage prisoners] to conform to prison regulations … and to make an effort to participate in what may be termed 'rehabilitative activities' ... The rationale of 'good time' credit as a reward for behavioral conformity does not readily fit the company of the mentally disturbed." (quoting People v. Saffell, 599 P.2d 92, 97, 25 Cal. 3d 223, 233, 157 Cal. Rptr. 897, 903 (Cal. 1979)).

181. Cochran v. Kansas, 316 U.S. 255, 257, 62 S. Ct. 1068,1070, 86 L. Ed. 1453, 1455 (1942).

182. Dobbs v. Neverson, 393 A.2d 147, 150 n.9 (D.C. 1978)

183. See, e.g., Dobbs v. Neverson, 393 A.2d 147, 154 (D.C. 1978) (holding a prisoner transferred from a prison to a hospital under the D.C. transfer statute is not entitled to statutory early release unless restored to mental health).

184. See, e.g., Murray v. Lopes, 529 A.2d 1302, 1305–06, 205 Conn. 27, 34–35 (Conn. 1987).

185. Murray v. Lopes, 529 A.2d 1302, 1307–08, 205 Conn. 27, 36–38 (Conn. 1987).

186. Custody credit is statutory credit that prisoners may be awarded for their time spent in confinement prior to trial and sentencing. The reason that many states allow prisoners to count these days as part of their sentence is that it would be unfair to treat defendants who can post bail differently than those who do not and who therefore have to stay in jail. See, e.g., People v. Callahan, 50 Cal. Rptr. 3d 677, 680–81, 144 Cal. App. 4th 678, 684 (Cal. Ct. App. 2006) (stating that the purpose of actual custody credit statute is to eliminate unequal treatment of indigent and non-indigent defendants). However, courts have taken differing approaches as to whether to grant that time to prisoners detained for reasons other than inability to post bail or bond, like psychiatric evaluation or drug treatment. This section will discuss some of these approaches so that you can figure out whether you are entitled to credit for any time you spent pre-sentence in an institution other than a jail.

your sentence is the "functional equivalent of a jail," you might be entitled to credit.[187] Second, some courts make distinctions based on whether the program you are in is voluntary[188] or involuntary.[189] These are general rules, though, so you should make sure to find out how courts have interpreted the law in your state.

(i) Credit for Time in a Mental Hospital

If you were housed in a hospital before being sentenced to prison, you might be entitled to custody credit for your time there. State statutes and courts' interpretations of those laws determine whether you can receive custody credits. Several states have found that, because time in these institutions is similar to being in jail, you should receive credit.[190] As one court stated, "The physical place of confinement is not important as the [defendant] continu[ing] to be in jail while held in custody at the hospitals. [The prisoner] was not free on bail, had no control over his place of custody and was never free to leave the hospitals. For all practical intents and purposes, he was still in jail."[191] But other courts have found prisoners housed in psychiatric hospitals pre-sentence underwent treatment rather than incarceration and therefore could not receive custody credits for that time.[192] These courts reason the two types of confinement are different in kind: imprisonment punishes, while hospitalization or civil commitment provide treatment.[193] So, some courts have found awarding credits for time in non-penal institutions toward prison sentences does not make sense.

(ii) Credit for Time in Drug Treatment

The law varies as to whether you may receive credit for time you spent in narcotics or alcohol treatment prior to serving your sentence. Some states permit credit,[194] and some states do not.[195] Additionally, like in 187. Maniccia v. State, 931 So.2d 1027,1030 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 2006).

188. Pennington v. State, 398 So.2d 815, 816 (Fla. 1981) (noting that the prisoner there was not entitled to credit for violating the terms of her probation, which included attending live-in drug treatment).

189. Maniccia v. State, 931 So.2d 1027,1030 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 2006) (holding that where confinement is coercive, a prisoner is entitled to credit for pre-sentence time in a "lockdown facility", even if the prisoner requested treatment there); Kansas v. Mackley, 552 P.2d 628, 629, 220 Kan. 518, 519 (Kan. 1976) (per curiam) (finding a prisoner in pretrial custody at a hospital where he was not free to leave was effectively in jail and therefore entitled to custody credit for his time there).

190. See, e.g., State v. Mackley, 552 P.2d 628, 629, 220 Kan. 518, 519 (Kan. 1976) (per curiam) (holding that the word "jail" meant a place of confinement, and included a hospital that the prisoner was not free to leave); Maniccia v. State, 931 So.2d 1027, 1028 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 2006) (pretrial confinement in a "lockdown psychiatric hospital" entitles prisoner to credit for time served); Murray v. Lopes, 529 A.2d 1302, 1305, 205 Conn. 27, 33–34 (Conn. 1987) (holding that statute entitles prisoners confined pre-sentence to credit for time served); People v. Smith, 120 Cal. Rptr. 54, 56, 120 Cal. App. 3d 817, 822 (Cal. Ct. App. 1981) (finding prisoner entitled to credits for time spent in hospital when proceedings were suspended because he was incompetent to stand trial).

191. State v. Mackley, 552 P.2d 628, 629, 220 Kan. 518, 519 (Kan. 1976) (per curiam).

192. Harkins v. Wyrick, 589 F.2d 387, 391–92 (8th Cir. 1979) (finding prisoner's due process and equal protection rights were not violated when he was not credited for time undergoing evaluation and treatment at a hospital prior to serving his sentence); Makal v. Arizona, 544 F.2d 1030, 1035 (9th Cir. 1976) (holding it did not violate prisoner's rights to deny him credit for time in a psychiatric hospital, where the purpose was treatment rather than punishment, unless state law provides otherwise, which it did not); People v. Callahan, 50 Cal. Rptr. 3d 677, 683, 144 Cal. App. 4th 678, 687 (Cal. Ct. App. 2006) (finding that where a prisoner was confined pretrial to treat him to restore his competency to stand trial, he could not later recover credit for that time); Closs v. S.D. Bd. of Pardons and Paroles, 656 N.W. 2d 314, 317–19 (S.D. 2003) (because the time that prisoner spent in civil commitment was not punitive and because no South Dakota statute provided a right to credit for time served while awaiting trial, court refused to award credits); State v. Sorenson, 617 N.W. 2d 146, 147, 150 (S.D. 2000) (per curiam) (holding that prisoner was not entitled to credit for pre-sentence confinement to undergo psychiatric evaluation unless he was confined only because he could not afford to post bail).

193. See Kansas v. Hendricks, 521 U.S. 346, 361–62, 117 S. Ct. 2072, 2082, 138 L. Ed. 2d 501, 515 (1997); Harkins v. Wyrick, 589 F.2d 387, 392 (8th Cir. 1979) (holding that time in hospital was rehabilitative, not punitive); Makal v. Arizona, 544 F.2d 1030, 1035 (9th Cir. 1976) ("The state hospital was established for the confinement, treatment, and rehabilitation of the mentally ill ... [not] for purposes of punishment ... ."); People v. Callahan, 50 Cal. Rptr. 3d 677, 683, 144 Cal. App. 4th 678, 687 (Cal. Ct. App. 2006) (prisoner's confinement was "nonpenal and treatment-oriented").

194. See, e.g., State v. Sevelin, 554 N.W.2d 521, 523, 204 Wis. 2d 127, 132–33 (Wis. Ct. App. 1996) (finding that state statute's definition of in "custody" for the purpose of determining whether the prisoner should get pre-sentence credit includes those temporarily outside of a correctional institution in order to receive medical care, which included treatment for alcoholism); Lock v. State, 609 P.2d 539, 543–46 (Alaska 1980) (interpreting statute granting credit for time "in custody" to include time in non-penal rehabilitation centers, since these institutions also involve restraints on liberty); People v. Rodgers, 144 Cal. Rptr. 602, 606, 79 Cal. App. 3d 26, 33 (Cal. Ct. App. 1978) (holding "custody" includes housing in live-in drug treatment, and so defendant was entitled to credit for time spent there); People v.

the hospitalization context, whether you may count the days in treatment toward your sentence often depends on the nature of the institution and the terms of your confinement there, such as whether or not you will be returned to prison if you fail to complete the program.[196] Typically, the court that sentences you is free to determine whether to award you credit.[197]

(d) How Does Commitment Affect Parole?

Although there is no constitutional right to parole,[198] the State may not use a mental illness as a reason to deny a parole hearing to a prisoner.[199] Even if you have been determined to have a mental illness, you have the right to a parole hearing and the same procedures that prisoners without mental illness have at their hearings.[200] You also should not be denied parole because you have a qualifying mental illness[201] but have not been provided with mental health care by the prison.[202] If state regulations provide for parole and specific conditions of parole, then you may have a constitutionally protected liberty interest in the procedures afforded by the statute.[203] For more information, please see Chapter 35: "Getting Out Early: Conditional & Early Release," and Chapter 32: "Parole" of the JLM. You should also check the laws of your state to determine whether procedural protections apply to parole denial.

D. Conditions of Confinement for Prisoners With Mental Illness

This Part explains how a prisoner's mental health may be a factor in determining conditions of confinement and in disciplinary proceedings. Section 1 details the rights of prisoners who are subjected to isolation and solitary confinement. This includes an explanation of the steps taken by many states to exclude prisoners with serious mental illness from isolated confinement and to increase mental health services for prisoners held in restrictive settings. Section 2 explains a prisoner's right to have mental health considered in disciplinary proceedings. Some states require that prison administrators consider a prisoner's mental health when deciding whether and how to sanction prisoners for disciplinary misconduct.

Strange, 283 N.W.2d 806, 808, 91 Mich. App. 596, 600–01 (Mich. Ct. App. 1979) ("[W]e believe that the circumstances under which defendant was ordered to the rehabilitation center amounts to a confinement analogous to jail.").

195. See, e.g., Pennington v. State, 398 So. 2d 815, 816–17 (Fla. 1981) (holding that because "[h]alfway houses, rehabilitative centers, and state hospitals are not jails," prisoner who attended live-in drug treatment was not entitled to statutory credit for time spent there pretrial); Commonwealth v. Fowler, 930 A.2d 586, 597–98 (Pa. Super. Ct. 2007) (holding that prisoner was not "in custody," within the meaning of the statute granting credit for time in custody prior to sentence, where he participated in drug treatment program that did not involve lock-down but did require reinstatement of court case if the defendant breached the terms of his program); State v. Vasquez, 736 P.2d 803, 804 (Arizona,1987) (holding that in determining whether time spent in a facility constitutes "custody" to be included as jail credit, circumstances of placement are of greater significance than the nature of the facility itself).

196. See, e.g., Lock v. State, 609 P.2d 539, 546 (Alaska 1980) (holding that prisoner would be returned to prison if he violated the terms of the drug treatment program).

197. See, e.g., Commonwealth v. Fowler, 930 A.2d 586, 589 (Pa. Super. Ct. 2007) (stating that the sentencing court acted within its discretion in denying credit for time served in voluntary drug treatment program).

198. Greenholtz v. Inmates of the Neb. Penal & Corr. Complex, 442 U.S. 1, 7, 99 S. Ct. 2100, 2104, 60 L. Ed. 2d 668, 675 (1979) (finding that Nebraska parole statute created a protected liberty interest a prisoner may enforce).

199. See, e.g., Sites v. McKenzie, 423 F. Supp. 1190, 1195 (N.D. W. Va. 1976) (finding a prisoner cannot be denied a parole hearing afforded to other prisoners solely because he is in a mental hospital); People ex rel. Newcomb v. Metz, 64 A.D.2d 219, 223, 409 N.Y.S.2d 554, 557 (3d Dept. 1978) (finding that mental competency is a factor to be considered during a parole revocation hearing, not an issue to be determined prior to the hearing).

200. See, e.g., Sites v. McKenzie, 423 F. Supp. 1190, 1195 (N.D. W. Va. 1976) (holding that liberty interest for the prisoner with mental illness included the right to a parole hearing and also the right to several procedural protections).

201. Bowring v. Godwin, 551 F.2d 44, 47 (4th Cir. 1977) (finding there is a right to psychological treatment provided "(1) that the prisoner's symptoms evidence a serious disease or injury; (2) that such disease or injury is curable or may be substantially alleviated; and (3) that the potential for harm to the prisoner by reason of delay or the denial of care would be substantial").

202. Bowring v. Godwin, 551 F.2d 44, 46 (4th Cir. 1977) (reversing dismissal of prisoner's complaint that he had been denied parole in part because of his mental illness, for which he had not received treatment).

203. See Greenholtz v. Inmates of the Neb. Penal & Corr. Complex, 442 U.S. 1, 7–8, 99 S. Ct. 2100, 2103–04, 60 L. Ed. 2d 668, 675–764 (1979) (finding Nebraska parole statute created a protected liberty interest a prisoner may enforce).

1. Isolation and Solitary Confinement

Isolating prisoners with mental illness in Special Housing Units (SHUs) or "keep-lock" for various reasons—among them protection or discipline—is a practice that courts have recognized as harmful.[204] Although isolation of prisoners with mental illness is not unconstitutional as a rule,[205] it is subject to Eighth Amendment limitations.[206] There are certain conditions under which isolating prisoners with mental illness can cross constitutional bounds. When those conditions exist, courts will be more likely to intervene to help prisoners. For instance, courts will grow more suspicious if prisoners are segregated indefinitely without review[207] or if psychological harm threatens.[208]

Several federal courts have found that, even though segregation does not by itself violate the Constitution, isolation can pose particular risks for those with mental illness or on the verge of developing mental illness.[209] For these groups, isolation can provide extreme stress and worsen their conditions,[210] and 204. It has been known for many years that isolated confinement—the deprivation of human contact and other sensory and intellectual stimulation—can have disastrous consequences. See In re Medley, 134 U.S. 160, 169, 10 S. Ct. 384, 386, 33 L. Ed. 835, 839 (1890) (finding that "[a] considerable number of the prisoners fell, after even a short confinement, into a semi-fatuous condition (state of foolishness), from which it was next to impossible to arouse them, and others became violently insane; others, still, committed suicide; while those who stood the ordeal better were not generally reformed, and in most cases did not recover sufficient mental activity to be of any subsequent service to the community"); Davenport v. DeRobertis, 844 F.2d 1310, 1316 (7th Cir. 1988) ("there is plenty of medical and psychological literature concerning the ill effects of solitary confinement (of which segregation is a variant)."). Modern courts have reiterated these consequences in addressing present-day forms of isolated confinement. See again Davenport v. DeRobertis, 844 F.2d 1310, 1313 (7th Cir. 1988) ("[T]he record shows, what anyway seems pretty obvious, that isolating a human being from other human beings year after year or even month after month can cause substantial psychological damage, even if the isolation is not total."); Langley v. Coughlin, 715 F. Supp. 522, 540 (S.D.N.Y. 1989) (citing expert's affidavit regarding effects of SHU placement on individuals with mental disorders); Baraldini v. Meese, 691 F. Supp. 432, 446–47 (D.D.C. 1988) (citing expert testimony on sensory disturbance, perceptual distortions, and other psychological effects of segregation), rev'd on other grounds sub nom. Baraldini v. Thornburgh, 884 F.2d 615 (D.C. Cir. 1989); Bono v. Saxbe, 450 F. Supp. 934, 946 (D.C.Il.1978) ("Plaintiffs' uncontroverted evidence showed the debilitating mental effect on those inmates confined to the control unit."), aff'd in part and remanded in part on other grounds, 620 F.2d 609 (7th Cir. 1980); Madrid v. Gomez, 889 F. Supp. 1146, 1235 (N.D. Cal. 1995) (concluding, after hearing testimony from experts in corrections and mental health, that "many, if not most, inmates in the SHU experience some degree of psychological trauma in reaction to their extreme social isolation and the severely restricted environmental stimulation in the SHU") rev'd in part on other grounds, 190 F.3d 990 (9th Cir. 1999).

---

205. See, e.g., Jackson v. Meachum, 699 F.2d 578, 583 (1st Cir. 1983) (finding that a prisoner with mental illness had no constitutional right to contact with other prisoners, even if it would have therapeutic value); Madrid v. Gomez, 889 F. Supp. 1146, 1261 (N.D. Cal. 1995) ("[W]e are not persuaded that the SHU, as currently operated, violates Eighth Amendment standards vis-à-vis all inmates."), rev'd in part on other grounds, 190 F.3d 990 (9th Cir. 1999).

206. See e.g. Helling v. McKinney, 509 U.S. 25, 34–35, 113 S. Ct. 2475, 2481, 125 L. Ed. 2d 22, 32–33 (1993) holding that prison conditions that "posed an unreasonable risk of harm to [a prisoner's] future health" may violate the 8th Amendment.) ; Casey v. Lewis, 834 F. Supp. 1477, 1548–49 (D. Ariz. 1993) (condemning placement and retention of prisoners with mental illness on lockdown); Langley v. Coughlin, 715 F. Supp. 522, 540 (S.D.N.Y. 1989 (holding that psychiatric evidence that prison officials fail to screen out from SHU "those individuals who, by virtue of their mental condition, are likely to be severely and adversely affected by placement there" raises a triable 8th Amendment issue); Inmates of Occoquan v. Barry, 717 F. Supp. 854, 868 (D.D.C. 1989) (holding that inmates with mental health problems must be placed in a separate area or a hospital and not in administrative/punitive segregation area), rev'd in part sub nom. Brogsdale v. Barry, 926 F.2d 1184, 1191 (D.C. Cir. 1991).

207. See Hutto v. Finney, 437 U.S. 678, 685–87, 98 S. Ct. 2565, 2570–71, 57 L. Ed. 2d 522, 531–32 (1978) (length of time in isolation should be considered when determining whether confinement there violates the 8th Amendment ban on cruel and unusual punishment); Jackson v. Meachum, 699 F.2d 578, 584–85 (1st Cir. 1983) (suggesting courts should be more willing to inquire where a prisoner has been held for a long period without a time limit).

208. Jackson v. Meachum, 699 F.2d 578, 584–85 (1st Cir. 1983) (urging that officials continue to monitor prisoners in segregation and that courts intervene in cases where there is evidence of psychological harm).

209. Madrid v. Gomez, 889 F. Supp. 1146, 1265 (N.D. Cal. 1995) (finding the risk of isolating prisoners with mental illness or those likely to develop mental illness is unreasonable and violates the 8th Amendment), rev'd in part on other grounds, 190 F.3d 990 (9th Cir. 1999); Jones'El v. Berge, 164 F. Supp. 2d 1096, 1125–26 (W.D. Wis. 2001) (granting preliminary injunction requiring removal of those with serious mental illness from "supermax" prison, which isolates prisoners); Gates v. Cook, 376 F.3d 323, 343 (5th Cir. 2004) ("[T]he isolation and idleness of Death Row combined with the squalor, poor hygiene, temperature, and noise of extremely psychotic prisoners create an environment 'toxic' to the prisoners' mental health."); Inmates of Occoquan v. Barry, 650 F. Supp. 619, 630 (D.D.C. 1986) (holding that housing prisoners with mental illness in segregation unit is inappropriate) on remand to Inmates of Occoquan v. Barry, 717 F. Supp. 854, 868 (D.D.C. 1989.

therefore violates their rights.[211] However, to succeed on a claim that isolation violated your rights, you will need to show more than mild or generalized psychological pain.[212]

A growing number of states have taken steps, either independently or because of litigation, to exclude prisoners with serious mental illness from some isolated confinement housing areas and to increase mental health services for prisoners with serious mental illness who are held in restrictive settings. Courts have approved remedies, many in the form of settlement agreements, for prisoners with mental illness in isolation. In New Jersey, prisoners must be released from administrative segregation if they have a mental illness history and it appears that ongoing confinement there would harm them.[213] The Mississippi Department of Correction was ordered to provide yearly assessments and better mental health care for death row prisoners, who were subject to conditions of isolation.[214] In California, Madrid v. Gomez resulted in prisoners with serious mental illness being excluded from the Pelican Bay prison's SHU.[215] In Connecticut, the settlement of Connecticut Office of Protection & Advocacy for Persons with Disabilities v. Choinski called for exclusion of prisoners with serious mental illness from the Northern Correctional Institution.[216] Similarly, Austin v. Wilkinson resulted in prisoners with serious mental illness being excluded from the Ohio State Penitentiary.[217] And, in Wisconsin, the settlement in Jones'El v. Berge excluded prisoners with serious mental illness from super-maximum security housing.[218]

In New York, advocates with the goal of improving mental health treatment in state prisons brought the case Disability Advocates, Inc. v. New York State Office of Mental Health.[219] The suit was brought statewide and alleged that one of the results of inadequate mental health treatment was that prisoners with mental illness were trapped in the disciplinary process and ended up in isolated confinement settings, which caused them to deteriorate psychiatrically. The case resulted in a private settlement agreement that includes among its provisions a minimum of two hours per day of out-of-cell treatment or programming for prisoners with serious mental illness confined in SHU, universal and improved mental health screening of all prisoners upon admission to prison, creation and expansion of residential mental health programs, required and improved suicide prevention assessments upon admission to SHU, and improved treatment and conditions for prisoners in psychiatric crisis in observation cells. A stated goal of this agreement is to treat rather than isolate and punish prisoners with serious mental health needs. This settlement applies only to New York State prisoners. Also, note that because this is a private settlement agreement, it does not create an individual cause of action, and a court did not order its terms. If you intend to bring a lawsuit based on the failure of New York to provide necessary mental health treatment to you in isolation, you must exhaust your administrative remedies and file a separate lawsuit. If you are a prisoner incarcerated in New York State and are concerned you are not receiving services required by the settlement, you may write to the lawyers who are enforcing this agreement. Appendix B contains a list of organizations to contact for help.

---

210. Fred Cohen, The Mentally Disordered Inmate and the Law 11-8 (1998) ("Social science and clinical literature have consistently reported that when human beings are subjected to social isolation and reduced environmental stimulation, they may deteriorate mentally.").

211. Madrid v. Gomez, 889 F. Supp. 1146, 1265 (N.D. Cal. 1995) (holding that confining those with marginal or full mental illness causes undue suffering for these groups), rev'd in part on other grounds, 190 F.3d 990 (9th Cir. 1999).

212. Madrid v. Gomez, 889 F. Supp. 1146, 1263–64 (N.D. Cal. 1995) (holding prisoners must show more than loneliness, boredom, or mild depression to state a claim of cruel and unusual punishment), rev'd in part on other grounds, 190 F.3d 990 (9th Cir. 1999).

213. D.M. v. Terhune, 67 F. Supp. 2d 401, 403 (D.N.J. 1999).

214. Gates v. Cook, 376 F.3d 323, 342 (5th Cir. 2004) (ordering mental health examinations and care for death row prisoners) ("the Special Administrative Segregation Review Committee shall release the prisoner from Administrative Segregation if the prisoner has a history of mental illness and the Committee decides that continued confinement in the unit would be harmful to the prisoner's mental health").

215. Madrid v. Gomez, 889 F. Supp. 1146, 1265 (N.D. Cal. 1995).

216. Connecticut Office of Protection & Advocacy for Persons with Disabilities v. Choinski, No. 3:03-cv-1352 (RNC) (D. Conn. 2004) (private settlement agreement), available at http://www.aclu.org/FilesPDFs/-f07s2zl.pdf.

217. Austin v. Wilkinson, No. 01-cv-071 (N.D. Ohio 2004) (private settlement agreement), available at http://www.aclu.org/FilesPDFs/stipulation%20for%20injunctive%20relief.pdf.

218. Jones'El v. Berge, 164 F. Supp. 2d 1096, 1125–26 (W.D. Wis. 2001) (granting preliminary injunction requiring removal of those with serious mental illness from "supermax" prison, which isolates prisoners).

219. Disability Advocates, Inc. v. New York State Office of Mental Health, No. 1:02-cv-04002 (S.D.N.Y. 2007) (private settlement agreement). A similar case, Disability Law Center, Inc. v. Mass. Dept. of Corr., et al., No. 07-10463 (D. Mass.), is currently pending in Massachusetts.

In early 2008, the New York Legislature passed and the Governor signed S.333/A.4870.[220] This statute amends various sections of the New York Correction Law, expanding on some of the provisions of the settlement agreement and adopting others. Notably, it defines "serious mental illness," provides for prisoners with serious mental illness to be diverted or removed from segregated confinement to residential mental health units, and provides them with improved mental health care. This law's passage makes the improvements to the system permanent, although most of the provisions of the legislation do not go into effect for several years.[221]

2. Your Right to Have Mental Health Considered in Disciplinary Proceedings

Mental health may be relevant in a prison disciplinary proceeding in three separate but related ways: whether the prisoner is mentally competent to proceed with the hearing; whether the prisoner was responsible for conduct at the time of the incident (or should not be held responsible because of his mental state at the time); and whether the prisoner's mental status should be considered to lessen the penalty or in determining what the penalty should be. When there is a connection between mental illness and disciplinary misconduct, a prisoner with serious mental illness might commit a disciplinary infraction that jeopardizes chances for parole, results in lost good time,[222] and results in isolated confinement.[223] Some states recognize the relevance of mental health and require that prison administrators consider a prisoner's mental health during disciplinary proceedings when deciding whether to sanction prisoners and, if so, how to sanction them. In New Jersey, the Department of Correction implemented disciplinary regulations following a lawsuit stating hearing officers must submit the names of any prisoners facing disciplinary hearings to mental health staff to find out whether mental illness might have played a role in the prisoners' behavior.[224] The hearing officer must decide whether to request a psychiatric evaluation, to take all information into account, and then to consider referring the prisoner to a mental health unit instead of disciplining him.[225]

The New York State courts recognize that evidence of a prisoner's poor mental health at the time of the incident that resulted in disciplinary charges should be considered at prison disciplinary hearings.[226] The 220. Press Release, Governor Spitzer Signs Legislation to Enhance the Care and Treatment of Prisoners With Serious Mental Illness (Jan. 29, 2008), available at http://www.ny.gov/governor/press/0129082.html.

---

221. Most of the provisions of the new law, which will be added to N.Y. Correct. Law § 137(6), will not go into effect until two years after the date that the Commissioner of Correctional Services certifies to the legislative bill drafting commission that the first residential mental health unit constructed by the Department of Correctional Services is completed and ready to receive inmates, but no later than July 1, 2011.

222. The effect is a longer period of incarceration for these prisoners because of psychiatric disabilities. Suits challenging these practices have included claims based on the Americans with Disabilities Act and Rehabilitation Act. For more information on bringing suit under these acts, see JLM, Chapter 28, "Rights of Prisoners With Disabilities."

223. Some courts clearly recognize the psychological effects of prolonged isolation as relevant to determining whether the discipline imposed constitutes an atypical and significant hardship under Sandin v. Conner, 515 U.S. 472, 483–84, 115 S. Ct. 2293, 2300, 132 L. Ed. 2d 418, 429–30 (1995), overruled on other grounds by Cray v. Carey, 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 43286 (E.D. Cal. June 26, 2006) (unpublished). See, e.g., Colon v. Howard, 215 F.3d 227, 232 (2d Cir. 2000) (advising district courts in the Second Circuit that, in cases challenging SHU confinement, evidence of psychological effects of prolonged confinement in isolation is relevant); Lee v. Coughlin, 26 F. Supp. 2d 615, 637 (S.D.N.Y. 1998) (finding that 376 days in SHU was atypical and significant and also observing that "[t]he effect of prolonged isolation on inmates has been repeatedly confirmed in medical and scientific studies"); McClary v. Kelly, 4 F. Supp. 2d 195, 205–08 (W.D.N.Y. 1998) (holding that evidence of psychological harm (both expert and the plaintiff's own testimony) created a triable issue under the Sandin "atypical and significant" standard).

224. D.M. v. Terhune, 67 F. Supp. 2d 401, 403 (D.N.J. 1999).

225. D.M. v. Terhune, 67 F. Supp. 2d 401, 403 (D.N.J. 1999).

226. Huggins v. Coughlin, 155 A.D.2d 844, 845, 548 N.Y.S.2d 105, 107 (3d Dept. 1989) (determining that the hearing officer is required to consider the prisoner's mental condition in making the disciplinary disposition when the inmate's mental state is at issue because "that principle is in conformity with the well-established proposition that evidence in mitigation of the penalty to be imposed or that which raises a possible excuse defense to the charged violation is relevant and material in a disciplinary proceeding"), aff'd 76 N.Y.2d 904, 905, 563 N.E.2d 281, 282, 561 N.Y.S.2d 910, 911 (1990); People ex rel. Reed v. Scully, 140 Misc. 2d 379, 382, 531 N.Y.S.2d 196, 199 (Sup. Ct. Oneida County 1988) ("[T]he mental competence and mental illness of a prisoner must be considered during the prison disciplinary process where a Penal Law § 40.15 adjudication has been made or a well-documented history of serious psychiatric problems calls the prisoner's mental health into question."); see also Powell v. Coughlin, 953 F.2d 744, 749 (2d Cir. 1991) (upholding Office of Mental Health policy that testimony at prison disciplinary hearings provided by clinical staff concerning a prisoner's mental health status must be done outside the presence of the prisoner, as reasonably related to legitimate penological interests (citing Turner v. Safley, 482 U.S. 78, 89, 107 S. Ct. 2254, 2261, 96 seriousness of the offense or the number of incidents should not interfere with a determination that alleged misconduct was caused by deteriorating mental health.[227] Litigation in New York[228] led to amendment of state-wide regulations that govern procedures at prison disciplinary hearings. The amendments contain criteria that establish when a prisoner's mental state must be considered at the hearing,[229] and that the hearing officer must ask the prisoner and other witnesses about the prisoner's condition and interview an Office of Mental Health doctor concerning the prisoner's condition at the time of the incident and the time of the hearing.[230] The amendments also created committees with full-time mental health staff at the maximum security prisons.[231] The committees review SHU prisoners every two weeks and may recommend restoration of privileges, reduction of SHU term, housing reassignment, medication adjustment, or commitment to a psychiatric hospital.[232] Mental illness is taken into consideration in determining whether to dismiss, make a finding of guilt, or less any penalty imposed.[233] Recent litigation, Disability Advocates, Inc. v. New York State Office of Mental Health,[234] resulted in a private settlement agreement that provides for additional changes to the disciplinary process including expansion of case management committees to additional prisons, multiple reviews of SHU sentences for prisoners receiving mental health services, restrictions on charging prisoners with serious mental illness for acts of self-harm, and restrictions on punishing prisoners with serious mental illness with the "loaf" (a restricted diet). These changes are contained in a private settlement agreement. They apply only to New York State prisoners. Also, note that the private settlement agreement does not create an individual cause of action and its terms were not ordered by the court. If you intend to bring a lawsuit based on the failure of New York to follow these procedures, you must exhaust your administrative remedies and file a separate lawsuit. If you are a prisoner incarcerated in New York State and are concerned that you are not receiving considerations required by the settlement, you may write to the lawyers who are enforcing this agreement. Appendix B contains a list of organizations to contact for help.

For more information on your rights at disciplinary hearings, please see Chapter 18 of the JLM, "Your Rights at Prison Disciplinary Proceedings." In addition, because much of the information in this section is specific to New York and New Jersey, you should research the law in your own state if you live elsewhere.

E. Special Considerations for Pretrial Detainees

Pretrial detainees are individuals in custody who have not yet been convicted. Because they are considered "innocent until proven guilty,"[235] they enjoy many of the rights they would have were they not in jail. Put another way, pretrial detainees, unlike convicted prisoners, may not be punished, and can claim that jail practices subjecting them to punishment violate their due process rights to be found guilty before punishment is inflicted.[236] In Bell v. Wolfish, the Supreme Court declared that the Due Process Clause of the

---

L. Ed. 2d 64, 79 (1987), superseded by statute on other grounds); the requirement is now part of New York State regulations, N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 254.6(c) (2007)).

227. People ex rel. Gittens v. Coughlin, 143 Misc. 2d 748, 750, 541 N.Y.S.2d 718, 719 (Sup. Ct. Sullivan County 1989) (expunging prisoner's disciplinary record where at each hearing the prisoner was charged with aggressive behavior similar to behavior for which he was receiving psychiatric treatment; mental illness was not taken into account; there was no consideration of whether he was competent to participate in the hearing; his psychiatric history was well-documented; he had been committed to the forensic psychiatric hospital seventeen times; and the hearing officer did not inquire, based on his nonattendance at hearings, into whether or not he was competent); Trujillo v. LeFevre, 130 Misc. 2d 1016, 1017, 498 N.Y.S.2d 696, 698 (Sup. Ct. Clinton County 1986) ("any determination by the mental health unit that the petitioner's lack of mental health was a causal factor in his misbehavior should apply equally to all charges.").

228. See, e.g., Anderson v. Goord, 87-cv-141 (N.D.N.Y. 2003) (challenging the adequacy of mental health treatment for prisoners in disciplinary housing units at Attica and Auburn Correctional Facilities).

229. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 254.6 (b)(1) (2007).

230. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 254.6 (c)(3) (2007).

231. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 310 (2007).

232. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 310.3. (2007).

233. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 7, § 254.6 (f) (2007).

234. Disability Advocates, Inc. v. N.Y. Office of Mental Health, No. 1:02-cv-04002 (S.D.N.Y. 2007) (providing changes under private settlement agreement to the disciplinary process for prisoners in New York). For a brief summary of settlement provisions, visit the case profile on The Civil Rights Litigation Clearinghouse, University of Michigan School of Law website, available at http://www.clearinghouse.net/detail.php?id=5560 (last visited: Feb. 15, 2010).

235. See, e.g., Campbell v. McGruder, 580 F.2d 521, 527 (D.C. Cir. 1978) (pretrial detainees are presumed innocent and therefore may not be punished).

236. See Bell v. Wolfish, 441 U.S. 520, 535, 99 S. Ct. 1861, 1872, 60 L. Ed. 2d 447, 466 (1979) (holding that conditions of confinement should be evaluated for whether they inflict punishment on prisoners without due process).

Fourteenth Amendment governs whether conditions of confinement violate prisoners' rights.[237] The Court established in Bell that jail conditions should not be assessed under the Eighth Amendment, which bans cruel and unusual punishment,[238] because pretrial detainees cannot be punished at all.[239] Instead, claims are assessed under the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. For more information about filing a constitutional claim under the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, see Chapter 16 of the JLM, "Using 42 U.S.C. § 1983 and 28 U.S.C. § 1331 to Obtain Relief From Violations of Federal Law."

Note that the Supreme Court has also made it clear that losing your liberty by confinement before trial does not violate the Constitution.[240] It is only when your loss of liberty goes beyond what necessarily comes with detention that prisoners may raise claims that their rights have been violated.[241] The Bell rule shapes most of the law surrounding your rights as a pretrial detainee to adequate mental health care and to avoid unwanted treatment.

1. Your Right as a Pretrial Detainee to Psychiatric Medical Care

